P R E F A C E.

IN the present Work the object of the Publishers has been to supply to the people of Cumberland and Westmoreland a complete and modern history of the two Counties. The only histories of Cumberland and Westmoreland which enjoyed any degree of reputation are those of Nicolson and Burn, and Hutchinson—a reputation by no means undeserved: but they are now old books; a long chapter of the manorial history has passed over since they were published; many things are changed, and many are changing; hence the want of a New History of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and the present attempt to supply that want.

The introductory portion of the Work consists of a General History of the Counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, from the earliest period, by Thomas Wright, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., one of the most distinguished archaeologists of our age and country, author of "The Celt, the Roman, and the Saxon," and numerous other works. In the composition of this part of the volume, Mr. Wright has endeavoured to treat the History and Antiquities of the two Counties in such a manner as to show what light the discoveries of the archaeologist can throw upon the condition of this part of England, during centuries which present little more than a blank in our ordinary annals. This is followed by an article on the Geology of Cumberland and Westmoreland, with particular reference to the District of the English Lakes, from the pen of the Rev. J. G. Cumming, M.A., F.G.S., Professor of Geology in the Queen's College, Birmingham. From Mr. Cumming's repeated surveys of these districts, and his intimate knowledge of their various strata, he has been able to make many interesting additions to this department of science, and the publishers have no doubt that the Work, with its accompanying Geological Map, will contain a more accurate account of the Geology of the two Counties than any that has as yet issued from the press. The eminent authoress, Harriet Martineau, has also contributed an article on the Lake District, which gives an interesting description of the past and present state of that "Switzerland in Miniature," its folk-lore, customs, and superstitions.

The Topography embraces a full account, under their respective Wards, of the City and Diocese of Carlisle, and all the baronies, manors, boroughs, towns, ports, parishes, chapelries, townships, villages, and hamlets, in the two Counties, clearly showing their boundaries, area, rateable value, population, landowners, seats and pedigrees of the families of the nobility and gentry, succession of incumbents, nature and value of church livings, tithes and their commutation, description of churches, chapels, and public buildings, endowed and other schools, hospitals, charities, benevolent, literary, and scientific institutions, poor-law unions, courts of law, manufactures, markets and fairs, and a variety of statistical and other information, extracted from MSS. in the British Museum, Parliamentary documents, and other authentic sources.

Generally speaking, in the manorial history, the Author has taken Nicolson and Burn's account as the foundation of his own, correcting their statements, and continuing the history, whenever his own researches, and the kindness of the literary and official gentlemen of the two Counties have enabled him to do so. Many new features have been introduced in the Work, which it is hoped is unique of its kind. Attention is also called to its arrangement, which will, in a very great degree, facilitate reference, and thus increase its usefulness.

With all the care which can be given to the subject, it is next to impossible that such a Work can be without errors; and the fact, that things are always changing, will explain why, before the book was finished, many things had ceased to be as they were when it began. The Publishers have always solicited from their Subscribers, who were constantly on the spot, the favour of a correction of such errors; and by the aid thus rendered, with what they themselves have been able to collect, they have endeavoured, as far as they could, to supply all such deficiencies by a brief Appendix.

In conclusion, the Publishers beg leave to express their best thanks to the nobility, gentry, and clergy, and their numerous subscribers generally, for the munificent manner in which they have patronised the Work, and the valuable assistance they have rendered during its preparation. The aid, thus kindly given, has been of the greatest importance, and will, there is little doubt, tend to give the Work a standard character, and make it an authority upon everything connected with the History, Antiquities, and Topography of the two Counties.

History and Antiquities

OF

CUMBERLAND AND WESTMORELAND.

THE result of the researches of modern antiquaries and ethnologists seems to be that the British islands, when they were first known to the Romans, were inhabited by numerous tribes, which were by no means all of the same race. The question of what may have been the original stock can now only be a subject of conjecture and speculation, but it is not improbable that it is represented by the Celts of Ireland and the northern Gael. The most powerful of these tribes, both in regard to its numbers and to the extent of its territory, was that of the Brigantes, who held the whole territory extending from sea to sea, having for its southern limits the Mersey and the Humber, and stretching northwards to the district now called Northumberland, which was held by a tribe called the Ottadeni, and to the lowlands of Scotland. Two divisions, apparently, of the stock of the Brigantes, the Voluntii and the Sistantii, occupied the western part of this extensive territory, the former holding the southern lake district, and a great part of modern Lancashire, and the latter the country extending from the lake district to the sea coast and the Scottish border. It is remarkable, that the same tribes are found under the same names, Brigantes, Voluntii, &c. occupying territories in the opposite island of Hibernia (Ireland); and, according to different ethnological theories, they had either come from Ireland into Britain, or had gone from Britain into Ireland. From what we know of the general current of migration of the western races, the latter was probably the case. The language of the Brigantes has long disappeared from England, but the same reasons for its early disappearance in Ireland never existed, and had the Irish Brigantes and kindred tribes belonged to that branch of the Celtic race which is known by the name of Cymric, we can hardly doubt that we should have found some traces of it in the Celtic dialects of modern Ireland. It appears to me that probability at least is in favour of the Brigantes being Gaels and not Cymri. We may probably best form a notion of the condition and manners of the Brigantes when first visited by the Romans, by comparing them with those of the kingdoms of the native Irish in the middle ages; and the history of Cartimandua, the Brigantian queen, presents all the characteristics of that of Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, in the twelfth century.

The dissensions among the chiefs delivered up Ireland an easy conquest to the Anglo-Normans; the same cause established the Roman supremacy over the Brigantes, apparently, as far as we know, without any serious struggle. A formidable revolt of this powerful nation was subsequently suppressed by the two prætors, Petilius Cerealis and his successor Julius Frontinus, and the limits of the Roman power were carried to the borders of the Caledonians. The north-western extremity of the Brigantes, the districts bordering upon the Irish sea and the Solway Frith, became now of surpassing importance to the Roman government, as being the point more especially exposed to attack from the Caledonians and other northern tribes, as well as from Hibernian pirates. This was more especially the case when the Emperor Hadrian had raised that marvellous wall, of which the remains are still an object of admiration to the antiquary, for I cannot suppose that anybody, after reading the excellent work of Dr. Bruce, on "The Roman Wall," can doubt for a moment, that that great monument of Roman skill and perseverance was the work of Hadrian, and not, as had previously been supposed, of Severus. This country was soon, therefore, covered with Roman towns, stations, and roads. Ptolemy, who is generally considered as having published his geographical work about the year 120 of our era, appears not to have known of the existence of any town within this district, although he names several in the lowlands of Scotland. But, just about 200 years after this date, the Itinerary of Antoninus gives us the names of a number of Roman towns and stations situated upon two lines of road. The principal town of this district was certainly Luguvallium, or Lughallium, represented by the modern Carlisle, which is stated in Richard of Cirencester, perhaps correctly, to have been one of the civitates Latio jure donatæ, or cities under the Latian law. Lughallium stood upon the wall of Hadrian, and upon the branch of the great northern road which here passed the wall in its way towards the northern limit of the Roman province. According to the Itinerary of Antoninus, this road, after leaving Lavatree, or Bowes, in Yorkshire, proceeded to a town or station named Vertere, which is identified with Brough, in Westmoreland. The next station on this line was Brovacina, at Kirby-Thore, near Appleby, in Westmoreland; which was followed by Brocavium, which there seems little reason for doubting occupied the site of Brougham, in the same county. The road now passed into Cumberland, and proceeded to a station or town, named Voreda, the site of which is found at a place called Plumpton-Wall, or Old Pourth; and thence to Luguwallium, or Carlisle. The other principal northern, or north-western, Roman road, which passed through the modern county of Lancashire, by way of Mancunium (Manchester), Coccium (Ribblechester), and Bremetonacæ (Overborough), directed its course right through the mountainous district of the lakes, having towns or stations at Galacum, which is believed to have been situated in the immediate neighbourhood of Kendal; Alone, near Ambleside, at the head of Windermere; Galava, at or near Keswick; and Glanoventa, which appears to have been on the sea-coast, and has been placed at Ellenborough, but the exact site of it is very doubtful. The road we have been following here joined another road, which appears to have run round by the coast to Luguwallium. Muncaster, or Mulcaster, almost at the southern extremity of the coast of Cumberland, the name of which seems to proclaim it a Roman station, appears to have stood on this road; as did Moresby, near Whitehaven, which is identified by inscriptions found on the site with the Morbium of the Notitia, a place occupied by the cavalry called equites cataphractarii. We have the remains of other stations in Papcastle, near Cockermouth, and near Maryport, which may have been respectively the Arbeia of the Notitia, which was occupied by a detachment of Bæariorum Tigrisenses, and the Glanoventa of the Itinerary. From the latter place one road proceeded along the coast to the termination of the Wall of Hadrian at Bowness, while another turned off in a north-easterly direction to the important town and citadel which occupied the site of what is now called Old Carlisle and is generally believed to be the Olenacum of the Notitia, and was continued thence to Luguwallium.

It is from the important record just mentioned, the Notitia Imperii, composed just before the fall of the Roman power in Britain—for it is ascribed to about the year 410—that we obtain a list of the towns and stations along Hadrian's Wall, which crossed the island at what has been termed the lower isthmus, resting one end upon the western coast at Bowness, and the other on the Tyne at the well-known spot named from it Wallsend.¹ The eastern portion of this marvellous barrier, running over wild and desolate districts, where it has been little disturbed by the process of cultivation, presents far more imposing remains than the western part, and every station and post mentioned in the Notitia is identified without any difficulty. Immediately after crossing the border of Cumberland from Northumberland, we meet with one of the most remarkable and interesting of these ruins of the mural towns, at a place now called Birdsoswald. Besides considerable remains of the walls of this place, which still remain standing, between thirty and forty inscribed stones have been found within the area, of which no less than seventeen commemorate the first cohort of the Dacians. As we know from the Notitia that these Dacians held the station of Amboglanna on the wall, which must have been somewhere in this neighbourhood, we can have no hesitation in identifying that station with Birdsoswald. After this place, however, it becomes very difficult to identify the stations, but Castlecads, or, as it is also called, Cambeck Fort, appears to be sufficiently well established as the representative of the Petrona of the Notitia. Watch-cross, near Bleatarn, is supposed to be the site of Aballaba, which was garrisoned by a detachment of Moors. There was evidently another station at Stanwix, and another at Burgh-upon-Sands, which, perhaps, represent the Congavata and Axelodunum of the Notitia, which were occupied respectively by the second cohort of the Lergi and by the first cohort of Spaniards. The remains of other stations occur at Drumburgh and at Bowness, but whether either of these be the Gabrosentum or the Tunnocelum of the Notitia is very uncertain. In the immediate neighbourhood of the Cumbrian portion of the wall are remains of other stations and towns, some of which were evidently places of importance. Such are Bewcastle, to the north of the wall; Whitley Castle, a little to the south of it and just within the borders of Northumberland; Old Town; Brampton; and Netherby. Whitley Castle and Brampton are supposed to have been the Aliona and Bremetenracum of the Notitia, and Netherby the Castra Exploratorum of the Itinerary of Antoninus. Others, however, believe that the Aliona and Bremetenracum of the Notitia are identical with the Alone and Bretonacae of the Itinerary; and the present rector of Bewcastle, Rev. J. Maughan, a diligent investigator of the antiquities of his neighbourhood, assuming this, suggests that Bewcastle itself is the Galava of Antoninus, and Castleton, in Roxburghshire, the station of Glanoventa.¹

This must be taken as a very imperfect list of the Roman towns and stations in the district represented by the modern counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland. It contains, in fact, only the places which lay upon two of the great lines of roads which entered into the official itineraries, and the principal military posts existing at the time of the Notitia. This last-mentioned record enumerates in this part of the island another place, bearing the name of Virosidum, which is believed to have stood on the coast of Cumberland. That curious relic of antiquity known as the Rudge Cup, on which were inscribed the names of several stations on this part of the wall, enumerates two, Mais and Banna, which are not mentioned elsewhere. Mais has been conjectured, however, to be the Magna of the Notitia (Carvoran), and Horsley believed Banna to be Bewcastle.²

Of the Roman roads which traversed this part of Britain, the principal line appears to have been that of the second and fifth Iters of Antoninus, which formed a branch of the great northern road known to the Anglo-Saxons as the Watling-street, which it left at Eburacum (York), proceeding thence to Carlisle, and so on to the stations on the borders of the Caledonians. This road is in some parts very distinct, and has been found to be no less than twenty-one feet broad. The other line of road described by the compiler of the Itinerary, which occupies the tenth Iter, has hitherto been considered as proceeding from Lancashire through the lake district to the sea, and there can be no doubt that a road did run in that direction, and that there are remains of stations, as at Kendal, Ambleside, and Keswick, which may answer to those in the Itinerary, while traces of cross roads are met with in all parts of that district. Any person who has travelled between Ambleside and Keswick must have been struck by the bold appearance, as it is seen at a distance, of the Roman road up the steep side of the mountain called from it High-street. Another very remarkable Roman road left the great road first mentioned in our enumeration, at Brovonace, or Kirby Thore, passed Hadrian's Wall at Amboglanna, or Birdswald, and directed its course by the Roman stations at Bewcastle and Castleton to the north, and received from the Anglo-Saxons the perhaps mythic name of the Maiden Way. The course of this road to the north of the wall has been carefully and ably investigated by the Rev. John Maughan, of Bewcastle, who communicated an excellent survey of it to the Archaeological Institute.³ A Roman road ran, as I have already stated, ¹ A Memoir on the Roman Station and Border Cross at Bewcastle. By the Rev. John Maughan. Soc. Cathol. 1857. Of course this suggestion would carry the tenth Iter of Antoninus, in which these places occur, quite out of the line which is usually given to it, and identify it with the Roman road called the Maiden Way. Mr. Maughan advances in favour of his suggestion the rather curious circumstance that the valley in which Bewcastle stands has till very recently been known by the name of Walyeava, which he supposes to be a corruption of Galava. Nothing, however, is more dangerous than to found arguments upon similarity of sounds in names like these, and I hesitate in changing the direction hitherto given to this Iter until we have some more decisive evidence on one side or on the other. Horsley has conjectured, on what grounds I am quite ignorant, unless it be because Bewcastle would signify in Anglo-Saxon "the bee-castle," that that place was called by the Romans Apatorium.

² A Roman altar found at Eborac, inscribed DEO SANCTO SILVANO VENATORIS RANNE S. S. so that Banna probably stood in that neighbourhood, and Whitley Castle, situated on a hill, may be supposed to have been the Rudge Cup mentioned above belonged to these same "hunters of Banna," perhaps a society or club formed from the stations of Mais (Magna), Aballaba, Axelodunum, Amboglanna, and Banna, the names inscribed in this order upon it, of which Banna (if it were Bewcastle) would be the most advanced station towards the wild hunting district, and Amboglanna (Birdswald) the one of these stations nearest to it, and of most importance, where we might expect to find such an altar erected by them.

³ Printed in the Archaeological Journal, Vol. XI. The meaning of the name Maiden Way has been the subject of all sorts of conjectures among writers who will have it to be a corruption from the Celtic: and I take the opportunity of deprecating the practice which has prevailed so much of rejecting the plain meaning of English names in order to substitute that of some far-fetched derivation, from supposed along the coast, and another accompanied the wall across the island. Many roads of less importance may be traced branching off from different stations on these larger lines, which must have formed a complete net-work over this part of the island.

As might be supposed from this description of the bolder monuments of Roman occupation, this district has furnished abundance of antiquities of every description. The roads are, as in other parts, accompanied with earthworks of various forms, which have served as camps, or as inclosures of residences, or for other purposes, many of which, without much apparent reason, have been pronounced to be British. The mountains of Cumberland and Westmoreland are celebrated for the number of those monuments of a remote antiquity, which have been commonly called Druidical circles, but the real origin and date of which are absolutely unknown. A solitary cromlech is also scattered here and there over the hills, and sepulchral tumuli, or barrows, are abundant almost everywhere. To return from the monuments of uncertain date to those with the history of which we are better acquainted, the sites of Roman towns and stations, which in this part of the country are usually distinguished by the name of Birrens, no doubt from the Saxon burh, have furnished an extraordinary quantity of sculptures and inscribed stones. Upwards of a hundred and fifty of the latter are given by Lysons and Horsley as found in Cumberland, to which we might add many found since their time, and a considerable number have been found in Westmoreland. A large proportion of these consist of altars, dedicated either to the known gods of ancient Rome, or, more numerous, to local deities, generally of the localities; in Germany, Gaul, &c., from which the colonists of these towns in Britain came. Another very numerous class consists of sepulchral monuments, commemorating sometimes the military—officers and soldiers—but more frequently their wives or children, and often presenting touching traits of domestic affection. Some of these inscribed stones are tablets, which have no doubt been placed on the walls of temples and other public buildings, declaring the reverence of the local authorities and people for the reigning emperor, or stating how much different detachments of the legionaries or auxiliaries had contributed towards the local public works. Of the altars given in Lysons as found in Cumberland, no less than thirty-two are dedicated to Jupiter, and a considerable number to Mars. Among the local deities, those which occur most numerous are Belutucadus and Cocidius, both of which are identified in the inscriptions with the Roman Mars; the worship of the former appears to have been brought into Cumberland by troops from the east established here. Both seem confined to the two counties; and the altars to Cocidius were dedicated severally by soldiers of the second, sixth, and twentieth legions, and by a cohort of Dacians, so that the worship of this deity also may have been brought from the east. Several altars are dedicated to the Sun and to Mithras, which also point to the east. Early in the last century, an inscription was found in the neighbourhood of Lanercost, dedicated NYMPHE BRIG—to the nymph of the Brigantes. Another altar, dedicated to the nymph of the Brigantes, is given by Gale as having been found in Britain; but as these Roman altars are universally dedicated to foreign deities, I am inclined to think that the Brigantes here intended were one of the tribes of that name on the continent, perhaps in Spain, and that these altars may have been dedicated by Spanish soldiers. Many of these inscribed stones are of considerable historical importance; they give the names of emperors or of consuls, whose dates are known, as well as of officers commanding in the stations or districts, whose dates are less certain, and they add names to our list of the pro-prætors or governors of Britain. The sculpture of the monuments found in this part of Britain, though generally rather rude, is sometimes, when it appears to have belonged to public buildings, of a superior class. It would be in vain to attempt here to give any account of the numerous other classes of antiquities found upon the Roman sites of Cumberland and Westmoreland.

Beyond the names of persons commemorated on these stones, and the light they and the other monuments of antiquity throw upon the condition of the country, the history of this district under the Romans is almost a blank. As the hostilities in this province for a long period were confined to the northern borders, the troops stationed here must have been in a constant state of movement and agitation, which increased as the attacks of what were now called the Picts of the North, and their allies the Gaelic Scots of Ireland, became more frequent and more formidable. The original population of the country must have been greatly diminished, not only by the ordinary causes which lead to the diminution of a conquered race under such circumstances, but because Celtic or other tongue, of which they are pretended to be corruptions. The road of which we are now speaking is translated into Latin in early Border records by via puellarum, and there is a story among the peasantry of the district through which it runs, that it was made by women carrying the stones in their aprons. I have no doubt that this is the degraded representative of some early mythic legend of the Anglo-Saxons connected with this road and with its name. We know that it was the constant practice of the Saxons to give mythic names of this kind to monuments of former times, which were extraordinary by their greatness or by some other characteristic, and of which they did not know the origin. We have examples in the names of the Watling-street and the Irling street.

the Romans were very unlikely to leave in such a position a conquered race strong enough to rise and co-operate with foreign invaders. Moreover, we know that the process of extermination had commenced as early as the middle of the second century; for we learn from the contemporary writer Pausanius,¹ that under Antoninus Pius more than one-half of the tribe of the Brigantes was cut off, for an act of turbulent insubordination in making war on another British tribe, the Genuui. To these causes also we must add the continual drawing away of the British youth to serve as Roman auxiliaries in foreign countries, while the population of other countries, especially from Germany, was as continually imported into Britain to recruit the Roman population. At the same time the language of the Romans, as in Gaul, gradually superseded the Celtic, whatever branch of it may have been spoken here, and after four hundred years of absolute foreign rule, in the fifth century, the whole physiognomy of the population of our island must have been entirely changed. Among the vast quantity of antiquities of every description belonging to the Roman period dug up in different parts of our island, not a letter or a scrap has been found which did not bespeak Romans or settlers under the Roman name—nothing which we can call British, in the usual sense given by antiquaries to that term.

Writers of the later period of the Roman empire in the west state that the municipal towns in Britain were remarkable for their political turbulence, which is easily accounted for by their distance from the imperial court and by their insular position. Long before the supremacy which Rome claimed over them had been abandoned, they had been in the habit of confederating together and electing emperors of their own. When at length Honorius, in the year 410, acknowledged their freedom, by addressing letters to them in which he exhorted them to provide for their own safety, he only recommended to them a task which they had already shown themselves capable of performing; for, a very short time before, as we learn from the historian Zosimus, the cities of Britain had confederated together and repulsed a formidable invasion of the Saxons. These cities, in fact, were the military colonies founded by the Roman auxiliaries, who formed the sole soldiery, after the legions, whose especial business it had been to hold the cities in obedience, were withdrawn. It appears from the Notitia, a work which was compiled under the reign of this same Honorius, that of the three legions which had been stationed in the island during the whole Roman period, the sixth (from York) and the twentieth (from Chester) had already been taken away, and that the second had been removed from Isca (Carlisle) to Rutupie (Richborough), where it was no doubt waiting for orders to embark. Yet, in this same record, we find the same cohort of Dacians (or nominally Dacians) at Amboglanna, the same Moors at Aballaba, Lergi at Congavata, Spaniards at Axelodunum, Thracians at Gabrosentum, Morini at Glannibanta, and Nervii at Aliona and Virosildum, and the same troops in occupation of Olenacum, Breiten-racum, and Tunnocelum, as had been settled there at the first colonisation of this district by the Romans. I have used the word nominally to intimate that these different bodies were not necessarily composed at that time of people from the countries after which they were officially named, because it had long become the custom to recruit them from any foreign country, and probably mostly from Germany, which was the great source from whence the Romans of the lower empire obtained their soldiers for the armies in the west. When they had once been left to confederate against the foreigner, the towns soon began to form rival confederacies among themselves, and later traditions, as well as the slight allusions of contemporaries, show them to us engaged in fierce domestic quarrels, in which one party or the other called in the assistance of those very Saxons, Picts, and Scots, whom their real interests required them to keep far away from their shores. We have no means of ascertaining what part the towns of the district, now represented by Cumberland and Westmoreland, acted in these troubles, but it is evident that it was exposed to an overwhelming invasion of foreigners, no doubt Picts from Scotland and Scots from Ireland, who overran the whole country, ruined everywhere the monuments of Roman civilisation, and overbrowed the altars, not, as the book ascribed to Gildas pretends, of the Christian churches, but of unmistakable Roman and other paganism. It is a curious circumstance, that at Plumpton Wall, believed to be the Roman Voreda, five altars were found in the year 1813, bearing severally figures of Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Mercury, and Venus, to whom they were no doubt to be dedicated; but they were in an unfinished state, as though they had been in the process of making at the moment when the decisive eruption of the barbarians occurred. Of its destructive effects, every Roman station that has been examined affords conclusive evidence. Thus, at the site near Maryport which is supposed to have been the Roman Glanoventa, when the Senhouse family, the proprietors of the ground, caused it to be excavated in 1766, "they found the arch of the gate beat violently down and broken; and, on entering the great street, discovered evident marks of the houses having been more than once burnt to the ground and rebuilt, an event not unlikely to have happened on so exposed a frontier. The streets had been paved with broad flag-stones, much worn by use, particularly the steps into a vaulted room, supposed to have been a temple. The houses had been roofed by Scotch slates, which, with the pegs that fastened them, lay confusedly in the streets. Glass vessels, and even mirrors, were found; and coals had evidently been used in the fire-places. Foundations of buildings were round the fort on all sides, and coins and urns in great numbers. These, with the three roads known to have pointed towards the station, prove it to have been a large and populous town.¹

We know nothing of the condition of this district between the period at which these ravages took place and the seventh century. There are good reasons for believing that, contrary to the received chronology of the Anglo-Saxon chronicles, the Angles had established themselves in the north of Britain before the invasions of the Saxons in the south, and they seem very soon to have extended their influence across the island to the western coast. There is no apparent reason for doubting that they found a population there which was at least partly Celtic, perhaps foreign, and which, apparently weak in itself, seems to have been usually in alliance with the Britons, as they are termed, of the western lowlands of Scotland. Ecgfrid, king of the Northumbrian Angles, must have been master of Cumberland and Westmoreland before the year 684, when he sent a hostile expedition to Ireland. He gave the city of Luguballium, or, as it was called during the later Roman period, Lugubalia, that is, the king's rights and revenues in it, to the church of Lindisfarne. In his rash expedition against the Picts in the year 685, when Ecgfrid perished in the disastrous battle of Nechtansmere, or Drumucchan, he left his queen at Lugubalia, in a convent of nuns, which had been founded in that city, and of which the queen's sister was abbess. It was there that she was visited by St. Cuthbert, who was then Bishop of Lindisfarne, and therefore superior lord over the city. It is evident, from Bede's account of this visit, that the citizens of Lugubalia still knew their town only by its old Roman name, and it is more than probable that they had continued from the Roman period to hold possession of it and defend it successfully against the attacks of the invaders, for they led him about it to point out to him with pride the beauty of their town walls and public buildings, especially glorying in a fountain, or conduit, of marvellous workmanship, built by the ancient Romans. Bede tells us that it was the Angles, his own countrymen, who had corrupted the Roman name into Luel, which appears to have been adopted also by the Celtic population of the county, who prefixed the name by which they were accustomed to designate the Roman fortresses, caer, or car (from the Roman castrum), and hence was formed the modern name of Caerluel, or Carlisle.²

For at least two centuries after this period, we have as little exact information relating to the history of this portion of the territory of the Brigantes as during the several centuries preceding it. Under the Anglo-Saxons, however, it had been divided into two parts, perhaps in consequence of their marking two successive advances in the tide of conquest, and these were known to the Anglo-Saxons by the distinctive appellations of Cumbreland, and Westmoringa-land, or, as the latter was subsequently written, West-mora-land, or West-mera-land. These words, which we meet with first in the Anglo-Saxon chronicle about the middle of the tenth century, had plain and simple meanings in the Anglo-Saxon language, the first signifying the land of valleys,³ the second, according as we read it, Westmora, or Westmera, the western land of moors or the western land of lakes. It is hardly necessary to say that this is the origin of the modern names of the two counties. In 875, according to the Anglo-Saxon chronicle, the Danish chieftain Halfdene established his winter quarters on the banks of the river Tyne, and over-ran the Northumbrian kingdom, carrying his ravages even into the territories of the Picts and of the Strathclyde Britons. In the year following, Halfdene distributed the lands of the Northumbrians among his own Danish followers, who proceeded at once to take possession of them, and, in the words of the authority just quoted, "they thenceforth continued ploughing and tilling them." It was a memorable year for its influence on the future fate of our country, for, according to the same chronicle, it was that in which Rollo established in Normandy the dynasty which was to produce William the Conqueror.

The Scottish chroniclers of a later period, anxious to establish a supposed claim of the Scottish kings to the border counties, invented apparently, a history of it during the period following this Danish conquest, no part of which is deserving of any credit, while its more prominent incidents are evidently absurd. It is pretended that Gregory, a king whose accession to the Scottish throne these chroniclers place in 876—the same in which Halfdene completed his conquest—immediately assisted “the Britons” in driving the Danes out of the kingdom of Northumbria; that the Britons subsequently quarrelled with their allies, invaded Scotland, and experienced a disastrous defeat; and that the result of this was that these Britons agreed to a peace, by which they ceded Cumberland and Westmoreland to the Scots, and, withdrawing entirely from those counties, retired into Wales. Gregory, we are told, held an assembly of his nobles at Carlisle about the year 880. Cumberland remaining, according to this account, in the possession of the Scots, their king, Constantine, in 916, granted it to Eugenius, the presumptive heir to the throne, and ordered that thenceforward the earldom of Cumberland should always be the appanage of the heir apparent of Scotland. After the celebrated battle of Brunanburgh, King Athelstan took possession of Cumberland and Westmoreland, but his successor Edmund restored it to the King of Scotland, and it was agreed by treaty, that the heir apparent of Scotland should possess Cumberland as before, on condition of performing homage for it to the King of England. It is added that soon after this the Cumbrians rebelled, and chose a man named Dummaile for their king, upon which, in the year 945, King Edmund led an army thither, laid waste and conquered the country, and, having deprived the two sons of Dummaile of their eyes, restored Cumberland to King Malcolm by a new treaty of alliance.

We have more substantial grounds for believing that this part of the island remained in the possession of the Danes until the reign of Edward the Elder, to whom, according to the English chroniclers, it submitted and remained subject to the Anglo-Saxon crown under his successor Athelstan. In 945, the Danes of Cumberland appear to have rebelled, and, according to the Anglo-Saxon chronicle, King Edmund, who had conquered Northumberland in the preceding year, “ravaged all Cumberland, and granted it all to Malcolm, king of the Scots, on the condition that he should be his ally as well by sea as by land.” But the Danes of the north appear to have continued more or less in a state of turbulent independence during the remainder of the tenth century. In 966, as we learn from the Anglo-Saxon chronicle, they ravaged Westmoreland under a chief named Thored, the son of Gunner. According to another historian of good authority, Henry of Huntingdon, the Danes, whose chief strength at this time lay in Cumberland, became again troublesome, and provoked King Ethelred to such a degree, that he marched into that county in great anger, “and ravaged it well-nigh all.” He seems to have followed the old policy of giving Cumberland in the light of what at a later period would be called a fief, to a Scottish prince, Malcolm, son of King Kenneth, in order that the Scots might have an interest in defending the northern frontier against the Danish invasions. We are told that this same Malcolm, after he had succeeded to the throne of Scotland, defeated, at Burgh-upon-Sands, Uchtred, earl of Northumberland, who had invaded Cumberland in combination with the Danes, probably from Ireland. During the whole period of the Danish kings of England, Cumberland appears to have remained more or less as a dependency of Scotland, but after the accession of Edward the Confessor, the Anglo-Saxon crown asserted its superior right, and Edward gave it, with the other northern counties, in 1053, to the well-known Siward, earl of Northumberland. The Scots, however, had regained possession of Cumberland at the beginning of the reign of William the Conqueror, and held it in the year 1070, when a war broke out between the two countries, in the sequel of which it was conquered from the Scots, and the earldom was given to Ranulph de Meschines, the ancestor of the earls of Chester. William took the earldom of Cumberland into his own hands in 1072, and gave Ranulph the earldom of Chester in exchange for it.

The county of Cumberland has preserved a very interesting class of monuments of Anglo-Saxon times in its ancient crosses, inscribed usually in Anglo-Saxon runes. The earliest of these is preserved in the churchyard of Beckermest, two miles from Egremont. It is, in its present state, a cylindrical column, bevelled to a square near the top, and on one of the bevels may be traced an inscription in runes, like all these early inscriptions, in verse, and commemorating, as it has been read and translated by the Rev. Daniel H. Haigh, of Erdington,¹ Tuda, bishop of the Northumbrians, who perished in the terrible pestilence which ravaged the whole island in the year 664. The inscription mentions the pestilence, and is doubly valuable as identifying Beckermest as the site, hitherto unknown, of the early monastery of Pægnalæch, where Bede says that Bishop Tuda was buried "honourably." A cross of very similar character, but without inscription, is preserved in the churchyard of the neighbouring parish of Gosforth. A better known monument of this description, of the same antiquity, and more important for its size, the object of its inscription, and its profuse sculpture, is preserved, though much mutilated, at Bewcastle. The Bewcastle inscription has been differently read and interpreted by Mr. Haigh and Mr. Maughan;¹ according to both, it commemorates Ælfrid, king of Northumberland, who died, like Tuda, in the year of the great plague, 664. Other crosses, of very early character, are found at Muncaster, Dearham, Rockliffe, and Irton. In the church of Bridekirk, near Cockermouth, there is a Saxon font, remarkable for its profuse and rather highly finished sculpture, among which we perceive a figure, not ill executed, of the sculptor himself at his work. His name is given in a runic inscription, which is read without difficulty as follows :

Richard he me wrought,
And to dis merth gemæ me brocte;

Which may be interpreted, "Richard he me wrought, and to this beauty carefully me brought." From the language, it is probable that this font belongs to the first half of the twelfth century. While on this subject, it is but right to state that the most remarkable of all the crosses with runic inscriptions yet discovered in this island is preserved close upon the limits of Cumberland, on the other side of the Scottish border, at Ruthwell in Dumfriesshire, and is said to have formerly stood at a place in that neighbourhood called Priestwoodside, so that it may fairly be considered as belonging to this class of Cumbrian antiquities. The Ruthwell runic inscription has been long known, and has puzzled many of the northern antiquaries; it was first properly explained by Mr. Kemble, who found that it consisted of fragments of a poem in the Northumbrian dialect of Anglo-Saxon on the Holy Cross, a poem which, curiously enough, is still preserved in manuscript in the West-Saxon dialect.

There is another class of local antiquities which mark the passage of different races over the soil—the names of places and the dialect of the modern inhabitants. Generally speaking, the first rude inhabitants of a country may be supposed to have given distinctive names only to the bolder landmarks, such as mountains and rivers, and the more striking natural features, and such alone are those in England which still bear evidence of a Celtic derivation. When the Romans settled here they appear to have found nothing which answered to their notions of towns, and they, therefore, gave their own names to the towns and stations which they established here. Some confusion has arisen on the subject of the names of the Roman towns in Britain, from the circumstance that each was founded by a detachment of the troops in the service of Rome, and that these, derived often from widely different countries, imported hither names of towns or villages in the country from which they came, just as the English colonists of North America have, at a later period, planted there the names of places which were familiar to them in their ancient homes. Hence we find names of places in this island, under the Romans, which recur in the ancient geography of Gaul, Spain, and other countries. The Teutonic invaders were peoples not accustomed to towns, and when they began to settle they shared the land among themselves, and seem to have accepted as they found them the towns which had not been destroyed in the fury of invasion. The towns which thus remained no doubt retained the names by which they were known under the Romans, whatever may have been the origin of them; and we still trace them in most of the modern names of the same places with such modifications as might naturally be expected. But the Angle and Saxon settlers, bringing with them a language of their own, which was entirely different from that which existed amongst the peasantry who preceded them, gave names taken from their own language to each allotment of land, to the family residences they built on them, to the farms and inclosures, and to all the minor objects, while they almost naturally took the names of the greater and more striking features of the country, such as the mountains and rivers, from the older inhabitants. This is exactly the case in the English colonies in North America, and was the origin of the modern nomenclature of local names in Old England also. It seems to be generally agreed by those who have most carefully investigated the subject, that the number of names taken from the Celtic, found in Cumberland and Westmoreland, is comparatively small. The Roman towns in these two counties seem to have been almost all destroyed in the earlier invasions, and Carlisle is the only one of them of which the name exists, though almost concealed, in that by which it is still known. The great mass of the local names are here, as in other parts of England, undoubtedly Anglo-Saxon. But still we trace among them a mixture of names, presenting peculiarities of form, which are not found in the southern parts of England, and which seems to indicate the presence of other settlers. Some of these we can hardly doubt were introduced by the Danish invaders.

These, and some other peculiarities found here and in other parts of England, have been made the groundwork for theories relating to the influence upon our country of the Danish and Scandinavian invasions, which I believe are carried very much too far, in consequence of generalising rashly individual facts which have often been misunderstood and exaggerated, and upon assumed facts which are really nothing but mistakes.¹ The exaggeration of this theory of the influence of the Northmen, as far as names and language are concerned, rests upon one great ground of fallacy, which may be explained by an illustration. A few years ago, a very talented literary contemporary amused himself and his readers by translating some of the best of Moore's melodies into Latin, and Greek, and French, and then presenting these as the originals from which Moore copied; and at least one of our respectable journals took the matter seriously, and believed that the Irish bard had been convicted of discreditable plagiarism. In this same manner, though not intentionally, the supporters of the Danish theory just alluded to translate the Anglo-Saxon names into Danish and Norse, and then they turn round and compare them, not as they should at the least do, with the language of the Angles, but with the Saxon of Wessex, which was no doubt the least like the Danish, or Norse, of any of the Teutonic dialects imported into this kingdom. We are to a certain degree acquainted with the peculiarities of form of the early Northumbrian dialect, but we know very little comparatively of its peculiarity in words, except that we have no right for assuming that any common words in the Danish, or in the other languages of the North, may not have been found in it in its corresponding form, and the general similarity in the languages, though acknowledged as a fact, is overlooked as an argument. In this way, a very large proportion of the names of places heaped together to support this theory, have, as is not denied, their representatives in the Anglo-Saxon dialects, and are really only Danish and Norse when they are translated into those languages. Thus, I see no reason why strand in composition should be considered rather to represent the Norse strönd, than the Anglo-Saxon word which is literally identical with it; or why the Norse bekr should be considered as the origin of the word beck, applied to a brook in the modern dialects of the north of England, rather than the Anglo-Saxon bec. It is a common case in the local dialects of the present day, that of two words equivalent, or nearly equivalent, one is more commonly in use in one locality, and the other word in another, just as beck in the north of England holds the place of brook in the south; and this no doubt was similarly the case in the Anglo-Saxon dialects of old. For instance, to take one of the words which has been most frequently quoted—it appears that by, or bye, was, in Anglo-Saxon, used in the same sense as ham, though it is of rare occurrence in the dialects of the south. Now, it is well known that, although ham in the terminations of places is not uncommon in the northern parts of England, yet those ending in by, which are very rare in the south, are much more prevalent. We should naturally take this as evidence that the Northern Angles were accustomed to use by in preference for what the Saxons called a ham. But it is taken for granted, I think too hastily, that all names ending in by are of Danish origin, and that they are marks of the settlement in that locality of the Danes, although in perhaps the majority of cases the other part of the name is clearly Anglo-Saxon.²

At the same time there can be little doubt that the northern invaders have left traces of their presence in this island in some names of places, and nowhere more than in Cumberland and Westmoreland. The fells, the fords (in many cases), and the thwaites, seem certainly to remind us of the fjeld, the fjord, and the thet, of Norway; and there are other curious resemblances of names in the northern districts; but still, it ought only to be accepted as a conjecture, that these were derived from late Norse settlers. The traces of the Danes are more evident in names of places which are formed from the proper names of their Danish possessors, but these, I think, are in most cases combined with Anglo-Saxon adjuncts, which show us how easily the invaders, when they established themselves in our island, amalgamated with the people they found here. In fact, there was this great difference between the Danish invasions and the original Anglo-Saxon invasions, that the Danes were not under the necessity of forming for themselves new towns and villages, or even new farms, and that they found all localities bearing names which they understood, and which, therefore, they had no great reason for changing. The small proportion of really foreign words in the dialect of the north shows us further, that the influence of the language of the invaders at least was very limited.

² It is curious, that of two places the names of which are perfectly identical, and have been given, no doubt, from similar circumstances, the southern one in Anglo-Saxon, deora-by (now Derby), has the termination assumed to be in Anglo-Danish, and the northern one, deora-ham (Durham), has the more usual Anglo-Saxon termination. It is true that Derby was one of the midland towns held by the Danes, and that it was also called in Anglo-Saxon, North-weorþige; but it is by no means a solitary instance of an Anglo-Saxon place having possessed two names, one of which, and that the one least known in the previous period, superseded the other. Though Derby certainly existed before the Danish invasion, it is hardly known in history. Both words, however, deora-by and deora-ham are strictly Anglo-Saxon in form.

The ravages committed in these parts during the long and melancholy period marked by the Danish invasions, were more destructive even than those of the age which intervened between the Romans and the Saxons. The early monasteries and churches had all been destroyed, and of some of them we can hardly discover the sites, while the population had been reduced to a state of wild barbarism. Even the city of Carlisle, which had escaped the ravages of Picts and Scots, had been utterly ruined by the Danes, probably during the conquest of Northumbria by Haldene in 875, and it could no longer boast, as it did in the seventh century, of its beautiful walks and public buildings. It is said to have remained in ruins about two hundred years, when William Rufus caused it to be rebuilt and fortified, in the year 1092. The few words in which the Anglo-Saxon chronicler recounts the events of this year, give us a striking idea of the state from which Cumberland had not recovered at the close of the eleventh century: "This year," we are told, "King William went northward to Carlisle with a large army, and he repaired the city, and built the castle, and he drove out Dolfin, who had before governed that country; and, having placed a garrison in the castle, he returned to the south and sent a great number of English peasantry thither, with their wives and cattle, that they might settle there and cultivate the land." This Dolfin was the son of the great Cospatric, earl of Northumberland, and he had perhaps already contributed towards the restoration of Carlisle. During the works of restoration in Carlisle Cathedral, in 1855, an inscription in Scandinavian runes was found on a stone in the west wall of the south transept, which was easily distinguishable from the ordinary mason's marks on the stones around. Mr. Maughan, of Bewcastle, in a pamphlet already quoted, has given the following reading and interpretation of this inscription: Tolfinn kraita at U'phara this stain—Dolfin inscribed this stone in memory of Ulfr. We learn from some of the old historians, such as Roger de Hoveden and Simeon of Durham, that Dolfin, the son of Cospatric, had a son named, in their Latin, Ulfius, who was treacherously murdered at York, in 1064, by Tosti, son of Godwin, earl of Northumberland. As this does not appear to present the characteristics of an older grave-stone used in building, it is conjectured that Dolfin may have begun this part of the Cathedral of Carlisle. It must not be concealed, however, that a very good scholar in northern literature and antiquities, Dr. Charlton, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, has given, in a paper read before the Society of Antiquaries of this town, a very different reading and interpretation, which he considers to have been a satirical allusion to the mason's marks, by some one of the masons who perhaps despised them. According to Dr. Charlton the inscription is, tolfohnur raita theksi runor a thisi stain—twelve idlers cut these marks on these stones. The connection of Dolfin with the building of Carlisle Cathedral may probably be considered as very doubtful; though it is believed to have been commenced as a conventional church in the reign of the second William, and to have been completed under Henry I. In 1138, Athelwold, or Athelwolf, the king's confessor, under whose influence the building was completed, was made first bishop of Carlisle. At the same time, powerful chiefs, who were taught that their worldly errors might be atoned for by expending their wealth in religious foundations, laboured to repair the ruin of two centuries. In 1088, Ranulph de Meschines, who held large estates in Cumberland, and was intimately connected with the town of Carlisle, founded the Benedictine nunnery of Wetheral, of which the gate-house is now almost the only relic. Immediately afterwards, the king, William Rufus, founded another religious house for the same order of nuns, at Armathaite, in the parish of Ainstaple. One of Ranulph's sons, William de Meschines, lord of Egremont, cleared the site of the ancient house of Benedictine nuns at St. Bees, which had been founded by St. Bega, about the year 650, and had been entirely ruined by the Danes, and raised upon it a monastery of Benedictine monks, which became celebrated for the miracles pretended to be performed at the shrine of the saint. Little beyond the conventual church, which is now that of the parish, remains of the monastic buildings of St. Bees. The Præmonstratensian abbey of Shap, the only monastic abbey of any importance in Westmoreland, the ruins of which are still seen in a picturesque situation on the banks of the Lowther, was founded about the year 1119, by Thomas, one of the sons of Cospatrie. In 1138, the second Ranulph de Meschines, the elder brother of the founder of St. Bees, built the abbey of Calder, which is still represented by interesting ruins. A Scottish prince, who then held Cumberland in fee of the English crown, Henry, the son of David I., founded, in 1130, the Cistercian abbey of Holme-Cultram, which boasted, among its earlier monks, of the celebrated magician, Michael Scott. A lord of Gilsland, nineteen years later, built the Augustinian priory of Lanercost, the church of which still remains a perfect and beautiful example of early English architecture. During the period at which these monastic establishments rose, there was also a great movement in building churches for parishes. Many of the parish churches throughout Cumberland and Westmoreland are still entirely or partially Norman, and some of them present interesting examples of what the continental architects call the Romanesque style of architecture. In Cumberland, and especially as we approach the Scottish border or the coast, these earlier parish churches are so massive in their construction that they assume the character of small fortresses, and were evidently designed not only for religious worship, but for refuge during the inroads of the Scots; and the old chroniclers have recorded more than one instance in which the invaders forced the churches, and committed the greatest barbarities in them. This combination of the church and the stronghold is by no means confined to the earlier period, but is found in later buildings, as in the two very remarkable churches of Burgh-upon-Sands and Newton-Arlosh, the latter of which is known to have been built early in the fourteenth century. The same activity in church-building seems to have continued through the twelfth, and far into the thirteenth centuries; and both countries present us with some good examples of early English, as well as of the Norman style of ecclesiastical architecture. But good examples of decorated or perpendicular work are much rarer; and from the thirteenth century till the time of the Reformation, little appears to have been done to the churches of this part of England beyond necessary repairs.

The Normans have left the marks of their footsteps here in their fortresses no less than in their churches. That of Carlisle, built by William Rufus, whose massive keep still remains, may justly take the lead in the Norman castles of Cumberland. It is a curious circumstance that the Normans seem to have experienced a similar difficulty in the pronunciation of the name of Carlisle as in that of Lincoln, which they pronounced and wrote Nicole; and they softened the former name to Cardeol or Carduel. It was under this form that the composers of the romance-cycle of King Arthur introduced into their narratives a city which they somewhat arbitrarily adopted as a chief residence of their great British hero. "At Carduel" says the poetess Marie in the Lai de Lanval, "King Arthur, the brave and courtly, was dwelling, on account of the Scots and the Picts, who were committing great destruction in the country."¹

Under the influence of these romances, not only the neighbourhood of Carlisle, but the whole of the two north-western counties, became in a manner classic ground. Arthur is represented as passing his days, in company with his knights of the round table and the ladies of his court, hunting in the forest of Ingelwood, and an adventure, which forms the subject of an early English poem, is described as having occurred on the banks of the Tarn Wadling, a small lake in the parish of Hesket, where there are still the remains of a mediæval castle. From this spot, according to the story, Arthur proceeded to sup, sleep, and hold his court next day, in his hall at Plumpton, the Voreda of the Romans; another instance, out of many, of the way in which the ruins of ancient towns and stations became identified with mediæval legend and fable.² On the river Eden, in Westmoreland, in the wild district which formed the forest of Mallerstang, are seen the ruins of an early castle, which bears the name of Pendragon Castle, and which, according to the legend, was built by Uther Pendragon, the father of King Arthur, who made it his favourite residence. It is said that he wished to strengthen it by turning the course of the Eden round its walls, but that he was foiled in the attempt, and his supposed failure is commemorated in a popular local proverbial rhyme,—

For Uther Pendragon, do what he can,
The river Eden wad run as it ran.

The local legend points out a spring near the castle as

1 A Cardeuil seigneur breis,
Arms, li preux li courtois,
Par les Escocx par les Pys,
Qui destruisent multe pais.

Poesies de Marie de France, Recueil, vol. I., p. 2.

The reader must not suppose that this form of the name was confined to the romances. Jordan Fantosme, the Anglo-Norman metrical chronicler of the Scottish invasion of Cumberland in 1173, always calls this city Carduil; and a Latin distich on the death of King David, preserved in the Chronicle of Melrose, gives a similar orthography—Postquam cecidit regem nostrum nomine Rex Carduile fuit obsessa scotum.

Under's favourite well, and tells how the Saxons threw poison in it, which was the cause of the death of the king and of a hundred of his knights. To return to a more historic period, one of the earliest of the Norman castles in Cumberland, was doubtless that which William de Meschines built at Egremont, the head seat of his branch of the family, and of which nothing now remains but the gateway-tower. The castle at Bewcastle was perhaps also a Norman building, or at least as old as the Norman period; and there are remains of a keep apparently of the same period at Graystock. Westmoreland is much more remarkable for its Norman castellated remains than Cumberland, probably because during the Norman period it formed virtually the English border. The massive Norman keep of Appleby Castle was imagined by some of its possessors to have been built by the Romans, and has been long known by the name of Caesar's Tower. There was probably a Norman fortress at Kendal, the castle of which has been supposed to occupy the site of a Roman fort. The present remains belong to a later date. The massive Norman keep of Brougham Castle has also been taken by some of the old antiquaries for Roman work,—it also stands upon the Roman station. Brough, or Burgh-under-Stanemore, on the site of the Roman Verterā, has another massive Norman keep, which, like that at Appleby, is known by the name of Caesar's Tower, and appears also to have been called formerly the Roman Tower. Two reasons, perhaps, would lead to the establishment of the earlier castles in these positions; first, the Roman ruins would probably then furnish abundant materials for the builder, and, secondly, they lay along the route in the line of the old Roman road, by which the Scottish invaders would advance southwardly into England.

The strength of these fortresses, indeed, and the energy of the English government under William and his two sons, seem to have restrained the turbulence of the Scots for a while. It is stated by some of the early chroniclers, that the Scottish kings had accepted a composition from the Conqueror and from his successor for all the claims they pretended to the county of Cumberland, and it certainly remained in the undisputed possession of the English crown until the reign of Stephen. The troubles which quickly gathered round the throne of this monarch encouraged the King of Scotland, David I. to make an attempt to gain possession of the northern counties, which he invaded in the year 1125, and, under pretence of acting in the interests of Stephen's rival, Prince Henry, who had been educated at his court, made himself master of all the fortresses in Cumberland and Northumberland, with the exception of Bamborough.

It would appear from the accounts of the old chroniclers, which differ in some particulars, that Carlisle and Newcastle-upon-Tyne were taken by surprise, or by treachery. Stephen immediately marched into the north, but his expedition ended only in a treaty, by which he ceded to the Scottish king the city of Carlisle and eventually the whole of Cumberland. David now established himself in that city, with a garrison of "ferocious Scots," as Ordericus Vitalis calls them, who struck terror into the whole of the north country by the barbarous atrocities they committed on the inhabitants, without distinction of age, or sex, or condition. The papal legate, who was then in England, was induced to interfere, and, having arrived at Carlisle on the 25th of September, 1138, he succeeded in obtaining from the Scots a promise to release all their female prisoners, who were to be brought to Carlisle before Martinmas for that purpose, and they engaged in future to abstain from the violation of churches and from the atrocities which had rendered their name hateful to the miserable population of the northern districts. The year following, David was defeated in the celebrated battle of the Standard, and fled to Carlisle as a place of safety. The King of England was not David's only rival in his claim upon Cumberland. In 1142, the two kings of England and Scotland being then at peace, Ranulph de Meschines, earl of Chester, who, like the Scottish monarch, was a partisan of Stephen's rival, laid claim to Cumberland as the inheritance of his family, in opposition to David's son Henry, who had been invested with the principality by his father; and the quarrel, we are told, was only arranged by an agreement, which must have arisen from the interference of King Stephen, that Ranulph should have, instead of Cumberland, the honour of Lancaster. In the year 1148, David conferred the honour of knighthood upon his nephew, afterwards Henry II. of England, at Carlisle; and so formidable a display of military force was brought together on this occasion, that Stephen, in alarm, advanced with an army to York. The peace, however, was not broken this year; but, in the year following, David, Henry, and Ranulph of Chester, met at Carlisle, and there entered into a league against Stephen as usurper of the English crown. It is said that Prince Henry, on this occasion, swore solemnly to confirm to David and his heirs the territories he held in England in the event of his own accession to the throne of the latter country. Prince Henry of Scotland died at Carlisle in 1152, and his father David followed him to the grave in the following year.

Malcolm IV. the successor of David, held possession of Cumberland, as well as Northumberland, until after the accession of Henry II. but that monarch, instead of fulfilling his engagements to Malcolm's father, summoned him, in 1157, to restore those two counties to the English crown, and Malcolm, awed by Henry's power and greatness, complied, in return for which, Henry confirmed him in the county of Huntingdon. Malcolm seems still to have been unwilling to abandon his hold upon Cumberland, and the dispute led to a meeting between the two kings, at Carlisle, in the following year, but, how it was finally adjusted is not quite clear, though it is certain that the English crown recovered its rights. Malcolm, dying in 1165, was succeeded on the throne of Scotland by William the Lion, who was watching eagerly for an excuse to recover his claims to Cumberland, when the opportunity was offered by the rebellion of the young King Henry against his father, in the year 1173. The account given of the Scottish invasion in this and the following years, by Jordan Fantosme, a contemporary, who was present at many of the scenes he describes, and has left us a narrative in Anglo-Norman verse, gives us not only a curious picture of the time, but it shows the importance of these great Norman fortresses as bulwarks of the crown, if they did not give very efficient protection to the population of the border.¹

According to the account of Fantosme, the King of Scotland at first entered into the war unwillingly, and yielded only to the earnest persuasion of his nobles, and to the temptation of regaining Northumberland and Cumberland, which the young King Henry offered him as the price of his alliance. Before he decided, he sent a messenger to Henry II. in Normandy, with a formal demand of what he called his inheritance in the north of England; and it was only when this demand was indignantly rejected by the father, that William the Lion openly espoused the cause of the son. He then sent to the latter for his contingent of Flemings to assist him in taking the English castles, for it appears that the Scots were very unskilful in attacking fortresses, and even with the assistance of their Flemish allies, who were more accustomed to siege operations, their success was not very great. When, soon afterwards King William, at the siege of Wark, ordered a perrière, or engine for throwing large stones, to be employed against the castle, the first stone that was thrown from it went backwards instead of forwards, and struck down one of King William's own knights.² At length, the Scottish king having assembled a formidable army, crossed the border and laid siege to Wark Castle, in Northumberland, but, failing in his attempt upon the fortress, he abandoned it, and laid siege to Alnwick, with no better success. Greatly mortified at the failure of his first siege operations, William yielded to the councils of his chiefs, who urged him to march against Carlisle, which was well garrisoned and commanded by Robert de Vaux. "Sir King of Scotland," they said, "of all your claims, Carlisle is the most difficult to obtain, and as the young king is willing to give you all, we advise you to go and conquer that first. If Robert de Vaux refuse to surrender it, you must cause him to be thrown down from the 'great ancient tower.'³ Lay siege to it, and make your whole army swear publicly, that they will not stir from it until they have seen the city on fire, the master wall broken down with your steel pickaxes, and Robert himself hung upon a lofty gallows. Then you will see Robert de Vaux falter; you will, no doubt, find his pride fallen, and his resistance will not be very obstinate." Next day the Scottish army marched to Carlisle, and it had no sooner arrived before the walls, than a furious attack was made upon the gates; but it was repulsed with heavy loss to the assailants. Soon after this, William the Lion received certain intelligence that an English army, commanded by Richard de Lucy and Reginald, earl of Cornwall, was rapidly advancing against him, and he immediately raised the siege of Carlisle, recrossed the border, and fell back upon Roxburgh. The precipitancy with which the Scots fled was unnecessary, for Richard de Lucy was obliged to abandon the north, and hurry back with his troops to East Anglia, to resist the Earl of Leicester and the other partizans of the young King Henry, who had organised a formidable insurrection there.

The winter put a stop to active hostilities on the Scottish border, but in the spring, William the Lion, having received a large reinforcement of Flemings, again invaded Northumberland, and attacked the castle of Wark, with furious resolution, but its commander, Roger d'Estuteville, had had time to strengthen his garrison, and the resistance was so great, that the Scots were obliged to abandon their enterprise in disgrace. At this moment, however, the Scottish king was joined by Roger de Mowbray, and other powerful barons of the young king's party, and his forces were thus so much increased, that he resolved on a new attempt to reduce Carlisle. "Away goes King William," to translate the language of Fantosme, "Away goes King William, with his vast host towards Carlisle, the fair, the strong garrisoned city. Lord Roger de Mowbray and his chivalry, and Lord Adam de Porz, join themselves to William's border men. The Scottish earls lead the hated people, who never had any repugnance to perform fiendish actions. They continue their march, without any event to interrupt them, until they come in sight of Carlisle, full of beauty; the sun glitters upon its walls and turrets. He who has a merry banner, gladly displays it; and the trumpets sound in every rank. You might hear the tumult of the terrified city. But, Lord Robert de Vaux gently exhorts the citizens not to be dismayed or to show any cowardice, for, as he assures them, if God keep his life safe and sound, he fears not all this bustle, nor the King of Albany. The king, on the other hand, summons Roger de Mowbray and Adam de Porz to council, with Walter de Berkeley, who was also one of his followers. 'Now behold, gentle knights, much noble display; you cannot count the white nor the red, so numerous are the banners raised against the sun. Go to Robert de Vaux, and say, that I send him this message. Let him deliver the castle to me without a moment's delay; he will have no succour from any man living, nor will the King of England ever more be his defender; but if he refuse to surrender, you may tell him, upon your oaths, that he shall lose his head for it, and that his children shall die. I will not leave him a single friend or relation whom I will not ruin, unless he obey my commandment.'" The three barons proceeded to Carlisle on their mission, and they were introduced to Robert de Vaux. "He was clad in a hauberk, and was leaning on one of the battlements, (à un kernel puaunt) and held in his hand a keen sword, with a sharp edge, which he handled caressingly." Robert, at first, received the king's messengers rather rudely, but he soon became more courteous, and listened attentively, while they announced to him the Scottish king's demand. He replied, that he cared nothing for King William's threats, but that, as he held the castle for King Henry, and could only in accordance with his duty deliver it to him by his order, he required a truce to give him the time to proceed to Normandy and consult with his liege lord. King William was angry at this reply, but he neither granted the truce required by Robert de Vaux, nor attempted an immediate assault upon Carlisle, but, while one part of his army apparently began to invest it, he marched southwards with the rest, made himself master of the Castle of Appleby, which had been left in the charge of Gospatric, the son of Orm, without any garrison to defend it, and attacked Brough, after placing in the former a garrison under three constables.⁴ Brough was better provided for defence than Appleby, for there were no less than six knights in it, with their followers. The castle was very soon attacked on all sides; and the Flemings and the border men made a fierce assault upon the garrison, and the first day took from them the outworks, which the defenders had soon abandoned, and shut themselves up in the tower. Here they might have held out for some time, but the Scots applied fire to the tower, and they were reduced to the alternative of surrendering or being burnt. "But a new knight had come to them that day. Now listen to his deeds and his great courage. When his companions had all surrendered, he remained in the tower, and seized two shields, which he hung on the battlements, and held his ground there a long time, and threw at the Scots three sharp javelins, with each of which he struck a man dead. When these failed him, he takes up sharp stakes and hurled them at the Scots, and overthrew some of them, and ever keeps shouting, 'you shall all be vanquished soon.' Never by a single vassal was strife better maintained. When the fire deprived him of the defence of the shields, he is not to blame if he then surrendered." The Castle of Brough was beaten down, with "the best part of the tower."⁵ The loss of Appleby and Brough caused great alarm to Robert de Vaux, in Carlisle, who sent a messenger in haste to Richard de Lucy, to press him anxiously for assistance. The entire defeat of the rebels in East Anglia, had left King Henry's two ministers, Richard de Lucy and Ranulph de Glanville, at liberty to provide for the safety of the north, and they returned Robert de Vaux an encouraging answer. On the very day of its arrival, the Scottish king returned to his camp before Carlisle, and rendered confident by his recent successes, and ignorant of the approach of Lucy and Glanville, repeated his summons to the English garrison, but again without effect; and he proceeded to attempt the castle of Præstcote and Alnwick. The defeat and capture of William the Lion, before the latter place, put an end to the war.

The possession of the northern counties, however, still continued to be a subject of dispute between the two crowns, and many years passed before it was finally adjusted. At the time of the coronation of Richard I. in 1194, William the Lion tried to obtain Northumberland by purchase, but failed. The demand for the restitution of Cumberland and Northumberland was formally repeated on the accession of King John, who, to gain time, evaded the demand, and William never obtained a direct reply; but his successor, Alexander II., had no sooner ascended the throne, than the war between King John and his barons offered him an opportunity of pressing his demands in a more effective manner. William joined the party of the barons, invaded Cumberland in 1216, sacrilegiously plundered the abbey of Holme-Cultram, and laid siege to the city of Carlisle, which was delivered up to him by order of the barons on the 8th of August in that year, but the castle still held for the King of England. Soon afterwards Louis of France, whom the barons had chosen for their king, recognized, with their consent, the claims of the Scottish crown to the three northern counties, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Northumberland. On the pacification which followed the accession of Henry III., Carlisle was surrendered to the English, but it is pretended that the dominion of Cumberland was to remain with the King of Scotland. It is evident, however, that no such agreement with regard to the county was ever acted upon, and we find Alexander II., in 1235 and again in 1237, making pressing demands for the restoration of the three northern counties, which he claimed as his inheritance. In the year last-mentioned, a conference on the subject was held at York, in the presence of the papal legate, by whose influence chiefly the King of Scotland was induced to give up his claim, in consideration of a grant of lands in Cumberland or Northumberland of the value of two hundred pounds, which he was to hold of the King of England, by the annual payment to the constable of the Castle of Carlisle of a falcon. In 1242, the manors of Penrith, Langwathby, Great Salkeld, Sowerby, and Carlanton, were granted to the Scottish king in pursuance of this agreement. Thus ended the Scottish claims to dominion in the northern counties of England.

The massive Norman castle, as we have seen, contributed largely towards saving the northern counties from conquest during the invasions of William the Lion, who lost his time and wasted his armies in sitting down before a few fortresses, which, from their comparatively small size but massive character might be held by a few men against a host. The Norman keep, indeed, which really composed the castle, was capable only of containing a very small garrison, which might hold out, if provisioned, any reasonable time until succour arrived. But after the commencement of the thirteenth century, a new system of warfare began to prevail, which was accompanied with new military tactics. The massive keep was now exchanged for an extensive fortress, as it was to be manned by a far more numerous garrison, forming sometimes a little army. These new fortresses inclosed an area, sometimes of considerable extent, which was usually surrounded with more than one circuit of fortifications, consisting of a combination of walls and towers. This new style of fortification is usually distinguished as the Edwardian castle, because it arose and prevailed chiefly during the reigns of the first three Edwards. The Edwardian fortress is often an addition to, and in a manner a development of an older Norman castle; but the position chosen by the Norman was not always that which seemed best to the military eye of the Edwardian age, and hence a great number of the castles of this period were quite new. Thus, the castle of Cockermouth is entirely Edwardian in character, though it is believed to occupy the site of an older Norman fortress. Cumberland was much richer in Edwardian castles than Westmoreland, which contains hardly a single example of any importance. Naworth Castle, the seat of the earls of Carlisle, which was built early in the reign of Edward III., was an example of this style of castellation, but it has undergone at different times extensive alterations. Another was Rose Castle, the seat of the bishops of Carlisle, which was built about the same period. Penrith, Kirk-Oswald, and Scaleby, may be mentioned as other examples of the Edwardian castle of some importance; and we have smaller examples of the castle or castellated mansion, of the Edwardian and subsequent periods, at Rocliffe, Muncaster, Hayes, Armathwaite, Dacre, Greystoke, Highhead, Askerton, &c. The importance which the individual gentleman was beginning to assume so early as the thirteenth century caused each to be desirous of literally making his house his castle, especially in districts so unsettled as the border counties, and during that and the century following the grants of permission from the crown to private gentlemen of licences to embattle, or castellate, their houses are very frequent.

During a few years the northern counties enjoyed a comparative degree of tranquillity, for the peace was preserved between the two countries if they had not become very hearty friends; but they were destined to experience a new age of disasters, when the death of Alexander III. in 1290, followed by that of his daughter Margaret, opened a field to the ambition of the house of Plantagenet. After the crown of Scotland had been adjudged to John Baliol, and he had been accepted as king by the Scots, the King of England delivered to him Penrith, Salkeld, and the other manors, which had been given to the Scottish kings in consideration of their claims to the border counties, but a little later, when Baliol had offended the King of England, Edward began his hostility by seizing upon these manors, which were never restored. In the spring of 1296, John Comyn, earl of Buchan, with an army formidable in numbers, but hastily raised and tumultuous, invaded Cumberland, ravaged the country barbarously, and laid siege to Carlisle on the 28th of March. Having been driven from Carlisle in disgrace, the Scots recrossed the border, after which they threw themselves upon Northumberland, and finally, returning into Cumberland, burnt the priory of Lanercost on the 8th of April. Wallace, after his victory at Stirling in the September of 1297, again invaded the English border. The counties of Northumberland and Cumberland were overrun during several weeks by these ferocious invaders, who laid the country waste with fire and sword, and subjected the miserable inhabitants to every description of cruelty and outrage. Carlisle was summoned, but as the garrison showed no inclination to surrender, the Scots continued their march, and ravaged the forest of Inglewood and the whole of Allerdale to Cockermouth. The severity of the season compelled them about the middle of November to return into Scotland. Towards Christmas, Sir Robert Clifford raised the men of Cumberland, and, joining with the garrison of Carlisle, retaliated by invading and ravaging the whole of Annandale. The success of the Scots lasted but a short time, for the victory of Falkirk (July 29, 1298) re-established the power of Edward in Scotland, and, after a successful campaign, he returned with his army to Carlisle, and held his parliament there in the month of September. On his way towards the south, he learnt that the Scots were again in arms, and he immediately signed his writs summoning his barons to meet him in arms at Carlisle on the eve of the day of Pentecost in the following year. Various circumstances prevented the English monarch from invading Scotland during the year 1299, but in the summer of the year following he marched into that country by the western border. The rather authoritative interference of the pope, however, served as a reason or excuse for a truce, and at the end of August, Edward, having returned over the border, proceeded to Holm-

Cultram, and remained there and at Carlisle until the 16th of October. He returned thence to Dumfries, where the truce with the Scots was concluded on the 30th of October, and Edward was at Carlisle again, on his way to the south, on the 3rd of November. The revolt of the Scots under Bruce in 1305 brought a renewal of hostilities. Edward now chose Carlisle as the rendezvous of his armies, and he summoned his barons to assemble there on Midsummer-day 1306. On the 28th of August, the king himself with his queen arrived there, and they remained there until the 10th of September, when they left to pass the remainder of the month in Northumberland. Edward was suffering under the united effects of age and disease, and he moved about on the Scottish border slowly. He was at Lanercost at the beginning of October, and remained there, with the exception of a short visit to Carlisle, until the 20th of February, 1307. On the 1st of March he removed to Kirk Cambeck, and on the 4th to Linstock Castle, where, during six days, he and his queen and court were the guests of the Bishop of Carlisle. On the 12th, the king met his parliament at Carlisle, where, in defiance of his health, he was preparing for another expedition against the Scots. The army had been ordered to assemble at Carlisle on the 8th of July. King Edward, whose mind was far more vigorous than his body, left Carlisle on the 28th of June, and, although he had hitherto been obliged to be carried in a litter, he remounted his war-horse; but the effort was too much for him, and he was obliged to halt the same day at the hamlet of Caldecote, a short distance out of the city. Next day he resumed his journey, and on the 5th of July he reached Burgh-on-the-Sands, which was his last halting place. He expired there on the 7th, and a commemorative pillar now marks the spot on which he died. The misgovernment of the reign of Edward II. exposed the border counties to continual devastations, and the fury of the Scots appears to have been especially directed against Cumberland, on account of the confiscation of Penrith and the other manors which had belonged to the Scottish kings. The district of Gilsland was twice overrun by the army of Robert Bruce in 1311, in the second of which invasions the Scottish king occupied the Abbey of Lanercost during three days. Next year Bruce penetrated to Durham, which city was plundered by his followers, and on his return he attacked Carlisle, but was repulsed with considerable loss by the garrison. He left, but returned by a forced march, and attempted to surprise it by night. His men were actually mounting the walls, when the garrison was aroused by the barking of a dog, and the assailants were again defeated with loss. The booty carried off on this occasion from Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Cumberland, is said to have been immense. After the battle of Bannockburn in 1314, Bruce's brother Edward and Sir James Douglas, after an excursion through Northumberland and Durham into Yorkshire, returned through Cumberland and burnt Appleby and Kirkoswald, on their way. At Christmas, Gilsland was ravaged again, and this inroad was followed by a still more formidable invasion in 1315, directed by the Scottish king in person. The chieftain whose terrible ravages had gained him celebrity under the name of the Black Douglas had led the way, and had laid waste the district of Egremont, plundered the monastery of St. Bees, and destroyed its manor-houses of Cleator and Stainborn. The united forces of the Scots made an attempt upon Carlisle, but after attacking it with persevering resolution during ten days, they were eventually beaten away by the garrison, under its brave commander, Andrew de Hercla. Hercla was subsequently created earl of Carlisle as a reward for his services, but he had hardly enjoyed his honours a year, when he was accused of treasonable correspondence with the Scots, condemned, and executed at Carlisle. In 1317, the Scots again laid waste Gilsland, the neighbourhood of Brough-under-Stanemore, and other parts of Cumberland and Westmoreland. In 1322, the northern counties were invaded by the Scottish king and dreadfully ravaged. Robert Bruce burnt Rose Castle, plundered the Abbey of Holm-Cultram, and laid waste all the western side of Cumberland to Duddon Sands. He then proceeded into Lancashire, and on his return encamped during five days near Carlisle. The unsuccessful expedition of Edward II. in the same year, was followed by a new invasion of Cumberland, in the course of which Robert Bruce established his head quarters for several days at Beaumont, near Carlisle, from which his soldiers carried their ravages far over the surrounding country. In all these expeditions the houses of the inhabitants and every thing which was not portable were destroyed, and the live stock and all the population which did not escape, or were not slain, were driven away into Scotland. The accession of Edward III. brought victory back to the standard of England, but did not save the northern counties from a repetition of these destructive inroads. In the summer which followed that event, the court moved to York, while the English army assembled at Newcastle, and reinforcements were sent to the castle of Carlisle; yet an army of fourteen thousand Scots, commanded by Randolph and Douglas, swept over Cumberland, and wasted the country as far as the county of Durham. The flight of Edward Baliol from Scotland in 1332, drew after it a destructive invasion of the district of Gilsland, which had so often before been the scene of the ravages of the Scots. In 1337, the Scots entered the county of Cumberland by way of Arthuret, destroyed about twenty villages in their progress eastward, and carried home an immense booty. They returned the same year, attacked Carlisle, and burnt the suburbs and the hospital of St. Nicholas, as well as Rose Castle. In 1342, they made an inroad through Gilsland, and advanced as far as Penrith, which was burnt. In a similar invasion in 1345, Carlisle and Penrith were burnt. Next year David Bruce in person, taking advantage of the absence of Edward III. in France, subjected the English border to a much more formidable invasion. He entered Cumberland, took Liddel Castle by assault, beheaded the governor, and massacred the whole garrison. The Scots plundered the monks of Lanercost, and after committing, as usual, frightful destruction, marched by way of Haworth to Ridpath. These devastations were revenged by the battle of Neville's Cross and the capture of the Scottish king. From this time, the border remained for some years free from such visitations, or, at least, no inroads occurred of sufficient magnitude to have found a place in history; but they were resumed after the accession of Richard II. to the throne of England. In the summer of 1380, the Scots laid waste the forest of Inglewood, surprised the town of Penrith, at the period of the great annual fair, when it was of course more than usually filled with people, and committed a barbarous massacre of the townsmen and strangers. They carried back to Scotland a very great booty, and a multitude of people as captives, but they were accompanied in their return by a pestilence which was then raging in the north of England, and which is said to have swept away one-third of the population of Scotland. On this occasion the invaders also made a fierce attack upon Carlisle, and they are said to have set fire to one of the streets by throwing in combustibles attached to arrows, but the report of an approaching army compelled them to withdraw across the border. These attacks appear to have been repeated in the following years, for we find the abbot of Holm-Cultram paying a large sum of money to the Earl of Douglas in 1383 to save his abbey from being burnt. During the hostilities between the two countries in 1385, the Scots under Douglas, with their French allies, overrun and ravaged Cumberland with dreadful ferocity, and, after laying waste the lands of the principal border barons, made an attack upon Carlisle, but they were again beaten off with loss. Encouraged by the weakness of the English government, the Scottish borderers became bolder, and, independently of the greater military raids, the English counties were now exposed to continual depredations. In 1387, the Earl of Fife, with the Earl of Douglas and the lord of Galloway, raised an army of thirty thousand men, and, by a rapid march, fell suddenly on the rich and beautiful district of Cocker-mouth, which had not experienced such a visitation since the days of Robert Bruce. After plundering and ravaging this country during three days without opposition, they made another attack upon Carlisle, and burnt the suburbs. It is related that on this occasion, Lord Douglas's illegitimate son, Sir William Douglas, distinguished himself by his extraordinary bravery. On a narrow drawbridge in the out-works, he is said to have encountered three armed citizens, of whom he slew one, and compelled the other two to yield. It was perhaps on this occasion that the Scottish army was attacked and defeated, and driven across the river with the loss of eleven hundred men. The chronicler, who has recorded this engagement, says that it took place a few days before the feast of St. Lawrence. Next year Gilsland was again invaded with great barbarity. It is said that the Scots shut up in some houses two hundred decrepid people, women and children, and deliberately burnt them.

The ruin to which these border districts were thus exposed during more than a century must have been dreadful, and is quite sufficient to account for the rarity of monuments of the ecclesiastical architecture of the period between the thirteenth century and the fifteenth, which has been remarked especially in Cumberland. In most of the churches, which present a diversity of styles, the Norman or the early English appears to be followed immediately by the perpendicular. Little, too, seems to have been left of the older domestic architecture of the two counties, and most of the old manor houses now existing date from the fifteenth or, more generally, from the sixteenth century. We cannot doubt, indeed, that everything in the shape of building, except massive stone walls, must have been hopelessly ruined. We hear little of border raids in the fifteenth century, and even the wars of the roses seem to have affected these remote districts very slightly. A Scottish army in the interest of Henry VI. besieged Carlisle and burnt the suburbs in 1461, but this appears as a solitary event in history, and any subsequent inroads of a serious character occur only in combination with some greater political event. In 1522, the regent Duke of Albany advanced to Carlisle at the head of a Scottish army, but that place was well provided for defence, and he withdrew without any further hostilities. During the hostilities between the three countries in 1523, Lord Maxwell made an inroad into Cumberland, defeated a force which attempted to resist him, and did considerable damage.

The last struggles of feudalism in the northern rebellions of 1536, called popularly the Pilgrimage of Grace, and 1569, caused a certain degree of agitation on the border, which continued to manifest itself at times during the rest of the reign of Elizabeth, but was finally put an end to by the union of the two crowns on the head of James I. The last inroad of the Scots happened immediately after the accession of that monarch to the English throne, when a party of two or three hundred entered Cumberland and carried their depredations as far as Penrith; but they were attacked and dispersed by a detachment of the garrison of Berwick, sent by the king who was in that town on his way to England. The practice of plunder, however, had become so habitual among the borderers, that in spite of the severe punishment with which it was visited, it long continued to prevail, and even the gallows seems hardly to have been looked upon as a disreputable end to the unlucky stealer of sheep or horse who chanced to fall into the hands of the law. A border anecdote has been repeated more than once, which relates especially to the parish of Bewcastle. We are told that a stranger visiting that place was surprised to find that the tomb-stones in the churchyard commemorated none but females, and he made a remark to that effect to the old lady who accompanied him as a guide. "Oh, sir," she replied feelingly, "they're a' buried at that weary Caerl!" In the sequel, the astonished inquirer learnt that no male inhabitant of that district was known to have ended his days otherwise than being hanged at Carlisle.

However, the opening of the fifteenth century brought with it a comparative degree of personal security, and the landholders began to return to their estates and rebuild their houses. In these, strength for defence was an important consideration, and most of them had a massive square tower, of three or four storeys, with a vaulted chamber on the ground floor. This was the retreat of the family in case of an incursion of the Scots. The larger houses had yards, strongly walled, in which the cattle were shut up at night, or in times of danger. Examples of the towers are still found attached to some of the older country houses in Cumberland. Houses of an older date than the sixteenth century are rare in Cumberland or Westmoreland, but both counties can boast of some interesting examples of the domestic architecture of that period. Naworth Castle, which is one of the finest examples of the later baronial residences, was built chiefly during the reign of Elizabeth, upon the remains of an edifice of the fourteenth century. Dacre Castle, in Cumberland, is one of the larger examples of the tower of which we have been speaking, and is likewise a building originally of the fourteenth century, but considerably altered in the sixteenth. Another example of the tower occurs at Yanwath Hall, in Westmoreland; and others will be found in Cumberland, at Kirk-Andrews upon Esk, as well as at Irton Hall, Muncaster, Nether Hall, and Netherby. Among the finest of the Elizabethan mansions are Drumburgh Castle, Dalston Hall, and Harby Brow, Hardrigg, Howthwaite, and Lamplugh Halls, in Cumberland; and Levins, Wharton, and perhaps Clifton Halls, in Westmoreland.

Local history may be considered as in some degree co-existent with feudalism, and ceases to possess any general interest at the period when the multiplicity of separate independencies were absorbed in the centralisation of power under which feudalism perished. The border counties, as a natural consequence of their position, preserved a general interest longer than the southern districts, and it was not until some time after the union of the two crowns that this interest was entirely destroyed. A considerable extent of territory lying to the north of the Esk, and extending to a certain extent on both sides of the real boundary line of the two countries, was known as the debatable ground, because it was the subject of conflicting claims between the two crowns. This territory was occupied chiefly by the rather numerous clan of the Grames, or Grahams, whose chief dwelt at Netherby, and who, by their depredations, had made themselves equally obnoxious to the two crowns. These depredations had been carried on with unusual boldness during the later years of the reign of Elizabeth, and, as they were not checked by the proclamations of her successor, King James determined to put an end to them in a summary manner, by the expulsion of the whole clan. An assessment was made on the county of Cumberland, in 1606, to defray the expenses of what was termed in those days the "transplantation" of this clan, who were embarked at Workington, and sent partly to Ireland and partly to the Netherlands. The love of their old country seems to have been still powerful with the banished Grames, and some of them ventured to return, and a proclamation for apprehending them appeared in 1614. Nevertheless, some of the branches of this clan had been allowed to remain, no doubt on account of their more peaceful behaviour; and Richard Graham, of Esk, was created a baronet in 1629, and purchased Netherby and the barony of Liddell. The family is at present represented by the Right Hon. Sir James Graham. There still remained, however, in the debatable ground, a multitude of wild freebooters, who were known by the name of moss-troopers, from the character of the country in which they found shelter, and who gave great trouble to the legal authorities, and no little occupation, as has been already intimated, to the executioner at Carlisle. The great opponents of these marauders were the Howards of Naworth, the ancestors of the earls of Carlisle; and the Lord William Howard, who held the office of Warder of the Western Marches during the reigns of James I. and Charles I., was so continually in the saddle in pursuit of them that he became popularly known by the name of Belted Willie.

The two counties appear not to have been so much agitated as many other parts of the kingdom, during the civil wars of the reign of Charles I. Their inhabitants, many of whom were old Catholic families, took less part in the new political principles which were then abroad, and they joined early in the association of the northern counties to raise forces for the king, who had an army there in 1644. After the great defeat of Marston Moor, July 2, 1644, Prince Rupert led the forces he had saved from the battle back through Lancashire to join these Cumberland and Westmoreland levies. Earlier in the year Montrose had raised a small army in Cumberland, with which he crossed the border and took possession of Dumfries, but the approach of the Earl of Callander compelled him to fall back upon Carlisle, where, according to some accounts, he was besieged, but our information on this subject is of a very uncertain character. Carlisle was subsequently occupied by the royalist troops which had formed the garrison of York, and received for its governor Sir Thomas Glenham. At some period during these events, an attempt was made to raise a force for the parliament in Cumberland, but they were easily defeated and dispersed. The royalists of these parts were now, however, threatened with more serious dangers, for the Scottish army, under General Lesley, was approaching this part of the border. Towards the end of September, he defeated, near Great Salkeld, a detachment of royalists, commanded by Sir Philip Musgrave and Sir Henry Fletcher, and drove them to Carlisle, whence he continued his march to take part in the siege of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Newcastle was taken by storm in the month of October, after which Lesley returned into Cumberland with part of the Scottish forces, and the siege of Carlisle was regularly opened. The garrison and townsmen held out resolutely during several months, although reduced to the greatest distress by want of provisions, until the king's defeat at Naseby deprived them of all hopes of relief, and they surrendered, and obtained honourable terms, on the 25th of June, 1645. Lord Digby and Sir Marmaduke Langdale made an attempt to revive the royalist influence in Cumberland, in the following October, but they were entirely defeated by Sir John Brown, the governor of Carlisle Castle, and made their escape, not without difficulty, to the Isle of Man. At the close of the following year, the Scottish garrison, which had till then held possession of Carlisle, was withdrawn and sent away, and orders were given for dismantling the castle.

It was not till two years after this period that new events occurred to give importance to the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland. The first signal of these new troubles was the surprise of Carlisle by Sir Thomas Glenham and Sir Philip Musgrave, at the end of the April of 1648; and immediately afterwards Sir Marmaduke Langdale assembled a force of upwards of four thousand men, raised chiefly in Cumberland and Westmoreland, upon a heath about five miles from that city. Lambert, who then commanded for the parliament in the north, advanced to Penrith in the middle of June, and made that place his head quarters, while Langdale fell back upon Carlisle, of which Musgrave had been made governor. The castles of Greystock, Rose, and Scaleby, were taken by the Parliamentarians on this occasion, and the two former are said to have been burnt.

This movement of the royalists in Cumberland had been concerted with the party headed by the Duke of Hamilton in Scotland, who had at this moment gained the superiority in the Scottish councils, and resolved upon taking up arms to liberate the king. The Scottish army, which was very ill equipped, numbered at that time nearly fifteen thousand men, of whom about four thousand were cavalry. A few days afterwards he was joined by General Monro, who brought a reinforcement of two thousand foot and one thousand horse from Ireland. The main body of the Scottish army lay about Wigton; and it was further reinforced by the forces under Sir Marmaduke Langdale, which now amounted to about four thousand foot and eight thousand horse. Lambert, whose army was quite insufficient to contest the ground with so formidable a force as this, fell back from Penrith upon Appleby, where the Scots were driven back in an attempt to dislodge the Parliamentarians. Lambert, however, continued his retrograde movement to Bowes, where he received some reinforcements from Yorkshire. Hamilton had now begun his march towards the south, leaving Carlisle in charge of a Scottish garrison, under the command of Sir William Livingston, whom he had appointed its governor in the place of Sir Philip Musgrave. The Scottish army remained a month in Westmoreland, without performing any exploit worth mentioning. The soldiers, who were turbulent and undisciplined, overran the country, plundering and committing such barbarous outrages as exasperated the inhabitants to the highest degree, until it was so exhausted that they were compelled to remove out of it by the want of provisions. Monro, with his Irish troops, was left at Kendal, with orders, in case the main army was attacked, to fall back upon Appleby or Carlisle according to circumstances, while Hamilton, ruled by the advice of the Earl of Callander, directed his march through Westmoreland, in the direction of Preston.

The disasters of Preston and Warrington so completely ruined the Scottish army, that about fifteen hundred of Hamilton's horse were all who reached Monro, to carry him the first intelligence of the misfortune of the rest. Monro had advanced from Kendal to Kirby Lonsdale, where he received intelligence that Cromwell was advancing upon him from Yorkshire, and he immediately retreated to Appleby, and sent a messenger to convey the information to the Duke of Hamilton and bring back his orders, but he soon afterwards learnt that Cromwell had taken the road to Preston, and then he resumed his quarters at Kirby Lonsdale. It appears that the messenger he had sent to Hamilton had been intercepted, and the surprise and alarm of the Scots at Kirby Lonsdale, on receiving their intelligence in this abrupt manner of the capture of Hamilton and the loss of his army, may be easily imagined. The cavalry refused to remain with them, but continued their headlong flight to Scotland, plundering and committing so many outrages on the way, that the peasantry, in their exasperation, slew every straggler they met with. Monro, also, began his retreat, but, with the same spirit which actuated his followers, he took the eastern road, intending to set fire to the coal-pits at Newcastle. The Hamiltonian party, however, had now been overthrown in Scotland, and he was met by an order of the committee of estates to return without further hostilities, in consequence of which he marched direct to the border.

The royalists of Cumberland had been active, and seem to have reckoned on recovering the superiority during these events. Sir Philip Musgrave, with a portion of the royalist militia of Cumberland, presented himself before Carlisle, where the Scottish governor refused to admit him; while Lieutenant Bird, who held Cocker-mouth Castle for the parliament, was besieged by about five hundred of the royalist forces of Cumberland during more than a month, until he was relieved on the 29th of September, by the arrival of Colonel Ashton, whom Cromwell had sent from Lancaster to his assistance. Carlisle was delivered by the Scots to Cromwell on the 1st of October, and received a strong garrison, consisting chiefly of cavalry, as they were designed for the suppression of the moss-troopers.

The garrison appears to have been increased in subsequent years, as we read of a detachment of a thousand men having been sent into Scotland, in the December of 1650, and of another detachment of two thousand men sent by Major-General Harrison, then governor of Carlisle, against a party of Scots, who threatened the border in the June of the following year.

Both Cumberland and Westmoreland were reduced to great distress by the ravages of the Scots during the expedition of the Duke of Hamilton. The petitions of the inhabitants of the former county, when seeking to be eased of the burthen of supporting the garrison of Carlisle after the expulsion of the Scots, complained that families of the first quality had hardly bread enough for their own consumption, with nothing to drink but water; that people died of starvation in the public roads; and that there were in the county of Cumberland no less than thirty thousand families who had neither seed nor bread corn, and who were entirely without money to buy them. The parliament ordered a collection to be made for their relief.

The border counties again enjoyed a long period of tranquillity. During the Scottish Jacobite rebellion of 1715, another attempt was made to penetrate into England by the route through Cumberland. Towards the end of October, Brigadier Mackintosh with his Highlanders had formed a junction at Kelso with the English insurgents under General Forster and Lord Kenmure; and at the beginning of November they crossed the border and took up their quarters at Brampton, where Forster opened his commission from the Earl of Mar, which appointed him commander-in-chief of the army in England, and at the same time the Pretender was proclaimed. The rebels marched through Cumberland and Westmoreland, halting for a while at Penrith and Appleby, but meeting with no sympathy from the population of the country through which they passed, and many of the English troops had deserted before they reached Kirby Lonsdale. The ill-conducted expedition ended speedily by the capture of the rebel army at Preston.

In the more formidable rebellion of 1745, these counties were chosen as the line of march of the Pretender into England. The Pretender left Kelso on the 6th of November; and, after making a demonstration as though he would enter Northumberland, in order to deceive General Wade, who was at Newcastle, he crossed the Esk on the 9th near Longtown, and entered Cumberland, passing that night at a place called Reddings on the road to Carlisle. Having assembled his whole army here on the 10th, he continued his march. A party of Highland cavalry had already shown themselves upon Stanwix bank, but had retired after a few shots from the castle. Carlisle had been left in a very defenceless condition, its whole garrison consisting of a company of invalids under the command of Colonel Durand, and the fortifications in a ruinous state; but the whole body of the militia of Cumberland and Westmoreland had been drawn into the city, and the mayor, Mr. Pattison, talked of defending the place with resolution. Accordingly, the summons to surrender was received in silent defiance, and the rebels, after firing a few shots, marched on the 11th to Brampton, in consequence of a report that General Wade was advancing to the relief of Carlisle. Charles Edward Stuart slept on the 9th at a Mr. Murray's, three miles south of Carlisle: on the 10th at Black Hall, in St. Mary's parish; and on the 11th at Warwick Hall. As no more was heard of Wade, a strong division of the Scottish army resumed the siege of Carlisle on the 13th, and the town and garrison at first made great show of resistance; but, when preparations were made for an assault on the 15th, both the mayor and the governor agreed to capitulate; and the Duke of Perth took possession of Carlisle in the name of the Pretender, who was next day proclaimed there, the mayor and municipal bodies attending with the sword and mace carried before them. The rebels took, in the castle and city, a great number of cannon, fifteen cohorn mortars, and an abundance of cannon-balls, grenades, small bombs, about a hundred barrels of gunpowder, and other military stores. Among the arms were many of the Highland broad swords taken at Preston in 1715. On the 21st and 22nd, the Scottish army, leaving a garrison of two hundred men in Carlisle, marched to Penrith, and thence advanced to the southward through Lancashire.

The subsequent fate of this expedition is well known, and belongs but partially to our border counties. The Pretender reached Penrith on his retreat on the 17th of December, during the night of which day the Duke of Cumberland and Major-General Oglethorpe, who were in pursuit, slept at Kendal. Next morning, Oglethorpe's light horse, accompanied by many of the squires and farmers of the country armed and mounted, rode early in the pursuit, and came in sight of the rear of the rebel army, as it was making its way laboriously over Clifton moor, but as the Pretender had sent most of his horse to protect the baggage and artillery, Oglethorpe did not feel strong enough to attack it, and fell back upon Kendal. Lord George Murray, who commanded the rear of the Pretender's army, sent forward the baggage, and remained behind to check the pursuit. Leaving a few men in a farm-house on the road, he marched rapidly through the village of Clifton, with about three hundred foot and a troop of horse, to take possession of Lowther Hall, where he found a servant of the Duke of Cumberland, from whom he learnt that the duke was advancing with four thousand cavalry and some infantry, and that he intended to establish his head quarters at Lowther Hall the same evening. Lord George fell back in haste upon the village of Clifton, and despatched a messenger to Prince Charles, who sent some regiments back to reinforce him. These were placed under cover of the hedges and walls in a line from the village of Clifton to the house of a Quaker, named Savage, at the foot of the moor. One of Savage's family, however, made his way through the fields unobserved, as the night had now set in, and informed the Duke of Cumberland of the dispositions of the rebel forces. The English made an attempt to dislodge the latter, in spite of the darkness, but they were repulsed with some loss. Nevertheless, the rebels made a hasty retreat to Penrith, expecting to find their prince there, but he had no sooner heard of the skirmish than he fled precipitately to Carlisle. The night was so dark, and the mountain roads in that winter season so bad, that the rebels, though not pursued, suffered greatly, and Charles Stuart was obliged to abandon his horse and proceed on foot, and in this condition he reached Carlisle next morning, the 19th of December.

The Duke of Cumberland had slept that night in the house of a loyal Quaker, in the outskirts of the village of Clifton, but in the morning he continued the pursuit. The rebels remained only one night in Carlisle, and on the 20th, leaving a garrison of three hundred men in the castle, continued their retreat, and at night recrossed the river Esk into Scotland. They had quitted Carlisle so precipitately, that they were obliged to leave there all their artillery and a great part of their baggage; and at the time they were crossing the Esk, the Duke of Cumberland was already within eight miles of Carlisle, which was formally invested next day. The siege operations were delayed by the want of siege artillery, which had to be brought from Whitehaven; but the duke's batteries were in a condition to open fire on the 28th, and the Scottish garrison surrendered at discretion on the 30th. The suppression of this rebellion may be considered as closing the history of the Scottish border.

The Geology of Cumberland and Westmoreland,

WITH PASTORAL RESEMBLANCE.

THE DISTRICT OF THE ENGLISH LAKES.

SOME few years ago I burst into the studio of a clever artist, an intimate friend, and found him occupied in putting some finishing touches to a landscape composition. The general effect was pleasing enough, and the arrangement of light and shade exquisite; still, when asked my opinion upon the production, I was obliged to express dissatisfaction. My friend slightly coloured. What was it which offended me? Want of congruity, I replied;—want of truthfulness to nature. Even had you not expressly informed me of the fact, I should have been assured that it is no real landscape which is here pourtrayed. I then questioned him as to his summer ramblings. Had he ever sketched in Kent? Yes, many a time. Had he ever visited Wales or Cumberland? Yes, both. Perhaps he had crossed over into the Isle of Man? Yes; he had some Manx sketches in his portfolio. And therefore, I continued, in composing this picture from your note-book, you have placed on one side of your lovely Kentish valley, with its hazel copses and hop-clad slopes, the towering porphyritic peaks of Scawfell and Great-Gable, and on the other the beautifully rounded outline of Bein-y-Phot or Greebah, the softer clay schists of whose surface have been ploughed up by the passage over them of ice-floes and icebergs, and then degraded during ages of quiet upheaval from the depths of an arctic sea. And see, I added, this mass of rock which so picturesquely occupies the foreground, and is presumed to have been detached and to have fallen from this frowning porphyritic precipice, is a veritable lump of mountain limestone, one of the blocks which the action of the boisterous sea which beats on the iron-bound coast of old Mona, has torn down from the singular patch of limestone which juts out between Port St. Mary and Perwick bay. My friend, with his characteristic candour, owned the correctness of my remarks, and acknowledged that, to be a proficient in his art, he ought either to paint direct from nature, or, if he composed a picture, to become a geologist.

Perhaps some might be inclined to exclaim, “Cur ego amicum offendam in nugis:” i.e., “Why get in a passion with such trifles as these;” or, with the same classic author, to affirm that “to poets and painters sufficient liberty must be allowed.” Granted; yet our old friend Horace is quite as decided as to the necessity of unity in a poem or a picture; and that man as much offends against true art, truth, and nature itself, who paints a granitic peak a-top of a chalk cliff, as he who pourtrays “a dolphin in the woods, or a wild boar in the midst of the sea.”

The fact is, that both poets and painters of some eminence have been guilty of many (so to speak) geological anachronisms. The terms granitic and adamantine sound very grand, and help to round a line, if they do not always express a truth; and so, also, it is very easy to paint gigantic breakers dashing against impossible coasts, and from ignorance of the effects of the atmosphere on rocks of different texture, to display, on the same canvas, such an aggregation of scenery as it is not likely, if at all possible, should occur on the face of nature.

Geology, though an infant science, has already added immensely to the intellectual enjoyments of the human race. The history of no country can be considered complete without the chapter of its physical history; and for a tourist to enter upon a district, guide-book and map in hand, but that guide-book or map defective in geological description or colouring, is much the same as if he should walk into a picture gallery with a catalogue of its contents, but that catalogue unnumbered, or the numbers so placed as not to correspond with the tickets attached to each separate painting.

The following pages are intended to supply to the present volume such a synopsis of the geology of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and more especially of the lake district, as may help the general reader to a just appreciation of the varied beauties which belong to this locality; and, whilst gazing on the lovely retirement of the vales, and the deep quiet of those azure lakes in which majestic mountains glass themselves, to enable him to revert to the period when the mountains were being heaved up with volcanic throes from the depths of the primeval ocean, or, subsequently, were being degraded by the action of the glacier and the avalanche, whilst an arctic sea reached far up into the country, changing the valleys into icy fords, whence it bore far away vast spoils of porphyry, greenstone, and granite, and spread them over a sea bottom which has since become the plains of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Staffordshire, stranding also a portion on the southern coasts of the Isle of Man.

When I first became acquainted with Cumberland and Westmoreland, I was but a tyro in earth-science. It is a fearful country for the young student in geology to break ground in. Torn in pieces, and then crumpled up in almost every possible contortion—intersected with vast dykes of protruded and intruded igneous rocks—starred in every direction with faults, and then scored with the ice tracks of a thousand ages;—how is such a country to be unravelled? Where must the student begin?—where can he end?

No wonder, then, that at the end of three months, though many a rock had yielded to the more energetic blows of my youthful hammer, and my packages were considerably heavier on my exodus from the country than at my advent to it, I had not advanced far into a knowledge of the structure of the mountain masses, and of their relation to the rocks of other regions I was in almost total ignorance. At that time, the great subdivisions of the oldest strata of the globe—the inner garments, as it were, which wrap about the giant limbs of Mother Earth, had scarcely been made out; and the terms Cambrian, Cambrian, Silurian, Devonian, were only beginning to find a place in the vocabulary of geologists. The patient, untiring labours of an humble individual, Mr. Otley, who must ever be regarded as the father of Cumberland and Westmoreland geology, had indeed worked out the chief problems of relative age of the different deposits, and had traced out almost accurately the boundaries of each; but the subject of metamorphism (i.e., change of form or structure of rocks) had hardly been touched upon, and the diluvial theory of the transport of boulders, and of the gravel and sands of the later tertiaries, reigned supreme.

The orderly mind of the venerable father of English geology, William Smith, accustomed to trace out that beautiful sequence of the strata of the secondary period, which in no quarter of the globe is better developed than in the south and east of England, started back at the confusion of this area of volcanic action; and the maps which he and his talented son-in-law, Professor Phillips, had accomplished, could only at the time place the rocks of the lake country under the one great nomenclature of the clay-slate and grauwacke-slate system. It was reserved to Professor Sedgwick, applying a mind powerful in itself, but trained to closer reasoning by the studies of that university of which he has long been so bright an ornament, to bring forth order out of chaos, and after many a footsore ramble amongst the mountains and glens of his almost native district, to lay before the Geological Society of London the result of years of investigation, in a series of papers which must ever form the ground-work of any geological description of this area.

Whatever future research may do in determining, by means of larger suites of fossils, the actual equivalents of the rocks of the lake district and surrounding country, when placed alongside those of Wales and other palæozoic and hypozoic districts, whatever may be the nomenclature which future geologists may find it most convenient to adopt in reference to these vast groups of strata—whether the name Cambrian, as first bestowed upon them by Professor Sedgwick, be retained, and whether it be regarded as corresponding with a portion of the lower silurian of Sir Roderic Murchison, still it is very unlikely that any material alteration can take place in the classification which Professor Sedgwick has made of the rocks of these counties, or in the outline which he has traced of the different areas which they occupy. The tribute which that eminent geologist Professor Phillips has given to the work of Professor Sedgwick is most just when he says, "From his judgment it is seldom safe to differ." In later years I have several times gone over this locality, again and again making various traverses, chiefly with the view of tracing the direction of the currents of the boulder-clay and post-tertiary period, and the map which Professor Sedgwick has deposited in the library of the Geological Society of London, has certainly been my most faithful guide in following up to their true situs, or origin, the several drifted materials.

An old writer, in speaking of the Isle of Man, has described it as "ano parko in y^e sea, impaled with rocks." Such might, in former ages, have served for the description too of the English lake district. The plains which encircle it on every side in which we may include the fragment of the drift fringing its western margin) formed the bed of a sea, out of which uprose the pinnacles of slate, porphyry, syenite, and granite, in the midst of which repose those exquisite waters which have given a character and celebrity to this portion of England.

In endeavouring to give to the general reader a notion of the structure of the area of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and of the causes which have led to its present appearance, I shall only presume that he possesses a very small quantity of geological knowledge, and can excuse my using very simple terms and illustrations. It is necessary that he should be aware that the rocks of which the crust of the globe on which we live is composed may be divided first of all into two great classes, viz., igneous, or those which have been forced up from below by the action of fire, and aqueous (or perhaps, rather, as we should call them, sedimentary), i.e., those which have been deposited from above after having been mechanically suspended in, or rolled along by, water. To the former class, in modern times, belongs the lava poured forth from volcanoes; and to the latter class belong the mud, sand, and gravel which settle down either in fresh water lakes or at the bottom of the sea. Both the above classes have in some places undergone a change in their original constitution, and, from some causes which I will not now discuss, have assumed a crystalline, or semi-crystalline appearance. They have hence been called metamorphic, i.e., altered rocks.

In the district of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and particularly in the midst of the lakes, we meet with the most perfect examples of these different classes of rock, and I proceed to give a short account of the origin of each, and the localities where they may best be studied. I will not speculate upon what may have been the original condition of our globe, but presume that we have come to that chapter in its history when the physical operations going on upon its surface were similar in kind, though, perhaps, not altogether in degree, to those which we witness now;—when, as now, the earthquake and the volcano were upheaving and breaking the surface of our earth, and the sea and air were at work upon the upheaved surface, pulling it down again to one general level.

The earliest stratified rocks of this district, as far as we at present know, are the Skiddaw slates, whose general character is dark, glossy, laminated, and argillaceous. Though deposited originally as mud at the bottom of the primeval sea, it is only very lately that organic remains, that is, fossils, or relics of ancient life, have been discovered in them. We are indebted for this discovery to Mr. John Ruthven, of Kendal, whose labours in working out the details of these beds, and of the greater part of the strata of this district, are beyond all praise. Previous to his discoveries, it had been usual to term the Skiddaw slate as hypozoic, i.e., below the range of life upon our globe. But I would observe here, that even should no organic remains be found in any particular rock, it would always be unsafe to say that at the period of its formation there was no animal life upon the surface of our earth. The sea bottom of that locality might at that time have happened to be so deep as to lie below the lowest known zone of animal life. There are vast areas at the bottom of our present oceans which must be regarded almost as marine deserts, destitute of a fauna or flora, except of a microscopic character. Besides, many strata (as, for instance, the lower portion of these Skiddaw slates) have, since their deposition in the form of mud, undergone great changes, in which such a general derangement of the particles of which they were made up has been effected as to obliterate all traces of organised life which may once have existed in them.

These Skiddaw slates may best be studied by making a traverse across the country in a south-westward direction, beginning from Calbeck Fells. The scenery which passes before the eye in this district is of the wildest character, for the strata have been crumpled up and tossed about in grand confusion. I have never dwelt on a prospect which has gratified me more than that which is presented to view on a summer's eve, to one looking westward from Latrigg, towards Causey Pike, Grassmoor, and Whiteless. I can only compare it to that of a troubled ocean running really "mountains high," and fixed all on a sudden in a solid condition.

The boundary of the Skiddaw slate district will be found by drawing a curved line first northward, then north-westward, from Mell Fell at the foot of Ulleswater, by Mungrisdale, towards Hesketh, then turning westward to Isell, thence through Cockermouth south-westward to Egremont. From a few miles south of Egremont, we shall find the southern boundary as a rather irregular line passing across Eumerdale near the Great Coves, over Highstile, Honister Crag, and the head of Newlands, thence by Wallow Crag near Keswick, by Wantnawite Crag and Wolf Crag, and back again to the south side of Mell Fell.

It should be observed also that we have a great mass of the Skiddaw slate brought up, contorted and altered, in Black Combe, in the south-western corner of Cumberland, at a point far distant from the proper Skiddaw slate district.

Next above the Skiddaw slates, we have a mass of green slates and porphyries of vast thickness. It would seem that whilst the ordinary aqueous deposits were going on at the bottom of the sea of that period, there were constant outbursts of igneous matter from the bowels of the earth. Sometimes the ejected matter (ejected, probably, at a great depth in the ocean, and therefore under great pressure) first disturbed, then overlaid, the aqueous deposits, forming breccias and masses of plutonic rock. Again, these masses were degraded and rubbed down into fine mud, and the result deposited either in beds of plutonic silt by themselves, or they were mixed with the ordinary deposits of the then sea bottom.

We meet with similar appearances, though of a different geological age, and belonging to an entirely different and later system, in the south of the Isle of Man. There the ordinary deposits of limestone, of the carboniferous period, are distinctly seen mingled with igneous rock; basaltic masses with dykes sometimes rising up through the beds of limestone—sometimes overlying them—at other times alternating with them, and even mingled in such a manner that the ordinary fossils of the carboniferous period are found embedded in masses of trap-tuff; and the mixture of volcanic ash and mud with calcareous mud is so intimate that it is difficult to name some hard specimens of the resulting rock, or to say which most predominates in them, the volcanic or the calcareous element.

As in the case of the Skiddaw slates, so in reference to these superior green and porphyritic slates, we must observe that a change in their constitution has taken place since their deposition and consolidation. This change may have been effected by long contact under great pressure with heated masses of granitic rocks; and we may well notice that great masses of syenite do actually break out in the midst of them in several instances, as, for example, in the vale of St. John, near Keswick, and on the southern side of Ennerdale.

As might naturally have been expected, the change, or metamorphism, has most intensely affected the more porphyritic portion of this series. Having at a previous period been in a fused condition, it more readily assumed the crystalline character when again subjected to heat.

It is not surprising that in such a series of rocks, deposited under circumstances generally so unfavorable to life or to the preservation of organic remains, we have not met with any fossils. They may, however, yet be found embedded as in the Isle of Man, even in volcanic products. In fact, in the upper portion of them we do meet with organic remains in a calcareous band, which has been named by Professor Sedgwick the Coniston limestone, and which, though formerly regarded by him as belonging to and forming the base of an upper group of strata on the parallel of the Bala limestone of North Wales, has ultimately been included in his lower subdivision of the Cambrian strata. In the same subdivision he includes the group of dark coloured slates and clay flagstones lying just above the Coniston limestone band, and to which he has given the name of Coniston calcareous slate, or Brathay flags. The total thickness of these beds of limestone slate and flagstones is not less than 1,800 feet. Their general appearance indicates an altered condition of the sea bottom at the time of their deposit, and a cessation, for a long period, of those outbursts of igneous matter which had previously been disturbing it. Thus, the circumstances were more favourable to the development of life, and to the preservation of the remains of the earlier forms of animated being.

The area of this division of the rocks of the lake district lying immediately above the Skiddaw slate, and for which we may still retain the name of the green roofing slate and porphyry series, though including in it also the Coniston limestone, calcareous slate, and Brathay flags, may be thus defined.

Its northern boundary will, of course, be the same as that of the upper portion or southern boundary of the Skiddaw slate series last considered. Its western boundary is an irregular line (interrupted by the elevation of Black Combe and the granite of Eskdale), beginning near Calder Abbey, and terminating in the Duddon estuary. Its southern boundary is a curved line passing from a little south of Broughton towards Coniston-water-head, where it is broken off by a great dislocation and carried northward. We may follow it again through Hawkshead Fould, thence by Wray across Windermere to Low Wood; after that it crosses the valleys of Troutbeck, Kentmere, and Long Sleddale to Shap Wells, where it is disturbed by the granite.

Its eastern boundary will be a line drawn at the foot of the mountain limestone escarpment from Shap to Pooley Bridge. In this area are included the loftiest peaks of the lake district, Scawfell and Helvellyn, and some of the grandest scenery, as Wastwater, Borrowdale, Langdale, Grasmere, Ulleswater.

The Coniston limestone may be best studied at Coniston-water-head, in a quarry by the roadside, thence to Ambleside, where a good suite of fossils may be collected. A very fair collection from the same limestone may be also made by the roadside, half-way between Lowwood and Ambleside, where a disused lime-kiln points out the particular locality of the impure limestone beds. The Coniston or Brathay flags may be well seen in some fine quarries at Brathay, between Ambleside and Hawkeshead.

Above the Coniston flagstone we have first a series of gritty beds (named by Professor Sedgwick the Coniston grits), and then coarse dark-coloured fissile or schistose beds, in the upper portion of which the slaty cleavage is but little developed. They may, perhaps, be regarded as middle silurian.

The series of rocks next in the ascending order has been divided by Professor Sedgwick into the Ireleth, the Hougill, and the Kendal group, named from the localities where each is best exhibited. The Ireleth group consists of quartzose slates, with intervening bands of impure limestone; the Hougill or Kirkby Moor group has a more arenaceous character in its lower portion, and the upper is made up of micaceous flags and schists extremely fossiliferous. They occupy a large area over the greater portion of Low Furness in Lancashire, the whole of the south of Westmoreland (excepting the portion covered by the carboniferous limestone), as far east as the valley of the Lune, and reaching up to the great Pennine fault. They may, however, be well considered as one series, or more simply subdivided into Ireleth slates, and Hayfell and Kirkby Moor flags.—(Vide Geological Map.)

Both the lithological character of these beds, and also the included fossils (upper silurian) indicate that some movement was going on continuously over this district during their deposit. The change in species between the Coniston limestone and flagstone and the superior Coniston grits is so great, as to have led Professor Sedgwick to the conclusion that we are here to look for the true termination of the Silurian series, and to place all the rocks below the Coniston grit in the series named by him many years ago from the locality where they occur, the Cambrian; but which seem, from their included fossils, to be on the same geological parallel with a portion of the Lower Silurian strata of Sir Roderick I. Murchison.

It is a remarkable fact, that this Cambrian series, as defined by Professor Sedgwick, contains seventy-two, at least, well-ascertained species of fossils; and that the remaining slate-beds above them in the lake district, which are certainly Upper Silurian, contain ninety-two species of fossils, whilst out of this large number of 165 species in all, not more than five are common to the two series.

If, therefore, there be any good reason for separating the paleozoic rocks below the old red sandstone into the two divisions of Upper and Lower Silurian, or, as some have proposed, and as is noted in the table accompanying the Geological Map, into three divisions,—Upper, Middle, and Lower Silurian,—the same reason seems to hold good for retaining the name Cambrian for the lower portion, as first named by Professor Sedgwick from that part of North Wales where beds of the same age and containing similar fossils occur.

By means of the igneous forces at work beneath the earth's crust, a tremendous convulsion took place, affecting the whole of this district after the deposit of the Kendal or Kirkby Moor group with its superior tilestone and before the formation of the old red conglomerate.

This convulsion elevated the district generally along an axis which runs from north-east to south-west through Skiddaw Forest and Grassmoor Forest.—(Vide Geological Map.) The consequence was that the lower rocks were brought up and elevated into ridges in such a way that their general dip was more rapid and precipitous towards the north-west than towards the south-east and the general elevation of the district greater on the south-east than on the north-west side of the axis of convulsion.

We may trace to this circumstance, perhaps, the fact that the beds on the north-west side are more suddenly covered up by newer deposits and that the upper beds of the slate rocks, where they are seen on the south-east side of the lake district (as for instance about Kendal), are less contorted than on the opposite side of the axis of disturbance.

The disturbance which so greatly affected the Cumberland and Westmoreland mountains appears to have been at the same time general in the British isles occurring just before the Devonian or old red sandstone era. In the neighbouring Isle of Man, we have a parallel mountain range of the same age. We meet again with evidences of a like direction of movement occurring at the same period in Wales, in Ireland, and in the south and north of Scotland. We might well imagine some vast earthquake wave passing over the British isles, and leaving these indelible records of its transit in vast mountain piles whose crests run parallel to each other, and the circumstance of these ranges being more precipitous on the north-west than on the south-east side is one well worthy of consideration and may lead to speculation as to the direction in which the force of translation (so to speak) has acted. Such a speculation must not, however, be supposed to set aside considerations of the subsequent effect of denudation and waste, due, perhaps, to the direction of powerful oceanic currents, acting upon these ranges at the period of their elevation and for ages afterwards.

We come now to the next great division of the rocks of Cumberland and Westmoreland. These are the beds of the Old Red Sandstone and Conglomerate, belonging to the Devonian series.

In the ravines and hollows formed by the last named great disturbance (in which the mountain ranges would appear as a series of islands in the ancient ocean) were deposited a mass of boulders, pebbles, and sand, afterwards consolidated. Beds of such materials are found mantling round the older slate rocks in the district of Cumberland and Westmoreland, as well as in other parts of the British Isles and resting unconformably upon them. And prior to their being deposited, a great wear and tear of the older rocks had occurred, jagged edges being planed down so that the Old Red Conglomerate often rests on a smooth surface, though unconformably to the dip of the older beds.

The beds of Old Red Sandstone and Conglomerate are of very varying thickness. The circumstances under which they were accumulated will readily account for this fact. In the neighbourhood of the lake district, as in the Isle of Man, we seem to have before us merely the relics of the margin of the Devonian strata, which attain such enormous proportions both in Scotland and in the south-west of England, but which are here only feebly represented.

I think one of the most instructive localities for studying the Old Red Sandstone is at Shap Abbey. Just across the stream eastward, opposite the abbey, is a fine escarpment of the Devonian series, capped with the Carboniferous Limestone. I have never yet seen a spot where the Carboniferous Limestone is unconformable to the Old Red Sandstone, though everywhere the conglomerate rests on the upturned and worn edges of Silurian schists or tilestones. Such seems to be the case in the neighbourhood of the lake district, and the section at Shap Abbey exhibits it very finely. The Devonian series does not here appear more than thirty feet in thickness, resting upon upturned claret-coloured schists; but at Mell Fell, on the northern side of Ulleswater, the Old Red Conglomerate is of enormous thickness.

Many years ago (in 1848), in a publication embracing the geology of the Isle of Man, I hazarded a conjecture that the Old Red Conglomerates were accumulated in a sub-arctic climate. I grounded this conviction on a comparison of this formation with that of the vastly more recent Boulder Clay of the post-tertiary period, which most, if not all the geologists of the present day, allow to have been accumulated under such climatal conditions. The degraded and smoothed surfaces of the rocks under the conglomerate can thus be readily accounted for. I have seen nothing since I hazarded the expression of that conviction to shake me in it, but rather still more to confirm me.

It was at the time objected against me by the talented author of "The Old Red Sandstone" (the late deeply lamented Hugh Miller), that there were found in some Devonian beds the remains of plants indicating a sub-tropical flora; but my answer was and is that these plants are mostly found in a fragmentary condition, indicating that they had been transported from a distance, and we know that, through the action of the gulf stream, the tropical plants of the West Indies are now often found, not only on the north-west shores of Scotland, but even farther north.

After such great disturbances and elevations of mountain chains occurring just before the Devonian period, there must have been a considerable change in the character of the climate of these islands, and the tendency would seem to have been to render them colder than at the immediately previous period.

I have not been able, as I before stated, to discover any distinct evidence of convulsion occurring between the Old Red Sandstone and the Carboniferous deposits next supervening, including the Mountain Limestone with the superior Coal measures. But there seems to have occurred a quiet subsidence of this area through the whole carboniferous period, more intensely developed on the north-western side of the lake district, where the coal beds attain their greatest thickness. Such changes in the relative level of sea and land, if widely extended, as was probably the case, would produce also a change in climate, and hence it is no objection to the theory of the Old Red Conglomerate having been originated in a sub-arctic climate, that the immediately supervening Carboniferous deposits exhibit the influence of a sub-tropical atmosphere and ocean.

These deposits must have occupied vast ages in their formation; and we know that throughout the Tertiary period there are strata in close proximity with each other, indicating as violent changes in the climatal conditions of the area now occupied by the British Isles.

To this circumstance of the subsidence of the area of Cumberland and Westmoreland during the Carboniferous deposits, is owing the fact that in most places they bury up and overlap the Old Red Sandstone, and are found resting on the silurian and Cambrian slates. This is more particularly the case along the northern and western edges of the lake district, owing to the causes which I have before alluded to, viz., the more rapid general dip of the beds, and also their greater waste and destruction whilst exposed in a shattered condition to the action of oceanic agents.

The Mountain Limestone may have surrounded the lake district as a fringing coral reef; or, if we suppose that the first great distortion of the slates had not very greatly raised the area, it may have even overlapped the whole, and been subsequently denuded in that uprising of the country which I now proceed to notice.

Towards the close of the Carboniferous period, after the deposition of the coal beds, and previous to the formation of the upper New Red Sandstone and probably of the Magnesian Limestone and Conglomerate and lower New Red Sandstone strata, the agencies at work beneath the crust of the earth raised up the entire lake district in a vast ellipsoidal dome, during which it was cracked and starred in directions generally at right angles to the axis of elevation.

This axis of elevation lies along a curved line drawn through Scafell (which appears as the point of greatest intensity of the elevating forces), from a little to the south of the Calder river on the west to Orton on the east, where it is cut across by the great limestone fault of the Pennine chain. From this axis the great north and south valleys run down at right angles, radiating, however, from each extremity like the spokes of a wheel. The inspection of even a common map of the district will illustrate this statement where the lakes themselves rest, and the rivers flow in valleys formed in the lines of these faults; but this is more distinctly indicated in the geological map accompanying this work.

It is to this gigantic disturbance that we chiefly owe the present configuration and main features of this portion of the British Isles. It was a disturbance, however, not limited to this spot, but very general at that period, both in Europe and also in America. By it not only was the country of the English lakes elevated in the manner I have just named, but its previously isolated character was altered to that of a peninsula. Previous to this event, during the deposit of at least a portion of the Carboniferous strata, the sea seems to have flowed continuously around the Lake District, a ridge was now formed which connected this district with the elevated tracts of the great Pennine chain, shutting up the channel on the eastern side of the Lake Country and forming a deep bay to the north-east, now occupied by the vale of Eden.

In this bay and in the seas which subsequently washed the north-west and south of the Lake District, were then deposited the beds of the New Red Sandstone and of the Magnesian Limestone and Conglomerate, which truly indicate the outline of that portion of the country occupied by the lakes of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire. Not any of these beds actually reach up to the lakes themselves, and the same might be said of the Coal measures and the Mountain Limestone in their present position, though it is probable, as I have before stated, that they did overlap some portion of the lake area prior to its elevation by the last-named general disturbance, by which the valleys and basins were originated in which the lake waters repose.

Whether the before-named elevation was sudden, or continuous through a long period, we have not any distinct evidence.

It caused faults, traversing the limestone beds, as is distinctly seen in the neighbourhood of Kendal, and therefore it must have commenced after their deposition. The New Red Sandstone also rests unconformably in many places on the Carboniferous deposits, and this circumstance indicates that some great elevation of the area had taken place in the interval between the two. But that the whole area of Cumberland and Westmoreland has also been further elevated since the deposit of the New Red Sandstone is shewn by its inclined position in several places, as for example about Furness Abbey and in the neighbourhood of St. Bees.

It is highly probable, though not absolutely certain, that very shortly after the deposit of the Coal measures, and the Magnesian Limestone and Conglomerates, and prior to the formation of the upper New Red Sandstone, occurred that remarkable convulsion which first elevated the Pennine chain in the east of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and gave the principal features to the eastern boundary of these two counties. It will be seen, by reference to the geological map, that along the eastern side of the vale of Eden, a remarkable dislocation of the limestone strata has taken place. A magnificent wall of carboniferous limestone towers aloft to a height, in some places, of more than two thousand five hundred feet above the plain of Carlisle and the valley in which the Eden flows. Beds of the very same limestone are buried under the Red Sandstone of these plains. On the eastern side of this axis of disturbance, the strata dip gently towards the plains of Yorkshire, but on the western side of it they are thrown down in a more precipitous manner, dipping at angles varying from 30° to 80° , and in some places are placed on end, or vertically.

Along this axis, between Brampton and Brough, the lower rocks of the Silurian series are, for a distance of ten miles, frequently thrust through, forming conical hills, as at Dufton Pike, Knock Pike, Keisley Pike, and Murton Pike, overtopping the lower edge of the Carboniferous Limestone. A small strip, also, of Old Red Conglomerate manifests itself in the neighbourhood of Hiltton. The distortion and confusion of strata along this magnificent line of disturbance, is such as to render it extremely difficult to trace correctly each rock, and to lay it down on a geological map. The tattered and zig-zag character of what have been termed the edge beds, baffles all attempts at correct delineation on a reduced scale of the country, though the leading features are sufficiently obvious. The dislocation and distortion becomes even more than ordinarily complicated in those parts where the general direction of the line of fault is disturbed, and forms re-entering angles, as in the country from Brough towards Ravenstonedale. No doubt this is due in a great measure to the influences of other faults which intersect this great axis of dislocation, as those of Cross Fell, Kirby Stephen, and Lunedale. This magnificent dislocation of strata is not confined to the eastern side of the vale of Eden, but reaches down to the south in an irregular line as far as Kirby Lonsdale, near which place it is cut across at right angles by the double Craven fault, which runs in a direction thence nearly east-south-east for thirty miles to Warfedale. In like manner, the northern extremity of this great axis of disturbance, which has received the name (not altogether a correct one) of the Pennine fault, is cut across at right angles by another called the Tynedale fault, which runs eastward, with some irregularity, for a distance of fifty miles, to Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

The course of the Pennine fault from Brampton to Brough is south-east by south; at this latter point it turns in a direction south-west by south to near Kirby Lonsdale, and its total length from the point where it is intersected by the Tynedale fault till it meets the double Craven fault is not less than fifty-five miles.

I have said that the period of the first disturbance which dislocated the strata in this direction must probably be between the time of the deposit of the Magnesian Limestone and that of the New Red Conglomerate. The evidence for such a supposition is this: It may be taken as an almost general rule, well established by observation and mathematical calculation, that faults in the same district at right angles to each other are contemporaneous. Hence we argue that the Tynedale fault and the Craven faults were contemporaneous with the formation of the Pennine range. In confirmation of this view we may also observe that in the Tynedale fault the strata on the northern side of the disruption are thrown down and in the Craven faults those on the south.

Now, if we examine closely the Tynedale fault we shall find near Newcastle that it has distinctly affected not only the Coal Measures but also the lower New Red Sandstone and the Magnesian Limestone. I have before stated that the upper New Red Sandstone is in some places unconformable to the Carboniferous Limestone, the Coal, and the Magnesian Limestone; and if this want of conformity could be distinctly traced to the effects of that disturbance which originated the Tynedale, Pennine, and Craven faults, we should be able very approximately to fix the date of that remarkable phenomenon. At the upper end of the valley of the Eden, we have a partial development of beds of the Magnesian Limestone and Conglomerate in such a situation in reference to the overlying New Red Sandstone, as to lead to the suspicion that the want of conformity between them might be due to some elevation of the Pennine chain.

The Carboniferous series of Cumberland and Westmoreland (more distinctly developed as we cross the border of the counties into Yorkshire), consists of the mountain limestone strata, the millstone grit, and the coal measures. The Mountain Limestone may itself also be resolved into an upper and lower division. The lower limestone consists of dark beds of a very pure limestone, full of shells, corals, and crinoida, and is that portion of the series chiefly exhibited in the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland. On the east side of the vale of Eden, under Cross Fell, we find mixed up with it some gritty beds, with shale, and poor coal. Its total thickness varies from 500 to 800 feet, or even more. The upper Limestone strata, or Yoredale rocks, of Professor Phillips, consists of limestone, grits, shale, chert, and thin seams of coal increasing more and more towards the north. Fossils are extremely abundant in these beds, brachiopoda and crinoida being prevalent in the limestones, and terrestrial plants in the coal and grit. The alternation of beds seems to point to an alternate rising and sinking of this area during the period of their deposition. They may be well studied in the rich mining district of Alston Moor, at Hesketh Newmarket, and Cockermouth, near Dalton in Low Furness, and further south again about Kirby Lonsdale, and, crossing the border, they may be finely observed in Dentdale, and under Ingleborough Fell and Wenside.

To the Mountain Limestone succeeds the Millstone Grit, hardly seen in Cumberland and Westmoreland, except in the extreme north-eastern portion of the former county, and in a degenerate form in the neighbourhood of Cockermouth. Generally speaking it increases in thickness towards the south. It may almost be regarded as a lower member of the great Coal formation, and it contains a few thin seams of coal. On the eastern side of the Pennine range, the millstone grit assumes larger proportions, and a remarkably tabular mass of it forms the summit of Ingleborough.

The true coal formation which next succeeds the above is of extreme importance to the prosperity of Cumberland and Westmoreland. In the former alone of the two counties it is developed. From near St. Bees Head it extends along the coast by Whitehaven and Workington to Maryport, thence its northern boundary is a curved line following partly the course of the Ellen river, and then bending eastward to near Blennerhasset and Rosely Hill, where it suddenly terminates. It occupies a breadth inland of about six miles in its southern portion, gradually diminishing northwards. On its northern edge the coalfield is overlaid by the New Red Sandstone, under which no doubt it would in many places be found, though it might not be at depths at present remunerative in the working. It appears again over a little space in the north-west of Cumberland, mantling round a nucleus of Mountain Limestone in the neighbourhood of Aikton and Little Brampton. The total thickness of the coal-bearing strata in the neighbourhood of Whitehaven is hardly less than three hundred yards,—being made up of many seams, the greater portion unworkable; but one of them, the main band, being ten feet in thickness, and wrought with great earnestness. The dip of the beds being seaward, the excavations have been carried under the bed of the sea.

Before leaving the consideration of the carboniferous strata, a word or two should be said respecting a singular igneous mass interpolated in them. The Whin-Sill, as it is called, is a great mass of basalt and greenstone interstratified with the lower rocks of the Yoredale series, and exhibited along the southern and western brows of Cross Fell, the great Pennine range, along the eastern side of the vale of Eden, passing round the northern end along the escarpment of Mountain Limestone into Teesdale, and thence stretching eastward into Northumberland. Its thickness and composition are variable. In some places, as at Hilton Beck, it is not more than twenty-four feet in thickness; at Caldron Snout, on the other hand, it attains a thickness of more than two hundred and forty feet. It has greatly altered the beds underneath it, whilst those above it, except at Caldron Snout, are not much changed. From these circumstances, as well as from the vast extent of country in which it is exhibited, with a general conformity to the beds of the carboniferous series, I conclude that it has been poured out in the carboniferous sea, perhaps at two or three intervals, from some great vent in the neighbourhood of Caldron Snout. We have an analogous formation in beds of apparently the same age in the south of the Isle of Man, which I have described in a memoir read before the Geological Society of London, in 1848.

The Manx whin bed (consisting of basalt greatly altering the underlying limestone, of trap ash and trap breccia), is remarkable for an interposed bed of black limestone, containing peculiar organic remains, and in the beds of trap ash we also meet with Mountain Limestone fossils. I am not aware that any organic remains have yet been discovered in the Whin-Sill of the Pennine range, but it is quite possible that they may hereafter be found in the more ashy portion, or in that which approaches the character of a volcanic breccia. Altogether, the phenomena of the Whin-Sill are of a most interesting character, and will greatly repay the visit of the geologist to the localities where it is developed. It has been fully described, together with its accompanying whin dykes rising up in the form of basaltic walls, by Professor Sedgwick, Mr. Hutton, and Professor Phillips.

Over the coal measures spreading out far and wide in the north of Cumberland, from Brough, at the head of the vale of Eden, to the shores of the Solway Frith, and across the border into Scotland (forming the extensive plain of Carlisle), we have a series of beds deposited in water to which the name of the New Red Sandstone formation has been given. A strip of this same formation occupies the low ground to the west of the Cumberland mountains, along the sea shore from St. Bees Head to the Duddon river; it is also spread out in Low Furness, and again on the southern shores of Morecambe Bay, whence it reaches through the plains of Lancashire and Cheshire, through Staffordshire, Warwickshire, the southern parts of Derbyshire, and the northern of Leicestershire, and so round through Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire to the mouth of the Tees. It nowhere occupies a high level. At the period of its being formed, the sea washed the sides of the mountains surrounding the lake district. Its colour on a geological map points out pretty distinctly what was the amount of land above the level of the sea at the commencement of the secondary period.

It is made up of three principal divisions, the lowest consisting of red marl and red sandstone, the equivalents of the Rothe todte liegende of the continental geologists; the middle portion is a magnesian limestone and conglomerate, as seen under St. Bees Head, and a magnesian breccia, as seen near Brough and at Stenkrith Bridge, near Kirby Stephen, at the head of the vale of Eden; the upper consists of red gypseous marls and red sandstone, with accumulations of gypsum, as seen in various parts of the plain of Carlisle. The two former divisions belong certainly to the Permian strata, as also, probably, does a portion of the latter. It is not unlikely, however, that the discovery of organic remains, such as have been found in Cheshire, may hereafter determine a considerable portion of the upper New Red Sandstone of Cumberland and Westmoreland to belong to the Trias, or lowest beds of the Secondary period.

A wide gap now occurs in the geological history of this portion of England. In other parts of England and the world there occurs a vast series of deposits, viz., those of the whole of the Secondary period from the New Red Sandstone upwards, and the whole of the Tertiary up to the boulder clay, of which there seems to be no record whatever here. I would by no means have it inferred that I believe that any of these strata at any time absolutely covered this district, and were afterwards borne away, though such might have been the case. I am rather inclined to believe that this portion of the British Isles lay above the sea-line during the whole of this long period, and that no marine deposits were then being spread upon it. This is, however, a mere matter of geological speculation, respecting which anyone may venture to express whatever opinion he pleases. It seems, however, pretty certain that at the commencement of the Boulder Clay period, which is the next of which we have any traces in the lake district, the whole country was in the condition of dry land, which sank gradually beneath the waves of an icy sea and as gradually rose again.

The period is one deeply interesting to the geologist as the connecting link between the past and present in the history of the condition of our globe. It is a period geologically recent, though beyond the date of all human record; but it may not necessarily be beyond the period of the existence of the human race on the globe. Strange enough, though so recent in a geological sense, it is one respecting which more doubt and uncertainty exists than perhaps any other. One reason is, that this formation, for it is truly such (as much so as the Old Red Conglomerate, or any of the older water-moved, sedimentary strata), was, till very recently, looked upon as a mere surface accumulation, such as the Noachian deluge was presumed to have left behind. There is, however, no scriptural or physical evidence that the flood of Noah was of a violent character, but rather the reverse. The Bible describes the rivers, for instance, which watered the garden of Eden, by names and courses known as existing in the days of Moses. The existence of the same river courses before and after the Noachian deluge is an evidence against any violent cataclysmal action on the surface of the earth. The flood of Noah answered all the purposes of the Almighty as a judgment on our guilty race, and as an everlasting warning. But had it been of that violent character which some have assigned to it, in order to account for the transport of vast masses of rock over hundreds of miles, the ark of man's safety must itself have been dashed to atoms, without some special miracle for its preservation, of which we have not even a hint in Holy Writ; and we should also find buried in the debris some relics of the family of man, which we do not find.

It may be well here to notice more particularly the various phenomena connected with the Boulder Clay and Drift period, as truly represented to us in the Lake District;—they will, perhaps, help us to an understanding of the agencies at work in this particular locality for a vast series of ages. Any person who chooses may go and certify himself of the following facts in the valleys and mountains of Cumberland and Westmoreland. If we examine the sides and bottom of the valleys, more especially those which run north-east and south-west, we shall notice—first, that they are scratched, smoothed, polished, and grooved in a particular manner;—that in many places are accumulations of both boulders and angular fragments of rock. He will notice that not only are the boulders and rocky fragments scratched and scored in a remarkable manner, but that, on removing a mass of the debris, the solid rock underneath is also carved with lines running parallel with the general direction of the valleys.

Now, such a phenomenon might be accounted for by the descent of glaciers from the mountain summits, bearing along on their surface the fragments of rock torn by the power of frost from the beetling crags which tower aloft in the midst of this region of mountain peaks of slate and porphyry; and, perhaps, we might rest satisfied with this solution of the phenomena if we study only the valleys of the lake district. But let us ascend the sides of the valleys till we come to the summits of the ridges by which they are formed, and let us mount some of the eminences that seem to bar their openings into the more level country. Still the same phenomena present themselves to our view. The ridges running out on each side of the valleys are scored and polished—there are transported blocks of porphyry and slate perched upon every ridge and knoll. We may here be told that this is merely the extension of the glacier action—that the glacier filled up the whole of the valley, and obtruded itself over the ridge, and crowned every neighbouring summit. Such a supposition is not beyond the bounds of possibility, though scarcely probable if viewed in connection with the extent of the mountain peaks and snow-fields which are requisite for generating glaciers of such magnitude.

But there is another phenomenon to be accounted for, and that is, that boulders of the rocks of the lake district are found, not only in the valleys and on elevated ridges and eminences of the lake district, but carried towards the south far over the plains of Lancashire and Cheshire, and reaching down into Staffordshire, and resting upon the hills of Derbyshire; and, to the south-east, carried across the great Pennine chain, occupying the plains of Yorkshire as far as Holderness, and the cliffs of the east coast of England. It seems difficult to allow simple glacier action to have resulted in phenomena such as these.

Some have imagined the phenomena to be due to diluvial action, and have stated that great oceanic waves dashed over the land in particular directions, carrying away vast fragments of rock over hills and valleys, strewing them to a considerable distance, and leaving them here and there in vast heaps.

Others, again, have suggested that not one set, but several sets of waves have been generated, at different geological epochs, by the upheaval of mountain summits displacing vast bodies of water, and causing a drift of the disintegrated masses seaward.

There is no doubt but that the sudden uprising of mountain chains would produce powerful waves which could move masses of rock to a certain distance, but there is no extraneous and independent evidence of such tremendous convulsions having occurred in the boulder period. We do not, for instance, as far as I am aware, find pleiocene beds tilted up by mountain elevations in the neighbourhood of boulder clay deposits, at least not in the British Isles; nor am I aware that ever in the historic period has the elevation of a range of country transported to a great distance such vast masses of rock and debris as are presented in the formation of which I am speaking.

There are, besides, in the boulder clay itself, very clear proofs to my mind, that it was not produced by violent cataclysmal action. These proofs I have stated elsewhere, and this is not the place to go into them.—(Vide Quarterly Journal of the Proceedings of the Geological Society of London, vol. vii., page 12, &c., 1849.

I may mention, however, just one powerful argument against the diluvial theory: and it is this. Not only are the rocks under the boulder-clay grooved, scratched, and polished in certain directions, but also the rocks and boulders in it; and the boulders are scratched, not merely crosswise, but along their length,—proving that they must, during this scratching process, have been held tight in some matrix, and not rolled loosely along in water. Now, it is always the safest plan in geological investigation, to assume that the surface of our globe has always been acted upon by the same or nearly the same agencies as at present are at work in modifying it. All the differences in temperature and climate, for instance, which from geology we learn have existed in past ages at any particular locality, we may easily conclude to have originated from a different arrangement of the sea and land. When we find, in the present day, in the southern hemisphere icebergs along the west coast of South America, in latitudes corresponding with Spain and Southern Italy in our northern hemisphere, there is no difficulty in allowing that with a different configuration of the land in the northern hemisphere they may formerly have existed in the seas surrounding Great Britain, and that our mountains may have been clothed with glaciers reaching even down to the sea. Let us, therefore, assume that this was the case at the close of the pleiocene period, and, at the same time, that there was first a gradual subsidence, or sinking down, of the area occupied by the British Isles (such as we know now to be going on as respects a portion of Scandinavia), and that there was subsequently a gradual re-elevation of this area, what then would be the consequence? The mountains clothed in glaciers would constantly be sending down masses of rock into the valleys, these valleys often terminating with the character of the Norwegian fiords. At first some of these glaciers might end off before they reached the sea, depositing their remains at various levels, and scratching and grooving the bottom and sides of the valleys in their progress. Some of them would reach even into the sea itself, and this would ultimately (as the land went down) be the case with all of them. The extremities of these glaciers, with their superincumbent load of scratched rocks, would then be torn off, and, by the action of currents, drifted out to sea or stranded upon neighbouring shores; along these shores, also, would be formed ice-floes and coast-ice, rising and sinking by the action of the tide, and oftentimes driven by the force of the winds high and dry upon the land; there is no difficulty in accounting in this way for all the appearances of scratching and grooving which we find on rocks under the boulder clay and in it. We have no difficulty in accounting in this way for the transport of blocks (large or small), of pebbles, gravel, and sand, from one locality to another, however distant. Nor have we any great difficulty in solving in this way the most remarkable phenomena of all connected with this period, namely, the elevation within very short distances of immense masses of rocks from a lower to a much higher level, without presuming upon the intervention of any violent diluvial action. Many years ago I pointed out a very remarkable example of this kind of transport in the Isle of Man. Blocks of the South Barrule granite are there elevated from their parent rock to a height of above 800 feet above it, within the distance of two miles. I then presumed it possible that, being frozen in coast-ice, they had been driven upwards by powerful waves of translation, originating in the elevation of some unknown mountain chain, or it might be the elevation of Cumberland and some portion of Scotland. I do not now say that this is impossible, but I think it not very probable. We are indebted to that eminent naturalist and antarctic explorer, Mr. Charles Darwin, for what I believe to be the proper solution of this apparent difficulty. It has already been partly alluded to. As the land went down, the sea retaining, of course, its own general level, the blocks of slate, porphyry, or granite, frozen into ice, were continually stranded higher and higher, relatively with the land. Many were, of course, carried out to sea and dropped at lower levels, and some, by this continued wear and tear of the stranding, would be ground down to powder; but others, also, would remain and be driven upon the sides, or even perched on the top of every mountain peak which just jutted up above the sea, and when the whole of this area was again elevated, whether suddenly or gradually (as I believe), these blocks would be left in every position, from the summit of a mountain down to its deepest valleys, just as we now find them. And in this way we can easily account for the spread of the rocks of the lake district not only over the plains of Lancashire, Cheshire, Warwickshire, and Staffordshire, and upon the sides of the Lancashire and Derbyshire hills, but also their transport over the pass of Stanemoor, across the Pennine chain, into the valleys and plains of Yorkshire, and far away to the eastern shores of England.

To take, for example, the transport of the boulders of Shap granite, so remarkable and distinct in its character that it can be recognised in hand specimens: glaciers descending from the eastern side of the lake district would transport masses of this granite into the vales of the Eden and the Lune. During the gradual submergence of this area let us suppose a general arctic current from the north-west, such as now flows in the same direction from Davis Straits, impinging on the shores of Great Britain. Its general course would be modified by the straits through which, in different places, it would have to pass, and its direction would be altered at particular spots by the altering condition of the coast during submergence. The blocks brought down into the vale of Eden would first be drifted up higher and higher at the southern end of that valley, whilst those in the valley of the Lune might remain almost comparatively unmoved. At one period of the submergence the elevated land connecting the lake district with the Pennine chain would be placed under the sea, and the current would flow on, between the lake country and what is now Yorkshire uninterruptedly to the south and south-west. Many blocks would be borne in this manner altogether away, but some would be driven up on the east shore. Ultimately the submergence would be such as to allow of the water of the ocean flowing on to the east and south-east through the pass of Stanemoor. When this was the case, a very powerful current would be generated through this channel, forcing its way from the lake mountains (then appearing as a series of islands in an arctic sea), directly into the sea covering the area which is now Yorkshire and the east of England. In this way blocks might then be transported direct from the granite boss of Wastdale Crag, near Shap Wells, through the Pennine chain, without any intervention of a glacier descending into the sea. I myself think this very probable.

What the climate of the lake district was during and immediately after its re-elevation, we may not be very positive, yet there is good reason for believing that it continued of an arctic character, and that the mountains, when again upraised, were covered with snow and glaciers. I have noticed in several places accumulations in the valleys having greatly the appearance of moraines; for instance, between Crummock-water and Loweswater, between Seatoller and Rothwaite, in the vale of St. John, at the head of Hawswater, and at the foot of Langdale. Now though as respects the scratching and grooving of the rocks at any spot, there is no reason why it may not have taken place prior to the submergence of the district; yet, as respects the moraines, I think they would all have been carried away, or greatly spread out, by the force of the waves of the sea during the sinking and uprising again of the land, so as to leave no marked traces of them. The continued existence of the moraines (if, indeed, the noticed accumulations be such), indicates, therefore, a cold climate for some time after the lake district began to re-emerge from the waters of the ocean. During this upheaval there would be considerable denudation, both of the hard rock, split up by the frosts and shattered by the impinging of icebergs, but more especially would the materials of the boulder clay be liable to a re-sorting and re-distribution; and all these would be spread out far and wide over the sea bottom, in varying forms, the larger boulders nearest the mountains, the pebbles and coarse gravel farther off, and, still farther, fine mud and sand; also whilst the more arctic climate continued they would all be conveyed occasionally to great distances, and dropped on the sea bottom far away from the lake district.

The extent of the submergence of the lake district is an interesting matter of speculation. Assuming the truth of the theory of its sinking down quietly in an icy sea, unaffected by violent cataclysmal action, the extreme height on the mountains at which any stranded blocks are found will be an evidence that the sea reached at least up to that particular point, or rather that the land had gone down so far into the icy waters. On evidence of this kind I have elsewhere shewn (vol. i. "Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal") the probability that the neighbouring Isle of Man went down, as respects the present relative level of land and sea, at least 1,600 feet at that period. On Moel Tryvaen, in North Wales, there are deposits of the glacial epoch at the height of more than 1,800 feet above the present sea line. I set down the submergence of the lake district at about the same amount. It must evidently have been sufficient to place the pass of Stanemoor under water, unless we should choose to affirm that the Pennine range has been elevated to its present position unconnectedly with the lake district since the glacial period, or that the granite blocks travelled into Yorkshire by some method different to that which we have supposed.

Another question remains, namely, what was the extent of the re-elevation,—what the amount of the re-emergence immediately after the glacial epoch? I am not at present aware that the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland afford any clear evidence per se. The raised beaches round about the Solway Firth and Morecambe Bay, and the caves in the neighbourhood of St. Bee's, taken in connection with similar phenomena occurring on all the coasts of the Irish Sea, have led me to the following conclusion.

Towards the end of the glacial period the whole of the area of what is now the Irish Sea was so far elevated that the previous sea-bed became dry land. A vast treeless plain was formed connecting all the surrounding countries, and similar to the barren lands of the present day round about Hudson's Bay, in North America. Over this plain ranged the Cervus Megaceros, or Great Irish Elk, whose remains are abundantly found upon it in fresh water marls, occupying basin-shaped depressions.

After the formation of the vast treeless plain the land became stationary for a long period, probably many thousand years, during which the sea quietly eat back its way into the drift-gravel plain and excavated deep caverns in the solid rocks, whenever they formed the coast line. These caverns are seen at heights of from fifteen to twenty-five feet above the present sea level. In this way a separation between the Isle of Man and Great Britain and Ireland was again effected.

A re-union, however, again occurred at a subsequent period by a farther elevation of the Irish Sea. A connecting plain was again formed. And that the country became covered in many places with wood, and the climate had greatly altered in its character and become milder, is also evident. Yet this was not the last change. A partial subsidence again occurred, which may have happened within the human, or historic period. The forests were buried under the sea: the remains of them, with beds of peat, are found on all our coasts between the present high and low water mark, and they even reach down some way beyond the low water line. The facts I have stated are becoming more and more distinct every day. As to whether the explanation of them which I have proposed be correct or no, each one will form his own opinion.

We are thus brought down from the earliest period of the geological history of the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland to those pages which relate to their present physical condition and the agencies which are now at work in modifying it. To describe the present features and scenery of these counties is not the object of this notice, as they are graphically given by an abler pen in another portion of this work, and therefore I shall make only one or two remarks in reference to changes which they are now undergoing.

The quantity of detritus brought down year after year by the mountain rills and rivulets is exceedingly small, and Professor Sedgwick has remarked, with his usual acumen, that "the erosion of the rivers and torrents, however indefinitely continued, could not account for the hollows and inequalities of any one of our mountain chains." Yet it is evident from the deltas which actually have accumulated where these rivulets enter the lakes, that had they been playing their part through a very long lapse of ages these lakes must now have been quite filled up, unless there were some agents at work to remove the material so collected. The real mystery seems to be, why were not these hollows completely filled with boulders, gravel, sand, and clay during the glacial epoch, when glaciers were descending into them, or they were buried far below in the glacial sea? The depth of Wastwater, for example, is in some places forty-five fathoms, so that its bottom is upwards of 100 feet below the level of the sea. Yet it is not formed by the accumulation of detritus at the bottom of the valley in which it lies, for the river flowing from it is actually cutting its way through the solid rock. (I have observed a similar phenomenon in reference to Loch Ness, in Scotland.) I think this circumstance of its depth is a proof that it has not, geologically speaking, been long elevated above the action of the sea. Wastwater is formed (as, indeed, all our English lakes are formed) in a great fault or dislocation of the strata. On the southern side the shores are extremely steep, and the depth of the water rapidly increases from the shore.

Now, at the present time, in the area of the Irish Sea, between the coasts of the Isle of Man and Mull of Galloway, there is a deep chasm existing, so that in one place the plumb-line goes down all at once from between eighty and ninety to one hundred and forty and one hundred and fifty fathoms. Yet this chasm is kept perpetually open, and whilst the sea has been flowing over it perhaps thousands of years no accumulation of gravel and sand has taken place in this natural cavity. Now, in the same manner in which this submarine valley is kept from being filled up, might the English and Scotch lakes be kept open at the period in which they were submerged below the sea level. If, therefore, we could accurately measure the deltas which have been pushed forward into them by the actual mountain-streams now at work, and determine the exact addition made to these deltas year by year (however small), we might approximate to the time which has elapsed since the upheaval of the surface above the level of the sea.

In the account above given of the geology of Cumberland and Westmoreland our attention has hitherto been almost exclusively given to the sedimentary strata, that is to say, to the strata which have been deposited in the form of mud, sand, and boulders, by mechanical action in the waters of the primeval ocean. But, as I have shewn, these strata have, in many places, been frequently disturbed or altered in their appearance by the intrusion of, or contact with, other rocks of a very different kind, forced up in a molten or semi-fluid condition from the bowels of the earth. An account of the district would be very incomplete without some notice of these so called igneous rocks, that is, the granite, syenite, porphyries, and trap rocks, which burst through and overlie the sedimentary rocks, or dislocate and alter them in various places.

The granite seems to claim our first attention, not because of the age of its absolute eruption, respecting which we can affirm little positively, but because it has generally been regarded as forming the basis of the stratified deposits, and exhibits itself as a nucleus round which are folded many of our mountain chains.

There are three remarkable kinds of granite rock presenting themselves to our notice in the area of the lake country, and it has been remarked as a fact well worthy of study, that these varieties break out apparently unconnected, and only one is found in each of the three groups, into which the slate rocks of this district have been divided. In the Skiddaw slate, we have bursting out in the valleys of the Caldew, and near Syningill, between Saddleback and Skiddaw, a granite, composed of dark mica, grey quartz, and light coloured felspar. This has usually been regarded as the oldest granite in the district. It is certainly newer than the Skiddaw slate, as it has altered and elevated it, but there is no distinct evidence of its intrusion amongst the porphyries and green slates, though it seems associated with that first great general disturbance, which we have noticed as affecting the lake district along an axis passing through this spot.

By far the largest development of Cumberland granite is found ranging from Bootle nearly to Scawfell, on both sides of the Mite and the Esk, in the middle division of the slate series. It is of varying texture, generally reddish, with a deficiency of mica, thus passing into syenite, sometimes earthy in structure, sometimes assuming the spheroidal form of basalt, at others forming compact semi-columnar rocks. It appears at Nether Wastdale Head to pass into the great mass of fine grained red syenite, which runs northwards through the mountains of Ennerdale, and which may be well studied at Reveling Pike, High Crag, High Stile, and Red Pike, and in the neighbourhood of Floutern Tarn, and Scale Force.

The fine Red Porphyritic Granite, or Wastdale Crag, near Shapwells, has before been alluded to. Its peculiarity consists in the large crystals of red felspar, which are interspersed in a more compact base of grey and red felspar, with specks of dark mica and quartz. It has pierced and metamorphosed the slates and flags of the uppermost division, and has cut off the Conistone limestone at Wastdale Head. It must, therefore, be more recent than these rocks, but of its actual age we have no clear evidence.

The vast number of basaltic, porphyritic, and syenitic dykes and masses which protrude themselves in the greatly disturbed district of the lakes, would occupy too much room separately to describe. We meet with them on the south side of Black Combe, in the bed of the Duddon, at Hawshead, in the valley above High Borough Bridge, in Wet Sleddale, in Kirk Fell, at Armboth near Thirlmere, in the vale of St. John, on Carrock Fell, between Tottlebank Fell and Brown Hall, in the mountains of Buttermere, westward about Scawfell, and at the head and foot of Wastwater.

The red porphyritic rock of St. John's vale, three miles from Keswick, with the intersecting dyke from Armboth Fell, and the syenite of Carrock Fell, with its crystals of hypersthene and intermingled titaniferous iron ore, are particularly worthy of study, and will well reward the collector of the rocks and minerals of this district.

It is not the object of this geological notice to enter upon a description of the mines and minerals of these counties, they belong rather to the subject of mineralogy and polished economy. The rich mineral district of Alston Moor is well known, and profitable veins of lead and copper have been opened on Conistoun Old Man, in Newlands, on Carrock Fell, and Patterdale. The wad, or black-lead mine of Borrowdale, has been long famous, the rich veins of hematite iron ore at Dalton, constitute some of the most valued sources of profitable export; and the coal field of Whitehaven adds in no small degree to the mineral wealth of Cumberland. To these, we have to add the magnificent products of flagstone and slate at Ingleton, Horton, Howgill, Kendal, Ireleth, Bootle, and Kirkstone. The New Red Sandstone strata also afford vast supplies of building materials, a fact which may be well studied in the magnificent quarries in the neighbourhood of Carlisle in the north, and near Furness Abbey in the south. With these must be taken into consideration the beds of Gypsum, which are scattered in various parts of the great New Red Sandstone Plain, stretching northward and westward from the vale of Eden.

Let us now, before parting with the subject, take a rapid review of the Geological History of Cumberland and Westmoreland, gathering into small compass the facts which have been stated at length in the preceding pages.

What vast ages has the mind to hurry through in such a review, ages not to be measured by the revolutions of our planet about the centre of our solar system, but of the sun itself, with that nebular cluster of stars of which it is but an insignificant unit about some vastly far-off and unseen centre of stellar gravity.

The mists of chaos roll away, and there spreads out before us a mighty ocean, beneath whose depths are being deposited beds of dark blue impalpable mud, destined hereafter to be exhibited in the form of Skiddaw Slate. Respecting the denizens of this ocean we know next to nothing, they may have been many or few; but their organisation, at least judging from the scanty remains of them hitherto met with, was of the lowest type. Ere long the sea bottom is disturbed and elevated, and masses of molten matter are poured forth over it from volcanic vents. Showers of ashes and pumice darken the air, and falling back into the waters are spread out in layers over extensive areas. Again and again the convulsive outpourings occur. Through long periods the waves of ocean dash against coasts of porphyry and green stone, and wearing them gradually away, deposit the spoils in the form of large sheets of plutonic mud. A troublous time is it for all organised beings whilst these green slates and porphyries of Cumberland and Westmoreland are being elaborated.

At length there is a period of comparative rest, and corals and zoophytes multiply and replenish the waters of the deep. The Conistoun limestone, though of no great thickness, covers a large area, extending beyond the lake country; and there is no doubt it must have required many an age for its formation. In the same period of quiescence must have been deposited also the next, superior Conistoun flags.

But the scene shifts again, and we have before us an ocean teeming with life, but that life greatly differing in character from that which had previously existed. In the Conistoun grits, the Ireleth slates, and the Hay-fell and Kirby Moor flags (which come next in order as a lake district group), we meet with the remains of animals of which not six per cent are of the same species as those which are found in the Conistoun flags and all the rocks below. This is an evidence of some great change in the character of the sea bottom and the climate of the period: whence originating, can be little more than a matter of geological speculation, yet extremely interesting, when viewed as points of identification between the Lake District rocks and those of North and South Wales.

After the elaboration of many hundred feet of such strata there comes again an epoch of great change. We look again upon the scene, and it is one of violent convulsion by which the whole of the Lake District is elevated on an axis, running from north-east to south-west, from Skiddaw forest to the mountains of Ennerdale. Such a grand convulsion, not restricted to this locality, but extending through the British Isles, must have greatly altered the contour of the sea and land, and with it the character of animal and vegetable life, ushering in the Devonian and old Red Sandstone period. With it come strange ichthyic forms, the Pterichthys, Cephalaspis, Asterolepis, and Coccosteus. A stormy period of struggling elements is this, for first the jagged edges of the upturned slates are broken off, and the fragments worn down and rolled about into the form of boulders, which in some places accumulate to the depth of many hundred feet. I hold by the hypothesis of the existence of a somewhat arctic climate, and the prevalence of glacial action on the lake region during some portion at least of this period. Yet change is pressing on and we are introduced in due time to the subtropical scenes of the carboniferous period, when giant tree ferns and lofty palms adorn the land, the delicate nautilus ploughs the sunny surface of the sea and spreads forth its sail to the balmy breeze, and the ever active coral insect is building up the atol and the coral reef. Hence are originated the coal-fields of Whitehaven and the thick deposits of mountain limestone mantling round the Cumberland and Westmoreland mountains. It is a period of gradual sinking of the sea bottom, when those masses of calcareous rock, destined afterwards to present so elevated and bold a western front along the great Pennine range, are being buried many fathoms below the surface of the briny waters which beat against the insulated peaks of Skiddaw, Helvellyn, Scawfell, and Grassmoor.

Again, the elevatory process succeeds, powerful in character as well as extensive in its effects, raising aloft the submerged beds and giving an additional lift to the altitude of the Lake District, impressing in fact upon it the general contour which it is intended ultimately to possess. Now is formed the ridge of Orton sears connecting this district with the Yorkshire range and cutting off the flow of the ocean on its eastern side. Presently is elevated the great Pennine range, and the lofty western escarpment of Cross Fell is formed. But the ocean no longer teems with zoophytic and coralline life, nor the land with the previously abundant tropical vegetation. There seems to be a dying out of all palæozoic forms of life, and the earth and ocean must be replenished with a new creation. But the ferruginous sea which spreads out the beds of sand destined ultimately to form the meadow lands of the Vale of Eden and the plains of Carlisle, with those of Lancashire, Cheshire, and Staffordshire, seems little adapted to sustain as yet the new race. Either the marine organisms of the New Red Sandstone period are few and far between, or the character of its sand beds is unsuited to preserve and transmit to our gaze their remains.

Amidst this uncertainty darkness settles down upon the scene,—a long night comes on in which we can, from our lake mountains, catch no sight of the wonderful creations which are going on in other regions. The whole of the Secondary period is a blank, and the Eocene, Meiocene, and Pleiocene of the Tertiary cannot be guessed at.

Our story hurries on to its end. Dawn at length approaches,—a cold icy dawn,—and, as we stand shivering on our mountain summit, the howling of the wintry tempest, the roar of the avalanche, and the crash of icebergs, salute the ear. Erratic fragments from distant mountains, torn down by the mighty, ever-working glacier, go careering by southwards, ploughing up the sea bottom in their progress, and scratching and gravelling the far-off shores on which they are stranded, and vast boulders of granite are borne away a hundred miles and more from the coasts of Cumberland and Westmoreland.

At length day comes on, the arctic winds have ceased, and beneath a genial atmosphere the submerged plains again raise their heads above the waters. Upon these plains the magnificent megaceros goes bounding far away, whilst herds of fat bisons crop the verdant herbage. Such are the scenes of the pleistocene era.

Further still the land becomes covered with dense forests as it continues to rise from the bosom of the deep. Anon the elevating process ceases, and again there is a quiet sinking of a large portion of the previously uplifted area. The sea reclaims its own, and the forests are overthrown.

"Piscium et summâ genus heret ulmo, Nota quæ sedes fuerat columbis."

Last upon this varying scene comes man; and the reign of the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, gives way to that of him who was made to be monarch and lord over all.

Survey of the Lake District.

THE Lake District of England,—that is, the mountainous region in which the lakes are enclosed,—occupies two counties, and extends over a part of a third. The highest mountains are on or near the boundary line between Cumberland and Westmoreland; but there are some lofty peaks and ridges, and several lakes and tarns in the detached portion of Lancashire, which lies beyond Morecambe Bay. The point of junction of the three counties is at a spot close by the road on Wrynose, where three ancient stones, called the Shire Stones, have been from time immemorial so grouped as that any person who chose to occupy them with three limbs, might boast of being in three counties at once. As these stones might easily be passed unnoticed, a more conspicuous mark, in the form of a pillar, has been recently set up by the public spirit of a resident of Ambleside. From this point, the boundary of Lancashire runs along the river Duddon to the sea; and in the other direction, by Langdale Tarn and Elterwater to the head of Windermere. About half-way down the lake, it strikes the eastern shore, and follows the little river Winster into Morecambe Bay, near Medup. The highest mountain ridges divide Cumberland from Westmoreland, the boundary line running over Bow Fell to Dunmail Raise, then crossing Helvellyn, and passing through Glencoin, to strike the western shore of Ulleswater. Between Ulleswater and the river Eden, it follows the course of the Eamont. Thus, of the mountains, Conistoun Old Man and Wetherlam are in Lancashire; the Langdale Pikes, the Troutbeck and Rydal groups, and Place Fell are in Westmoreland; Skiddaw and Saddleback, the Borrowdale group, Scawfell, the Pillar, Great Gable, Grassmoor, and Black Combe are in Cumberland; while Wrynose, Bow Fell, and Helvellyn are on the boundary lines. Of the larger lakes, Conistoun, Esthwaite, and part of Windermere are in Lancashire; Rydal and Grasmere lakes, Haweswater, and a part of Windermere, and of Ulleswater are in Westmoreland; while Cumberland contains Thirlmere, Derwentwater, Bassenthwaite, Buttermere, Crummock Water, Loveswater, Ennerdale Lake, Wastwater, and part of Ulleswater. If Brothers' Water, (in Westmoreland) is included among the lakes, as it usually is, though only three-quarters of a mile in length, and half a mile broad, the whole number is sixteen; of which two are in Lancashire, four in Westmoreland, and eight in Cumberland; while two are divided by boundary lines.

The English mountain district, like every other, presents the likeness of a national citadel, well surrounded with out-works. The highest peaks are near the centre; and to the highest peaks always belong the deepest valleys and most difficult passes. As the ridges spread outwards from the centre, they decline in height, their valleys are shallower; all the features of the landscape are milder, and the skirts spread out in gentle undulations down to the plain or the sea. In the case of our English group, the ridges melt down into sea-shore, from the Solway, all round to the Lancashire coast; that is, for nearly two-thirds of its circumference; and the rest subside into the moorlands of Yorkshire, Durham, and Northumberland. From whatever direction the group is approached,—from the dreary sands of the Solway or Morecambe Bay, from the green shores of the western sea, or from the dark slopes of moorland to the east, the likeness to a vast citadel is equally striking. Here did race after race come for refuge, under a series of invasions. The Britons fled hither from the Romans, and maintained themselves against the Saxons. The Saxons fled hither from the Normans; and here they resisted for centuries the amalgamation with their conquerors, which had taken place in all the southern parts of the island. To this day the citadel character remains, in a somewhat figurative sense. Ancient notions, prejudices, and customs hide, from generation to generation, in the interior fastnesses, and even hold some of the outworks. Strangers are struck by strong local peculiarities as soon as they alight at the railway stations, or dip into the shallowest outlying valley; and when they penetrate to the deep, dark lakes, and sleep at the foot of solemn precipices, they seem to have become the guests of a generation of two centuries ago. The dwellings are of grey stone, rough and substantial; the walls two feet thick, and the floors flagged; and the yawning chimney, with its furniture and space, is like nothing more modern than Queen Elizabeth's time. The carved chests and high-backed chairs, the heavy wooden settles, the linsey-woolsey of the women, and the wooden shoes of the children, and the home-spun coats of the men, the stone fences, with their antique steps; and above all, the mysterious walls, which straggle up the mountain sides, apparently useless, and certainly ugly,—all carry back the imagination through many centuries, and give an impression of a sample of old England, preserved through all the changes of a modern time.

The straggling walls are so distinctive a feature of the region as to require special notice. The stout Romans made no difficulty of storming this citadel any more than any other which it suited them to take; and they marched right into, or over, the fastnesses of the region. We know this by the traces they have left. Not only have we still their camp at the head of Windermere, which involved no great mountain travelling: we have vestiges of a wonderful road of theirs along the very top of the Troutbeck ridge,—one peak of which is called High Street for that reason. The Saxons and Normans sat down before the citadel; but they did not take it till the garrison had nearly died out. As the Normans pressed on the Saxons, the Saxons entered where the Britons had found refuge before; but this was not till long after they had made a lodgment in the more fertile and accessible parts of the district. For instance, it was in or about A.D. 945 that the Saxon Edmund slew the king of Cumbria, Dunmail, in Dunmaille Raise, where a cairn marks the place of battle. The two sons of the slain king were blinded, and their territory given to Malcolm of Scotland, to hold in fee. This was when the Saxons had long been the reputed lords of the land; and it does not appear that they were well settled in the district till long afterwards. The straggling walls mark their recession, in their turn, before a new race of invaders: a recession so slow and partial that the feudal age was nearly over before the region was thrown open. There are no ruins of feudal castles in the interior; and such Norman traditions as remain hang about the outskirts. The heart of the Lake District was, for a long course of years, almost as much of an unknown land to knight or abbot as Mauritania or far Cathay.

There were, as we have said, no feudal castles in the interior. But there were abbeys in the surrounding levels; and broad lands were given to Norman nobles, comprehending nearly the whole circumference. Cartmel Priory and Furness Abbey occupied the two peninsulas stretching into Morecambe Bay; Calder Abbey lay between the mountains and the sea on the west; St. Bees stood above the surf on that coast; Lanercost Priory on the north; Wolverdale Monastery and Shap Abbey nearly complete the circuit. In the intervals stood many a strong dwelling, whose park stretched inwards towards the mountains, over gentle hill and shallow dale. A ring-fence of Norman possessions enclosed the mountains; and the nobles and monks spread their flocks and their tillage over the slopes, up to the natural defences of the region. Their lands were divided into tenements, and the tenements into portions small enough to be given to emancipated serfs. By arrangements among the holders, military aid was so afforded to the owner as to permit the greater number of settlers to apply themselves to the care of stock and to tillage. As shepherds and husbandmen they obtained access to the hills, which would have been denied to armed men; and they gradually hutted themselves on the uplands, and then enclosed crofts round their dwellings, for the protection and sustenance of their flocks, without opposition from the mountaineers. The sprouts of the ash and the holly were a chief part of the food of cattle in those days; and the walling in of the crofts was partly to preserve the woods, and partly to protect the animals from wolves. The feudal proprietors encouraged this gradual encroachment by herdsmen and shepherds; and the walls seem to have crept up wherever wood could grow, in days when the whole region was one great forest. The forest is gone, and the walls remain, without beauty, and without apparent use; but they answer some purpose, even to the mere observer, if they indicate the mode and degree in which the last invaders encroached on the last resistants who struggled for possession of Old England.

The distribution of the estates into tenements gave rise to the name, as well as to the mode of life of the dalesmen. Strangers are surprised to find that it is the dwellers on the hills, and not in the valleys, who are the dalesmen of the region. The name is derived from the word deylen, to distribute. As each tenement was divided into four portions, and as each tenement furnished an armed man to the border, or other wars, on demand, three out of four tenants remained in their crofts, and industry was spread over the region, through all the ravages of feud with the Scots and among baronial neighbours. The uplands were cut up into portions, each of which had its own herd, or flock, or tillage, according as the ground was woodland, or pasture, or fit for cultivation; and the dalesmen were the distributed men. The most remarkable change that the district has ever undergone was, perhaps, that which succeeded the union with Scotland. The border wars at an end, there was no further drain of able-bodied men from their homes; and a repose, like nothing else in England, settled down upon the Lake District. The men now shared the monotony in which the women had lived. For a whole lifetime entire families never were further from home than the next fair or market, or spring or autumn sale of household goods; and strong traces of this seclusion remain, even to this day, in some of the most retired vales,—where the women speak with the awkwardness which attends an unaccustomed action. It is not only that the dialect is unintelligible to strangers, but that the mind is so sluggish, the thoughts so unused to be dressed in words, that the rustics speak their native language as learners speak a foreign one. And yet the other great change of modern times has penetrated this part of the country, like every other. The growth of the manufacturing system modifies life in the lake district to an extent only exceeded by the border wars. The process and the existing state of things are perfectly clear and easily described.

The first breaks in the forest which once covered the whole district—clothing the ridges and filling up the valleys—appeared when the husbandmen and herdsmen made their clearings, and let in the sunshine over broad tracts of the mountain sides. Still, though the people grew their own flax and hemp, as well as wool, the woodlands were preserved with some care, for the sake of food and shelter for cattle and sheep. Wordsworth was told by old people, in his youth, of a time when the squirrel could go from Wythburn to Keswick (six miles) on the tops of the trees, without touching the ground. But the consumption of wood went on without any attempt to repair it; and large spaces of rocky ground were left bare which had better have been covered; and bogs began to spread, as they usually do where the felling of forests has not been accompanied by drainage. The wool and flax were still spun at home, and the clothes were made up by the itinerant tailors who went from homestead to homestead to construct the family suits, being paid by board and lodging, and a small gift over. As the flocks and cattle suffered more from the snow-drifts on the bare uplands, and as the spread of the swamps occasioned more and more loss, this affair of the clothing became more expensive and difficult. The dalesmen were unconscious of the process, but they were passing through a period of transition which must end in making clothing cheap, in partially restoring their woods, and in providing for their sons and daughters at a distance from home.

In brief, the coppices of the district are now more valuable for bobbins for the manufacturing districts than the flax, hemp, and wool of the same area could ever be again. According to the news of the South Carolina cotton-fields, and the Australian sheep-walks, and the mulberry plantations of Italy and India, is the condition and prospect of the woodlands of the Lake District. Every autumn a group of men may be seen traversing the uplands from coppice to coppice: the agent, well booted, making his way through bog, brambles, and moss, and squeezing through the underwood, to value the trees. A labourer follows with paint-pot and brush, to mark the doomed trunks; and a bargain is finally struck with the bobbins-mill owner, on behalf of the landowner. In some parts, the woods, within a certain limit, are divided into twenty portions, one of which is felled every year,—wood of twenty years' growth being considered best for the purpose; but the order is broken in upon, more or less, according to the state of the cotton, wool, and silk markets.

The domestic changes which have attended the introduction of this new element have been such as must give a new aspect to the whole life of the dalesmen in general. Formerly, the wheel was whirring from morning till night in every farmhouse; and there was employment for the whole family when everything was grown and made at home, and when any surplus, from either field or loom, was sure of a sale. For many years after cotton goods became cheap enough to be bought all through the dales, the packhorse which brought them first, and the carrier's waggon which succeeded it, took away the old homespun in return for the new calicoes; and there was still work for the daughters in the domestic manufacture. But, at length, spinning-machines grew and multiplied in Lancashire and Yorkshire till the demand for bobbins brought the coppices of the lake district into request, and changed the course of industry. The first effect was to lay the hill sides barer than ever; but, when the wood began to grow again, and the residents found that the demand was likely to be a permanent one, they began to cherish their woods, and to plant more on soil which would answer no better purpose. This might be all very well—a gain to some people, and no loss to any—but there are incidents connected with the change which cannot but sadden the observer, while they must not be passed over in any faithful account of the district. The lads and lasses who used to be busy at home, making all the domestic clothing and utensils,—the dairy vessels, baskets, fishing tackle, etc.,—obtaining whatever else was wanted from the pedlar who dropped in upon them twice a year or so, now find their skill discredited by modern improvements, and their fortunes hopeless at home. They are scattered through the neighbouring towns, or working in the Lancashire and Yorkshire mills. The parents, and the one son at home, would have, they thought, more produce to sell at market and fairs; but here again they are met by agricultural improvement. Already under disadvantage as to climate and soil, they cannot compete with the farmers of more advanced agricultural districts. The decline of the domestic fortunes is regular and inevitable when it has once set in. The land is mortgaged: the “statesmen” (“estatesmen” originally) haunt the fairs and markets, losing more and more, and too commonly resorting to the old solace on such occasions, and coming home drunk. The amount of intemperance among that class, both in the villages and the dales, is something incredible to strangers, and by far the most painful feature of the transition stage. As the mortgages grow more oppressive, the heirs sell the lands;—estates which have belonged to the same name for centuries have changed hands; and the old names are found everywhere among the shopboys, domestic servants, and labourers of the towns and villages. The old yeomanry of the district have nearly passed away, and strangers have come into their place. The spectacle is a sad one, but nobody has a right to complain. If the indigenous proprietors could not keep up their old ways intelligently, nor adopt new ones, they must inevitably give place to a science and an activity which can regenerate the woodlands, and fill the valleys with grain, and cover the hill-sides with flocks. Amidst the depressed and discouraged class of “statesmen,” some hearty specimens of the old order may here and there be found; but it must strike every traveller in the district that the mountaineer farmer is everywhere becoming remarkably like the agriculturist of a more level region.

The improved value of the copses acts both as cause and effect in creating and sustaining bobbin-mills, of which there are four, not far apart, in the southern part of the district, viz., at Staveley, Troutbeck, Ambleside, and Skelwith. But even in that neighbourhood charcoal-burning goes on with some activity. In ancient times the monks of Furness Abbey made great profit of their ironworks, through the abundance of their woods, after those of the eastern counties were exhausted. The mineral treasures of the north-west of England would have availed little without the charcoal and peat of the district; and even the discovery of the Newcastle coal-field did not affect the iron works at Furness. The oregates (ways) of the Furness peninsula at this day testify to the amount of business done,—many roads and lanes remaining entirely constructed of the slag and refuse of the smelting process. And the huts of the charcoal-burners still delight the eye amidst the woodlands of the southern part of the district. The wood-cutters remain on a particular spot till their work is done; and they build an abode for the time by piling up stems of trees, and heaping heather upon them for a roof. This is the most picturesque thatch that can be seen; and the structure is so shaggy and wild that it might not be known for a dwelling but for the blue smoke breathing out from the hole in the roof, or the fire before the door, where the pot is boiling. The grimy charcoal-burners, or the children at play in the red light, remind the traveller of the forests of Germany; and the life is really not less wild. When the children see a stranger sketching, or botanising, or in any way exploring, they say he is “spying fancies;” and he is a sort of magician in their eyes. Among the latest specimens of the old wild race of forest men were the brothers Dodgson, whose memory has been preserved in Cartmel for above a century. We complain of men being too much engrossed by business in our towns at this day; but these brothers were so intent on their wood-cutting that they devoted Sunday to cooking for the whole week. They lived chiefly on oatmeal porridge, varying the diet with dried peas and hard beans. When they were growing old, they found the need of some domestic help and comfort; and at last the one relieved his mind to the other, saying, “Thou mun out and tait a wife.” “Aye,” said the brother, “if thair be a hard job, thou ollus sets yan tult.” He obeyed, however; and when the old fellows were chopping away—rain or shine—at past eighty, there was a wife’s face at the door of the hut, and children helping with the faggots. The brothers left plenty of money; but it melted away as fast as misers’ hoards usually do; and the name is now known only by tradition in Cartmel.

Much more recently, and more within the verge of modern civilisation, another story was mournfully enacted. A young charcoal-burner was about to marry a farmer's daughter, when, as he sat on a stone, watching his fire and taking his dinner, a flash of lightning struck him dead. Kitty Dawson, his beloved, went to his hut the day after the funeral, in a crazed state, and would never leave it again. She passed her days in sitting on that stone, or calling her lover through the wood. Though she was never intruded on, there were always comforts in the hut, and kind eyes on the watch. One winter day, some sportsmen entered the hut to leave food there, silencing their dogs, and moving quietly. But she could never more be disturbed,—she was lying dead.

Another distinctive class of the district are much like that they were of old,—the slate-quarrymen and miners. The quarrymen, who are met with in the very wildest spots, are a hardy and athletic race, who can bring down from the top of a crag to the ground, from six to twelve hundredweight of slate at once. A Joseph Clark, remembered by the existing generation, accomplished feats which could hardly be surpassed by the strong men of the border in the middle ages. In one day he made seventeen journeys from top to bottom of Honister Crag,—that is, seventeen miles of climbing and sharp descent,—carrying up, each time, a hurdle weighing 80lbs., and bringing down each time 640lbs. of slate. He once carried double that quantity, each time, in three successive journeys. His greatest day's work was bringing 11,776 lbs. His abode was three miles from the quarry; but he thought little of the addition of a six miles' walk to his daily business. He complained of nothing but thirst, and did not appear to suffer from toil so stupendous, continued through a long course of years. Wherever the passenger observes heaps of refuse on the mountain side, or near his path, he may be sure of seeing men worth knowing. They may be found standing on ledges in the recesses of the quarry, or seen moving in the depths below, looking like pigmies, or creeping along the face of the crag, several hundred feet overhead. In the latter case, there are little chambers built up in the refuse, to afford shelter from wind and storms. Ranges of these may be seen, if carefully looked for, near the summits of Honister and the adjacent crags; but it too often happens that a quarryman is caught by the wind before he can get to shelter, and blown out from the face of the crag, like a bird from its perch. When the slate is closely compacted, and offers a perpendicular surface, the quarryman goes to work as the shepherds do when they want to destroy eagles' eggs. His comrades let him down by a rope, and he tries for a footing to rest on while he drives in his wedges. Seen from below, men thus employed look like summer spiders dangling from the eaves of a house. There are more resources and better roads than there used to be; and there is less breakage of men's bones, as well as of good slate; but, between the needless risks they run, and the sudden storms they encounter, and the vast weights they carry or draw, and the slipping of the foot, and the dizzying of the head by drink, there are widows and orphans coming in almost every year from the quarries to live in the towns, and subscription lists going round oftener than from any other local accident, except drowning in the lakes.

There are other black chasms in the mountain sides. There is copper mining and lead mining among the fells, besides the ironworks in the Furness peninsula. The lead miners have, perhaps, been the least stable class; for their fortunes are precarious. At one time the value of the plumbago in Borrowdale was so little known that the shepherds used it freely for marking their sheep; and then, when it was found to be the best material for pencils ever known, the proprietors at once obtained from thirty to forty shillings a pound for the lead of a single "sop," which yielded upwards of twenty-eight tons. In those days, houses were built at the entrance, where the workmen were obliged to change their clothes under inspection,—so strong was the temptation to embezzlement. The high wages of such prosperous periods have alternated with entire suspensions of business, when the lead became too poor for even blacking stoves, or when it seemed lost altogether; and such vicissitudes work mischief on the character of the labouring class. The old copper-mines have been sufficiently prosperous to offer a temptation to the opening of new works; and the characteristics of the mining class are spreading into new vales, and crossing from one mountain side to another. The successor of Robert Walker, "The Wonderful" (celebrated by Wordsworth), complains that the tranquillity of the parish of Seathwaite is disturbed by the sinking of a shaft in the neighbouring hill side,—the miners drawing people away to diversion on Sundays. At Conistone, where the great copper-mine of the region has been worked from the earliest recorded times, the people, who sometimes receive as wages from the mine no less than £2,000 per month, are known by their eagerness after open-air sport. They shoot at everything they see flying, and hunt everything they see running; so that not only did the eagles disappear there sooner than anywhere, but the ravens are gone, though the last pair showed every inclination to cleave to their crag in Yewdale through all chances and changes. Like the general working class of the region, the miners are quite sufficiently thrifty,—abundantly fond of gain. While poets and romancers have taken for granted that there must be patriarchal generosity and rural innocence among the dalesmen, the clergy declare that they find it necessary to preach against worldliness, instead of exhorting to foresight and thrift. While the people appear to have no conception of personal cleanliness, or civil and orderly indoor habits, they keep their houses and furniture clean and bright, hoard goodly clothing, and are exceedingly fond of high profits. They would prosper better with more intelligence and modern knowledge; but their backwardness in these respects does not prevent their having a keen eye for the main chance. Youthful lovers find that there are hard fathers in the vales as elsewhere; and the young dalesmen have reason to know that the rural heiress can take very good care of herself and her fortune. In this matter there is probably little difference between the old times and the new, unless it be in the broadest highroad of the summer tourist.

PHYSICAL CHANGES.

The changes wrought by nature in the features of the landscape are perhaps more conspicuous than those which affect the characteristics of the people. The sea works roughly in such a recess as Morecambe Bay, stirring up the sands very destructively. Several villages specified in Domesday Book are so utterly gone that no trace of them has remained within the memory of man. Others have become isolated at high water, or have been wholly engulfed since the beginning of the last century. The old village of Aldingham has disappeared since that time. The fresh-water forces of the interior operate to the same effect, causing occasional ravages as terrible as any that the marauding Scots left behind them in their old forays. One instance will suffice. In 1760, a flood descended the ravine between Grassmoor and Whiteside, on Crummock Water, carrying down everything that it could sweep from the mountain side, and from the vale below, and ending with laying bare of all soil a piece of arable land which extended between the valley and the lake. Full-grown trees were flourishing there in a considerable depth of earth when the sun set, and at sunrise there was a clean floor of rock. The accumulated material smothered ten acres of land. In the place of a stone causeway, fortified by an embankment, apparently as strong as the hills, there was a swift-flowing river in a sunken channel. The village of Brackenthwaite, unintentionally built on a rock, was safe in the morning; but it stood perched on a knoll, with chasms all about it. The flood and its burden poured into the little river Cocker, and so swelled it that the plain between the mountains and the sea was under water for a considerable time. If such mischief could be done in one night, the perpetual operation of impetuous waters cannot be insignificant. Slides are frequent, as in all hilly countries subject to rains; and the leaping rocks thus displaced play many tricks. Sometimes they lodge in a chasm, and form a bridge; sometimes one bounds into a pool, and forms the basis of an islet; and then, again, it stops short in a meadow, and makes a resting-place for the shepherd, or a shelter for his lambs. The continuous conveyance of silt by the streams alters the forms and dimensions of the lakes so materially that no one of them looks the same from one half century to another. This perpetual deposit alters the currents more than any occasional slide of stones and gravel. New promontories gradually arise, and the sweeps of the bays contract, till reeds fill up the space of the marginal waters, and new acres are seen growing for the husbandman of a future generation. There is scarcely a vale in the whole district which does not show green meadows, and especially a "waterhead," which must have been a part of the lake not very long ago; and in Grasmere the effect of the process is remarkably evident. From any of the slopes above the north-east of the vale of Grasmere the lake looks a mere pond, the small remains of a sheet of water which must once have occupied the whole basin, except where the knolls made islands, like those of the Windermere of our day. While the lakes are thus contracting, and hinting of a time when they will become dry land, new pools are opened, and then deepened and expanded into a promise of future lakes. A tree falls, or a boulder lodges on a well head. In either case the waters spread through the soil, and lodge round the obstruction, making a swamp, which is constantly increased by the fall of more trees, as their roots are loosened. The drowned vegetation decays, and sinks, and waterplants appear, no one knows how. Fish come in time, and their fry, and the seeds and insects, which presently abound, bring birds, and birds bring men. The waterfowl squabble among the reeds; and the hill echoes send the sound to the sportsman's ear. He finds the heron wading in summer, and the snipe rocking on the bulrush in autumn; and divers popping on the surface of the pool, and perhaps the wild geese encamping for the night. When the waters stretch to barriers of rock where they can grow clear and deeper, and receive constant accessions from the hill ooze and drip, the new tarn is safe. The shepherd follows on the track of the sportsman, and his flock in time transform the rough ground into sward, by manuring and browsing. Next appears the first work of art in this wilderness. The sheepfold is a mere enclosure, formed by piling the stones which lie about into high walls, some one of which must afford shelter from drifting snow, whichever way the wind brings it. These folds are usually placed on the lowest ground in the hollow, and as near the water as may be. After the fold comes the hut, looking much like a deserted chalet; and there the cows can be sheltered in bad weather while out on the fells,—to say nothing of the herdsman. In time, the farmstead rises on the slope above the tarn; the plough drives in among the stones; and the stones congregate in the shape of fences. The sounds of the farm-yard scare away the wildfowl; oats take the place of heather; and the draining of the tilled land once more enlarges the lake. The clatter of horses is heard on the stony road; men pass that way, and open new tracks over the ridges. The pedlar drops down into the vale with his gay commodities, and his news from the town; and before the dark sycamores at each end of the house have met to make a canopy, there are sons and daughters settled within call, and a new hamlet (something ending in “thwaite,” probably), has taken its name and place among the hills.

If sudden changes in the aspect of the scenery are caused by slides which lay bare the green uplands or sloping fallows, or by clearings of the woods, or by floods, nature gradually restores the smooth and tranquil surface of the landscape. The birds and the breezes carry seeds to every ledge, and cast them into clefts in the bare precipices, so that the birch and mountain-ash show themselves where there seems to be no soil nor room for a root to strike. The wildest rock-face thus becomes feathered from its base to its ridge; and every autumn fall of leaves and flight of seeds helps the process. Wherever the rill, or the mere drip from above, deposits soil, grass and weeds appear; and they creep up the slopes with visible progress from season to season. Exquisite mosses and delicate ferns line the recesses kept moist by the spray of waterfalls, and clothe the stone fences till they become richer in vegetation, and far more grateful to the eye than the hedges of the southern counties. By this kind of tinting and of drapery, the barrenness of new grey-stone buildings, and the glare of white ones, are presently tempered. So many processes are continually going on that the newest and rawest fissure of a rent mountain, where all is rigid, motionless, and bare, is sure to become in course of years filled with beauty. There is motion from waving trees and tall grass, as well as from winds and waters; and every variety of hue, from the gayest wildflowers and mountain berries to the sombre greens, greys, and browns of the fir, and the rocks and their heather. Some further operations are, however, becoming necessary from the hand of man. Inundations are more frequent and mischievous than formerly, and are evidently on the increase. In the neighbourhood of such of the larger lakes as are preferred for residence, the levels are oftener laid under water than they were twenty years ago; and there is more flooding of houses, and injury to health as well as property. Derwentwater and Bassenthwaite Lake effect a junction of their contents much too often, to the injury of the town of Keswick and the surrounding levels; and the lowlands round Windermere, and even the two valleys of the Rotha and the Brathay at its head, are flooded several times in the course of a winter, as well as after the July rains. The main cause of the evil is the new fashion, excellent in itself, of agricultural drainage. Modern improvement, which every wise man welcomes, sends down masses of water in an hour which it would have taken a week to carry off before drainage was thought of. The thing wanted is a proper carrying out of the system of drainage, and not any going back from what is already done. When steamboats were set up on Windermere, a good deal of money was spent in deepening the south end of the lake,—and this was very well; but the outlet wants enlarging too; and a weir is, in such a case, not to be tolerated. Now that steam-mills are to be had, water power must give way to the public health and convenience; and every facility must be afforded to the waters to flow away as rapidly as they are brought down by the drainage-pipes of improved farming.

One other modern feature of the scenery must be pointed out. At regular times,—once a month, for the most part,—a tall, old shepherd may be seen, with his staff and his dog, traversing the highest central ridges, sometimes below and sometimes above the clouds. He has business up there, higher than he ever led his sheep. He has the charge of the rain-gauges, some half-dozen of them, set up on various heights, and well secured against the gales. He goes the round of them, and records the results. In his youth superstition and fear held possession of the places where science has now established a footing; and the old shepherds, to whom, above all men, their neighbours looked for goblin stories, can now read off the registers of nature, and teach the wise, instead of amusing the ignorant, by telling what they find on the mountain top. The district can show no change more suggestive than this.

SURVEY FROM THE SUMMITS.

The diameter of the Lake District is only thirty miles. It is a singular case of the concentration of all the attributes of a mountain region within so small a compass. Elsewhere, either the proportions are altogether larger, or, as in Scotland and many other countries, long spaces lie between the objects of interest. The way to obtain a conception of the proportions and relations of the heights, valleys, and lakes, in our own district, is to stand on the ridge called Esk Hause, and look abroad on a clear day.

Esk Hause is a ridge among the central and loftiest peaks, of which the Scawfell Pikes and Bow Fell are the conspicuous points. The head-waters of the Esk and Duddon are on this ridge; and it commands, to singular advantage, the primary valleys of the region,—three lines of landscape, which, with their accessories, constitute the Lake District. Looking northwards, Borrowdale is seen lying immediately below, and extending to Derwentwater, beyond which the opening continues past the town of Keswick, past Skiddaw, over Basethwaite Lake, to the Solway and Scotch mountains. This is one line. The next tends to the south-east. It begins with Langdale, lying just underneath, passes by the opening of the Brathay valley to Windermere, and onwards to the dim outline of Ingleborough, in Yorkshire. The third line is intermediate, tending south-westwards. It follows the course of the Esk down Eskdale to the sands; and while Blackcomb rises to the left, the glittering sea bounds the view beyond. The three lines are rarely seen in equal clearness; for, if the sun favours one, another is shadowy or misty; but by spending a bright summer's day on the ridge, the geography of the district may be better understood than it could be by any other method of actual observation, unless it were from a balloon. To follow these lines may be the best way of studying the mountain area in print, as on the spot.

From this ridge the ancient domains of Furness Abbey may be traced. The abbey itself lies south and seawards, among the last levels of the peninsula, which is hidden by the screen of the great Conistone mountain. From the sea to the Shire Stones—not far below Esk Hause—the whole territory lying between Windermere and the Duddon belonged to the abbey; and again, looking northwards, the whole of Borrowdale. The hamlet of Grange, at the mouth of Borrowdale, owes its name to the barns in which the produce was stored, and where monks lived to take care of it. The passes are so steep, and the vale is so effectually hemmed in by mountains, that it was thought sufficient to take care of the entrance. So Grange stands in the defile where the shoaly Derwent is spanned by twin bridges, and the monks were supposed to hold the key of Borrowdale. It was this character of a recess which gave rise to the old story, which a Borrow-dale man hardly likes to hear of even at this day, and which makes the name of the cuckoo a signal for a faction fight at fairs or in wayside inns. Spring was so delightful, we are told, to the Borrowdale people in old times, and the note of the cuckoo so gladsome, that the inhabitants set about building a wall, to keep in the cuckoo, and make spring last for ever. This wall stretched across the entrance, at Grange. Unfortunately, the cuckoo got away; but this was because the wall was built one course of stones too low. It is simply for want of a top course on the wall that eternal spring does not reign in Borrowdale! Not only is the word gook (cuckoo, and also fool) not to be uttered, but the mention of the cuckoo is sure to be followed by a knock-down blow from a Borrowdale man, if time and place allow of it.

It is not now difficult to drop into the dale from the surrounding heights, the most southerly of which are the loftiest. From Esk Hause there is a foot-track to Sprinkling Tarn, whence a rill flows to feed Sty Head Tarn, on the pass between Wastdale and Borrowdale. Another way is by the Stake pass from Langdale; a third is by the steep road from Buttermere; and a fourth is from the direction of Helvellyn,—a footpath from Legberthwaite and Watendlath, which drops into Borrowdale behind Rosthwaite. The twin passes of the Stake and Sty Head descend on each side the "tongue" which splits this vale, like almost every other, into a fork at its higher end. The mountain Glaramara is the "tongue" of Borrowdale; and that part of the recess is still deeply secluded, while settlements thicken towards the other end. From the top of the Stake Pass to Grange is about eight miles; and within the last six there are dwellings,—first, mere farmsteads with their appurtenances, and a few miners' cottages; then the hamlet of Rosthwaite, and finally, Grange. Within a few years several goodly mansions have risen up from the levels, which is rather strange, considering the swampy character of the low grounds, and the vast fall of rain in that mountain basin, amounting to no less than from 120 to 160 inches by the rain gauge at Scathwaite.

Borrowdale can hardly be more celebrated than it has been ever since the scenery of the district began to be appreciated; but it is now so frequented that the local traditions of primitive manners sound very strange. For instance, the great event of an innovator having entered the vale, some generations ago, is fixed in the people's minds by an anecdote. This new-fangled personage wanted some lime,—an article never heard of. He sent an old man a long way for the new commodity, with horse and sacks,—there being no carts because there was no road. Returning from beyond Keswick, the messenger and his horse were overtaken by a shower; and immediately after, the old man was alarmed by seeing his sacks begin to smoke. He got a hatful of water from the river: but the more he wetted his sacks, the worse the smoke grew. As nothing could be clearer than that the devil must be in any fire which was aggravated by water, the terrified man tossed his whole load into the river, where it hissed so fearfully as to make him glad to be rid of it.—Another resident is reported to have suffered more than this by introducing an innovation, being rescued at last by a bright native wit, such as may often be found in the dullest places. A Borrowdale “statesman” went one day to a distant fair or sale, and brought home something terribly new,—a pair of stirrups. He jogged home with his feet firmly jammed into his stirrups,—so firmly that by the time he reached his own door he could not get them out. The alarm and lamentation were great; but there was no use in crying over misfortunes; so the good man patiently sat his horse in the pasture for a day or two—the family bringing him food—till the eldest son declared that he had an idea! The horse would suffer by exposure; and it would be better for the horse, and no worse for his father, that they should be in the stable. The idea was applauded; and the farmer had his food brought to him in the stable for a few days more. By that time, the second son had an idea. It was a pity that the horse should not be useful, and, for that matter, the father too; and it might be possible to carry him on his saddle into the house. By immense exertion it was done,—the horse being led beside the midden-heap, in the yard, while the girths were loosened, to soften any unlucky fall. The good-man found himself under his own roof again, spinning wool in a corner of the kitchen, as he sat astride his saddle. There he remained, through the cleverness of his second son, till his youngest, a bright youth, in a bright hour, came home full of learning from the college at St. Bees. After duly considering the case, he, like his brothers, had an idea. His counsel was, that his father should draw his feet out of his clogs. This was done, amidst family acclamations; and the good-man was restored to his old way of life. His wife was so proud and delighted, that she declared that if she had a score of children she would make scholars of them all.

The learning of Borrowdale, however, did not all come from St. Bees. Philosophy might be native there as elsewhere; and one genius arrived at a conclusion, on a certain occasion, which could hardly be outshone within the walls of any college. A stranger came riding into the vale on a mule, which he left at a farmhouse, as he had an errand up the pass. Neither the farmer nor his neighbours had ever seen such a creature before; and some natural misgivings induced them to consult the wise man of the vale. (They were sensible enough to keep a Sagum or Medicine-man, to supply their deficiencies in wisdom.) The wise man came, contemplated the creature, drew a circle round it, and consulted his books while his charms were burning. At length he announced that he had completed his discovery. There were so many things that the creature could not be, that there remained no doubt as to what it must be. It was a peacock! Borrowdale could thenceforth boast of a visit from a stranger who came riding on a peacock. If every valley abounded in anecdotes like Borrowdale, there would be no end of describing the district; but it is not so. The unique character of that valley as a recess, and the deep seclusion of its old inhabitants, made Borrowdale remarkable for simplicity and dulness in a region where the people in general seemed as primitive as possible in the eyes of the few who came from afar to see them.

Borrowdale opens upon Derwentwater,—perhaps the best known of the lakes, though not one of the largest, nor perhaps in itself the most beautiful. It is about three miles long, and has an average breadth of a mile and a half. Its depth is inconsiderable; and hence its singular clearness, and mirror-like expanse. Its islands, and certain promontories and passes of the surrounding heights, are connected with the names and histories of the Ratcliffes, Earls of Derwentwater; and they are believed to have left records on even the sky. The aurora borealis is there called “Lord Derwentwater’s lights,” because it was particularly brilliant the night after the execution of the Earl, who was “out” with the Jacobites in 1715. The cleft in Wallabarrow crag, which is called the Lady’s Rake, takes its name from its being the way of escape of his wretched wife, who climbed it in the night, carrying away the family jewels, to be used on behalf of her husband. The ancient abode of the Ratcliffes was on the hill called Castle-head, built, according to tradition, within the compass of a Druidical circle: but the materials were removed to Lord’s Island, on the lake, where their more modern mansion stood. The island of Ramp’s Holme was theirs also; and tradition connects with their family the hermit of the seventh century, St. Herbert, the dear friend of St. Cuthbert, who inhabited a third island, called after him, and died on the same day with his holy brother of Lindisfarn. Vicar’s island is the fourth of those which stud the northern end of the lake, and reduce its apparent extent. The noted floating island of Derwentwater is a mere mass of decayed vegetation, and soil formed from it, which rises to the surface when distended with gasses, and sinks when collapsing by their discharge.

Derwentwater is surrounded by very noble landmarks. At one end Scafell Pike rises above the lofty Borrowdale mountains; and at the other, Skiddaw swells from the levels in lonely majesty. Along the western side, Cat Bells rises to a height of 1,400 feet, with Causey Pike, 600 feet higher, just behind it; and the fine wooded steep of Wallabarrow and Falcon Crag enclose the eastern shore. It is from this ridge that the Barrow fall and that of Lodore descend, from a tarn in the upland valley of Watendlath. The fall of Lodore is one of the finest in the district, and unique in its character. A steep ravine of vast boulders separates the towering rocks of Gowder Crag and Shepherd's Crag; and the contents of the tarn in the valley, which lies 150 feet above Derwentwater, come gushing and dripping down in a multitude of little streams, or in a succession of roaring cascades, according to the season or the weather.

At the north end of the lake lies the town of Keswick, on the plain which stretches at the base of Skiddaw. That plain, as seen from any of the surrounding heights, and especially from Castlerigg on the road to Ambleside, presents one of the richest scenes in England. Besides the town and environs of Keswick, there are villages where the woollen manufacture flourishes, and many farmsteads, and two conspicuous churches, in one of which, the white old-fashioned Crosthwaite Church, Southey is buried, and his monumental statue reposes. The Derwent and the Greta wind through the level; and roads intersect it, losing themselves at last in climbing the slopes and penetrating the recesses of the hills; and the fields and woodland show every variety of green under the summer sun, though they are too apt to be flooded in the winter months. The mountains of this group have a peculiar character, being bare and pointed; but every peculiarity becomes reduced as the valley opens to the north. Bassenthwaite, four miles in length, and one in breadth, is the outlying lake in this direction; and, except that Skiddaw towers on its eastern shore, it presents no marked features. Lord's Seat and Barf are the highest hills on the western side; and from them the fells subside in undulations to the plain. The Derwent flows out much enlarged from the northern end of Bassenthwaite, and takes its course towards Cockermouth. The open vales of Isell and Embleton, lying north-west of Bassenthwaite, are the limit of the Lake District in that direction.

The rich vale of Lorton, adjoining Embleton, and traversed by the high road from Keswick, connects with the great Derwentwater valley its dependency, in which lie Loweswater, Crummock Water, and Buttermere. In describing Borrowdale, mention was made of an opening towards Buttermere. At the branching of the fork, below Glaramara, in Borrowdale, there is a road to the west which passes through the farmyard at Seatoller, and ascends very steeply to Honister Crag, at the head of Buttermere Vale, commanding as wild a scene as can be found in the region. The slate quarries of Honister Crag, rising to 1700 feet, have been already referred to. The waterfall which pours beside them rushes down the vale in a channel so winding as to require many bridges or courses of stepping stones, so frequently must the road cross it. This stream is the infant Cocker. The highest peaks of the region are at hand to the south; but the vale leads on to a group which is only secondary. The four mountains which cluster round the south-western side of Buttermere range from Red Pike, 2,750 feet, to the group a few hundred feet lower, of High Crag, Hayrick, and High Stile. They pour down cataracts in noble force, one of the most conspicuous of which is on the side of Buttermere, Sour Milk Ghyll by name. It descends from a tarn (Butnress Tarn) on Red Pike. Another appears to close in the Vale of Newlands, above Buttermere Haws, tumbling down the rocky side of Great Robinson. A much greater one is Scale Force, on the neighbouring Crummock Lake, a fall of 160 feet in a chasm of Melbreak. Tarns abound in these clustered mountains, where the clouds congregate naturally. The tarns of the district are small still-water lakes, lying on high ground. Those which are found in upland vales are not particularly beautiful, their margins being swampy, and their environs not usually striking. But the true mountain tarns are very fine—deep, dark, and still, with wild heathery knolls or perpendicular rocks overshadowing them. When their stillness is broken, it is by tumult. Some rush of wind lashes the surface into foam, and catches up the spray so that it may be seen whirling out like smoke from a distance. Such waterfalls as have been spoken of,—Lodore, and those of the vales about Buttermere,—each torrent descending from a tarn, indicate the uses of those little high-lying lakes to which the district owes so much. But for them there would be more both of drought and of flood. They cause a distribution of water, which fertilizes without inundating. The agricultural drainage already existing shows something of the consequences of bringing down too much at once of the produce of the rains; and but for the tarns, the whole body of rainfall would rush from the heights in a flood. While the lower brooks are rising and swelling the rivers, which immediately expand the lakes, there is no contribution from the heights till the tarns overflow. The higher brooks empty themselves into the tarns, and by the time they are full, the waters below are subsiding. There are no fewer than fifty-four in the district, in all varieties, from the reedy pools of shallow upland vales, and clear basins with a margin of firm turf or clean sand, to the black pits of water which lie under precipices, or in hollows so deep that one at least is said to reflect the stars at noon day. Where they abound in the Buttermere group, the aspect of the mountains is remarkably rude. They show long sweeps of orange and grey stones, and red peaks and yellow promontories; and huge hollows filled with deep blue shadow, or breathing out white mists to curl up the black precipices. Such is the character of this lofty central region, from the topmost peak of Scawfell to the Sceres above Wastwater. Such is the character of Red Pike, as it towers above the lakes of Buttermere and Crummock Water.

Buttermere is a small lake,—only a mile and a quarter in length, and little more than half a mile in breadth. Crummock Water is the same average breadth, and three miles long. The two lakes are separated by a narrow meadow, a mile across, subject to inundation, but divided into fields and clumped with trees,—a platform rescued from the waters to afford a noble view of a circle of mountains. Opposite to Melbreak, the swelling masses of Whitcless, Grassmoor, and Whiteside guard the lake,—the last mountains in this direction. The land subsides in undulations towards the Vale of Lorton, the boundary spoken of before as that into which the highlands melt to the north. One small lake, Loweswater, lies beyond Crummock Water, to the north-west. It is only a mile long, and half as broad; and its northern end opens upon the wild moor which lies between the mountains and the sea.

We must return to the head of Derwentwater, to notice the two isolated mountains there, Skiddaw and Saddleback. Skiddaw is the fourth English mountain for height, being 3,022 feet above the sea, and 2,911 above Derwentwater. It is separated from Saddleback by the Glenderterra, which rushes down to fall into the Greta. Blencathra, as Saddleback was called of old, is 2,787 feet in height. It is distinguished by the noble view from its summit, preferred by many to that from Skiddaw; and by the depth and darkness of its tarns. In one of these, Scales Tarn, it is that the stars are said to be visible at noonday; and another, Bow-scale Tarn, is that which is believed by the country people to be inhabited by a pair of undying fish,—the immortal fish celebrated by Wordsworth in his "Song at the Feast of Brougham Castle." Many legends, and much superstition hang about this neighbourhood. Druidical circles seem to have left traces or traditions in many spots, and a well preserved one remains at the foot of Saddleback. Its forty-eight stones form an oval; and on the eastern side, within the line, there is a small recess formed by ten stones, making an oblong square. According to the tradition which is related in regard to this, as to various other druidical circles, the last human sacrifice was attempted there, and in this way:—The priests in an ancient time settled among the mountains, where there were stones suitable for their temples; whereas the rest of the people went down to the level grounds, and settled in a clearing of the forest, beside a river. A fever soon made havoc among them; and the oracle demanded a sacrifice to appease the divine wrath. The lot fell on a girl who was betrothed; and on the day of sacrifice she was conducted, with the usual ceremonies, to the temple, on the western side of which a little hut of wickerwork, like a beehive, was set up. When she was presented to the assembled people, crowned with oak, and with mistletoe in her hand, her wretched lover saw her from a distance. He resolved to brave divine vengeance rather than contribute a twig to her pile, as every spectator was religiously bound to do. He saw her enter the hut; he saw the multitude pass before it, each casting his branch against the walls; and he saw the priest heap up the dried wood and leaves against the door, while the arch-priest was procuring fire from two sticks. He saw the pile blaze, and, at the same moment, a miracle:—Every mountain round gave forth a torrent, and all the floods rushed towards the temple as to a centre, and made an island of the little hut, extinguishing the fire, and then flowing back to their sources. The maiden came forth safe,—not a hair singed, nor a leaf of her garland withered. The arch-priest, skilled in interpreting thunder, seems to have understood also the "voice of many waters," for he proclaimed that the god had forbidden human sacrifice henceforth for ever. Even now the druid stones are not like others in the eyes of the country people. Shy as they are in speaking about them, they really believe that nobody can count the druid stones correctly, and that a treasure is buried under the largest. Its weight, eight tons, prevents a search on the part of any curious individual; and it is to be hoped that no body of men will be found barbarous enough to overthrow the stone.

In ascending Saddleback by the stream from Scales Tarn, a scene of natural magic is traversed,—so like a miracle that some superstition on the part of the country folk may be excused. There is no doubt whatever as to the facts of the appearances on Souther Fell,—those appearances being spread over a course of years, and attested, not only by the inhabitants of all the dwellings within view of the mountain, but by twenty-six witnesses, selected for the purpose. The facts were related in the Lonsdale Magazine, and other records of the time; and, instead of being overthrown by inquiry, they were confirmed by disclosures of a similar phenomenon seen in Leicestershire in 1707, and on Helvellyn, on the eve of the battle of Marston Moor.

Souter Fell, it must be premised, is full of precipices which render any march of troops impossible in any part of it; and the north and west sides present a sheer perpendicular of 900 feet. On midsummer eve, 1735, a farm-servant of a Mr. Lancaster, living half a mile from the mountain, saw the eastern side of the summit covered with troops, which pursued their onward tramp for an hour. They came, in distinct bodies, from an eminence in the north end, and disappeared in a niche in the summit. The man was ridiculed and reviled when he told what he had seen, as original observers are wont to be when they have anything new to tell. He had to bear it for two years before he had a companion in his disgrace. His employer, Mr. Lancaster, then observed, on midsummer eve, some men following their horses on the same part of the fell, as if they were returning from a hunt. He thought nothing of this; but, looking up ten minutes afterwards, he saw the men mounted, and followed by a countless multitude of soldiers, five abreast, coming and disappearing as before. The entire household now watched the spectacle till darkness covered the summit. The family declared that the forces were manoeuvred, and each company commanded, by a mounted officer, who galloped in various directions. As the light faded, the troops seemed to intermingle; the officers rode at unequal paces; and then it was too dark to see more. All the Lancasters were now insulted as their servant had been before; but they too were justified in course of time. On the approach of midsummer eve, 1745, they selected and invited twenty-six persons whose testimony ought to be received with respect; and the company saw all that had been seen before, and more. There were carriages now among the troops; and everybody knew that no carriages ever had been, or could be, on the summit of Souter Fell. The multitude was beyond imagination, for the troops occupied a space of half a mile, and marched quickly till night hid them. The figures were so distinct that people went up, the next morning, to look for the hoof-marks of the horses; and they were scared at the fresh and untrodden appearance of the grass and heather. The story was attested on oath before a magistrate at the time; and the whole countryside was, in consequence, appalled about the issue of the rebellion then going forward. It came out that on that evening some of the rebel forces were exercising on the western coast of Scotland. Unless we knew in what part, we can have nothing to say to the prevalent conclusion that the movements of that force had been reflected "by some transparent vapour, similar to the fata morgana,"—the theory offered by the Lonsdale Magazine. Some other facts came out,—at least as much to the purpose: that Mr. Wren, of Wilton Hall, and a farm-servant, had had a little private experience of their own in the summer of 1743, when one evening they saw on the mountain a man and a dog pursuing some horses along a place so steep that a horse could scarcely, by any possibility, make good his footing. Their speed was prodigious; and they disappeared so instantaneously at the southern extremity that Mr. Wren and his servant went up next morning to find the body of the man who must have been killed. No trace of man, dog, or horse could be found; and the pair kept their vision to themselves till encouraged to speak by what happened two years afterwards. They were insulted just as much, after all, as if they had not had the Lancasters and their twenty-six friends for fellow-witnesses.

Our first survey from Esk Hause has thus comprehended (somewhat figuratively) the chief mountains—Skiddaw, Saddleback, Grassmoor, Red Pike, and Lord's Seat; to which we may add several mountains of inferior rank, and the remarkable peak of Honister Crag. Of the chief lakes, we have noticed Derwentwater and Bassenthwaite; Buttermere, Crummock Water, and Loweswater. Of waterfalls, Lodore and Barrow Falls; Sour Milk Ghyll, on Buttermere, and Scale Force. Of rivers, the Derwent, the Greta, and the Cocker. Of tarns, more than would be remembered if enumerated.

SOUTH-EASTERN SURVEY.

The second great opening lies south-eastwards from Esk Hause; but we must take it in its whole extent, beginning northwards at the vale of St. John at the foot of Saddleback. Pursuing it from this end, we find the lake of Thirlmere, (formerly Leatheswater, occupying the valley at the foot of Helvellyn, which thrusts its great bulk between this lake and Ulleswater to the east. Ulleswater lies among the last of the north-eastern mountains of the district; and it is only about its head that any considerable peaks are assembled. At the foot of the lake, which is ten miles long, the heights have sunk into hills; and the hills presently subside into the open country stretching towards Penrith. A few more ridges interpose between Ulleswater and the railway and open moors to the east, the last of those ridges being the Shap Fells. They enclose the shallow vales of Mardale, Swindale, Wetsleddale, Lonsleddale, and Kentmere; the only lake of any note being Haweswater in Mardale,—a miniature of Wastwater, which remains to be described hereafter. Parks and noblemen's seats abound outside this corner of the mountain district; Brougham Castle and Hall being in the neighbourhood of Penrith, and the terrace of Lowther Castle overlooking the basins of both Ulleswater and Haweswater. Greystoke Park lies north of Ulleswater, and Gowbarrow Park stretches down to the margin of the lake. In that park is the ravine which contains the exquisite waterfall, Ara Force; and from its woods and slopes, graced with deer, the walk of four miles along the lake to Patterdale at its head, is one of the loveliest the region affords. On the opposite side of the lake, Place Fell rises abruptly from the water; while about the head there are groups of mountains looking like promontories in their projection into the landscape, and throwing up from their midst the great summits of St. Sunday's Crag, Herring Pike, Stridding Edge, and, finally Helvellyn,—the next to the Scafell Pikes, and only 105 feet lower than the highest. The height of Helvellyn is 3,055 feet; and from its summit the tract we are now considering is commanded in all its features. On the one hand below lies Thirlmere, and on the other Ulleswater, while Windermere, Coniston, and Estwaite lakes stretch away to the south and the peninsula beyond them till the land line melts into the sea. Immediately below, at various heights, some of the deepest tarns of the district lie all around,—the chief being Red Tarn, Keppel Cove Tarn, and Grisedale Tarn in the pass from Patterdale to Grasmere, at the junction of three mountains,—Helvellyn, Seat-sandal and Fairfield. The two roads between which Helvellyn occupies the chief space run southwards till they meet at Ambleside. The Patterdale road, which runs from Ulleswater to Windermere, ascends the Kirkstone pass,—the most considerable pass for carriage transit in the district, being 1200 feet above the sea level. At the foot of the ascent lies Brothers' Water, the smallest of the lakes, except Rydal. It is three-quarters of a mile, and Rydal half a mile in length, and the one is half, and the other one-third of a mile in breadth. Hayswater, a tarn beloved of anglers, and overhung by High-street, is high up among the hills to the left. The hamlet of Hartsop lies in the level, where Brothers' Water spreads out among the meadows, and the rough track mounts to the tarn above. The heights which enclose the pass are those of Scandale to the west, and of Coldfield to the east. Near the top stands the fragment of rock which is supposed to have given its name to the pass, as it strongly resembles, from some points of view, a miniature church. The summit of the pass is occupied by the "Highest Inhabited House in England," a wayside public-house, so designated by the ordnance surveyors, whose testimony is exhibited in an inscription over the porch. From this point, two roads diverge—the one descending immediately upon Ambleside, and the other (the eastern one), passing through Troutbeck before it strikes the margin of Windermere. Troutbeck has no lake, but only the stream indicated by its title, and it is chiefly remarkable for the primitive character of its inhabitants and their abodes. To pass through it is like going back two centuries for a morning walk. On the other side of this narrow, scooped-out valley, the subsiding ridges give access to shallower vales, by which the mountain district melts down towards the east.

The descent of above three miles from the top of Kirkstone pass to Ambleside is steep. In the Market-place the road joins that which has run on a lower level from the foot of Helvellyn.

Thirlmere lies high,—five hundred feet above the sea level. It is two miles and three-quarters in length, and in some parts so narrowed by promontories, as hardly to afford any fair average of breadth. It is called, however, half a mile broad. At one point, where promontories and shoals unite, it is crossed by a bridge, or a causeway, supported by little bridges. A rough road on the western side, seldom visited by any but angling or sketching strangers, presents the finest views of the lake, as well as of the massy Helvellyn which overhangs its opposite side. This is a haunted lake. A large black dog swims across it at night as often as the bells of a visionary house on the hill side are set ringing, and lights appear in the windows. A table is said to be spread in that ghostly dwelling by unseen hands, and mortal ears have heard the clatter of the plates and dishes. A murdered bride comes up from the bottom of the lake at intervals, to keep her wedding feast. There is a house at Arncliffe which really has something remarkable about it. Two or three miles off, on a bright moonlight night, the glittering windows are reflected in the lake: and, if a slight fog gives a tinge of redness to the reflection, the appearance is that of an illuminated mansion; whereas the real house is a very humble one, placed in a nook, and overshadowed by a hill, so that it is hardly noticeable by daylight.

From Thirlmere the road passes through the hamlet of Wythburn, from whose little inn travellers begin the ascent of Helvellyn. It then descends Dunmail Raise, where, as has been related, the last king of Cumbria was defeated and slain in A.D. 945. The boundary line between Cumberland and Westmoreland is marked by the stream which rises on the east of the road, whence it is carried over the summit of Helvellyn to Ulleswater. The descent from Dunmail Raise is upon Grasmere, following the course of the Rotha, which, rising in the Raise, runs through the lakes of Grasmere and Rydal, and falls into Windermere at its head. Grasmere is rather more than a mile in length, and rather less than a mile in breadth. It forms a small part of an area, level for the most part, but diversified by knolls, rocky or wooded, which were once, no doubt, islands, like the one which now remains in the lake, and the two which adorn its neighbour mere at Rydal. The whole is enclosed in a basin of hills, more steep than lofty, but singularly inviting to the clouds. The amount of rain which falls at Grasmere is a serious drawback upon residence there, though for beauty it is by many considered incomparable. In the old-fashioned church of the village is a monumental medallion of Wordsworth, with an inscription perhaps somewhat too boastful for a sacred place; and in the churchyard are the graves of himself and his deceased children. Hartley Coleridge lies buried near his old friend.

From the high peaks behind Grasmere, there are several roads through the region we are now considering: viz., from the head of Langdale to the limits of the Lake District. The mail-road which we have been following proceeds southwards past Rydal lake, on the margin of which stands Hartley Coleridge's dwelling; past the foot of Rydal Mount, so sacred to the admirers of Wordsworth; past Rydal Park, where the charms of ancient forest and modern park are united; through the valley of the Rotha, sheltered to the north by Fairfield, forming a great cul-de-sac, and sending down Rydal Beck, to make waterfalls in the park; through the little post town of Ambleside, a mile from the head of Windermere, along the margin of Windermere, and finally to the railway station, just above Bowness, midway down the lake. The road ceasing to be a mail route, continues along the lake to Newby Bridge, at its foot; and then the mountains and lakes being left behind, it runs down into the Furness peninsula, passing through the brisk little town of Ulverston, and the smaller town of Dalton, to Furness Abbey and the sea. This is the easternmost of the roads which traverses the region under notice. After Fairfield, the head of which is 2,950 feet above the sea level, it does not skirt any considerable mountain, unless Wansfell be so regarded. It rises to the height of 1,590 feet, on the eastern shore of Windermere. The hill called Longhrigg, which forms the central dividing ridge between the valleys of the Rotha and Brathay, of Rydal, Grasmere, and Langdale, is only 1,108 feet high. Interposing between the lofty peaks in the centre of the district and Windermere, it is the first token of subsidence towards the south. Beneath its shelter, in the valley of the Rotha, stands Fox How, the residence in which Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, passed his holiday seasons, and where he hoped to spend his latter years. In the same valley, and just above Ambleside, is the Stock Ghyll waterfall,—not a very mighty “force,” but remarkably beautiful. Along this route, dwellings are multiplied so that, from the railway station to beyond Grasmere, there is little intermission of mansions, villas, farms, and cottages, with lands pertaining to them. Bowness and Ambleside trade in tourists, and are busy and thriving places; and Rydal and Grasmere see new houses rising every year. The case is different with the other roads traversing the same portion of the district.

The Langdale Pikes, which command everything to the south of them, rise to the height of 2,400 (Harrison Stickle), and 2,300 (Pikes' Stickle), and supply several streams from their tarns. Following the course of those tarns, there is one path down into the secluded Easedale, lying behind Grasmere, and another into Langdale, near the fissure in which the famous Dungeon Ghyll Force pours its thundering flood. From Langdale, there are several passes into other vales;—the Stake pass, leading over into Borrowdale, as we have already seen; Rosset Ghyll pass, leading to our lofty stand point, Esk Hause, and the Wall End ascent, leading out of Langdale to the neighbouring vale, which is the scene of a considerable portion of “the Excursion” of Wordsworth. Blea Tarn in that little vale is the mere by which the Solitary dwelt. Langdale is remarkable for the regularity with which its opposite heights advance and recede, so as to divide the vale into areas, sometimes winding, and sometimes circular, and nowhere spreading out into a level which will admit a lake. A small stream winds through it, and the spurs of the mountains are occupied by dwellings above the margin of the winter inundations; the frequency of which is denoted by the paving of the roads and paths. This vale, as seen from High Close, a point of view above Langdale chapel, is one of the most striking in the district. Bow Fell and the Pikes close it in gradually to the north-west; the fissure of Dungeon Ghyll is clearly discernible, and the falling foam of the beck from Stickle Tarn; thence the vale is traced by the attenuating spurs of the hills, and at the outlet, there are the prodigious Thrang Slate Quarries and the powder mills at Langdale chapel. Opposite is the chain of pools called Elter Water, and thence the valley widens, till it discloses Windermere, and the boundary of Yorkshire hills beyond.

It is a primitive region, this through which lay the pack-horse route to Whitehaven, before even the carrier's cart was introduced. That road is still visible, winding from Fell foot up the mountain side towards the Shire Stones, before mentioned. Whitehaven is now reached by railway along the coast; but here, in the heart of the mountains, the pedlar still plies his trade, tramping over the passes and along the vales, and dropping into every rural dwelling, however secluded. The little chapel is itself a relic of an older time—a good specimen of the order of chapels which is disappearing. The place is homely; and the people are literal and familiar beyond belief in their understanding of religious matters. In this very chapel, not many years ago, the clergyman, Rev. Mr. Frazer, was preaching from the text “Behold, I come quickly.” He had not proceeded far in his sermon when the rotten old pulpit fell, enveloping in rubbish an elderly dame who sat just under it. As soon as he could collect himself, the pastor congratulated the good woman on her escape; but she was in no mood for sympathy, and replied, tartly, “If I’d been kilt, I’d been reet sarrit (rightly served), for you’d threatened ye’d be comin’ doon sune.”

Loughrigg now rises on the left hand. At its foot on the other side, Grasmere and Rydal lakes are lying; while on this side a quiet little valley spreads out, to receive the waters of the Brathay, a little river which rises in Elterwater, and runs into Windermere after a junction with the Rotha. There is a pretty modern church in the Brathay valley, on a knoll which commands a fine view of the central mountains.

The various routes have thus far joined so as to make one along the course of Windermere. There is still another belonging to the same opening, which takes a parallel course by Coniston and its lake. Leaving Langdale by the Wall End issue, it passes through the Vale of Wordsworth's Solitary, and descends into the valley, and down upon the tarn of Little Longdale, and to the settlement of Fell foot, whose name speaks for itself. Through a wild region of slate quarries, and under the shelter of Wetherlam, it leads to the bright beautiful openings at the head of Coniston, where stands the last high mountain, and spreads the last long lake in this direction. Coniston Old Man is the fifteenth in rank of the mountains of the district, its height being 2,632. The lake is six miles long, and averages half a mile in breadth. At its foot the hills become undulating moorland, and the moorland turns into red soil towards Ulverston, and into sand before it reaches the sea.

The views from the Old Man (as the highest point of the mountain is called,—the usual cairn on the summit of each mountain being called “the man”) are considered finer than any in the district except those from Scawfell and Helvellyn,—if indeed those of the latter be an exception. After the tracks leading to the copper-mine are left behind, precipices spring to a great height, casting their shadows into the black tarns at their base; and the most grotesque crags, infested with foxes, are piled up with singular wildness. The edge of the rock at the summit overhangs Low Water Tarn at a height of 600 feet, while the tarn itself is 2,000 feet above the sea level. The “Old Man” erected here by the country people, and removed by the Ordnance surveyors, who substituted an inferior one, contained a chamber of refuge, most welcome to shepherds and travellers in case of sudden storms. From that pinnacle, the Isle of Man is conspicuous in good weather; while in other directions may be seen Ingleborough in Yorkshire, Lancaster, and even Snowdon. Instead of the chains of lakes seen from the central peaks, there is here a fine stretch of sea; and when the estuaries are full, the coast is a beautiful spectacle. The shores of Windermere and Coniston, wooded, and thickly inhabited, form a gay scene nearer at hand. There is no view more thoroughly distinctive of the district than that which is commanded from the heights on the opposite (the eastern) shore of Coniston lake, near the head. Nowhere else perhaps is the grouping of the mountain peaks, and the indication of their recesses, so striking; and, as to the foreground, the overlapping of the slopes, the green undulations, the glittering waterfall on the mountain side, the diversified woods, the bright dwellings, scattered among the knolls, and the clear lake, with its boat-houses and moving skiffs, convey the strongest impression of fertility, prosperity, and comfort, nestling in the bosom of the rarest beauty.

At the extremity of this region lies Furness Abbey, of which it is necessary to speak in this place only as a ruin. Its situation is beautiful, as the position of religious houses usually is. It stands in a wooded glen, with a stream flowing beside its walls. It must once have nearly filled the glen, in the days when its beacon-fire was visible all over Low Furness, and drew all eyes in case of disturbance or expected invasion. The remains indicate the space of sixty-five acres which its boundary-wall enclosed, and on which may still be recognised the mill, the granary, the fish-ponds, the ovens and kilns, and other offices. The walls are of red stone of the peninsula, faded by time to the palest pink hue. Ferns and mosses fringe its ledges, and tall grasses grow round its fallen stones. The scent of violets is sweet within the nave in dewy spring mornings, and the secret staircases in the walls, and the chapter-house, where so much mystery once kept guard, are laid open to the free air and sky. The Abbey was founded in A.D. 1127; it flourished for four centuries, during which its abbots were absolute rulers over a broad territory. It was humbled to the dust at the time of the Reformation, so that its last abbot was glad to accept, as a life annuity, the proceeds of the rectory of Dalton, valued at £33. 6s. 8d. of the money of that time; and now, in the nineteenth century, it stands crumbling in its exposure to the elements; the dwelling of its abbots, after being a farm house, has become a hotel; and the railway passes through the glen, cutting its way through the wood, like the hurricane cleaving a path through the American forest.

WESTERN SURVEY.

We have now surveyed the northern, eastern, and southern portion of the Lake District. The western is perhaps the finest and most interesting, from its characteristic features and its close connexion with the group of central peaks. Scawfell itself overhangs its principal lake,—Wastwater. This portion lies within the Cumberland boundary, and extends from the central peaks to the sea, and from the mountains above Crummock Water to the Duddon.

The summit of Scawfell Pike is visible from Esk Hause. It is 3,160 feet in height; but three more lie below it, and with it compose the mountain called Scawfell. One of these, Great End, faces Borrowdale. Another, Lingmell, affords the best ascent on the Wastwater side. The two Pikes are about three quarters of a mile apart at their summits, being separated by the great chasm called Mickledore. The ordnance surveyors have set up a staff on a cairn on the highest peak, which cannot be henceforth mistaken by any traveller. Herdsmen and shepherds never want to go there in the way of their vocation; for there is not a blade of grass there, nor any vegetation, except moss. Blocks and inclined planes of slate rock, cushioned here and there with moss, compose the peak. It is difficult of access and dangerous without a guide, from the abundance of its chasms and precipices; but the view from the highest English mountain, the centre of its highlands, may well tempt the lover of fine scenery. On the one hand cluster the heights already described. On the other are Great Gable, 2,925 feet above the sea; the Pillar, 2,893; Hay Cocks, Steeple, Red Pike, and High Stile, above Crummock Water. From the remarkable alluvion at the base of Scawfell, Wastdale Head, there is a striking route to Ennerdale Lake, a lake less visited than most, and less beautiful than many, but yet presenting fine features in the rocky heights amidst which it lies. It is two miles and a half long, and half a mile broad; and it is so wild, in the character of its shores, and in its position among the mountains, as to have caused more terrors and disasters to strangers than any other spot in the district. At every house from Wastdale Head to Ennerdale Bridge, stories may be heard of adventures and escapes of pedestrians and horsemen in Mosedale, and the passes of Blacksail, and Scarf Gap. A young man attempting this route some years ago, struck into the deep ravine between Great Gable and Kirk Fell; and when he came out at night upon a sheet of water, was confounded to find it the same he had left in the morning. He had walked completely round Kirk Fell. Three young ladies passed the night on the mountain, once upon a time, from having got bewildered in this intricate region. At first their story was disbelieved; but one had dropped her pocket book, and another had seen a dead sheep in a particular spot; and these incidents being verified, the adventure of the Kendal ladies remains one of the wonders of the dales.

Blake Fell, a wild, high lying moor, separates Ennerdale from Crummock Water. These moorlands, treeless, except where farmhouses or sheepfolds lie in the hollows and are sheltered by sycamores; and all grassy and undulating, with a descent towards the coast, are an interesting feature on the western skirts of the Lake District. They are too exposed and dreary for some tastes; but they have an imposing character of their own for those who are not afraid of the risks to be encountered among them;—risks of sultry heats, of biting cold, and of sweeping storms. From them the grouped mountains may be best studied for their forms and light and shade. From them the passing storms may be best seen hastening out to sea, and veiling and unveiling the Isle of Man. From them may be best seen the wonderful spectacle of lakes and vales lying far below in yellow sunshine and blue shadows, while the spectator is enveloped in gloom and tempest. From them too, may the coast be best surveyed, with its little ports and fishing villages lying at the mouth of each river, and stretching out on sandy promontories, washed by the surf which is noiseless so far off. The railway may be traced, emerging from woodland or enclosures, and showing its cobweb construction against the yellow sands, threading the towns and villages, as it were, upon its slender string. The smoke of Workington, at the mouth of the Derwent, is visible from Blake Fell; and Whitehaven with its shipping, near the bluffs of St. Bees. From Cold Fell, crossed from Ennerdale to the south, several little towns are seen lying in the green hollows, or through vistas between grassy slopes. Among these is Egremont ("The Mount of Sorrow" in the original Norman). It was at the gate of Egremont Castle that the horn was hung in crusading days, of which Norman tradition afforded Wordsworth so pretty a tale to tell. The ruins of the castle stand on an eminence on the seaward side of the little town, which has nothing else of romantic interest to show.

Wastwater lies, as has been said, at the base of Scawfell. It is the most solemn and imposing of all the lakes—three miles long, half a mile wide, and in some parts reaching a depth of 270 feet, a depth considerably exceeding that of any part of either Windermere or Ulleswater. It is usually grey and shadowy, being bordered on its south-east side by the Scares. The lines of this singular range are almost unbroken in all directions. For two-thirds of their height there is a prodigious slope,—a sweep of slaty debris rushing down sheer into the lake, without affording any trace of a path for man or brute. When the summer tempest or winter gale shakes the crags above, down comes a slide, sending up dust from the shore, and spray from the water. The upper third of the height consists of crags, bare of vegetation, except where ferns line the waterdrips, and grass grows out of the crevices. Here the grey masses are relieved by red soil, and streaked with the colours found where iron is present. The great fissure called Hawlghyll, and other crevices, breathe out vapours which may be almost always seen ascending, or floating along the craggy rampart. The opposite shore is cheerful and comparatively open. It sends several bright streams into the lake, and affords a charming succession of promontories and little bays, above which winds a practicable road to the marvellous recess of Wastdale Head. From a distance, the hollow in which the lake is hid is seen to lie between the bases of Middle Fell, Yewbarrow, Great Gable, all the Scawfell ridges, and the Scares. When the head of the lake is reached, a turn of the road discloses the finest "water head" in the district. As among the Alps, so here, the loveliest low-lying spots are the levels which have been won from the lakes by the hand of nature in the course of centuries; and here the finest instance is at Wastdale Head. It is so shut in that exit from it appears to be impossible, except by the lake. The mountains come down with a sheer sweep to the green and perfect level, which is divided into little fields, and graced by a farmhouse here and there, and a little chapel, containing eight pews. This nook has a chapel and school, and no public-house; and if the people are not wiser, or more cleanly than those of other places, they are more sober. There is more than one exception to the reproach of dirt; and in one dwelling, at least, life may be as comfortable as it must be picturesque in this, the very heart of the district.

Besides the lake, the modes of egress are by the Wastdale road, just described; by the ascent of Scawfell, by Mosedale, leading out between Yewbarrow and Kirk Fell; and by the Styhead pass, into Borrowdale, the road to which is seen from below, slanting up the precipitous front of the gable to the height of 1,000 feet. This is all; and nowhere can the seclusion of human dwellings appear more complete; for nowhere else in the district is a dalehead overhung by such lofty mountains.

In descending from this nucleus of summits to the more open regions, the Irt is seen making its way to the sea; and next to the Irt, the Mite; and next to the Mite, the Esk, which descends, as has been seen, from the watershed at Esk Hause, where the Duddon also rises. The town of Ravenglass stands on the bay formed by the estuaries of the Irt, Mite, and Esk, and it may be seen from the heights above Eskdale, which is the chief feature of the last opening proposed for survey from Esk Hause. The high road which crosses these vales, in their whole series from the Duddon to the Calder, commands charming views of the heights above, the richly diversified coast below, and the valleys which widen from the one to the other. On the Calder, and a few miles from Wastwater, lie the ruins of Calder Abbey,—a small but very beautiful ruin of a Cistercian monastery, founded in A.D. 1134, and partaking in the fortunes of its neighbour abbeys. It is charmingly situated in low ground, with wooded hills closing it in; and it is most carefully preserved. Another great object of interest among these vales is Stanley Ghyll Force, in Eskdale,—usually pronounced the finest waterfall in the district. If the fall is not the finest, its glen certainly is;—a ravine whose sides are feathered with wood from base to ridge. Two crags part to give passage to the waters, which have not to be sought in a hollow, as at Ara Force (which otherwise this fall most resembles), but are seen from a distance through an avenue of wooded heights.

Above this ravine the high moorland of Birker Fell extends from Eskdale to the valley of the Duddon. Here the lark may be heard; and it is an infrequent pleasure to hear the lark in a mountain region. The narrow vales are an unsafe abode for small birds, while the rocks afford a harbourage for birds of prey. The eagles are said, though with some doubt, to have disappeared; very few ravens, if any, remain; but hawks abound; and those who would hear the lark must go out to such places as Birker Moor. Here the central peaks sink out of view, being lost entirely on the verge of the Duddon valley. The deepest part of the vale, and that in which lie the stepping stones celebrated by Wordsworth, is hidden below the skirts of this moor. It rushes among broken rocks, and is overhung with scattered masses of woodland; but it widens and slackens as it flows, till it spreads over the level sands of its estuary. In this vale, which comprehends Seathwaite higher up, and Ulpha lower down the stream, the bounding heights are sometimes a green and smooth pasturage, and elsewhere a rough brown heather, broken up by occasional rocks, and new plantations, or remnants of the old forest. Grey stone cottages are scattered about, and more substantial farmsteads, where the massive sycamore overhangs the roof, and the light birch casts its quivering shadows on the field plots. This is the Seathwaite (there are several), where Robert Walker, named "the Wonderful," spent the sixty-six years of his ministry. The story of the good man's vast charities and astonishing course of life is told at length in the notes to Wordsworth's Duddon Sonnets; and there is probably no lover of poetry in the kingdom who is unacquainted with the facts. The little church is much like what it was when he taught the children of the parish there, and sat spinning beside the altar, to keep himself warm by exercise,—sending the children in detachments to his household fire. The turf seat round the old yew is there, and the old men rest on it still, after their walk over hill and dale. The little sun-dial is there,—the whitened post which tells the time in summer to neighbours who have no clocks. The neat white cottage is there, with its frontage of evergreens and roses, where Robert Walker lived, and which is still the parsonage. Here, in 1802, he died, after having been curate of Seathwaite for sixty-six years, and an example to all country pastors for all time. The manners of his day were those of a preceding century; and strong traces are found of their peculiarities wherever an old-fashioned pastor and flock keep themselves secluded in their own vale. Odd sprinklings of learning are found here, as over the border, where Englishmen would hardly look for them; and there seems to be hardly any medium between scholarship and absolute ignorance of books and what they teach. It was in Ulpha, in this vale, that Gunson the innkeeper lived, to whom some travelling students sent a note in Latin, requesting to have their bill. Gunson immediately sent in the bill in Greek, which was too much for the young men, who were humbled to ask for it in English. It was here that the farmer lived who rebuked his "heighlarned" wife for declaring, in a trying time, that she did not fear poverty, but could be content with food and raiment. "Thoo fule," said the husband: "thoo doesn't think thoo'st to her mair than other folk. I se content wi' meat and class." It is in these vales that the people retain the primitive custom of doing on Sunday any farm-work to which the weather—so precarious among the hills—is favourable, with the sanction, as in Switzerland, of "the priest," as the curate is called. It was in the chapel at Ulpha that "the blind priest" officiated, a few years since, who was not only on the most familiar terms with his people, but apt to jest from the pulpit, like the pastors of the Reformation, and of many a century before. When the bell rang rather early, one Sunday morning, calling the people unexpectedly from tending their stock, farmer T— was out after some cow, pig, or sheep, and was the last to enter the church. As he came "thunnerin' down the aisle," the priest inquired "Wha's comin' now?" and, being informed by the clerk that it was John T—, he inquired further, "a-foot or a-horseback?" The old characteristics are, as has been seen, dying out; but it is in these comparatively untrudened vales, lying off from the high road, that they will linger longest.

Yet the railway spans the estuary of the Duddon, within view from a point not much lower down than this old Ulpha Kirk. A wild and pleasant mountain track leads from the vale over Walna Scar to Coniston. The high road runs south to Broughton, where, four miles from the bridge at Ulpha Kirk, the head of the Furness peninsula is reached.

Such is the Lake District of England, seen from end to end, across and around, in and out. It contains within its small compass a wonderful aggregation of beauties, by which the northern counties are distinguished, and must continue to be so, from all others south of the border. Englishmen who have never visited Switzerland or the Tyrol have missed what certainly is unequalled in the way of natural scenery: but next to those transcendent displays of the charms of earth, water, and sky, there is perhaps no region which combines so many features of grandeur and beauty as the Lake District of Cumberland and Westmorland.

Geographical Description of Cumberland.

SITUATION, BOUNDARIES, EXTENT, POPULATION, DIVISIONS, ETC.

CUMBERLAND is a maritime, lake, and border county, extending from $54^{\circ} 11'$ to $55^{\circ} 12'$ north latitude, and from $2^{\circ} 17'$ to $3^{\circ} 37'$ west longitude. It is of an irregular oblong form, bounded on the north by Scotland and the Solway Frith, on the west by the Irish Sea, on the south by Lancashire and Westmoreland, and on the east by Durham and Northumberland. Its length from Ravenglass to Spadeadam Waste is 64 miles, its greatest breadth 34 miles, average breadth 22 miles, and circuit about 215 miles, 75 of which are coast. The area of the county is 1,565 square miles, or 1,001,273 statute acres, of which about 300,000 are mountain and lake. The population in 1801 was 117,230; in 1811, 133,665; in 1821, 150,124; in 1831, 169,262; in 1841, 178,038; and in 1851, 195,492; showing an increase of 66 per cent in the number of inhabitants during the last fifty years; of this number 96,244 were males, and 99,248 females. There were, in 1851, 36,763 inhabited houses, 1,545 uninhabited, and 239 in process of erection; the number of persons to a square mile was 125, of inhabited houses 23; the number of persons to a house was 5.3, of acres to a person 5.1, and of acres to a house 27.2.

Cumberland was formerly divided into five wards (divisions similar to the hundreds of the midland and southern counties), viz.:—Cumberland, Allerdale-below-Derwent, Allerdale-above-Derwent, Leath, and Eskdale; but, in 1833, a new ward, that of Derwent, embracing portions of the two Allerdales, was formed for magisterial purposes, and for taxes, in 1843. At the quarter sessions held at Carlisle, October 20th, 1857, the ward of Allerdale-above-Derwent was still further curtailed, and a new division formed from it, viz.:—the Bootle Division.¹ This new arrangement, which came into operation on the 1st January, 1858, does not extend to police purposes. For the election of members of parliament the old arrangement of wards is still followed, Cumberland, Eskdale, and Leath wards forming the eastern division, and the two Allerdales the western. Cumberland contains one city, Carlisle; the parliamentary boroughs of Cockermouth and Whitehaven; and the market towns of Alston, Aspatria, Bootle, Brampton, Egremont, Harrington, Hesketh Newmarket, Ireby, Keswick, Kirkoswald, Longtown, Maryport, Penrith, Ravenglass, Wigton, and Workington.

For ecclesiastical purposes the county is comprehended in the province of York, and the diocese of Carlisle, with the exception of the parishes of Alston and Over Denton, which belong to the diocese of Durham. The ward of Allerdale-above-Derwent, formerly in the diocese of Chester, was, under the provisions of 6 and 7 William IV., c. 77, and of an order in council dated 10th August, 1847, annexed to the see of Carlisle, on the demise of Bishop Percy, in 1856. According to the Census of Religious Worship, taken in 1851, it appears that there were at that period 389 places of worship, of which 161 belonged to the Church of England, 136 to the Wesleyan Methodists, 24 to the Independents, 17 to the Scottish Presbyterians, 9 to the Baptists, 8 to the Catholics, and 34 to the smaller bodies. The number of sittings provided by the Church of England was 58,088; by the Wesleyan Methodists, 26,489; by the Independents, 7,247; by the Scottish Presbyterians, 6,070; by the Catholics, 2,877; by the Baptists, 2,290; and by others, 6,707, making a total of 110,374 sittings.

Cumberland is included in the Northern Circuit, and the assizes are held at Carlisle twice a year. The Midsummer and Christmas quarter sessions are held at the same place, and the Easter and Michaelmas at Cockermouth. County courts are held at Alston, Carlisle, Cockermouth, Keswick, Penrith, Whitehaven, and Wigton.

The county returns four members to the imperial parliament, two for the eastern and two for the western division. Carlisle sends two members, the borough of Cockermouth two, and Whitehaven one. Under the provisions of the Poor Law Amendment Act, Cumberland was apportioned into the following nine unions, viz.:—Alston, Penrith, Brampton, Longtown, Carlisle, Wigton, Cockermouth, Whitehaven, and Bootle; the statistics, &c., of which will be found in the notices of the parishes and townships in which the workhouses are situated.

Cumberland is said to have given the title of earl to Randolph de Meschines, but we have nothing upon which we can depend as authentic to confirm this. In 1525, Henry, Lord Clifford, was created Earl of Cumberland, and the dignity continued in his family till the demise of Henry of the fifth earl, in 1643. It was revived the following year, in favour of Prince Rupert, but only to become extinct on his death, in 1682. Prince George of Denmark was the next who bore the title, which he enjoyed from 1689 till his decease, in 1708, when the title of earl was discontinued. In 1723, Prince William Augustus, son of George II., was created Duke of Cumberland, but dying without issue, in 1765, the dukedom remained in abeyance for two years, when it was given to Prince Henry Frederick, brother of George III., who also died childless, in 1790. In 1799, Ernest Augustus, fifth son of George III., was created Duke of Cumberland, and held the dignity till his demise, in 1851, when the title descended to his son, the present King of Hanover, and Duke of Cumberland.

SURFACE.

The surface of this county is considerably diversified, the east and south-west being very mountainous, rugged, and uneven, while the north and north-west parts are low and flat, or gently undulating. Hills, valleys, and ridges of elevated ground occupy the centre. The mountainous district in the south-west is the most interesting to the traveller, for here are situated Saddleback, Skiddaw, and Helvellyn, and the lakes of Ulleswater, Thirlmere, Derwentwater, and Bassenthwaite, whose beautiful and romantic scenery annually attracts tourists from every part of the kingdom, from the Continent, and even from America. Several of the other districts, though not mountainous, are hilly, and present an endless variety of landscape. Some of the valleys are traversed by rivers, and afford, perhaps, a greater variety of delightful scenery than any other county.

The mountains of Cumberland are exceedingly numerous, and many of them immense in elevation and singular in structure. They enter into the composition of almost every view, and either by their sublime heights, their romantic forms, the dignified grandeur of their aspects, the immensity of rocks composing them, or the imposing, wild, and awful majesty of their appearance, are peculiarly calculated to excite our interest and admiration. Two distinct ranges run, the one towards the north, to which belongs the Cross Fell ridge; the other and most gigantic towards the south, of which the highest summit, Skiddaw, is 3,022 feet above the level of the sea. Besides this noted peak, the most striking of the loftier mountains, which are termed fells, and are familiar to tourists, are Scawfell, Saddleback, Helvellyn, Bow Fell, Grasmere Fell, Wrynose, High Pike, Pillar, &c., the scenery of which, in general, is abrupt and bold. Between these grander heights are many hills of various degrees of elevation; some of them cut through by clear and rapid torrents; others based in richly wooded, highly cultivated valleys, fertilised by quiet brooks and rivers; others dipping their precipitous and craggy sides down into the beautiful and celebrated lakes, the picturesque and varied beauties of which have so often been described in "stately prose and melodious verse." The following are the names and altitudes of the principal mountains, and the districts in which they are situated:—

Name.	Situation.	Altitude in Feet.
Scawfell (high point)	Eskdale	3,166
Helvellyn	Keswick	3,055
Skiddaw	Keswick	3,022
Bow Fell	Eskdale	2,911
Cross Fell	Alston	2,901
Pillar	Wastwater	2,893
Saddleback	Keswick	2,785
Grasmere Fell	Keswick	2,736
High Pike	Hesket Newmarket	2,101
Black Combe	Dunblon Mouth	1,919
Dent Hill	Egremont	1,110

RIVERS.

The principal rivers of Cumberland are the Eden, Esk, Derwent, Duddon, and Eamont, with their numerous tributary streams.

The Eden rises on the borders of Westmoreland, on the side of Hugh's Seat, one of the mountains of the Pennine Chain, and passing Kirkby Stephen and Appleby, shortly afterwards quits the county for Cumberland. Its course in Westmoreland is about thirty miles, no part of which is navigable. It has numerous affluents, among which may be named the Beelah, or Belay, the Helbeck, the Troutbeck, and the Crowndundale on the right bank, and the Leath and the Eamont on the left bank. The Eden enters Cumberland on the south, and runs to the east of Penrith, passing Kirkoswald, Armathwaite, Corby, Warwick Bridge, and Carlisle, receiving in its course the Croglin and the Irthing on its right bank, and the Peteril and the Caldew on its left, and discharges itself into the Solway Frith, near Rockliffe, where it forms a fine estuary. The scenery along the coast of this river in Cumberland, which is about thirty-five miles, is very varied and beautiful; the banks being adorned by the mansions and pleasure-grounds of Skirwith Abbey, Eden Hall, Nunnery, Armathwaite, Low House, Corby Castle, Warwick Hall, and Rickerby.

The Esk, which gives name to Eskdale Ward, is formed by the junction of the Black and White Esk, the former of which rising near Ettrick Pen, in Dumfriesshire, runs past Eskdale Muir to Kingpool, to join the White Esk from the same part—thence it goes through some fine scenery in Eskdale, by West Kirk, Longholm, "Cannobie Lea," across the border to Netherby, flowing through a beautiful valley, in a south-west direction to Longtown, and after receiving the waters of the Liddell and the Line falls into the Solway Frith, near Rockliffe Marsh. Its course in Cumberland is about ten miles.

The Derwent has its source in Sparkling Tarn, among the mountainous crags at the head of Borrowdale, and having poured its foaming waters over various precipices, passes through Styhead Tarn, and forms the lake of Derwentwater at Keswick, where it is joined by the Greta. It then pursues its course through an extensive tract of meadow land to Bassenthwaite Water, from which it emerges at Ousebridge. Again confined in a rocky channel, it takes a westerly direction, and flows rapidly through a narrow vale to Cockermouth, where it is joined by the waters of the Cocker, and then pursues its course through a more open country to the sea at Workington. The scenery along the whole extent of this river is exceedingly varied and interesting.

It is, perhaps, the most limpid and colourless stream in England.

The Duddon, Green tells us, in his own picturesque style, "is a fine river, and its feeders flow precipitously in their descent to the valley. It rises on the Three County Stones on Wrynose, from which place to its junction with the Irish sea, it separates the counties of Cumberland and Lancashire. . . . At Goldrill Crag it brightens into agitation, and, after various changes, becomes at Wallowbarrow Crag one scene of rude commotion, forming in its course a succession, not of high, but finely formed waterfalls. But these furious waters, suddenly slumbering, become entranced, displaying little signs of life along the pleasant plains of Donnerdale. At Ulpha Bridge suspended animation is again succeeded by the clamorous war of stones and waters, which assail the ear of the traveller all the way to Duddon Bridge. From that place to the sea it passes on in an uninterrupted and harmonious calmness." The sea flows nearly nine miles up its channel, and its estuary contains about 13,000 acres of land at low water.

The Eamont takes its rise in the lake of Ulleswater, which is supplied by several smaller streams. From the most northern portion of the lake, the Eamont flows in a north-westerly direction along the Cumberland border to the point where the Eden leaves Westmoreland and falls into that river. This is a remarkably clear and limpid stream and is much resorted to by anglers.

We subjoin the other rivers in alphabetical order.

The Bleng has its source near Ponsonby Fell, and after passing near Gosforth, falls into the Irt between Nether Wasdale and Santon, after a course of about six miles.

The Calder rises not far from Ennerdale Water, and, taking a south-westerly direction, flows by Calder Abbey, between Ponsonby and Stella Park, falling into the sea at Calder-foot, after a course of about eight miles.

The Caldew, which is called near its source Caldbeck and Caldew-beck, rises on Caldbeck Fell, in the vicinity of Skiddaw, and runs twenty-five miles, in a northerly direction to the river Eden at Carlisle, passing in its course Heskett Newmarket, Sebergham, and Dalston.

The Cocker issues from Buttermere lake, and passes through Crummock Water, to the north of which a pretty large stream connects it with Loweswater. It afterwards passes northward, a little more to the east, intersects the vale of Lorton, and flowing onwards to Cockermouth, joins the Derwent; its course from Crummock Water to Cockermouth being about six miles.

The Croglin rises at Hoffenside Beacon, on Thackthorn Fell. It then takes a west-south-westerly direction, and contributing to the beautiful scenery at Nunnery, where it forms several cascades, after a course of twelve miles falls into the Eden.

The Ellen or Elne rises from Caldbeck Fells, and passing by Uldale, Ireby, Bolton, Torpenhow, Whitehall, Harley Brow, Blennerhasset, Aspatia, Hayton Castle, Outerby, Allerby, Dearham, Ellenborough, and Netherhall, enters the sea at Maryport, after a course of about eighteen miles.

The Ehen or Enn flows out of Ennerdale Water, passes by Ennerdale Chapel, Cleator, Egremont, and St. Bride, and after a course of about eleven miles from the lake, falls into the sea at Enn-foot.

The Esk, in Allerdale-above-Derwent Ward, is formed by the junction of some small streams which rise near Bow Fell. It then runs through the valley of Eskdale, and passing by Muncaster and Waberthwaite, falls into the sea at Ravenglass. Its course is about thirteen miles.

The Gelt rises in Croglin Fell, and passing through Geltsdale, and near Castle Carrock, falls into the Irthing, near Corby. Near to where the river is crossed by the bridge on the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway there is some very beautiful scenery.

The Greta is formed by the junction of St. John's Beck from Thirlmere, and the Glenderamakin from Mungrisdale, by way of Threlkeld; and after receiving the Glenderaterra from between Skiddaw and Saddleback, it passes Keswick and joins the Derwent, soon after that river issues from Derwentwater. When the rains are heavy, the Greta often rises so suddenly as to cause the Derwent to flow back to the lake, which is speedily filled from all quarters.

The Irt, issuing from Wastwater, passes by Nether Wasdale, Santon, Irton, between Drigg and Carlton, and falls into the sea in the neighbourhood of Ravenglass, after a course of about eight miles.

The Irthing has its source in Spadeadam Moss, on the borders of Northumberland, and runs about thirty miles south-east past Naworth Castle and Lanercost Abbey to the river Eden at Warwick Bridge, receiving in its course the Kingwater, near Walton, and the Gelt, below Irthington. Some very fine scenery adorns the banks of this river.

The Kershope is a small stream, which for a course of about six miles from Dove Crag to its junction with the Liddell forms the boundary between Cumberland and Scotland.

The Kingwater rises near Side Common, and after a course of about ten miles falls into the Irthing.

The Line is formed by the junction of two streams rising near Christenburgh Crag, called Black Line and White Line, which unite about ten miles from their source, and afterwards pass Shank Castle, Brackenhill, Kirklington, and Westlinton, and fall into the Esk, not far from its junction with the sea. The course of the Line, after the confluence of the two streams, is about twelve miles.

The Liddell rises in Scotland, and for about eight miles forms the boundary between that country and Cumberland, falling ultimately into the Esk.

The Lowther has its source at the foot of Shap Fells, in the middle of Westmoreland; and flowing at first north-east, and gradually afterwards due north, passes Shap Abbey, about two miles beyond which it receives the waters of a small stream from Haweswater, and passing by Lowther Castle, finally joins the Eamont, near Brougham Castle, at a point about two miles south-east of Penrith.

The Mite has a course of about seven miles. It rises in Burn-moor Tarn, and runs through Miterdale, falling into the sea at Ravenglass.

The Nent rises in the south-eastern extremity of the parish of Alston, and falls into the South Tyne, near the town of Alston, after a course of about six miles.

The Petteril is formed by the union of several small streams, which flow from Greystoke Park, Skelton, and Hutton, and proceeding northwards falls into the Eden in the neighbourhood of Carlisle. Near Penrith this river is 430, and near Upperry 70 feet above the level of the sea—its average fall per mile is twenty-four feet.

The Sark runs between Cumberland and Scotland for about six miles, near Solway Moss, and empties itself into the Solway Frith.

The South Tyne has its source in a swamp or bog ground about seven miles east by south from the summit of Cross Fell, and a little below Alston enters Northumberland.

The Tees rises in the same swamp, about a mile from the source of the South Tyne, and for nearly four miles forms the boundary between Cumberland and Westmoreland.

The Wampool has its source in Brocklebank Fells, at Dockwray joins the Wiza, which rises near Rosley, and runs by Westward, Old Carlisle, and Wigton. After the junction of the two streams, the Wampool passes by Gamblesby, and falls into the sea about half a mile west of Kirkbride, its course being about twelve miles.

The Waver has its origin in Brocklebank and Caldbeck Fells, and flows by Waverton, Dundraw, and Abbey Holme, falling into the sea about half a mile from the latter place, after a course of twelve miles.

The larger rivers abound with salmon, trout, branding, and various kinds of fish, and the smaller streams with trout and eels.

LAKES, TARNs, ETC.

The principal lakes of the county are Ulleswater, between Cumberland and Westmoreland; Thirlmere, at the entrance of the Vale of St. John; Derwentwater and Bassenthwaite, connected by a stream in the Vale of Keswick; Buttermere, in the north-east of Borrowdale, and to the north a little, Crummock Water and Loweswater; the three last mentioned connected by the Cocker, which running northwardly through the fine vale of Lorton, falls into the Derwent at Cockermouth. Besides these, and Overwater, Wastwater, Osmerdale, and Devoekwater, there are several smaller lakes, called tarns—Burn-moor Tarn, at the head of Miterdale; Tarn Wadling, near High Hesket; Talkin Tarn, in the parish of Hayton; Martin Tarn, in that of Wigton; &c. All the lakes are well stocked with fish, particularly with trout, pike, and perch. Ulleswater, Ennerdale, Crummock, and Buttermere contain char. Tarn Wadling is said to produce some of the finest carp in the kingdom. The following is a tabular view of the principal Cumberland lakes:—

Lake.	Nearest Market Town.	Length in Miles.	Breadth in Miles.	Depth in Feet.	Height in feet above the level of the sea.
Ulleswater ...	Penrith	9	1	210	380
Bassenthwaite, Keswick		4	1	68	210
Derwentwater, Keswick		3	1½	72	228
Crummock ...	Cockermouth ..	3	1	121	240
Wastwater ...	Ravenglass ...	3	1	270	160
Thirlmere	Keswick	2½	1	108	473
Ennerdale	Whitehaven ...	2½	½	80	—
Buttermere ...	Keswick	1½	½	90	217
Loweswater ...	Cockermouth ..	1	½	60	—

There are several picturesque waterfalls, of which the following are the principal, with their respective situations and height in feet:—Scale Force, near Buttermere, 190; Barrow Cascade, two miles from Keswick, 124; Lowdore Cascade, near Keswick, 100; Sour Milk Force, near Buttermere, 90; Airey Force, Gowbarrow Park, 80; Nunnery Cascade, Croglin, 60.

In addition to the tarns, cascades, &c., just enumerated, this county possesses the following natural curiosities:—The Bowder Stone, in Borrowdale; the grand and varied echoes of Ulleswater; saline springs at Crosthwaite, Drigg, Gilerux, Stanger, &c.; sulphur springs at Aikton; sulphureous springs at Biglands and Bewcastle; sulphureous and chalybeate at Melmerby; chalybeate at Bewcastle, Brampton, Great Salkeld, and Iron Gill, in Sebergham; Gilsland Spa, near Lanercost, whose waters are similar to those of Harrogate, in Yorkshire; medicinal waters at Holywell, at Lanercost, and Kirkland, in Wigton; a mineral spring at Rockliffe, the water of which tints paper a beautiful gold colour; and a petrifying spring at Sebergham.¹

ROADS, TURNPIKE TRUSTS, AND BRIDGES.

Cumberland is crossed from south to north, and from east to west, by two important roads; one of which, from south to north, is a principal road from London to Edinburgh and Glasgow. It enters the county near Penrith, and passing by Plumpton Wall, Plumpton Street, High and Low Hesket, and Carleton, reaches Carlisle; from which place it proceeds through Stanwix, Blackford, Westlinton, and Arthuret, to Longtown, about four miles beyond which it quits the county for Scotland, previously giving off a branch three miles north of Carlisle to Glasgow, by Gretna. The road from east to west extends from Newcastle, by Nether Denton and Brampton, to Carlisle, where it crosses the great north road. It then proceeds by two branches, the one through Old Carlisle, joined by the Wigton road, and the other past Bassenthwaite Water to Cockermouth, and thence to Whitehaven and the Irish Sea. There is also a cross road from Penrith through Keswick, where it meets another from Kendal to Cockermouth, and from Penrith to Hexham, etc., joined to which, at Alston Moor, another road crosses the south-western extremity of Northumberland to Brampton, and thence to Longtown. Many other roads radiate from and intercommunicate with these, which are the principal roads in the county. From "The Abstract of the General Statements of the Receipts and Expenditure on account of the highways of the parishes, townships, etc., in the several counties of England and Wales, for the year ending 25th March, 1855," which was presented to parliament July 10th, 1857, we learn the following particulars relative to the highways of this county:—Number of returns, 250. Balance, 25th March, 1851: in hand, £2,114 12s. 4d.; overspent, £314 15s. 4d. Receipts: from rates or assessments, £13,758 11s. 10d.; team labour performed in lieu of rates, £191 4s. 2d.; other work performed in lieu of rates, £94 14s.; turnpike trusts, £22 11s. 5d.; other extension of commerce—cheap and facile transit for agricultural, mineral, and other produce—improvements in harbours—the increase in the manufacture of iron, &c., are some of the results of the formation of railways in this district; and sufficiently testify by their favourable influence on the social condition of the population, the great benefits already procured for these two counties. The railways at present existing in the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland are the following:—a portion of the Caledonian, the Carlisle and Silloth Bay, the Cockermouth and Workington, the Kendal and Windermere, the greater portion of the Lancaster and Carlisle, the Maryport and Carlisle, a portion of the Newcastle and Carlisle, the Port Carlisle, a portion of the Ulverstone and Lancaster, the Whitehaven, Cleator, and Egremont, the greater portion of the Whitehaven and Furness, and the Whitehaven Junction.

The Caledonian was incorporated by the 8 and 9 Vic. cap. 162, for a line from Carlisle to a junction with the Scottish Central at Castlecary, with branches diverging therefrom at Cairstairs, to Edinburgh and Glasgow. From Carlisle, the line proceeds across the Calder by a viaduct, and thence over the river Eden by another viaduct, after which, it passes by King Moor and Rockliffe station, and crosses the Esk by a viaduct of seven arches, thence passing over the Glasgow road and along the Guards' embankment, formed through a deep moss which absorbed thousands of tons of earth before the foundation was sufficiently solid to bear a train, it shortly afterwards crosses the Sark, and quits Cumberland.

The Carlisle and Silloth Bay Company was incorporated July 16th, 1855, to make a railway from the Port Carlisle line at Drumburgh to the boat lighthouse in Silloth Bay, and a dock and a jetty at the latter place. The first soil of the railway was cut at Drumburgh, on the 31st of August, 1855, the works were at once commenced, and the line opened on the 28th of August, 1856. The line is identical with that to Port Carlisle for eight miles and a half, two-thirds of the length of the latter. The Silloth line commences strictly at Drumburgh. At the village of Kirkbride there is a station for the convenience of the locality. Three miles further west, not far from where the Wampool and the Waver enter Morecambe Bay, the line passes within a short distance of Long Newton, or Newton Arlosh, and a little past Abbey Holme, where there is a station, passes through the heaviest cutting in its whole extent, viz., Kingside Hill, and shortly afterwards arrives at Silloth.

The Cockermouth and Workington Company was incorporated in July, 1845, by the 8 and 9 Vic. cap.

120. The line is from Cockermouth to Workington Harbour, where it joins the Whitehaven line. Its length is eight and a half miles; and it was opened throughout 28th April, 1847. After leaving Workington, the stations are Workington Bridge, Camerton, Broughton Cross, Brigham, and Cockermouth, where the line at present terminates.

The Kendal and Windermere Company was incorporated by 8 and 9 Vic. cap. 32, (1845), for a line from the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway at Oxenholme to Birthwaite, near Windermere Lake, ten and a quarter miles. The line was opened on the 21st of April, 1847. The stations on the line after leaving Oxenholme, are Burnside, Staveley, and Windermere.

The Lancaster and Carlisle Company was incorporated by 7 and 8 Vic., cap. 37, (1844), for a single line, in the first instance, until the Act authorising the Caledonian was passed, when it was made a double line, continuing the Lancaster and Preston to Carlisle, and there forming a junction with the Caledonian. Cost, £22,000 per mile. Length, seventy miles. The joint station at Carlisle was built at a cost of £164,500, of which the Caledonian contributed £63,367. By an arrangement with the Glasgow and South Western, and Maryport and Carlisle, they have become joint tenants of that station. This line enters Westmoreland from Lancashire, and passing the Burton and Holme station soon reaches Milnthorpe, whence it crosses the canal at the tunnel, and pursues its course through a fine and well-wooded country to the village of Sedgwick, where the magnitude of the Sedgwick embankment is seen to advantage. Its course is now by Natland to Oxenholme, previous to which the Burton turnpike road is crossed, about two miles south of Kendal; and after passing an embankment, and through some heavy rock cutting, Oxenholme station is reached, where the line is joined by the Kendal and Windermere Railway, which affords an easy and delightful means of access to the Lake District. A fine view of the town of Kendal is enjoyed at this station; whilst far beyond rise the mountains of the west, the giants of the Lake District. From Oxenholme, the line proceeds upon embankments and through cuttings, with occasional views of Kendal and its ruined castle; and soon after passing the Birkland cutting, skirts the base of the lofty Benson Knot, one of the highest hills in the neighbourhood, and passing thence through heavy rock cuttings and across an embankment, reaches Docker Gill viaduct, one of the most beautiful structures on the line. A mile from this splendid piece of work Graygrigg summit is reached, where a heavy cutting of hard material, called saled, is passed through; and another mile onward is the Low

Gill embankment, one of the highest in England. After passing Low Gill station, the line skirts the Dillicar hills, and soon afterwards passes through the great Dillicar cut, and is then carried over the Borrow Water, near its junction with the Lune, upon a neat viaduct. Borrow Bridge, a romantic spot, celebrated for trout fishing, the scenery about which is the most beautiful along the whole line, is next passed, and the traveller seems to be completely hemmed in on all sides by stupendous hills. The village of Borrow Bridge appears on the right, at a short distance from the line, which, passing through the Borrow Bridge cutting, reaches the Lune embankment, 95 feet deep, formed through the old bed of the river, which has been diverted from its course, through a tunnel excavated in the solid rock, 50 feet from the top, and made nearly parallel to the ravine. Proceeding onwards, the Lune excavations, Loup's Fell cutting, the Birbeck embankment, and the Birbeck viaduct, are passed, shortly afterwards the foot of the great incline—a plain of eight miles—rising 1 in 75, is reached. Proceeding from Tebay station, Shap Wells is reached, the line passing through the Fells, over which Prince Charles Edward and his army marched in 1745; and, leaving the Shap summit, a cutting through limestone rock is entered, and before it approaches Shap village the line runs through a circle of large boulder stones, said to be the inner circle of an ancient Druidical temple. From Shap the line proceeds on the east side of the town of Shap, along a heavy cutting, and passing thence under a skew bridge along the flat portion of the route, called Shap Mines, and, following the valley of the stream, it again runs under the turnpike road, and thence passes Thrimby, through a thick plantation. Here the character of the scenery is considerably altered, the bare, rugged, and sterile mountains being succeeded by fertile pastures and picturesque prospects. The Kendal turnpike road is crossed, for the last time, by a skew bridge at Clifton, near the entrance to Lowther Park and Castle, the seat of the Earl of Lonsdale. The scenery between Shap and Clifton is very attractive—Cross Fell, Saddleback, Skiddaw, and the other hills in the Lake District appearing to great advantage. From Clifton station the line proceeds along the Lowther embankment, and about 50 miles from Lancaster and 20 from Carlisle crosses the river Lowther on a magnificent viaduct, 100 feet above the stream; its arches, six in number, are of 60 feet span each. A mile and a half beyond, the line crosses the Eamont, on a viaduct of great beauty, consisting of five semi-circular arches. Leaving the county of Westmoreland at this point, the line enters Cumberland, and shortly afterwards passes through a large cutting, and then, running nearly level to the town of Penrith, reaches the station adjoining the ruins of the ancient castle. From Penrith the country is flat and uninteresting. The line enters the valley of the Petteril, through which it pursues almost a direct course to Carlisle, past the following stations:—Plumpton, Calthwaite, Southwaite, and Wreay.

The Maryport and Carlisle was incorporated by Act 1 Vic. cap. 111 (1837),—28 miles. It was opened, Maryport to Aspatria, 15th July, 1840; Carlisle to Wigton, in May, 1844; and completed 10th May, 1845. The Act of 1855 (17 and 18 Vic. cap. 79, June 26th) provides that new capital, for doubling the line and other improvements, may be raised to the extent of £77,712 10s. in £12 10s. shares, making a total of £420,000, with borrowing powers to the extent of £135,000. Leaving Maryport, and passing Dearham Station, the line reaches Bull Gill, and 3½ miles further comes to Aspatria, pleasantly situated on the river Ellen; it shortly afterwards arrives at Brayton. After crossing the Waver it reaches Leegate, 3¼ miles beyond which is Wigton, and passing Curthwaite and Dalston stations, arrives at Carlisle.

The Newcastle and Carlisle was incorporated on the 22nd of May, 1829, as a line between these two towns, crossing from the east to the west coast of England; also a branch-line of 12 miles to Alston, and one to Swalwell. Total length, 78½ miles now open. A short extension from Alston to Nenthead is in abeyance. This line enters Cumberland near Rose Hill station, and passing Low Row and Milton, in the neighbourhood of Brampton, crosses the ravine of the Gelt by a skew bridge of three arches, and arrives at How Mill station, close to which is Hayton Church, and in the distance may be seen the white turrets of Edmond Castle and Castle Carrock Church. The next station is Wetheral, where the Eden is crossed by a magnificent bridge, consisting of five semicircular arches, each of 80 feet span, and raised to an elevation of 99½ feet above the summer level of the stream, with a parapet of 4½ feet in height. The entire length of the bridge is 624 feet. The situation of this viaduct is perhaps unrivalled. Looking from it towards the south the spectator has a full view of both sides of the river and their noble woods, the grounds of Corby, and the ancient church of Wetheral; and turning in the opposite direction, he is charmed with the extensive prospect before him, embracing as it does every variety of rural beauty, and terminating in the distant mountains of Scotland. Leaving Wetheral, the line passes by Scotby and arrives at Carlisle.

The Port Carlisle Railway was incorporated August 4th, 1853, by the act 17 Vic. cap. 119, for converting the canal between Carlisle and Port Carlisle into a railway. It was opened for goods on May 22nd, 1854, and on the 22nd of the following June for passengers. Quitting Carlisle, the line passes Kirkandrews and Burgh stations, from the latter of which it proceeds by Drumburgh and Glasson to Port Carlisle, a total distance of $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles.

The Ulverstone and Lancaster was incorporated by Act 14 and 15 Vic. cap. 102, 24th July, 1851, for a railway from the Furness at Ulverstone, to a junction with the Lancaster and Carlisle at Carnforth, seven miles north of Lancaster, thus completing a direct line from Whitehaven and the west coast of Cumberland to the south of England.

The Whitehaven, Cleator, and Egremont Company was incorporated by the 17th and 18th Vic. cap. 61, June 16th, 1854. The share capital amounts to £75,000, with borrowing powers to the extent of one-third of that amount. The line, including the Egremont branch, is about seven miles in length from the point at which it joins the Whitehaven and Furness Junction Railway. It was opened for the conveyance of passengers on June 1st, 1857, having previously, for about eighteen months, been in use for mineral traffic.

The Whitehaven and Furness Company was incorporated 21st of July, 1845, by the 8 and 9 Vic. cap. 100, for a railway from Whitehaven to a junction with the Furness, near Dalton; and subsequently extended to a junction at Whitehaven, with the Whitehaven Junction, and fixing the junction with the Furness at Foxfield, near Broughton: total length, 35 miles. On leaving Broughton, and crossing the Duddon by a wooden bridge, the line enters Cumberland, and then proceeds along the coast by Green Road, Under Hill, Holborn Hill, Silcroft, Bootle, Eskmeals, Ravenglass, Drigg, Seascales, Sellafield, Braystones, Nethertown, St. Bees, and Carkle stations, to Whitehaven.

The Whitehaven Junction was incorporated on the 30th of June, 1844, for a railway from the Maryport Junction (Maryport and Carlisle), to Workington Junction (Cockermouth and Workington), to Whitehaven (Whitehaven and Furness). Length, 12 miles. On quitting Whitehaven, Parton is the first station reached, whence the line proceeds by Harrington, Workington, and Flimby, to Maryport.

In addition to these the following lines are projected: The Carlisle and Hawick, the Lancaster and Carlisle and Ingleton, and the Eden Valley.

CLIMATE, SOIL, AGRICULTURE, ETC.

The climate, as might be readily inferred from the great extent of coast, and the numerous and lofty mountains, is various, the elevated portions of the county being cold and piercing, while the lower parts are mild and temperate. The whole county, however, is exposed to wet and variable weather, particularly in the autumn, yet it is very salubrious, and remarkable for the longevity of its inhabitants. Lysons has a list of 144 persons of not less than 100 years of age who were buried between the years 1663 and 1814. The greatest ages are, Robert Brown, aged 110, buried at Arthuret, in 1666; Richard Green, 114, at Dacre, in 1680; Thomas Fearon, 112, Bridekirk, in 1701; Jane Hodgson, 114, Harrington, in 1717; Thomas Dickenson, 112, Bootle, 1745; Mary Singleten, 110, Dearham; Rev. George Braithwaite, 110, Carlisle, in 1753; Mark Noble, 113, Corney, in 1768; and James Bell, 113, Penrith, 1772. John Taylor, who died in 1772, aged 135, was noticed in a communication of Bishop Lytton to the Society of Antiquaries. The obituary of the Gentleman's Magazine also records Ann Wilson, 110, Alston, 1765; John Noble, 114, Corney, 1772; and John Maxwell, 132, Keswick Lake. The annual mean quantity of rain at Carlisle is about thirty inches; at Wigton, thirty-four inches; at Whitehaven, fifty inches; and at Keswick, sixty-eight inches. April, on an average, is the driest month in the year; the wet months are July, August, September, and October, in each of which about twice as much rain falls as in April; and about one-third less rain falls in the first six months of the year than in the last six months.

The soil of this county varies considerably, often differing much in the same parish, and sometimes even in the same field. The mountainous districts are bleak and barren, the prevailing soils being mossy, or dry gravel covered with heath, and they are chiefly used as sheep pastures and preserves for moor-game. Some good land of dry brown loam is found in the valleys and on the sides of the smaller mountains; and on the margins of the rivers there is much valuable ground, consisting of a rich brown loam. On the coast, the soil is a light sand, or gravel. The lowland country, extending from Carlisle in every direction for about thirty miles, is fertile, though a considerable portion of it is cold wet loam, and black peat earth; this land has been much improved by draining, which is now carried on to a great extent, and with the best results. There is a good deal of fertile clayey loam, in the neighbourhood of Wigton; while sand and light loam prevail near Brampton, and likewise near Penrith. In the west of the county, there is some wet soil on a clay bottom, and also some hazel mould. The subsoil, in many places, is a wet sterile clay. In consequence of the cultivation of extensive commons and waste lands, the aspect of this county has been completely changed. Within the last sixty years more than 250,000 acres have been enclosed. Many of the commons, which previously afforded only a scanty pasture to a few half-starved sheep and cattle, are now covered with fertile cornfields and profitable herbage, and have hawthorn fences, good roads, and commodious farm buildings.

"The agriculture of the county," says a recent writer, "has improved considerably of late years, and great quantities of corn, and other kinds of produce, are now exported. Cattle, sheep, poultry, grain, potatoes, butter, bacon, &c., are the principal exports, and are shipped from Whitehaven, Port Carlisle, Workington, and Maryport. The land being generally divided into small farms, the dairies are necessarily on a small scale, but their produce is excellent, and commands a high price in the market. Many of the farms do not exceed 100 acres, and some are not more than 40 or 50 acres. They are generally let on short leases. Many persons, provincially called statesmen, occupy their own land, which, in some instances, have been possessed by the same family for centuries in an unbroken line of descent, and this circumstance gives them an air of independence which forms a peculiar trait in their character. In some places, a small part of the land lies in open town fields, which cannot have the benefit of the common improvement in husbandry. In other places, there are certain common lands that are annually stocked with horses and cattle, on a fixed day, by the owners or occupiers. These lands are always in grass. In the high and mountainous districts the chief object of attention, on the part of the farmers, is their sheep stock, though, of late years, a large portion of the high lying land has been brought into cultivation. In some of these places the climate is cold, the corn backward, and the harvest late. The valleys and low ground are cultivated chiefly for grain, and produce excellent crops of wheat, barley, and oats; these are alternated with turnips and potatoes, or fallow. Some of the lands that are well supplied with water, are kept as meadows or pastures for dairies, and for rearing and fattening cattle. Candlemas is the usual time for entering upon farms, and the rents are paid half-yearly, in equal portions, at Lammas and Candlemas. The modern farm-houses have a handsome appearance, being generally built of stone, and roofed with blue slate. The old farm buildings and cottages have clay or mud walls, and are thatched with straw. There is a great variety of cattle and sheep. A peculiar breed of sheep, called Herdwicks, from their being farmed out to herds at a yearly sum, is met with on the mountains, at the head of the Duddon and Esk rivers. The ewes and wethers, and many of the tups, are polled; their faces and legs speckled, and the wool short and coarse. They are lively and hardy little animals. The tups are in great request, to improve the hardness of other flocks. There are several agricultural societies and cattle shows in the county, which give a stimulus to agriculture, and encourage improvements in the breed of live stock, by distributing rewards and premiums. At Carlisle, Whitehaven, and Penrith, are horticultural and floral societies, which are well supported, and are of service in exciting attention to the cultivation of fruits and flowers.

GOVERNMENT OF THE COUNTY, ETC.

The division of England into counties, as well as into hundreds and tythings, is ascribed to Alfred, but there is evidence that some counties bore their names, and had those divisions, 150 years earlier. The government of counties is vested in several officers, the chief of whom is the lord lieutenant, whose office was instituted in England in the third year of the reign of Edward VI., 1519. This officer is regarded as the chief magistrate of the county, and his appointment, which is vested in the crown, is very rarely bestowed upon any but a supporter of the government for the time being. The office is held during pleasure. The duty of the lord lieutenant is to organise and superintend the discipline of the militia of his county, the command of which is vested in him. He is empowered to select, from amongst the principal gentlemen of the county, deputy lieutenants, who are to officer that force, and in his absence to be his representatives. He may, therefore, in the event of war or civil commotion, be regarded as responsible for the defence of the county, and, as a necessary consequence of that, he is the sole disposer of the patronage of the militia. The lord lieutenant is also generally custos rotulorum, or keeper of the rolls and records of the county. The following have held this high and important office for Cumberland:—1689, Sir John Lowther, Bart. (afterwards Viscount Lonsdale); Charles, Earl of Egremont; 1715, Henry Lowther, third Viscount Lonsdale. The office has since remained in the Lowther family, and is now held by the present Earl of Lonsdale.¹

The next officer in dignity and authority is the sheriff, upon whom the civil administration has long devolved. He receives the charge of the county under letters patent, direct from the monarch; though in ancient times he was appointed by the freeholders of the county. The office is held for one year, formerly it was held for a much longer period. In his judicial capacity, the sheriff presides at the county court, and by him all the county meetings are summoned; the election of the county members, and of the coroners, is conducted by him, and he makes a return of those duly elected. He is unable, however, to try any criminal offence, and cannot act as an ordinary justice of the peace during his term of office. As a keeper of the Queen's peace he is strictly the first man in the county, and superior to every noble within the shire. In the preservation of the peace he is armed with ample powers, and for his assistance he may command all the people of the county to attend him; these form the posse comitatus. In his ministerial capacity he executes all writs and other processes directed to him from the courts; he summons and returns the juries for all trials, and is responsible for the due execution of the judgment of the courts, civil or criminal,—from the exaction of a farthing damages to the execution of capital punishment. As the king's bailiff, the rights of the crown are in his especial custody: he must seize all lands devolving on the crown by attainder or escheat, levy all fines, take charge of all waifs or strays, etc. The following are the high sheriffs of Cumberland from 1155 to the present time.

Besides the lord-lieutenant and sheriff, the county possesses the following officers:—an under-sheriff, appointed by the sheriff; justices of the peace, all appointed by the crown; a county treasurer, and a clerk of the peace, generally an attorney, who is appointed by the custos rotulorum: the county coroners are elected by the freeholders, as the knights of the shire were formerly.

The revenue of the county is chiefly derived from rates which are struck by the justices of the peace in quarter sessions. The rates, which were formerly collected by the high constables—or constables of wards—are directed under 7 and 8 Vic. c. 33, to be collected by the Boards of Guardians, and to be paid by them to the county treasurer. The county expenditure is chiefly incurred in maintaining bridges, gaols, police, prisoners, lunatic asylums, and the various county officers; some of whom are paid, although the majority of the officers are honorary, and are discharged gratuitously.

For the year ending April 7th, 1857, the receipts, including a balance of £483 8s. 8d., amounted to £10,343 3s. 10d. From four successive rates amounting to 2½d. in the pound, £6,806 11s. 4d. was raised, £2,541 2s. 6d. was received from the lords of the treasury for the expense of criminal prosecutions, £318 17s. 3d. for the maintenance of prisoners, and £121 13s. for the conveyance of prisoners to depots for convicts. Fines produced £111 5s. 11d., and the marking of weights and measures £7 19s. 8d. £115 9s. 5d. was received from the governor of the gaol, for mats, &c., and £14 8s. for the subsistence of deserters and revenue prisoners. Rents brought in £106 17s. 3d.

The expenditure was as follows:—Gaal of Carlisle, £2,496 15s. 3d.; conveyance of convicts to depôts, £115 5s. 6d.; court-house, £88 11s. 8d.; the various lock-ups in the county, £881 13s. 8d.; conveying prisoners to gaol, £169 3s. 5d.; criminal prosecutions, £1,741 5s. 2d.; bastardy returns, £6 16s. 6d.; clerk of the peace, £434 5s. 10d.; coroners, £586 2s. 6d.; county surveyor, £1,596 4s. 11d.; repayment for bridges, £156 2s. 6d.; crier of court of quarter sessions, £4; bailiffs, £40 17s. 6d.; high constables, £160; treasurer of county, £110; queen's prison, £15; weights and measures, £19 2s.; lunacy, £326 19s. 8d.; printing and advertising, £10 9s.; returns of fines to clerk of the peace, £9 12s.; militia, £27 14s. 6d.; interest account, £317 17s. 6d.; intended lunatic asylum, £196 17s. 6d.; incidental expenses, £56 0s. 4d.; and balance due county, £1,149 11s. 7d.

COUNTY CONSTABULARY.

The constabulary for the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland was established at the January Quarter Sessions, 1857, under the provisions of the acts 2 and 3, 3 and 4, and 19 and 20, Vict. For police purposes the two counties are united, and are under one chief constable, being the only counties in England that are so. On the election of the chief constable, eighty-two candidates offered themselves, including officers of the army and navy, civil officers, and private gentlemen. J. Dunne, Esq., was unanimously elected, and subsequently appointed by the secretary of state. He at once entered upon his duties. The head quarters of the force were fixed at Carlisle, where a house was taken for the purpose, in which the business of the constabulary is transacted. Shortly after his appointment, the chief constable visited all the principal and most important points of the two counties, for the purpose of organising the force as speedily as possible. The authorised numbers were soon enrolled, put into working order, and located throughout the two counties upon the basis laid down by the courts of Quarter Sessions. In every instance where it was in the power of the chief constable to fix the station of any officer, he was guided as far as possible by the elements of rating and population, so as to endeavour to give to each district the proportion of police it actually paid for, paying at the same time due regard to any other peculiar wants and requirements which were found to exist in the neighbourhood selected, with the view of placing the constable in the position where he might be of most use to the public generally. With regard to the divisional police forces which previously existed, all the officers who, upon examination, were found qualified, were re-appointed. The force has been recently inspected by the inspector-general of constabulary, under the provisions of the constabulary act, who highly approved of its state, and in consequence of his report of its efficiency and discipline, government pays one-fourth of the cost.

In order that the arrangements of the chief constable may be duly carried out, the two counties have been divided into eight districts,—six in Cumberland and two in Westmoreland, the former of which are co-extensive with the various wards as they existed in 1857. In Westmoreland the East and West wards form one division, and Kendal and Kirby Lonsdale wards the other. Each division comprises several stations or detachments, which are subdivided into beats, so arranged as to connect the different divisions and detachments. The distribution of the force at present, 1858, is as follows:—

Cumberland.—Allerdale-above-Derwent Ward.—One superintendent, one inspector, two sergeants, and twelve constables, at Whitehaven; one inspector and two constables at Workington; one sergeant at Bootle; one sergeant and one constable at Egremont; with constables at Arlecdon, Cleator, Cleator Moor, Dissington, Gosforth, Hill-in-Millom, Harrington, Hensingham, Ravenglass, and Saint Bees.

Allerdale-below-Derwent Ward.—One superintendent, one sergeant, and one constable at Wigton; with constables at Abbey Holme, Aspatria, Allonby, Caldbeck, Ireby, and Kirkbride.

Derwent Ward.—One superintendent, one sergeant, and two constables, at Cockermouth; one inspector and one constable at Keswick; one inspector and three constables at Maryport;¹ with constables at Bassenthwaite, Dearham, Great Clifton, and Grey-southen.

Cumberland Ward.—One superintendent, one inspector, and two constables at Carlisle; with constables at Burgh, Dalston, Kingstown, Stanwix, and Wetheral.

Esldale Ward.—One superintendent, one sergeant, and one constable at Brampton; one sergeant and one constable at Longtown; with constables at Castle Carrock, Kinkerry Hill, Smithfield, and Walton.

Leath Ward.—One superintendent, one inspector, and three constables at Penrith; one sergeant and one constable at Alston; with constables at Armathwaite, Castle Sowerby, Greystoke, Hesket, Kirkoswald, Lang-wathby, and Watermillocks.

Westmoreland.—East and West Ward.—One superintendent, and one constable at Appleby; one inspector at Shap; one sergeant at Kirby Stephen, and constables at Askham, Brough, Morland, Orton, Patterdale, and Temple Sowerby.

Kendal and Kirby Lonsdale Wards.—One superintendent at Kendal; one inspector and one constable at Kirby Lonsdale; with constables at Ambleside, Bent-thwaite Green, Bowness, Burton Holme, Milnthorpe, Old Town and Staveley.

The constables are not posted permanently at any station, but moved from one place to another, at the discretion of the chief constable, who, by the act of parliament, has the general disposition and government of the force; this power the chief constable may also delegate to the superintendents. Police stations, combining accommodation for the constabulary, with lock-up cells for prisoners under temporary confinement, have been provided or are in course of erection in different places in the two counties.

The proportion of square miles to each police officer is about 21, and usually comprise several villages and townships, all of which he is expected to pay attention to, both by night and by day, according to a system of patrolling regulated by the chief constable, tested by conference points. A diary of the duty performed is entered daily by each constable in his journal, copies of which are transmitted weekly to the chief constable's office through the superintendents.

The duties of the police in the rural districts differ much from the routine in large towns, being of a more comprehensive nature; and each constable, not being so immediately under the eye of a superior, is left more to his own discretion, and greater responsibility attaches to him. Hence the necessity of strict discipline, and the difficulty of always attaining the requisite degree of efficiency in a dispersed force. The county constabulary, besides the ordinary duties of parochial and special constables, in serving summonses, the apprehension of offenders, warning coroners and summoning jurors, conveying prisoners to gaol, and acting as peace officers generally, have undertaken the inspection of weights and measures, as also that of low lodging houses, and, in some districts, act as assistant relieving officers, for casual vagrants, and inspectors of nuisances. They have likewise the charge of lockups, and the custody of prisoners temporarily confined in them. The combination of several of these offices is in pursuance of the recommendations of the parliamentary commissioners, and effects considerable saving to the county.

CUMBERLAND CONSTABULARY.
No.	Grade.	Pay.

A Merit Class to consist of 20 men at 24s. per week, to be provided for any extra-duty or vigilance, &c. &c. and energy displayed in the discharge of their duties, and for exemplary good conduct and responsibility, each of whom should be distinguished by some honorary badge.

The total cost of the force is as follows:—Cumberland, £3,110 7s. less £1,277 11s. 3d. allowed by government; net cost, £3,832 15s. 3d. Westmoreland, total cost £1,521 1s. less £380 5s. 3d. government allowance; net cost, £1,140 15s. 9d.

In accordance with the regulations of the secretary of state each superintendent, inspector, sergeant, and constable, receives annually a complete suit of police clothing with great coat and extra trousers in alternate year, together with 2s. 6d. per month in lieu of boots. A cape and a stock with clasp are supplied when required. In addition to the above each officer is supplied with a truncheon, handcuffs, lantern, journal, and instruction book, together with a small knapsack, to contain a change of linen when employed away from home on special duty. An allowance of 1s. per month is also made to those members of the force who use lanterns, to supply themselves with oil and cotton. These articles of clothing, &c., are inspected monthly, and each man is held responsible for keeping them in good order. The uniform is dark blue, the superintendents being distinguished by a frock coat with black buttons and embroidery.

Under the provisions of the constabulary acts, a superannuation fund has been established, for old and deserving officers. This fund is supported by certain fines or portions of fines, in cases where the police are the informants, and those inflicted on members of the force for misconduct, together with a deduction of 2½ per cent from the pay of each member of the force.

Two additional representatives were given to Cumberland by the Reform Act of 1832, when the county was formed into two divisions. The eastern division comprises Cumberland, Eskdale, and Leath wards, and the western the two Allerdale, as they existed previous to the change made in 1833. The city of Carlisle is the place of election for the eastern division, and the polling places are Wigton, Alston, Brampton, Longtown, Hesket Newmarket, Kirkoswald, Dalston, and Penrith. The place of election for the western division is Cockermouth, at which, and at Bootle, Aspatria, Egremont, and Keswick, are polling places. The number of electors is,—eastern division, 5,352; western division, 4,144. The following have represented the county since the Reform Act:—

EASTERN DIVISION.

- 1832-35. Rt. Hon. Sir J. R. G. Graham, Bart.; Wm. Blamire.
 1835-37. Rt. Hon. Sir J. R. G. Graham, Bart.; Wm. Blamire.
 (Mr. Blamire accepted the Chiltern Hundreds in September, 1836, when William James was elected.)

WESTERN DIVISION.

- 1832-35. Edward Stanley, Viscount Lowther. (The latter accepted the Chiltern Hundreds in March, 1833, when Samuel Irton was elected.)
 1835-37. Edward Stanley, Samuel Irton.

VICTORIA.

EASTERN DIVISION.

- 1837-41. William James, F. Aglionby (died July, 1840), Hon. C. W. G. Howard.

- 1841-47. Hon. C. W. G. Howard, William James.
 1847-52. Hon. C. W. G. Howard, William Marshall.
 1852-56. Hon. C. W. G. Howard, William Marshall.
 1857. Hon. C. W. G. Howard, William Marshall.

WESTERN DIVISION.

- 1837-41. Edward Stanley, Samuel Irton.
 1841-47. Edward Stanley, Samuel Irton.
 1847-52. Edward Stanley, Henry Lowther.
 1852-56. Henry Lowther, Samuel Irton.
 1857. Henry Lowther, General Wyndham.

TRADE, COMMERCE, ETC.

First in importance, as in utility, the working of coal and the coal trade claim precedence in a notice of the mercantile affairs of the county of Cumberland. "In a country like England," says Ansted, "deprived of any large quantity of wood by the advance of civilisation, where should we obtain means for enduring the inclemency of the weather, or enjoying any comforts at our homes, if it were not for large supplies of coal? But we must look further. Where would be our manufactures?—where would be our iron,—the staple of all manufactures,—if there were not abundant and cheap supplies of valuable fuel where the ores of these metals occur? Without coal could this country have advanced beyond its condition many centuries ago? Could there have been education? Could there have been printed books available for the multitude? Could there have been food and raiment for ourselves? Or could science have advanced? Must not England have remained in the background, its inhabitants unable to exercise that intellectual activity which they have exerted in placing their country in advance of the whole world? Without coal there would have been no extensive use of steam, even if the vast power of that agent had been discovered. Without steam and iron, where should we now be in the advance of civilisation over the world? Coal is indeed the indispensable food of all industry. It is a primary material, by whose aid we engender force, and obtain power sufficient for any purpose that has yet been imagined."

The coal-bearing strata of Cumberland will be found described at page 31. Coal is worked to a great extent at Whitehaven, Workington, and in the vicinity of Maryport, whence it is exported in considerable quantities. It is also found in the eastern part of the county, whence the chief supply for Carlisle, Brampton, Penrith, and the neighbouring country is obtained. The following is a list of the collieries of the county in 1856, with their situation and owners' names:—

Name of Colliery.	Situation.	Owners.
Aspatria	Aspatria	John Harris.
Bolton	Wigton	Adison & Co.
Broughton Moor	Maryport	Fletcher, Ross & Co.
Carnation	Workington	Thomson & Co.

Seaton	Maryport	Messrs. Wilson & Co.
Seaton	Maryport	Nicholson & Co.
Theapwaite	Whitehaven	Cleator Company.
Wearly Hall	Wigton	Addison & Co.
Whitehaven Collieries	Whitehaven	Earl of Lonsdale.
Workington	Workington	J. Curwen.

These 28 collieries produced, in 1856, 913,891½ tons of coal, which were disposed of as follow:—225,435 tons were shipped at Maryport, 118,239 at Workington, 10,926 at Harrington, and 211,347½ at Whitehaven, making a total shipped of 565,947½ tons. The coal sent by railway for land sale amounted to 64,316 tons, 64,628 tons were used at iron-furnaces, 3,500 for colliery and iron-mine consumption, and 215,500 for local consumption in the principal towns and manufactories, making a grand total of 913,891½ tons as above. The quantity of coal, coke, and anthracite shipped at the ports of the county, and sent coastwards to the other ports of the United Kingdom, in 1856, was as follows, in tons:—Whitehaven, coals, 207,947; anthracite, 775. Workington, coals, 129,275; coke, 5; anthracite, 130. Maryport, coals, 291,068; coke, 2,877; anthracite, 1,521. The quantity of coal exported to foreign countries during the same year was—Whitehaven, 3,943 tons; Workington, 1,514 tons; and Maryport, 4,075 tons!¹

Alston is the principal seat of the lead mines, which are almost exclusively the property of Greenwich Hospital, having been granted to that institution by Act of Parliament, on the attainder of the unfortunate Earl of Derwentwater, in 1716. We subjoin a list of the various lead-mines of the county, with their produce of lead-ore, lead, and silver, in 1856.

Silver and copper are found in some of the mines in the same veins as the lead-ore: the table which we have just given from the Mining Records shows the quantity of silver produced. The quantity of copper sold by private contract, of which returns have been obtained from the mines, was as follows:—Coniston mine, 3,659 tons, 8 cwt., 2 qrs., valued at £27,861 14s. 7d.; Greenbourn mine, 204 tons; Roughton Gill, 45 tons, 1 cwt.; Driggrith, 8 tons; Alston Moor, 13 cwt., 2 qrs.

In no part of the world has the production of iron advanced with more rapid steps than in the north of England, nor is there perhaps a limited district where the ores and their resulting irons are more varied in character. The ores of iron raised in the northern counties belong, geologically speaking, to three different formations, viz., the Carboniferous Limestone, the Coal Measures, and the Lias, the former of which alone demands our attention. The principal mass of the Carboniferous or Mountain Limestone of the iron-producing district under consideration, emerges from beneath the Coal Measures of Durham and Northumberland on the east, and is bounded by a steep declivity overlooking the vale of Eden on the west. It reaches a culminating point in the long mountain ridge of Cross Fell, and forms the vast tract of moorland which near Alston extends for some twenty-five miles in width, and in the high desolate region adjoining the Scottish border stretches almost from sea to sea. After an interval of some miles towards the west, the same formation rises again from beneath the New Red Sandstone of Penrith, and the Coal Measures of Workington and Whitehaven, and lapping as a narrow belt round the older slaty rocks of the Lake district, almost entirely encircles this the most beautiful region of England. The structure of the central high land first mentioned, in which are situated the towns of Alston, Hexham, and Haltwhistle, differs materially from the contemporaneous formation which occurs farther south in England and Wales, and which consists principally of uninterrupted beds of limestone to a vast thickness. In the north the actual limestone plays but a subordinate part, and alternates with strata of gritstone and shale, locally termed "hazle" and "plate." Certain ores of iron are interstratified with these beds; nodules of clay ironstone, the argillaceous carbonate, are met with in some of the bands of shale, the mode of aggregation being analogous to that of the similar ores of the Coal Measures. At Hareshaw, near Bellingham, towards the source of the North Tyne, four furnaces were erected some years ago, to smelt the clay ironstones which were obtained from the series of "sills" or beds intervening between the so-called "great limestone" of the Alston district, and the "second" or "little limestone" which lies about sixty feet above it. They produced excellent iron, but the expensive cartage of the ore, and the absence of railway or canal communication, were fatal for the time to the success of the establishment.

Masses of brown iron-ore (the hydrous sesquioxide of iron) appear in some instances to form regular layers, although their presence is probably in close relation to the veins of metallic minerals which in great numbers intersect the rocks in and around Alston Moor.

It is not until farther and systematic workings shall have been followed out, that the true nature and extent of these apparent strata can be determined.

The majority of the mineral veins or lodes of the Alston district, celebrated for their productiveness of lead-ore, range nearly from east to west, intersecting the whole of the above-mentioned beds, but yielding their riches far more abundantly in certain strata than in others. Some of these lead veins, in a part of their course, are charged with brown iron-ore instead of the usual veinstone of fluor spar and quartz and its concomitant lead-ore. Thus the rich lode of Roderup Fell where it crosses the valley of the Tyne, above Alston, and is known as the Craig Green or Bracken Syke vein, is seen in the so-called "scar" limestone, as a vein of brown iron-ore from 16 to 20 feet in width. Hitherto, however, from the remote position of the district, these repositories of an ore so well calculated to produce a good quality of iron have been very little explored.

Since the late extension of a branch railway to the town of Alston, certain of the lodes, apparently producing nothing but this kind of ore, have been extensively wrought. Thus the Manor House vein has been opened very near the railway station, for the Shotley Bridge Company, and hundreds of tons have been raised from a very small area at the extremely low cost of 1s. 7d. per ton.* The vein is about 14 feet wide striking east and west, with a northerly dip, and throwing down the measures on its north wall about 12 feet. Its productiveness is increased by tongues or "flats" which penetrate to the distance of a few feet between the layers of the scar limestone which it here intersects.

The hematite (red iron-ore, sesquioxide of iron) of Whitehaven, occurs in the carboniferous limestone near the outcrop or surface edge of the slaty rocks upon which that formation rests. The greater part of the excavations from which it is extracted are subterranean, and so extensive is often the mass of iron-ore in which the workings are carried, that it is difficult in such situations to obtain a clear idea of the nature of this important deposit. But at a place called Todholes, near Cleator, an open work has for some time been in operation, which throws great light on the subject. A slight anticlinal axis has brought the iron-ore to within a small distance of the surface; and the superficial covering of fifteen to twenty feet in thickness, which contains very numerous angular fragments of gray limestone in its lower portion, being removed, the red iron-ore is worked as a quarry. The floor of the deposit is a white and red mottled shale, almost of the nature of a fire-clay, and is evidently a bed belonging to the limestone series; bore-holes have been sunk in it to a depth of thirty or forty feet without meeting with any other material. The surface of this shale is very uneven on a large scale, although the actual planes are smooth, and frequent sudden depressions or ridges throw it up or down for a few feet, disturbances which appear to be regularly followed by the superimposed hematite. Between the shale and the iron-ore there lies, very generally, a band of conglomerate, from three to eight inches thick, of small pebbles of white quartz. The magnificent bed of hematite which then follows, varies from fifteen to upwards of 30 feet in thickness, and is for the most part a dense mass of red ore subdivided by irregular and nearly vertical joints. Small cavities rarely occur, adjacent to which the ore assumes those botryoidal forms commonly termed "kidney ore," so well known in mineralogical cabinets, and which exhibit this mineral in a high state of purity. In such parts of the mass rock crystals occur, and calcareous spar and arragonite appear to be the substances which were last crystallised in the hollows. With a general parallelism to the floor of the deposit, two, and sometimes three bands of greenish black shale, from one to eight inches thick, are distinctly interstratified with the iron-ore; and the presence of these partings, with the overlying roof of impure limestone which makes its appearance on the dip, leaves on the mind almost a conviction that the hematite occurs as a true bed.

* It is worthy of note, that here, as in so many other localities, our forefathers had availed themselves of the occurrence of a rich ore to work it for their small charcoal furnaces; on the late opening of these works, remains of ancient gullies and a horse shoe were found, although the existence of old workings was not betrayed by any surface appearances.

And yet it is difficult to remain satisfied with the view of the regular contemporaneity of the ore with the limestone strata. In other mines of the district the presence of a definite and nearly vertical boundary along one side of the workings is more nearly akin to the phenomena of a vein, and it is very possible that a systematic examination of the whole group of localities might lead to the assigning of a later date for the introduction of the iron-ore into chasms and hollows which had been formed in the already consolidated beds, and thus bring the nature of the repositories of Whitehaven into coincidence with the more clearly-marked ores of Ulverstone.

There seems occasionally to be a second bed, in a somewhat higher position, which rests upon a limestone floor; but hitherto so small an area has supplied the requirements of a single mine that the physical structure of the district is very imperfectly understood, both as regards the extent of these unrivalled deposits and their exact position among the members of the mountain limestone.

A shaft which has recently been sunk at High House near Cleator, through a greater depth of cover than usual, yields the following section:—

Coarse Grit, called "Millstone" Grit	36	0
Shales	30	0
"Whirlstone"	12	0
Red Limestone	7	0
Shale	1	8
Hematite pierced to depth of	32	0

When the ore is worked as a mine, galleries are driven out from the shaft fourteen or fifteen feet in height, forming "rooms" with substantial pillars left between them; and after a certain area has thus been prepared, the pillars are "robbed," the roof falls, and the surface of the land commonly gives way. The depressions which ensue and often become pools of water, with the crushing action on the neighbouring workings, render the last stages of the operation somewhat insecure, and necessitate special caution.

A small proportion only of the ores of the Whitehaven district is smelted on the spot. The coal of the neighbouring field is ill suited for smelting purposes; and the admirable coke of the Newcastle district has to bear so expensive a carriage, that but one ironwork, that of the Whitehaven Hematite Iron Company, has, for some time past, been in action. This establishment, situated near Cleator, is placed close upon the edge of the coalfield, and possesses three blast furnaces, smelting no other ore than that of the district, which the company purchases from its neighbours. Hot blast is employed, and a certain quantity of shale has to be added to the usual materials, in order to supply in conjunction with limestone the requisites for a slag.

The quantity of iron-ore produced in the county during 1856, was 267,256 tons, of which 259,167 tons were hematite from the Whitehaven district; and 8,089 hematite and hydrated oxide from Alston Moor. Of the 259,167 tons raised in the neighbourhood of Whitehaven, 152,875 were shipped at Whitehaven, 65,675 were sent away by rail, and 39,617 tons used at the ironworks in the district. The destinations of the ore were as follow:—Wales, 124,630 tons; Staffordshire, 26,768 tons; Scotland, 15,865 tons; Newcastle, Middlesbrough, &c., 51,470 tons; and to France, 817 tons.

The following are the hematite iron mines near Whitehaven, with their proprietors:—

Amnes Mines	Talk and Ley.
Debske Mine	James Henry Attwood and Son.
Biggins Moor	S. and J. Lindow.
Biggins	Anthony Hill.
Ditto	Wilsons, Peile, & Co.
Cleator Moor	Anthony Hill.
Cleator (sundry mines)	Whitehaven Hematite Iron Compy.
Crowgarth	Anthony Hill.
Goosegreen	Fisher, Dees, Fletcher, & Musgrove
Heskett Pit	D. and J. H. Robinson, Richard Barker, and Thornton.
High House Mine	S. W. Smith and Company.
Knoekmorton Cop.	Thomas Carmichael.
Langthorne	Earl of Lonsdale & Gen. Wyndham.
Low Ling
Parkside	Fisher, Dees, Fletcher, & Musgrove
Tadboles	John Stirling.
Woodend	Henry Attwood and Son.
Yatehouse	Talk and Ley.

The total produce of pig-iron from the hematite ore furnaces of Lancashire and Cumberland, was 25,530 tons.

Millom produced 2,268 tons of iron pyrites, which sold for £1,100, and contained 47 per cent of sulphur. From the Alston Moor mines 443 tons, 16 cwt. of barytes (carbonate) were obtained; and 378 tons, 5 cwt. of zinc (blende and calamine), valued at £1,405 9s.

The plumbago of Borrowdale has long been famous for its fine quality. It is found in detached pieces called according to the size sops or bellies, so that the supply is very irregular, the miners being frequently engaged for a long period in seeking for the graphyte. Some years since a very large quantity of plumbago was obtained from Borrowdale; this has been stored by the proprietors, and sold in small parcels from time to time. The mine has not been worked for several years; it was examined by some skilled miners since the cessation of the work, and their opinions were not such as would lead us to believe that any large quantity of black-lead would be discovered by any extension of the workings.

Cobalt has been found in small quantities at Newlands, and antimony at Bassenthwaite. Lapis Calaminaris, small quantities of Manganese, Galena, and spar of various kinds and different colours and forms are found in several places. Slate of a pale blue colour, and of the finest quality, is abundant in the county, particularly in the neighbourhood of Ulleswater and Keswick. Limestone is very abundant in many parts of Cumberland; and in some places it is burnt in large quantities for exportation, particularly to the west of Scotland. The quantity produced at Alston, in 1856, was 2,411 tons, 11 cwt.

The principal ports of Cumberland are Whitehaven, Workington, Maryport, and Harrington. Skinbursness appears to have been at one time a haven of some importance, and was the rendezvous of the English fleet which Edward III. employed against Scotland. Silloth, on the bay of the same name, is a rising port, which at present engages a large amount of public attention, and for which a prosperous future is confidently anticipated.

Cumberland appears to have possessed manufactures from a very early period, for we learn from a charter of William de Fortibus that there were fulling mills at Cockermouth and Dearham in the reign of Henry III. A manufactory of fustian was established at Carlisle in 1660, and one of broad cloth at Cockermouth about the same period. About thirty years afterwards we find iron-forges at Millom, and fulling-mills at Bassenthwaite, where woollen cloths were dressed called Skiddaw greys. From the beginning of the 18th century the manufactures of the county have gone on increasing, and now afford employment to several thousands of the population. The cotton trade is located principally at Carlisle; the manufacture of coarse linen, sail-cloth, &c., at Whitehaven and other places; paper on the rivers; woollens at Keswick; earthenware, iron, copperas, &c., in different localities, and at Whitehaven, Maryport, and Workington, are several ship-building yards, where every kind of manufactory connected with shipping is carried on. There were formerly considerable saltworks at Bransted, near Whitehaven, Netherhall, and Workington, but they have long been discontinued.

BOTANY.

Cumberland produces a great variety of plants, many of which, whose habitat is among the mountains, are of rare occurrence in other parts of the kingdom. A list of them is annexed:—

- Acer campestre*, Mirehouse Woods.
Adonis autumnalis, near Bromfield.
Agrimonia eupatoria, Lamplugh churchyard. A. eupatoria, var. odorata, Lorton.
Agrostis vulgaris, var. pumila, common on high elevations.
Alchemilla alpina, Borrowdale House, Helvellyn, Scawfell, Skiddaw, Scree.
Alisma natans, Derwentwater. A. plantago, Keswick. A. rotundifolia, Eskmeals.
Allium acronotum, lands of the Derwent. A. ursinum, Salter Hall. A. vineale, Bearpot, near Workington.
Althaea rosea, Westside, Ponsesby, Lamplugh; everywhere in the Lake district.
Antagallia ovata, Hensingham Collier. A. tenella, Scraggs, Loughrigg, near the Inn, Patterdale.
Anchusa sempervirens, Gosforth, Sandwith.
Andromeda polifolia, Moss near Bromfield, Moresby, Drum-lough.
Anthemis maritima, Couderton.
Anthriscus vulgaris, Workington Bridge.
Anthyllis vulneraria, Maryport railway.
Apocynum autumnale, Ennerdale.
Apium graveolens, Workington Marsh.
Aquilegia vulgaris, shore of Bassenthwaite Lake, Dovenby.
Arabis hispida, on the shores. A. hirsuta, Shouldthwaite, Moota. A. petraea, Scree. A. stricta, Lamplugh Hall, Parashaw Hall.
Arbutus uva-ursi, Grassmoor, Crammock, Bootle Fell, Bracken-thwaite.
Arenaria pepioides, Seaton, Flimby. A. serpyllifolia, Parshaw Hall, Cockermouth. A. verna, Helvellyn.
Armeria maritima, Helvellyn.
Arum maculatum, Wood Hall, Branthwaite.
Arundo arenaria, Sea-shore, Couderton. A. calamagrostis, River Derwent. A. phragmites, River Derwent.
Asarum europaeum, near Keswick.
Asperula odorata, Lowdore Fall.
Aspidium angulare, Whigham. A. dilatatum, Keswick. A. latifolium, Flimby, Walla Crag, Caldbeck. A. oreopteris, Ponsesby Fell, Ulpha. A. spinulosum, Keswick, &c.
Asplenium Adiantum nigrum, common. A. alternifolium, said to be found in the Lake District. A. marinum, rocks near Whitehaven, St. Bees Heads. A. rutumaria, common. A. septentrionale, Borrowdale, Scree, near Lorton. A. Trichomanes, Carleton, &c. A. viride, Casterliff Fell, river Irthing, edge of Scout Scare, Ashness, Ghyll, Cross Fell.
Aster tripolium, Eskholme, Holborn Hill.
Athyrium ovatum, Roth., near Keswick.
Atriplex laciniata, St. Bees and Harrington shores. A. patula, Workington north shore.
Atropa Belladonna, once plentiful round Egremont Castle, but now only retained in a few gardens there.
Ballota nigra, Workington.
Betula alba, var. pendula, round Derwentwater.
Bidens cernua, Braithwaite, Cloflocks. B. tripartita, Keswick Cass, Bootle.
Blechum boreale, common.

- Betrychium Lunaria*, not rare on dry pastures.
Brassica Monensis, Flimby and St. Bees shore.
Cakile maritima, Seaton shore.
Callitriche pedunculata, Ennerdale. C. verna, Whinlatter.
Calluna palustris, var. radicans, margins of lakes.
Camelina sativa, Workington Mill Field.
Campanula glomerata, foot of Ulleswater, Hardendale. C. latifolia, common in hedges.
Cardamine amara, Moorside Woods, Bearpot. C. hirsuta, elevated situations on Whillmoor. C. pratensis, common, sometimes double.
Carduus acanthoides, Carlisle Castle.
Carex ampullacea, Cocker side. C. arenaria, Harrington shore. C. dioica, plentiful at Wythburn Head, Orgill. C. extensa, Marron side. C. filiformis, Workington. C. flava, Hardknot. C. limosa, var. irrigua, Gilsland. C. pallescens, Sellafeld. C. pulicaria, Hundey. C. rigida, Helvellyn, Skiddaw, Scawfell. C. riparia, Stubbin Mire. C. stricta, Bullgill Bridge. C. vesicaria, Braithwaite. C. vulpina, Yearton Hall.
Carlina vulgaris, Ennerdale.
Catabrosa aquatica, Couderton shore—scarce—perhaps extinct.
Centaurea Scabiosa, Eaglesfield.
Cerastium Alpinum, rocks above Red Tarn, Helvellyn. C. tetrandrum, Cockermouth.
Chara aspersa, Harra Moor. C. flexilis, Whillmoor.
Chelidonium majus, Kirkland, St. Bees.
Chieranthus fruticosus, walls of Scaleby Castle.
Chorophyllum sylvestre, Giffot and Whigham.
Chrysosplenium alternifolium, Portinscale Bridge. C. oppositifolium, common in wet woods.
Cicuta virosa, Keswick, Walton, Irthington.
Circea alpina, margins of Ulleswater and Derwent Lakes, Ashness Ghyll, Barrowside. C. lutetiana, Keswick.
Cladium mariscus, Cuswick Tarn.
C. leopodium vulpinae, Mirehouse, Papecastle.
Cnicus aculeatus, Barrowside, Hardknot. C. heterophyllum, Armboth, Watendlath.
Cnidium Silaus, Seaton, Schoose Farm.
Cochlearia anglica, Workington shore. C. groenlandica, var. alpina, rills on Helvellyn. C. officinalis, Couderton Shore, Fleswick Bay.
Comarum palustre, common in meadow ditches.
Convolvulus arvensis, Fitz toll-bar. C. soldanella, on the shore at Parton, Maryport, Ravenglass, Couderton, and Harrington.
Corydalis solida, Vale of Newlands.
Cotyledon umbilicus, Eheside, Gosforth.
Crambe maritima, near St. Bees, below Ravenglass and Bootle, Couderton shore.
Crepis tectorum, Woodcock Nook, near Egremont.
Critheum maritimum, St. Bees rocks.
Cynoglossum officinale, Flimby.
Cystopteris Banguetata, Helvellyn. C. dentata, Naddle. C. fragilis, Whinlatter.
Cystea dentata, Naddle, Braithwaite, Whillmoor. C. fragilis, St. Bees Moor.
Dancus carota, Ravenglass.
Drosera anglica, Helvellyn. D. longifolia, Ullock Moss, near Gilpin Bridge, Borrowdale. D. rotundifolia, common in bogs.
Eleocharis acicularis, Egremont. E. fluitans, Cogra Moss, in Lamplugh. E. caespitosa, Merton Moss. E. multicaulis, Ennerdale Lake. E. palustris, Loweswater Lake. E. paniculatus, Merton Moss.

Empetrum nigrum, Cross Fell, Skiddaw, moors and bogs.
Epilobium alpinum, Keswick and Gowbarrow Park. E. alsinifolium, Whinlatter. E. hirsutum, river Eden and its tributaries.
Epipactis latifolia, Dean Seales, Bridge Foot, Cockermouth Road. E. palustris, near Cuswick Tarn.
Equisetum arvense, common. E. fluviatile, Flimby, Salter Hall, Parton rocks. E. palustre, Cold Fell. E. sylvaticum, Watendlath, &c. E. variegatum, Gilsland, in the Irthing.
Eriophorum angustifolium, Calder Ghylls and Edge Tarn. E. polystachion, Brigham Moss. E. vaginatum, common in bogs.
Frodium cicutarium, Gosforth. E. maritimum, St. Bees.
Eryngium maritimum, common along the sea shore.
Erythraea centaurium, Bostle, Distington, and a pure white variety in Loweswater.
Eucnemos Europaeus, Lowdore Woods.
Euphorbia crispata, Bridge Foot. E. helioscopia, Gosforth. E. paralia, Haverigg and Harrington shores. E. peplus, Egremont, Bostle station. E. portlandica, Braystones, Drigg shores.
Fedia dentata, Frisington. F. olitoria, Moresby Hall.
Festuca vivipara, on the mountains.
Galeobdolon luteum, Croisdale.
Galopsis versicolor, near Carlisle.
Gallium boreale, margins of lakes, Helvellyn, river Irthing. G. cruciatum, Lamplugh, &c. G. mollugo, Crofton Hall, Pardshaw, &c. G. palustre, Brackenthwaite, Lowdore. G. saxatile, St. John's Vale. G. verum, Tallentire, Lamplugh, Lowdore.
Genista anglica, Drigg, Bostle. G. scoparia, Bridekirk. G. tinctoria, Sention, Tallentire, Arlecdon.
Gentiana Amorella, Tallentire Hill. G. campestris, Tallentire Hill, Workington Warren. G. pneumonanthe, between Maryport and Flimby. G. verna, till recently on Egremont Green.
Geranium columbinum, Fell Foot, Newby Bridge, Cockermouth. G. lucidum, Lowdore Bridge. G. phaeum, Kirkland. G. pratense, Lamplugh. G. pusillum, Elterby Sear. G. pygmaeum, Dale Head, Thirlmere. G. Robertianum, St. John's Vale. G. rotundifolium, Yeorton Hall. G. sanguineum, rabbit warren, between Workington and Maryport, St. Bees shores. G. sylvaticum, St. John's Vale, Keswick.
Glauis maritima, Ravenglass, St. Bees.
Glaucium luteum, Flimby, Coudertown, Bostle shores.
Gnaphalium dioicum, Penzith Fell, Kirkland, Helvellyn, Screes. G. gallicum, Drigg, Gosforth. G. germanicum, Drigg. G. minimum, Fieldhead in Eskdale. G. rectum, base of Helvellyn. G. uliginosum, Arlecdon.
Glechoma hederacea, Barrow Side.
Grammitis ceterach, Sandwith, Mosser, Gosforth, &c.
Gynandria conopsea, Wasthwaite, St. John's Moota.
Habenaria alba, Watendlath. H. bysolia, margin of Derwentwater, Wythburn Head, Watendlath. H. chlorostachya, abundant in moist situations. H. viridis, Watendlath. Helleborus viridis, Duddon Woods, Plamland.
Hesperis matronalis, Dale Head, Thirlmere.
Hieracium alpinum, Helvellyn, at Grisedale Tarn. H. aurantiacum, near Keswick. H. subaundum, Ennerdale, in side woods. H. umbellatum, Kirkland How.
Hippuris vulgaris, Dub Mill.
Hordium murinum, Flimby. H. maritimum, Coudertown.
Huanulus Lupulus, hedges near Keswick and Grasmere, Egremont.
Hydrocotyle vulgaris, in bogs near lakes.

Hymenophyllum Tunbridgensis, Screes, Ponsonby Hall. H. Wilsoni, Lowdore Fall, Nook, Scale Force, Walton Crag, Haweswater, Dungeon Ghyll, Ponsonby.
Hyoscyamus niger, Cockermouth, Flimby, Harrington.
Hypericum calycinum, Irton. H. elodes, Birker Moor, Aitcha Moss, Ullock Moss. H. hirsutum, Camerton, Clifton. H. humifusum, Lowdore Fall. H. perforatum, Keswick woods. H. pulchrum, Castlehead woods. H. quadrangulum, Clifton.
Iberis nudicaulis, near the Hards, Abbey Holme.
Impatiens noli-tangere, Stock Ghyll Force, Scale Hill.
Imperatoria Ostruthium, Gilsland woods.
Inula Helenium, Mosser. I. dysenterica, St. Bees Heads.
Isotria laticus, in most of the lakes.
Jasione montana, common.
Juncus canosus, Millom Marsh. J. filiformis, margins of Derwentwater and Crummock. J. triglumis, rocks above Red Tarn, Fairfield, Loweswater, Helvellyn. J. uliginosus, Workington.
Lathraea squamaria, wood near Wigton, Winder Sear, Cuswick wood.
Lemma minor, ponds in Whillimoor.
Leonurus Cardiaca, Workington Row.
Lepidium Smithii, margin of Derwentwater; near Brayton Hall; Abbey Holme.
Listeria cordata, Castlerigg Fell, Mellbreak. L. nidus-avis, Flimby wood, Wood Hall. L. ovata, common.
Lithospermum arvense, Stanger. L. maritimum, Bostle shore and Workington. L. officinale, Mosser and Westward Parks. L. purpureum, Carlisle, Castle Carrock.
Littorella lacustris, margin of Derwentwater, Wythburn.
Lobelia dortmanna, plentiful in the lakes.
Lonicera caprifolium, Lorton Hall. L. xylosteum, Workington Park.
Lotus major, road sides.
Luzula campestris, common on bare heaths. L. campestris, var. congesta, Ullock Moss. L. congesta, common on bare heaths. L. Fosteri, Lowdore, woods between the mountains and the sea. L. pilosa, common in woods. L. sylvatica, banks of the Marron.
Lychnis alpina, Brackenthwaite.
Lycopodium alpinum, on all the mountains, Sty Head, &c. L. annotinum, said to be found on Langdale Pikes, near Bow Fell. L. clavatum, on all the mountains. L. inundatum, Shoulthwaite, Wastdale, in a bay half way between Keswick and Wythburn. L. Selaginoides, Lycopodium Selago, Harlkinot, Helvellyn.
Lycopus arvensis, St. Bees. L. europaeus, Ribton Hall.
Lysimachia nemorum, Castlehead wood and Lamplugh. L. thysifera, Keswick. L. vulgaris, Keswick, Ennerdale, Lorton.
Lythrum hyssopifolium, said to grow at the south end of Derwentwater. L. silicaria, Ennerdale, Newlands; Beckermot.
Malva Moschata, Cockermouth Road.
Matriaria chamomilla, Sylcroft.
Meconopsis Cambria, near Ambleside, Naddale.
Melampyrum pratense, common in old woods.
Mentha gentilis, Dalston. M. piperita, M. hirsuta, near Sykes in Naddale, in ditch sides. M. rotundifolia, Lowdore.
Meum athamanticum, Fell End in Ennerdale, Ducker Garths, Kendal, near Keswick.
Myosotis caespitosa, Hallen Fell; Helvellyn. M. palustris, var. strigulosa, river Derwent, near Keswick. M. repens, Vale of Newlands, Skiddaw, Helvellyn, Wastdale.
Myrica gale, in most bogs.

- Myriophyllum spicatum*, Naddale.
Narcissus Pseudo-Narcissus, Duddon Woods.
Noctia Nilus-avis, Cunswick Wood, Wallow Wood, Kendal, foot of Skiddaw.
Nuphar lutea, in most of the lakes, Mockering Tarn, Wormanby Lough.
Nympha alba, in all the large lakes, Mockering Tarn.
Ophioglossum vulgatum, rather common.
Ophrys cordata, Kirkland. O. mucifera, Barrowfield Wood.
Orchis albidula, Little Broughton. O. bifolia, Whillimoor. O. latifolia, Watendlath, Borrowdale. O. mascula, common, Dovenby. O. pyramidalis, Watendlath, common. O. ustulata, Blindcrake. O. viridis, Merton Moss.
Ornithopus perpusillus, Irton Church, St. Bees Moor.
Orobis sylvaticus, Gablesby and Ousby.
Osmunda regalis, Millom, Irton, Egremont, Ullock Moss, Dalston.
Oxyria reniformis, Wastdale Head, Helvellyn, Ashness Ghyll.
Parietaria officinalis, Torpenhow Church.
Paris quadrifolia, woods in Lamplugh.
Parassia palustris, meadows and bogs.
Peplis portula, Haras Moor, Kinniside Long Moor, Calder Gills.
Phragmites communis, in most of the lakes.
Pinguicula vulgaris, common in bogs.
Pimpinella dioica, Tallentire Hill.
Pisum maritimum, Harrington rocks.
Plantago Coronopus, shore at Flimby, Ravenglass, &c. P. maritima, Moota, Flimby, Gillerthwaite. P. major, Arlecdon. P. media, Arlecdon and Egremont.
Polygonum amphibium, Dearham. P. ariculare, Lowdore Woods. P. bistorta, in meadows. P. convolvulus, Basenthwaite. P. hydropiper, Lowdore. P. viviparum, Helvellyn.
Polypodium calcareum, Kendal Fells. P. dryopteris, common in the Lake District, Legberthwaite, Dean. P. phegopteris, Eskdale, Ulpha, Braithwaite. P. vulgare, common.
Potentilla fruticosa, Screes.
Poterium sanguisorba, Scout Scar, Knipe Scar, Shap Fells.
Prenantes muralis, Borrowdale, Ulpha.
Primula elatior, Seaton, Lamplugh. P. farinosa, Aspatia, West Newton, Wanthwaite Mill, Caldbeck. P. veris, (red variety), Egremont Clinks.
Pteris crispata, Borrowdale.
Pulmonaria maritima, on sea-coast near Allenby, Ravenglass, Maryport, &c.
Pygmaethum Parthenium, Nether Hall.
Pyrola media, Kirklington Moors. P. minor, Dunmallet, near Ulleswater. P. rotundifolia, Walla Crag. P. secunda, Helvellyn, near Keswick.
Pyrus aria, Scout Scar.
Radiola millegrana, Swinside. R. millegrana, var. maritima, Ebsenside.
Ranunculus aquatilis, Thirlmere, Derwent River, St. Bees Moor. R. auricomus, Pardshaw. R. circinatus, Ulleswater. R. Flammula, common in cold soils. R. fluitans, Derwentwater. R. hederaceus, Lamplugh Hall, Pardshaw. R. hirsutus, Drigg, Worthington Marsh. R. Leonard-mandi, common. R. Lingua, Naddale Beck, Cardew, Wastdale, Eskdale.
Reedea Luteola, Flimby, Eaglesfield, Worthington.
Rhamnus frangula, Cockshot and Ullock, Keswick.
Rhinanthus crista-galli, var. major, Chapel Bank, St. Helens.
Rhodiola rosea, Helvellyn, Screes, Ennerdale Caves, Pillar Fell.
Ribes Grossularia, limestone rocks at Sunderland. R. nigrum, banks of the Derwent. R. rubrum, banks of the Derwent.
Rosa arvensis, Whillimoor. R. canina, Loweswater. R. cinnamomina, Howray, Keswick. R. gracilis, Whinlatter. R. hibernica, Brackenthwaite. R. rubella, Thirlwall. R. Sabini, Derwent Bay. R. spinosissima, plentiful on the coast at Seascle, &c. R. tomentosa, Lamplugh. R. villosa, Gilsland.
Rotbolla incurvata, Skate Dubs, Worthington.
Rubus caesius, Tallentire. R. corythifolius, Arlecdon. R. Chamaemorus, Crossfell, Styx Moss. R. fruticosus, very common. R. glandulosus, Pardshaw. R. idaeus, common. R. rhamniifolius, Ulpha. Lowca, Flimby. R. saxatilis, Cockshot Wood, Gilsland. R. suberectus, Moorside Hall.
Rumex digynus, Screes, slate quarries near Buttermere.
Ruppia maritima, Cliflocks.
Sagittaria sagittifolia, Braystones Tarn.
Salicornia herbacea, Ravenglass, Worthington. S. procumbens, Worthington North Shore.
Salix herbacea, Sawfell, Helvellyn, Skiddaw, Saddleback. S. reticulata, about Alston, Greystoke, Abbey Holme.
Salsola fruticosa, Ravenglass. S. kali, Couderton.
Sambucus Ebulus, Brackenthwaite, Scalelands.
Samolus Valerandi, Couderton Shore.
Sanguisorba officinalis, meadows near Kendal and Keswick.
Sanicula europaea, Wythop Woods.
Saponaria officinalis, Derwent Side, near Worthington.
Satyrion albidum, mountain pastures above Borrowdale.
Saussuria alpina, Striding Edge, Helvellyn.
Saxifraga aizoides, wet situations on mountains, Barrowside, Grassmoor. S. granulata, Harrington Church. S. hypnoides, wet situations on mountains, Armboth Fell, Shoulthwaite. S. nivalis, rocks above Red Tarn, Helvellyn, Legberthwaite Gills. S. oppositifolia, Striding Edge, Great End, Screes, Borrowdale. S. stellaris, Helvellyn, Iron Crag, &c. S. tridactylites, old walls at Dacre, Moota, Whicham.
Scleranthus annuus, St. Bees, Knockmorton, Eskdale.
Scirpus lacustris, Loweswater. S. maritimus, Worthington. S. setaceus, Ennerdale. S. sylvaticus, banks of the Marron.

CHARITIES.

From an early period, it has been usual, in the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, as well as elsewhere, for pious or charitable persons to settle or demise money, property, rent-charges, and other proceeds, for the purpose of supporting the poor, endowing schools, providing clothing, &c., in particular districts or localities, or for extending and improving the means already in existence for carrying out these objects. Many of the charities remain in operation to the present day; some of them improved by the kindred spirits of their managers, others allowed to dwindle into insignificance, some appropriated by the cupidity of individuals, and some of them lost in a manner that cannot now be traced. For the preservation and good management of the immense amount of property involved in these endowments, an act was passed, 58 Geo. III., cap. 91, "for appointing commissioners to inquire concerning charities in England, for the education of the poor;" and another, 59 Geo. III., cap. 81, to amend the previous act, "and to extend the powers thereof to other charities in England and Wales." Both these acts were continued by others, 5 Geo. IV., cap. 58, and 10 Geo. IV., cap. 57. In pursuance of their provisions, commissioners were appointed, whose labours were continued during a series of years, and whose voluminous reports tended materially to elucidate this hitherto little known subject. So important was this inquiry considered, that another act, 5 and 6 William IV., was passed, "for appointing commissioners to continue the inquiries concerning charities in England and Wales, until the 1st day of March, 1837." In that year, the concluding report appeared. In common with the charities of other counties, cities, and towns of England and Wales, those of Cumberland and Westmoreland were carefully investigated and the results placed on record. From this authentic source of information, it is intended to collect the materials for an account of each of the parochial and other charities in the two counties, with a statement of such changes, modifications, and additional particulars as have occurred since the date of the commissioners' reports, so far as they can be procured. These accounts will be arranged with their respective localities.

Cumberland Ward.

CUMBERLAND WARD, which comprises the city of Carlisle, and is the most fertile division of the county, is bounded on the north by Eskdale Ward, on the north-west by the Solway Frith, on the south-west by All-ridge-below-Derwent Ward, and on the south-east by Leath Ward. It is of an irregular oblong form, extending about twenty miles from east to west, and about eight miles from north to south, and is watered by the rivers Eden, Petteril, Caldew, Wampool, and Waver, with their numerous tributary streams. The scenery of the first-named river is very picturesque, and is much admired: on the Petteril and Caldew there are several mills and manufactories. The railways passing through the ward are the Newcastle and Carlisle, the Maryport and Carlisle, the Lancaster and Carlisle, the Caledonian, the Port Carlisle, and the Carlisle and Silloth. Cumberland Ward comprises seventeen parishes,—Beaumont, Bowness, Burgh-on-Sands, Crosby-on-Eden, Christ Church, Dalton, Grinsdale, Kirk Andrews-on-Eden, Kirklaughton, Orton, Rockliffe, St. Cuthbert, St. Mary, Stanwix, Uppery, Warwick, and Weatherall; one chapelry, Wreay; and two extra-parochial places, Eaglesfield Abbey and Kingmoor.*

THE CITY OF CARLISLE.

CARLISLE, an episcopal city, a parliamentary and municipal borough, and the capital of the county of Cumberland, is situated in 54° 53' north latitude, and 2° 55' west longitude. It is 301 miles north-west by north from London by road, and 300 miles by the North-Western and the Lancaster and Carlisle railways. The city is seated upon an eminence, surrounded by a fertile plain of rich meadows, and is nearly encompassed by three streams, the largest of which, the Eden, passing Carlisle on the north side, receives the other two—the Petteril on the east and the Caldew on the west of the city. From the neighbourhood of Stanwix, on the other side of the Eden, Carlisle is seen to great advantage, while the southern approach is also beautiful and picturesque. The eye commands an extensive prospect towards the north and east, and in the middle rises the city, overtopped by the massive towers of the castle on the west; the cathedral still higher in the centre; and in the east arise the embattled towers of the court houses. The atmosphere is dry and pure, and the soil chiefly sand and clay, while the proximity of the city to an inlet of the sea, and its due distance from the mountains on all sides render the temperature moderate and temperate.

The city, the parliamentary and municipal boundaries of which are co-extensive, consists of the townships of Botchergate, English-street, Scotch-street, Fisher-street, Castle-street, Abbey-street, Rickergate, and Eaglesfield Abbey, with part of Caldewgate township. Its population in 1801 was 9,521, in 1811, 11,645; in 1821, 14,531; in 1831, 19,069; in 1841, 21,878; and in 1851, 26,310, of whom 12,677 were males, and 13,633 females. The number of inhabited houses, at the same period, was 3,956; of uninhabited, 119; and there were 38 in course of erection. The following table gives the population of the different townships in the city from the latest parliamentary returns:—

The history of Lugubalia or Carlisle during the Roman period is as much involved in obscurity as that of the other portions of the county, though there is little doubt that it was a place of some importance, and contained its temples, and palaces, and public edifices, like the other cities and stations of the empire. It appears to have been one of the Civitates Latii jure donata, or cities under the Latian law, of which there were only ten in Britain, and as such enjoyed peculiar exemptions and privileges. The Scots seem to have looked upon it with no friendly eye, even at this early period, for we learn from two of their own writers, Fordun and Boethius, that it was captured and burnt by them, during the absence of the imperial legions, in the reign of Nero. It must, therefore, have been subsequent to this event, and most probably in the time of Agricola, that it was fortified as a strong frontier town. The defences constructed at this period appear to have been, like all the other works of the Romans, of great strength and durability, for despite the many attacks which were made upon the city at different times, and the numerous repairs which these attacks rendered necessary, much Roman masonry remained till a comparatively recent period, as we learn from Leland and others.¹ During the time that Britain was held by the Romans, Cumberland was tolerably secure from the attacks of the Picts and Scots, but no sooner were the protecting legions withdrawn than these wild sons of the north overran the country, and Carlisle, from its situation, being almost the first object of attack, was laid in ruins, and its inhabitants put to the sword.

* That part of Caldewgate township, within the city of Carlisle, comprised, in 1831, 7,405 inhabitants.

* No return was made for Eaglesfield Abbey prior to 1841.

From the departure of the Romans, we hear no more of Lugubalia till the seventh century, at which time the Angles possessed the northern parts of England, and acknowledged Egfrid for their king. This monarch visited the city, gave orders for its re-edification, caused a wall to be erected for its defence, and founded, as is generally believed, a college of secular priests to attend to the spiritual wants of the inhabitants. It is to the Angles that the change of the name of the city from Lugubalia to Carlisle is ascribed by the early chroniclers and historians. In the year 608, St. Cuthbert arrived, and was gladly received by the people, who took him to see the fortifications and other remains of antiquity which their city possessed.¹ Lugubalia, with the surrounding country for fifteen miles, was subsequently granted to the see of Lindisfarne, to which it remained attached till the reign of Henry I. On the invasion of Cumberland by the Danes, under Halfdene, in 875, Carlisle, as it was now called, is said to have been destroyed; but if the statement of some of the Scotch historians be correct, that Gregory, King of Scotland, held an assembly of his nobles here in 880, this destruction must have been only a partial one, and one that could be soon repaired. But certain it is that sometime about this period, the city fell into the hands of the Northmen, by whom it was laid in ruins. It continued in this state for about two centuries, during which time there was "never an inhabitant to be seen, but some few straggling Irish, who lodged themselves among the ruins. There was no face nor appearance of a city, but the very foundations were so buried in the earth, that it is said large oaks grew upon them, so that it looked more like a forest than a place of civil government, and this is not only attested by our own historians, but also made out by some discoveries that have been late made of large unheun oak trees buried ten or twelve yards in the ground."²

Matthew, of Westminster, is the only writer who speaks of the restoration of Carlisle previous to the reign of William Rufus. He tells us that Ranulph de Meschines, as soon as he had received Cumberland from the Conqueror, at once began to rebuild the city; and further informs us, that the Conqueror himself, on his return from Scotland, in 1072, gave orders for fortifying Carlisle. If we are to place any reliance on this information, it is manifest that the work of restoration must have proceeded slowly, and made but little progress till the reign of the second Norman king; for the same writer, in common with the other historians of the period, attributes the restoration of Carlisle and the rebuilding of the castle to William Rufus, who visited the city and placed a garrison there in 1092. The same monarch subsequently sent a number of labourers from the south of England to settle in and around Carlisle, to reclaim the neighbouring lands and to bring them into cultivation, and Sir Francis Palgrave considers it not unlikely that these colonists were the people who were ejected from their homes by Rufus, when the New Forest was in course of formation. These extensive operations, there is little doubt, occupied many years, and must have been far from finished when Tyrrell's arrow laid the Red King low, and Henry I. ascended the English throne; for in 1122, or twelve years after his accession, Henry being at Carlisle, disbursed money towards their completion. From this fact it would appear that the premature death of William II. interfered with the carrying out of the plans devised for the restoration of Carlisle, and it is not at all improbable that the castle and the city walls were finished by David, King of Scotland, who, during several years possessed the city, and occasionally resided there.¹

From the important position held by Carlisle as a strong frontier town, it was frequently besieged during the many wars between the English and the Scotch, and suffered greatly in consequence. In 1135, it fell into the possession of David of Scotland, who captured it either by surprise or treachery, and spent the three following years in adding to the strength of its fortifications, which according to Fordun, were completed in 1138. In the same year was fought the Battle of the Standard, when the Scottish monarch was completely defeated, and obliged to retreat to Carlisle, where he remained for three days in the greatest anxiety regarding the fate of his son, whom he had left contending valiantly with the enemy. The prince, however, escaped, and shortly afterwards joined his father at Carlisle. In the following September, David was visited at Carlisle by the Cardinal Alberic, who had landed in England, as papal legate. The Cardinal had passed through the tract of country which had been the scene of Scottish depredation, and was so affected with the horrors that he had witnessed, that on his knees he begged of the king to consent to a peace. David was inexorable, but out of respect to the petitioner, he granted a truce for two months; promised that all the females that had been consigned to slavery in Scotland should be conducted to Carlisle, and liberated on the feast of St. Martin; and gave his word that in future wars the churches should be respected, and protection should be extended to the weak and unresisting. In the year 1149, David conferred the honour of knighthood upon his nephew (afterwards Henry II. of England), at Carlisle, and a year later, the same king, prince Henry of England, and Ranulph, earl of Chester, met here, and entered into a league, binding themselves to make common cause against Stephen, who, at that time had possession of the English crown. The contemporary writers inform us that on this occasion prince Henry solemnly promised, that on his accession, he would confirm to David and his heirs the lands in England claimed by that monarch. Prince Henry of Scotland died at Carlisle, in 1152, where his father David also expired, on the 24th of May, in the following year. At this period the city was of sufficient importance to have a mint, which seems to have been supplied with silver from mines in the county.

Henry succeeded to the throne of England in 1154, when Malcolm of Scotland, the son and successor of built and furnished, to engage thereby the favour of heaven for the good of this new society,—for all Christians agree that if God be not well served in a city, it may be strong but it cannot be safe,—nisi Dominus custodierit civitatem, frustra vigilat qui custodit eam." Then William II., out of his princely care and bounty, built the walls of this ruined city of Carlisle, built and fortified the castle, laid the foundations of the church and abbey, and placed a great number of inhabitants in all parts of the city; but before he could bring his designs to perfection, the fabric of his own body failed, and he was called out of this world by an unexpected death, wherefore, the finishing and completing what he had so well begun, and so far advanced, was left to the royal care of his successor, Henry I., a wise and pious prince. No sooner had King Henry got the crown upon his head, but he had it in his heart to advance the good state of the new garrison here on the borders; and if other business would not have permitted him to consider its condition, yet the frequent alarms the Scots gave him in these parts would have advertised him how necessary it was to keep a number of men to defend these northern counties from their insolence. Hereupon, in the beginning of his reign, he removed the Flemings and Dutch which had been placed here, as was said, into the Isle of Anglesea, and sent in their room regiments of families of English out of Kent, Essex, and Middlesex, to inhabit the city, and to defend it too, under the command of Ranulph de Meschines, sister's son to Hugo Lupus, Earl of Chester. What expenses were needful to finish the walls and the church, were supplied out of the King's exchequer and put into the hands of Walterus, the supervisor of the works, who was a person of great worth and abilities, who came out of Normandy with the Conqueror, served him and his son in great offices, and when he had partly at his own charge, as well as the king's, built and endowed a monastery here, he took upon him the habit of an Austin monk in it."

David, applied to the English monarch for the fulfilment of his promise regarding the land, &c., in England, claimed by the Scottish kings; Henry, however, disregarding the oath made to David, refused to comply, and kept them in his own hands. In 1158 the two monarchs met at Carlisle, but separated without adjusting their differences, though much time was spent in negotiations for that purpose; "and," says Dr. Todd, "the King of Scotland did not receive the honour of knighthood, which he had expected." From this time the city remained in the possession of Henry, who, according to Hutchinson, granted a charter to the citizens, in which he allowed them to take timber for building from the royal forest of Carlisle. Not long after this, in 1173, hostilities continuing between the two kingdoms, William the Lion, the successor of Malcolm, invaded Cumberland, and laid siege to Carlisle, which was well and ably defended by Robert de Vaux, but learning that an English army was on its march to relieve the city, he drew off his soldiers and returned to his own country. He came back, however, in the following year, and invested Carlisle with an army of 80,000 men. The garrison made a determined resistance, and the siege lasted several months, during which the greatest privations were endured by all within the city. Being reduced to the last extremity, the brave garrison was on the point of surrendering, when the capture of the Scottish king at Alnwick put an end to the war, and brought the siege to a conclusion.¹ In 1186, Henry II., accompanied by a large army, visited Carlisle, where he was met by William the Lion and his brother David, the two kings being then on friendly terms. During the reign of this monarch a considerable portion of the city was burnt by the Scots, and in addition to the loss of property sustained by the citizens, the charters and other documents by which they held their various liberties and immunities were completely destroyed. In 1193 they paid ten marks for the restoration of their rights and privileges. King John visited Carlisle in February, 1201, and stayed in the city for three days, and again in February, 1206, when he remained for a similar period. In August, 1208, we find that he was here for one day. Four years afterwards, in 1212, we find him again in the old border city, where he arrived on the 23rd of June, and staid till the 26th, when he departed for Hexham, which he reached on the same day, and proceeded thence to Durham.² In 1216 Carlisle was besieged and taken by the Scots under Alexander, but the castle still held out for John. The Scottish king repaired and strengthened the fortifications, but was not able to retain possession of the city long, for in the following year, on the pacification which followed the accession of Henry III., it was surrendered to Walter Gray, archbishop of York, for the King of England. On this occasion the canons of the cathedral are said to have been banished by Gualo, the papal legate, for having, through fear of death, sung mass for the Scottish king while under sentence of excommunication.

From this time we hear no more of Carlisle till 1233, in which year, according to the Lanercost chronicler, two convents were founded, one for the Dominican friars, and the other for the Franciscan. In 1283, the citizens were summoned by Edward I. to send two representatives to parliament. Nine years later, 1292, a fire broke out, which is said to have consumed many houses in the city, with the greater portion of the abbey buildings, and greatly damaged the cathedral. This conflagration appears to have been the work of an incendiary, who, from motives of resentment, set fire to his father's house, and was subsequently executed for the crime. During the progress of the fire, two thieves, one of whom had taken sanctuary in the cathedral church, and the other in that of the Franciscan friars, effected their escape, for which the citizens were condemned to pay a fine of £16 into the exchequer; the fine was, however, remitted by the king, on condition that the citizens should acknowledge that they were responsible for the safe custody of felons flying for sanctuary to the churches within the city. In 1296, the earls of Buchanan and Monteith, with other Scottish nobles, besieged Carlisle, when the garrison made such an energetic resistance, that after three days the assailants were glad to retire. During this siege the women took an active part in the defence of the city, and caused the enemy considerable annoyance, by pouring boiling water and casting heavy stones from the walls upon the besiegers, "which so abated their courage and fury, that they thought best quietly to retreat, and leave the country to judge that Carlisle women had more courage and valour than the Scottish soldiers."³ In the following year, Wallace, at the head of his army, summoned the city to surrender, but the garrison being well prepared to repel any attack, refused to comply, and the Scottish leader withdrew his troops, without commencing hostilities.

Edward I., after his victory at Falkirk, in 1298, came with his army to Carlisle, and is said to have held a parliament there on the 5th of September. Two years later we find him again here, on his route to Scotland, when he was attended by his army and the flower of the English nobility. But the mediation of the Pope brought about a truce between Edward and the Scottish monarch, the former of whom, after having passed the border, returned to Holme Cultram, and continued there and at Carlisle till the 16th of October. He subsequently went to Dumfries, where the truce was concluded, on the 30th of the same month, and arrived at Carlisle again, on his way to the south, on the 3rd of November. The revolt of Bruce, in 1305, recommenced war between the two countries. The king of England appointed Carlisle as the place of rendezvous for his army, which was summoned to assemble at midsummer, 1306. Edward, with his queen and court, arrived on the 28th of August, and remained till the 10th of September, when he made a short excursion into Northumberland, returning to Carlisle in October. His health being in a declining state, from the united effects of disease and advancing years, he moved slowly about the Scottish border, and passed a great portion of his time at Lanercost priory, making, however, in the mean time a short excursion to Carlisle. In January, 1307, a parliament met here. On the first of the following March the king removed to Kirk Cumbuck, and on the 4th, accompanied by the queen and court, paid a visit to the Bishop of Carlisle, at Linstock Castle, where he remained for six days, enjoying the hospitality of the prelate, returning to Carlisle to meet his parliament on the 12th. This parliament consisted of Edward, Prince of Wales, the legate of the Holy See, the Archbishop of York, nineteen bishops, several mitred abbots, the officers of state, and a large number of the most powerful barons of the kingdom. During its sittings an excommunication was fulminated against Robert Bruce, by Peter of Spain, the papal legate, assisted by the other bishops, with all the ceremonies usual on such occasions.¹ The army having assembled at the time and place appointed, Edward celebrated his last birthday, in the ancient city, and on the 28th of June, set out on his march towards Scotland. The exertion of sitting on horseback, however, proved too much for the aged monarch, he having heretofore been carried in a litter, and he was obliged to halt at Caldote, in the neighbourhood of Carlisle. On the following day, believing himself better, he resumed his journey, and proceeding by slow marches, on the 5th of July reached Burgh-on-Sands, where he expired two days afterwards. A messenger was immediately despatched to convey the tidings to prince Edward, who arrived at Carlisle on the next day, and was at once acknowledged king by the assembled prelates and nobles. He then proceeded to Burgh, to assist at the obsequies which were performed for the repose of the late monarch's soul, and shortly afterwards, abandoning the war with the Scots, returned to the south, passing through Carlisle in September.

In 1314, Robert Bruce invaded England by Carlisle, and wasted all the country as far as York.¹ In the following year, he again entered Cumberland, and on the 22nd of July appeared before Carlisle, which he at once invested, little expecting the determined resistance which he met with from the garrison and its brave commander, Andrew de Hercla. "On every day of the siege," says the Chronicle of Lanercost, "an attack was made on some one of the three gates of the city, and sometimes all three together; but not with impunity, for darts, arrows, and stones, as well then as at other times, were cast down upon them from the walls in so great an abundance, that they questioned among themselves whether the stoues did not increase and multiply within the walls. But on the fifth day of the siege, they erected an engine for carting stones near the church of the Holy Trinity, where the king had placed himself, and continually threw great stones towards the Caldew-gate, and at the wall, but did no injury, or but little to those within, except that they killed one man. There were indeed within the city, seven or eight similar engines with other warlike instruments, called springaldes, for throwing long darts; and slings in sticks, for casting stones, which greatly terrified and annoyed those who were without the city. In the meanwhile the Scots erected a great berefray, in the manner of a tower, the height of which considerably exceeded that of the walls; which, being observed, the carpenters of the city erected a wooden tower, which exceeded the height of the other, upon one of the towers of the wall towards which that engine must have come, if it had approached the wall; but it never drew near to the wall, for when it was drawn upon wheels over moist and clayey ground, there it stuck, by reason of its weight, nor could it be drawn any further, or occasion any inconvenience. But the Scots applied many long ladders, which they had brought with them, for the purpose of ascending the wall in the same manner in different places, and a sow for undermining the wall of the city, if they found it practicable; but neither the sow nor the ladders availed anything. They also made bundles of straw and grass in great abundance, to fill up the moat without the wall, on the east side, in order to pass over it dry; they also made long wooden bridges running on wheels, that being drawn forcibly and rapidly with cords, they might be carried across the ditch; but neither would the bundles, during the whole stay of the Scots there, fill up the moat, nor those bridges pass the ditch, but fell by their weight to the bottom. On the ninth day of the siege, when all the engines were ready, they made a general assault on all the gates of the town, and attacked valiantly throughout the whole circuit of the walls, and the citizens defended themselves as valiantly; and in like manner on the following days. Moreover the Scots employed a stratagem similar to that by which they took the castle of Edinburgh: they caused the greater part of their army to make an assault on the eastern part of the city, against the place of the Friars Minors, that they might draw thither the party within; but the Lord James Douglas, a valiant and wary soldier, with certain of the more bold and alert of the army, posted themselves on the western side, over against the place of the Canons and Preaching Friars, where, on account of the height [of the walls] and difficulty, an attack was not apprehended, and there erected long ladders, which they ascended, and they had archers in great numbers, who discharged their arrows thickly, lest any one should raise his head above the wall; but, blessed be the Lord, they found such a resistance there that they were thrown to the ground with their ladders, and there, and elsewhere about the walls, some were taken, some slain, and others wounded. Yet no Englishman was killed during the whole siege, except one man struck with an arrow, and the one above-mentioned, but a few were wounded. Thereupon, on the eleventh day, that is to say, on the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula (August 1st), the Scots, either because they heard of the approach of the English to raise the siege, or because they despaired of making any further progress, early in the morning returned into their own land, in confusion, leaving behind them all their warlike engines above mentioned. Certain English pursuing them, took John de Moray, who, in the before mentioned battle at Strivellan, had for his share twenty-three English knights, besides esquires and others of lower rank, and received a great sum for their ransom. They took also with the aforesaid John, the Lord Robert Bardolf, a man certainly of the very worst disposition towards the English, and brought them both to the castle of Carlisle." This extract from the chronicle will give an insight into the manner in which sieges were carried on in those days.

In 1322, Andrew de Hercla, governor of Carlisle, having vanquished the Duke of Lancaster and his adherents at Boroughbridge, was rewarded for his services by the earldom of Carlisle and the wardenship of the Western Marches. The same year, Edward II.

assembled a numerous army for the invasion of Scotland, information of which coming to the ear of Bruce, he entered England near Carlisle, and burnt Rose Castle, plundered the Abbey of Holme Cultram, and laying waste the surrounding country, proceeded through Copeland as far as Preston, carrying destruction whithersoever he went. He returned with great booty, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Carlisle for five days, during which time the Scottish troops were constantly engaged in plundering. "Whereupon," says Nicholson and Burn, "Andrew de Hercla, concluding that King Edward neither knew how to govern nor defend his kingdom, and fearing that he would in the end lose it, did, on the 3rd of January, privately repair to King Robert, at Lochmaben, and there they mutually agreed to assist and succour each other with all their might. And it was further agreed, that if the king of England should within one year approve thereof, that then King Robert should cause one monastery to be built in Scotland, and endowed with 500 marks of yearly revenue for ever, to pray for the souls of all those that had perished in the wars between England and Scotland; and should pay 4000 marks of silver to the king of England within ten years: and that the king of England should have the prince of Scotland and marry him to a relation. The earl returning to Carlisle, summoned all the chief of the county, as well clergy as laity, and there, more out of fear than love, they all swore that they would keep and defend the said convention with their whole power. And all the common people were much pleased therewith, hoping they might now live peaceably at home. But an account of all these proceedings being carried to King Edward, he was greatly surprised and troubled at it; and publicly proclaiming the earl a traitor, sent to Anthony Lord Lucy to apprehend him, promising that he and his assistants should be well rewarded. Whereupon the Lord Lucy, having his squires and other men properly dispersed here and there upon various pretended causes, on the morrow of St. Matthias the Apostle (February 25th), he and they entered the castle of Carlisle, where the earl was, as upon common business. With Lord Lucy were three stout and daring knights, Sir Hugh de Lowther, Sir Richard de Denton, and Sir Hugh de Moriceby, with four squires, all well armed. And as they entered the castle they carefully left a guard at every gate. The Lord Lucy, with his three knights, went through the great hall to the place where the earl was sitting, and thus accosted him,—'Sir, you must either surrender or defend yourself instantly.' Upon which he submitted. Then some of his servants calling out treason, the keeper of the inner gate would have shut it upon the knights that had entered, but Sir Richard de Denton killed him with his own hand, and this was the only person that was slain in the whole affair. But all that were in the castle surrendered themselves and it to Lord Lucy. But some of the family repaired with all speed to High-head Castle, to acquaint his brother John therewith, who immediately fled into Scotland, and with him Sir William Blount and many others. A special message being despatched to King Edward at York, to acquaint him with all that was done, and to know his pleasure; the earl, in the meantime, apprehending what would be the consequence, confessed himself to several monks, who gave him absolution, and assured him of eternal happiness. On the feast of St. Chad (March 2nd), six days after the seizing of the said earl, an armed force, with Sir Jeffrey de Scrope, chief justiciar, arrived at Carlisle, who, the next day, tried and sentenced the said earl to be degraded, hanged, and quartered. After the pronouncing which sentence, the earl said, 'You have disposed of my body at your pleasure, but my soul I give to God.' And then, with an unchangeable countenance and uplifted hands and eyes, he was carried to the gallows and executed, having first fully explained the intention of the treaty.¹

¹ History of Cumberland and Westmoreland, vol. ii, pp. 230, 231. The judgment was in substance as follows:—Whereas our lord the king, on account of the loyalty which he thought he had observed in you, Andrew de Herle, made you earl of Carlisle, and with his own hand girded you with the sword, and gave you a fee of the county, with castles, towns, lands, and tenelements, to support the estate of an earl; and yet you have traitorously, falsely, and maliciously gone to Robert Bruce to maintain him in opposition to the will of the king, this court doth award that you shall be degraded, and lose the title of earl for yourself and your heirs for ever; and that you shall be ungirded of your sword, and that your spurs of gold shall be struck off from your heels. And whereas you, Andrew, the liegeman of our lord the king, contrary to your homage, faith, and allegiance, have traitorously gone to Robert Bruce, the mortal enemy of our lord the king, &c., this court doth award that for the same treason you shall be drawn, hanged, and beheaded: that your heart, bowels, and entrails, from which these traitorous thoughts proceeded, shall be plucked out and burnt to ashes, and the ashes be scattered in the wind; and that your body shall be divided into four quarters and sent to Newcastle, Carlisle, York, and Shrewsbury, and your head shall be placed on London Bridge for an example, that others may learn not to commit such treasons against their liege-lord.—Bym. 999, Parl. Writs, ii. app. 262.

The following account of this affair is given by Capgrave:—"In this same yere Andrew Herle, which took Thomas of Lancaster, and broute him to the kyng, and whom the kyng had rewarded gretely, and mad erl of Carlele, ros ageyn the Spenseris. And whanne he say it myte not avale, this were so wallid with the kyngis grace, he rebelled openly, and drew to the Scottis, and favoured her part ageyn the kyng. Thenne was there a nobil knyght in that cuntre, cleped Sir Anthony Lucy. He, supposing to stand the better in the kyngis grace, sodeynly fel upon this tyrant at Karlib, took him, put him in yrunnes, and brout him to London to the kyng, and there he was shamefully deposed of alle worchip, and deed as a tre-tourne."—Chronicle of England, p. 191.

As some reward for his services in arresting Herle, Lord Lucy appears to have been appointed governor of Carlisle, for we find that in 1327 the lords Urford and Mowbray were sent to that city with a reinforcement to the governor, Anthony Lord Lucy. He does not, however, seem to have held that important post for any lengthened period; for, in 1332, when Edward Baliol sought protection here after his unsuccessful attempt to obtain the Scottish crown, he was entertained by Lord Dacre, who appears to have been governor at that time.

In 1334, Edward Baliol and the earls of Warwick and Oxford were sent to Carlisle by Edward III., who was then in Scotland, with instructions to defend Cumberland against the Scots. Shortly after their arrival in the city, their force having received several additions, they made an incursion into Scotland under the leadership of Baliol, and then returned to Carlisle. On the 11th of July in the following year, another expedition, headed by the king in person, marched from Carlisle against the Scots, who three years later retaliated by making an irruption into Cumberland and attacking Carlisle, but being unable to make any impression upon the city, they burnt the suburbs and the hospital of St. Nicholas, as well as Rose Castle. In 1345, however, they were more successful, and the city itself was given to the flames. From this date we find no further notice of Carlisle till 1356, in which year Bishop Welton granted an indulgence of forty days, upon the usual conditions, to all those who should contribute to the repairs of the bridge over the Eden to the north of the city. On the demise of Edward III., in 1377, Richard II. succeeded to the English throne; and in the third year of his reign "the Scots," says Dr. Todd, "invaded Cumberland and Westmoreland, killing all they met, and miserably laying waste the whole country. They passed by the city of Carlisle, going through the forest of Ingelwood, where they seized four thousand head of cattle and sent them to Scotland, with a small party to secure them. They came to Penrith on the market-day, and killed many of the people, putting the rest to flight, and spoiling the town of all goods which they were able to carry away. In their return they designed to have made an attack upon Carlisle, but finding it well manned and provided, they durst not attempt it, which some of the chief archers perceiving, made a sally upon them, and by their bows and arrows killed many of them. The Earl of Northumberland would have pursued them, but the king would not suffer him, though he had lost a thousand marks by the rapine and fury of the invaders. About two years after, as soon as they had eaten their stolen provisions, the Scots again invade Cumberland, burn part of Penrith, lay siege to Carlisle, and throw fire into it, which consumes to ashes one whole street; and they had in all probability taken the city, but that they were frightened away in a miraculous manner, as is reported, which was thus:—When they had put the citizens to great consternation, and were ready to make an assault, there appeared a woman to them, and told them that the king of England with a puissant army was coming upon them. They, looking about, saw the English banner, and a vast army advancing towards them, as they supposed, whereupon they left their ladders and engines at the walls, and took to their heels for security, never looking behind them till they came into their own country. This woman was then supposed to be the Blessed Virgin, the patroness of the city, who had upon these occasions often appeared to the citizens and inhabitants, as Henry Knighton is of opinion; and such religious esteem has been had towards the Blessed Virgin, that her impress with our Saviour in her arms, is the public seal of the Corporation to this day." In 1385, the same enemy, in conjunction with some French auxiliaries, invaded Cumberland, when another fruitless attempt was made upon Carlisle; and in 1387 the city was again attacked by the Scots under the Earls of Douglas and Fife, but with a similar result. "In 1391," says the writer just quoted, "this city was burnt by misfortune, whereupon the king (Richard II.) moved with compassion, gave to the citizens £40 fee farm-rent, and a mill for four years, to repair in part the damages which they had sustained. After the poor and unfortunate city was burnt and laid in ashes so many times by the fury of the Scots and by casualty, as has been seen, it was able to recover itself from many desolations; and even at this day the scars of those dreadful wounds are yet apparent, for the town is so thin and empty of inhabitants that it looks like a country village well walled about rather than a city which can boast of so many royal favours and immunities bestowed upon it; and these devastations which it has suffered, are not only attested by our historians, but also demonstratively evident now-a-days by the several pavements which are discovered in digging wells, one above another, which are nothing but the ancient streets, buried in vast heaps of rubbish, at the several conflagrations that the town has suffered."

During the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, the city is said to have been "miserably harrassed," but we have no recorded particulars of that period with the exception of an act of parliament passed in 1461, in which it is stated that "Carlisle had suffered greatly in the late civil wars when besieged by the King's enemies, Margaret (the late Queen), Edward (late Prince of Wales), and Henry Duke of Exeter, when they burnt the suburbs and the city gates." In consideration of what the citizens had suffered on this occasion, Edward IV. remitted one half of their fee-farm rent of £80, and granted to them the lordship of the royal fisheries at Carlisle. By another act passed in the twenty-second year of the reign of the same monarch, it was enacted that no English goods were to be sold to the Scots at any other places than Carlisle and Berwick-upon-Tweed, under pain of forfeiture.

For the next forty years we hear no more of the ancient city. In 1522, however, the Duke of Albany, at that time regent of Scotland, entered Cumberland at the head of a large army, and advanced towards Carlisle; but finding the city well prepared to sustain a lengthened siege, he withdrew his forces without attempting anything of importance. In 1537 broke out the Northern Rebellion, or, as it is more generally called, the Pilgrimage of Grace, which soon spread over the northern counties; and we are informed that 8,000 men, under Musgrave, Tilby, and others, attacked Carlisle without effect, being repulsed by the garrison and citizens. The Duke of Norfolk, who commanded the royal forces sent against the insurgents, intercepted them on their retreat from Carlisle. All the leaders, with the exception of Musgrave, were captured, and seventy-four officers expired with their blood their too ardent attachment to the faith and practices of the old religion,—being hung on the walls of the city. The same year Cuthbert Tunstall, bishop of Durham, and the Bishop of Orkney, met at Carlisle, as commissioners for arranging a treaty of peace between England and Scotland.

Nothing further transpires relating to Carlisle till 1568, when Elizabeth occupied the English throne, and Mary of Scotland makes her appearance here as a prisoner. She landed at Workington on Sunday, May 16th, whence she proceeded to Cockermouth, and then, under the escort of Mr. Lowther and a number of the gentlemen of the county, she was conducted to Carlisle and lodged in the castle. She was followed to the city by the Earl of Northumberland, who was desirous of getting possession of her person, but the vigilant watch kept over Mary by Mr. Lowther prevented the accomplishment of the earl's designs. When Elizabeth was informed of the Scottish queen's arrival at Carlisle, she sent instructions to Mr. Lowther that Mary should be treated with the greatest respect, and commanded Lady Scrope, and other ladies, to repair to Carlisle and attend upon her. In order that Mary's conduct might be strictly watched and properly reported, Elizabeth ordered Lord Scrope and Sir Francis Knolles to proceed to Carlisle for that purpose.

On the 29th of May, Sir Francis wrote to Elizabeth, giving her an account of the first interview which he and Lord Scrope, the lord deputy, had with the captive queen. In this letter he describes Mary's great dissatisfaction at not being admitted into the presence of Elizabeth, and recommends to the latter's consideration whether it would not be more honourable in the sight of foreign princes, and of her own subjects, to suffer the Queen of Scotland to return to her own country, if she thought proper. Alluding to the possibility of her being still longer detained a prisoner, he remarks, "She cannot be kept so rigorously as a prysener with your hyghness honor (in myn opnyon) but that with devyces of towls or toys at her chamber wyndow or elsewhere in the nyght, a bodye of her aglyty and spyryte may escape beyng so near the border." It having been resolved to detain Mary as a prisoner, Sir Francis was appointed her keeper, an office which he by no means relished, though he appears to have fulfilled the disagreeable task imposed upon him with the utmost fidelity. In a letter dated June the 15th, he recommends Naworth Castle as a much more secure place for her residence than Carlisle. He also, in the same letter, assures Elizabeth that every precaution should be taken for Mary's safe custody, though he seems to think that escape was possible, considering the small number of guards he had at his disposal, and that appearance of liberty which it was deemed advisable to allow her. We gather from the same letter that it was to keep up this semblance of liberty that the Scottish queen was allowed to attend service at the cathedral church. With respect to air and exercise she does not appear to have had much indulgence, as we learn from the letter just mentioned, in which Sir Francis says, "Yesterday hyr grace went owte at a posterne to walke on a playenge green toward Skotland, and we, with 24 halberders of Master Read's band, with divers gentlemen and other servants waited on hyr. Where about twenty of her retinue played at football before hyr the space of two howers very strongley, nymbyley, and skylfullye, without any fowle play offered, the smalness of theyr balls ocaseonyng theyr fayre playe. And before yesterdaie since our comyng she went but twyse out of the towne, once to the lyke playe at football in the same place, and once roode oute a hunting the hare, she gallopyng so fast upon every ocaseyon, and hyr hoole retinue being so well horsyd, that we upon experyence thereof, dowtyng that upon a set cowrse some of her frendes owte of Skotland myght invade and assaulte us upon the sodayne to reskue and take hyr from us, we mean hereafter yff any soteche rydyng pastymes be requyred that waye, so motche to feare the indangeryng of her person by some sodayne invasyon of her enemyes, that she must hold us excused in that behalfe."

Elizabeth, it appears, was most anxious to learn what kind of person the Scottish queen was, for in reply to some inquiries concerning Mary, Sir Francis observes, "This Ladie and Prynces is a notable woman, she seemeth to regard no ceremonious honour beside the acknowledging of hyr estate royalle, she shoethe a disposition to speak motche, to be bold, to be pleasant, and to be very fameliare; she shoethe a great desyre to be avenged of hyr enemyes; she shoethe a redinesse to expose hyrself to all perylls in hoope of victorie; she delythethe motche to hear of hardiness and valeaunce, commendyng by name all approved hardye men of hyr countrye, althoe they be hyr enemyes, and she concealeth no cowardness." With regard to her attendants, and how they were disposed, Sir Francis tells us, that she had about thirty or forty servants, including gentlemen servers and waiters, carvers and cupbearers; but not more than three or four of these had lodgings in the castle. The lords Claude and Skarling, and young Mr. Maxwell, with several other gentlemen and their servants, lay in the city at their own expense, and waited upon the queen when opportunity offered. Lord Herries, who had gone to London to try and obtain for Mary an interview with Elizabeth, shortly after this returned to Carlisle, his efforts having proved unavailing. An order subsequently arrived for her removal to the south, which Mary resisted as long as she could, but was ultimately obliged to comply with, and after a residence of two months in Carlisle, the Scottish queen left the ancient city, which she was destined to behold no more. She was removed on the 13th of July to Lowther, whence she was taken to Bolton Castle in Yorkshire.

Fears being entertained for the safety of Carlisle during the rebellion of the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, in 1569, Lord Scrope, warden of the western marches, occupied the city, but this precaution was needless, as the forces of the earls did not advance beyond Naworth, where they dispersed. In 1596, William Armstrong, or "Kinmont Willie," a noted borderer, was taken prisoner on the marches, and carried to Carlisle, although it was a day of truce upon the borders. When the knowledge of Willie's capture came to the ears of Lord Buccleugh, who at that time had charge of Liddesdale, he at once applied to Lord Scrope, the English warden of the western marches for the borderer's release, but his application being refused, he at once formed the resolution of rescuing his countryman.

Coming to Carlisle during the night with a party of 200 men, he made a breach in the city wall sufficient to admit a few men, who, by breaking open a postern gate soon let in the remainder, and before the garrison was prepared for resistance, Armstrong, whose place of confinement was previously known, was released and carried off in triumph. The boldness of the Scots in thus surprising an English fortress is said to have highly incensed Queen Elizabeth, and to have endangered the peace of the two kingdoms. When Buccleugh was afterwards presented to the English sovereign, tradition tells us that, in a peremptory way, she demanded how he dared to undertake an enterprise so desperate; and the undaunted chieftain's answer was, "What is it that a man dares not do?" A reply which so struck the queen that she exclaimed, "With ten thousand such men our brother of Scotland might shake the firmest throne of Europe."

According to Ridpath, commissioners appointed to settle the disturbances upon the borders met at Carlisle in 1596. They were empowered to hear and redress all wrongs committed since the last sitting of the commissioners, which took place at Berwick-upon-Tweed upwards of nine years previously. This arduous undertaking found them employment for several months, during which time the raids of the borderers were as frequent as ever. The Bishop of Durham was the principal commissioner on the part of England, and the Bishop of Dunkeld on the part of Scotland. Carlisle suffered severely from the plague in 1598, when 1,196 persons, or about a third of the entire population, are said to have died. The sick poor were not neglected on the occasion, upwards of £200 being collected for their relief. On the 19th of August of the same year, Christopher Robinson, a Roman Catholic priest, suffered death at Carlisle, with all the revolting details usual in cases of high treason, for having celebrated the rites of his religion, and performed the duties of his profession. He was a native of Woodside, and having studied at Douay and Rheims, was ordained and sent upon the English mission in 1592. During his imprisonment before execution, Bishop Robinson, who at that period held the see of Carlisle, had a conference with him, but failed in his attempt to make him abandon his religion. In 1600 an act of parliament was passed for the rebuilding of the two bridges over the Eden at the expense of the county, as they were both at that time in a very decayed state.

On the accession of James VI. of Scotland to the English throne on the demise of Queen Elizabeth, the border inroads may be said to have ceased, as only one occurred after that event, and in 1603 the garrison of Carlisle was reduced. In 1671 James I. visited the city, and was gladly received by the citizens, who by their mayor and recorder presented him with an address, a gold cup valued at £30, and a purse containing forty jacobuses. His majesty graciously received the address, and not less graciously the cup and purse. He subsequently visited the Cathedral, and having attended a feast given in honour of the royal visit, departed on the 7th of August, after a stay of three days.

Scotland being in rather a disturbed state in 1639, a garrison of 500 soldiers was placed in Carlisle, but the Earl of Stafford, not deeming this number sufficient, in a letter dated May 30th, advised its being increased to 1500. In June of the following year, rumours being prevalent that a Scottish army was about to enter Cumberland, orders were issued to prepare the various beacons, so that they might be available on the shortest notice: strict watch was also to be kept on the threatened part of the county; and the governor of Carlisle, Sir Nicholas Byron, who was appointed the same year, received authority to proclaim martial law, should he think such a measure requisite. In 1641, in pursuance of the provisions of a treaty made with the Scots, the garrison of Carlisle was disbanded, and the Parliament gave orders that the arms and ammunition should be carefully laid up till again wanted. Shortly after this date the civil wars commenced, and early in 1644 Montrose raised a small army in Cumberland. Having advanced as far as Dumfries, and taken possession of it, he was compelled by the Earl of Callander to fall back on Carlisle, which place, according to some accounts, was besieged by the latter. If this be correct, the siege must have been of short duration, as it is hardly mentioned by any of the contemporary writers. In June of the same year, the royalist troops, under the command of Sir Thomas Glenham, took possession of Carlisle, which, in the following October, was invested by General Lesley and a detachment of the Scottish army. Sir Thomas Glenham defended the city with the greatest courage, industry, and patience, being well supported by his devoted soldiers; and it was only after a siege of nine months, during which the garrison and inhabitants were compelled to subsist on the flesh of horses, dogs, and other animals, and when all hope was lost by the disastrous result of the battle of Naseby, that Carlisle capitulated. It was surrendered on the most honourable terms to Lesley on the 25th of June, 1645, and was immediately occupied by Scottish troops, who continued in possession till the December of the following year. For three years after this siege we learn nothing of Carlisle; but in April, 1648, mention of it is again made as being captured by Sir Philip Musgrave and Sir Thomas Glenham, who in July gave it up to the Duke of Hamilton, who placed in it a Scotch garrison, and appointed Sir William Livingstone governor. Shortly afterwards, when Sir Philip Musgrave, with a portion of the royalist militia of Cumberland, presented himself before the city, the governor refused to admit him. Carlisle was surrendered to Cromwell on the 1st of the following October, pursuant to treaty made some time before, between the Marquis of Argyle and General Monro, and at once received a strong garrison, which, consisting chiefly of cavalry, proved of the greatest service in repressing the turbulence of the moostroopers during the three years in which its efficiency was maintained. After the restoration of Charles II. to the throne of his ancestors, Sir Philip Musgrave, whose devotion to the royal cause was conspicuous on every occasion, was appointed governor of Carlisle, and from this period the ancient city appears to have enjoyed comparative tranquillity, disturbed only on one occasion when the last effort was made to replace the Stuarts on the English throne.

We come now to the memorable year 1745, at which time the population of Carlisle did not exceed 4000 persons, almost the whole of whom dwelt within the walls of the city,—the present suburbs, with the exception of a few cottages outside the gates, having no existence. The old castle and walls, the connecting links which united the Carlisle of that period to the dim ages of the past, and the more recent ones of Scottish warfare, were still standing; and with the presence of a company of invalided soldiers, under the command of a governor who rarely, if ever, saw his troops; and the closing of the gates at the boom of the evening gun, still reminded the citizens that they dwelt in what was termed a garrison town. The principal people in the city were the members of the ecclesiastical body, the dean and chapter, and the members of the corporation, between whom not the best understanding appears to have existed. In short, Carlisle, in 1745, in regard to its condition to sustain a siege, differed from the Carlisle of border history as widely as it is possible to conceive,—its importance as a frontier town having disappeared after the union of England and Scotland; nor was there any reason that would justify the authorities in its being maintained as one. The thought of an invasion from Scotland no one for a moment entertained; and hence the astonishment and consternation felt by the entire kingdom, when the news of the irruption of the Highlanders spread over the country.

The appearance of a party of fifty or sixty Highland cavalry on Stanwix bank, immediately opposite to Carlisle, on the afternoon of Saturday, November the 9th, warned the citizens that they were about to be attacked, and caused them to man the wall as best they could. The fear of injuring the country people, who were thronging the road on their return from market, and among whom the Highland party had mixed themselves, prevented the garrison from opening fire, and thus allowed the city to be reconnoitred in safety; but when the country people had retired, a few shots were fired from the ten-gun battery of the castle, and the Highlanders at once retreated. Having been reinforced, in the afternoon, by the arrival of part of the Peebles division, with the artillery, the prince, with a portion of the army, marched down the right bank of the Eden, which he crossed at Peatwath, near Rockliffe, and proceeded the same night to Moorhouse. On the following day considerable reinforcements arrived, and the city was formally and completely invested,—one body, under the Duke of Perth, approaching by Stanwix; another, under the Marquis of Tullibardine, by Shadongate; and a third, commanded by the prince in person, by Black Hall fields and St. Nicholas. The fire from the castle and citadel obliged the assailants to retire, and the prince slept that night at Black Hall. The following day, Monday, the besiegers, much to the relief of the citizens, marched to Brampton, which they judged more favourable for repelling an attack which they thought Marshal Wade was about to make upon them; but as no more was heard of the marshal, and a few days were lost in waiting for his coming, on the afternoon of the 13th the Highlanders returned and resumed the siege, the trenches before the city being opened the same evening. For the defence of Carlisle at this time, the garrison consisted of the Cumberland and Westmoreland regiments of militia, two companies of invalids, numbering about eighty men, and a few volunteers, the whole being under the command of Colonel Durand, a brave and skilful officer, who was resolved to defend the place to the last, and there is no doubt that he would have kept his resolution had he been sufficiently supported by those from whom he had every right to expect assistance.

On the morning of the 14th, Colonel Durand received a message from the officers of the militia regiments, in which they acquainted him that having been lately extremely fatigued with duty, in expectation of relief from his majesty's forces, and it appearing that no such relief was now likely to be had, and not being able to do duty or hold out any longer, they were determined to capitulate. On receipt of this the commandant went at once to the officers, and endeavoured, by every means in his power, to induce them to change their resolution, but his efforts were fruitless. The townspeople shortly afterwards joined the militia officers, upon which Colonel Durand, Captain Gilpin, and the officers of the invalids, after protesting against the proposed capitulation, retired, with the two companies of invalids, into the castle, which they were resolved to defend to the last. On the morning of Friday, the 15th, the besiegers had pushed their trenches within eighty yards of the wall, and it appears intended to assault the place, and try to take it by escalade, but before anything could be effected, a white flag was hung out, and an offer made to treat for the surrendering of the city. This proposal came from the officers of the militia and the inhabitants, and referred to the city alone,—not embracing the castle. An express was at once despatched to the prince at Brampton, whose reply was that the castle must be surrendered at the same time with the city, or the proposition would not be entertained. In the afternoon these conditions were accepted on the following terms:—“That the town and castle, with the artillery and magazines, should be delivered up; that the men should lay down their arms in the market-place, after which they should have passes to go where they pleased, on taking oath not to carry arms against the House of Stuart for a twelvemonth; that the city of Carlisle should retain all its privileges; that they should deliver up all arms, &c., and also the horses of such as had appeared in arms against the prince; and that all deserters, particularly the soldiers that had enlisted with the Highlanders after the late battle at Preston Pans, and had fled to Carlisle, should be delivered up.” These things being agreed to, the Duke of Perth immediately entered the city and took possession, and the next day proclaimed King James, attended by the mayor and corporation in their robes of office. The prince received the mayor and corporation at Brampton, where they presented him with the keys of the city; and on Monday, the 18th, the Pretender made his entry into Carlisle.

The capture of the ancient city was in every respect a fortunate circumstance for the prince, for, in addition to its moral effect, it put him in possession of a number of cannon and a large quantity of ammunition, besides military stores of various kinds; and, what was of still greater importance, furnished a basis for securing his further advance into England, affording a safe medium for keeping open his communication with Scotland, and a secure point upon which to retreat in case of a reverse of fortune. The terms of the capitulation were honourably fulfilled, and the Highlanders appear to have refrained from plunder or violence. Captain John Hamilton was made governor of the castle, and a garrison of 100 men placed under his command; and Sir John Arbutnot, an officer in the service of the King of France, received the governorship of the city. These appointments being made, Prince Charles Edward, on the 22nd of November, marched out of Carlisle, at the head of his troops, and proceeded towards the south.

It would be foreign to our purpose to follow the footsteps of the prince and his brave followers, suffice it to say that after having reached Derby, it was thought advisable to return to Scotland as quickly as possible. When the news of this retrograde movement reached Carlisle, Governor Hamilton began to prepare for the worst, by seizing on the markets, fixing prices on all commodities, laying in supplies, and taking every precaution to ensure the safety of the city, which he fully apprehended would have to resist the attacks of the king's troops. On the 19th of December, the retreating Highlanders entered Carlisle, and two days afterwards set out for Scotland, leaving a garrison in the castle, consisting of the Manchester Regiment, 120 strong, with 270 Scotch troops, and a few others, including four French officers. The same day, the Duke of Cumberland, with his entire army, marched from Penrith, and on his arrival before Carlisle, proceeded at once to invest the city, fixing his head-quarters at Black Hall, as Prince Charles had done previously.

The governor of the city, Colonel Francis Townley, in conjunction with Hamilton, the governor of the castle, resolved to do all in his power to retain Carlisle for the house of Stuart, or perish in the attempt. But his efforts were unavailing. The Duke of Cumberland, having received some cannon from Whitehaven, and being reinforced by the arrival of some Dutch troops, opened fire on the 28th of December, and on the 30th, two breaches having been made in the walls, Hamilton proposed to surrender on being allowed the privilege of prisoners of war. To this proposition the duke's answer was that they must surrender at discretion; and the only terms he would grant was that the garrison should not be put to the sword, but referred to the king's pleasure. On these hard conditions the garrison was obliged to give up the city, which was immediately occupied by 1,100 infantry and 120 cavalry, under the command of Brigadier Blight. The garrison, amounting to 396 officers and men, were made prisoners, and, after laying down their arms in the market place, were conveyed for security to the cathedral, where a strong guard was placed over them. On the 31st the duke entered Carlisle, and at once ordered the mayor and town-clerk to be arrested and sent to London; but they being able to vindicate their conduct, were subsequently restored to liberty. Several other gentlemen were also taken into custody, who did not fare so well. The duke took up his quarters in Mr. Highmore's house, where the prince also had lodged, but in a few days he returned to London, having given the command of the army to General Hawley, whom he instructed to follow the fugitives into Scotland. General Sir Charles Howard was appointed governor of Carlisle, where a considerable garrison was left, and on his arrival there early in January his first care was to get the prisoners removed to Chester and Lancaster. "On the 10th of January," says Mr. Mounsey, "these unfortunate men left Carlisle. The officers were placed on horseback, their legs tied under the bellies of their horses, their arms pinioned so as to afford them barely the power of holding the bridle, each horse was tied to the tail of the one before it. The privates were on foot—each man's arms tied—the whole marching two abreast, fastened to a rope hanging between them. The governor, Hamilton, went first, his horse led by a dragoon with a drawn sword; then followed the officers, and dragoons in the rear. The foot were preceded by two dragoons, one of whom held the rope to which the prisoners were attached; the whole were followed by a body of dragoons."¹

Governor Hamilton, Colonel Townley, and many of the officers of Prince Charles's army, were conveyed to London, where they were tried, convicted, and suffered death, the heads of some of them being placed upon Temple Bar, and those of others being sent to Carlisle, and placed over the gates there. In the latter end of July, a number of the prisoners were brought back to Carlisle, where the commission for their trial was opened on the 12th of August. The total number to be tried amounted to 382. It having been found that it would be next to impossible for the judges and juries to try this large number, it was, therefore, arranged that, with a few exceptions, the prisoners should have the option of drawing lots for selection of one out of every twenty to stand trial, the nineteen remaining to submit to transportation. These terms were accepted by several, and in this manner the number to be tried was reduced to 127, against whom bills of indictment were found by the grand jury. On the 9th of September the prisoners were arraigned, and of the large number just mentioned, very few were acquitted. Eighty-six were sentenced to death, of whom thirty-one were executed, two died in prison, and the remainder, with the exception of a few who received their pardon, were transported. At the conclusion of the assizes the judges ordered the release of those who had been arrested by order of the Duke of Cumberland.

"On Saturday, the 18th October," says the authority above quoted, "Thomas Coppock, Major Macdonald, Kinlock Moidart, Francis Buchanan, Brand, Henderson, Roper, Cameron, and Macnaughton, were taken from Carlisle to Gallows Hill to suffer the execution of their sentence. . . . Coppock is said to have read a sermon to the rest, and when finished to have flung it to the crowd, but the sheriff seized it. . . . After the bodies had hung a few minutes they were cut down, ripped open, the bowels burnt, and the heads severed from their bodies. The remains of Coppock and two others were buried on the spot; the bodies of the rest were interred in the churchyard at Carlisle. The heads of Major Macdonald and Kinloch Moidart were placed on the Scotch-gate, where they remained many years. A Highland regiment, in after times, passing through Carlisle, is said to have been halted on the Sands, without the gate, in order to avoid marching under these revolting mementos."² On the 21st of October six more suffered death at Brampton, and three days later five others were executed at Penrith. On the 16th of November, Sir Archibald Primrose and two others suffered the extreme penalty of the law at Gallows Hill. Such was the closing scene of the rebellion of 1745, as far as Carlisle was concerned, but for some years afterwards a garrison was maintained there, and "watch and ward" duly and regularly kept. The numerous prisoners who had escaped the fate of their companions in arms were detained in captivity till late in the spring of 1747, when they were sent off to the various seaports for transportation. From this period the historical proceedings of Carlisle settled down into mere annals, possessing little interest to engage the attention.

From the recital of deeds of war and violence, let us turn now to the records of peaceful industry, and see what progress the city of Carlisle has made since the energies of its inhabitants have been directed to such pursuits. The situation of the city affords every facility for the encouragement of manufactures, though we do not find any mention made of them previous to the year 1747, the year of the deportation of the prisoners of Prince Charles's army, except that of a manufactory of fustians, which was established here about the period of the Restoration. In 1747 some Ham-burgh merchants commenced the manufacture of wol-lens in the city, but after a few years, on the death of the leading partner, the concern was mismanaged, and soon ceased to exist. A few years afterwards an establishment for making coarse linens, and a new woollen manufactory were commenced, but with the like unsuccessful results. Shortly after this a public brewery is first mentioned. The cotton trade was subsequently introduced, and with the best results; the number of hands required for this branch of trade and the linen manufacture, which was equally successful, adding considerably to the population of the city and neighbourhood. Nor did the good effect produced end here. Many of the old houses were taken down and rebuilt in a superior style, the means of access to the city much improved, and greater facilities for traffic given to every one. In 1758 several hundred French prisoners were brought to Carlisle on parole, and by their expenditure in the city added considerably to its trade. We are also told that they introduced a more expensive style of living amongst the inhabitants. According to Jefferson, there were at this time only four private carriages in the city; and he gives the names of their owners: he adds that "about this period chaises were first kept at the inns." In 1761 calico printing was introduced by a Newcastle company, Scott, Laird, & Co. Cotton-spinning soon followed, and has continued to extend to our own days, affording employment to great numbers of the inhabitants. Iron and brass founding, and other branches of industry, were subsequently commenced. Power-looms have been recently introduced on a large scale. There are numerous cotton-mills; and one belonging to the Messrs. Dixon, by its extent, rivals some of the largest in Lancashire. The woollen manufacture is again "looking up," two large factories having lately been established. Carlisle is likewise noted for its extensive biscuit manufactories. One firm has obtained the royal appointment, and exports its goods to all parts of the world. Steady increase in material prosperity has been the characteristic of the city for a lengthened period; and the last ten years have witnessed great and important changes for the better in the old border city,—changes and improvements which are well described in the subjoined extract from the "Carlisle Examiner" of Tuesday, August 11th, 1857, and which, without further preface, we present to the reader:—

"There are few towns in England that have made more rapid strides in social and material advancement than Carlisle. In a single decade the face of the town has been almost entirely changed. Ten years ago green pastures basked in the sunshine and waved in the wind where now a city's population has taken up its abode, or pursues its ceaseless industry. Streets of houses, of massive form, with all the conveniences that modern art can suggest—with little gardens decked in the lovely hues of summer—have sprung up as residences for the merchant, the manufacturer, and the tradesman. Streets of houses, too, have been erected for the working man, in lieu of dingy alleys, creaking garrets, and fever-stricken yards. The clerk, the mechanic, and even the labourer, has had his dwelling improved, and now enjoys the freshness of the fields and the recreation derived from the cultivation of his little plot of garden ground.

"Ten years ago, this very summer, was begun one of the grandest works of which Carlisle can boast. Then was formed that deep basin on the top of Gallows Hill which has since continued to pour its cleansing streams of water, received from a source a mile distant, into the heart of our city, and thence pursuing its directed course to the farthest extremity. Before the lapse of many months the same city will have raised a stately monument to the memory of the man who, amongst other important public works, took the foremost part in providing for his fellow-townsmen one of the greatest benefits to a community—an abundant supply of water. But that supply, ample as it then was to meet all the wants of the town, became insufficient for the increased demand; and only during last spring, exactly ten years after the water works company commenced their operations, it was found necessary to lay down pipes of enlarged diameter to carry a more dense body of water through the streets.

"Ten years ago another great boon was conferred upon the city by the establishment of the gas works. Previous to that time the town was indifferently lighted by a private company carrying on business at the head of Brown's Row—on the ground now spanned by the railway arch at the south end of the Citadel Station. To say nothing of the reduction that was made in the rates charged upon consumers of gas, the facilities offered by the corporation, when the old company broke up and the new works were built under their direction, the benefits to private consumers and to the town especially, were most important. Since then the town has been well lighted on the whole; shopkeepers can afford to place flaming lights in their windows, and nearly the whole of the cottage property that has since been built is provided with gas. The dim light of a halfpenny candle is superseded by a flame that illumines the whole house, and at a much cheaper rate. The gas works themselves possess all the modern improvements for the manufacture of this indispensable element—certainly one of the most useful and important which the civilisation of the nineteenth century has produced. Originally provided with two large tanks, the town was well supplied with gas; but, as in the instance of the water works, these were in time found to be insufficient to meet the growing consumption, and two or three years ago, it was found necessary to lay down another gasometer capable of holding double the quantity of each of the others. But in addition to the benefit accruing from the formation of the gas works by the Corporation, their erection gave an impetus to the building trade in their immediate locality, and laid the foundation of one of the greatest improvements that has yet taken place in the city. This is the Nelson Bridge. Previous to the establishment of the gas house, the only means of communication between the east and west sides of the town—that is, between Botchergate, English-street, Scotch-street and Castle-street, and Caldewgate, was over the old bridge that spanned the Caldew. This route is to a great extent still adopted by the inhabitants residing in the last-named streets, and to them, therefore, the opening of a new road was not of much importance. But to the residents of Botchergate, and the extensive population that surround it, the inconvenience attending so circuitous a journey was very great. The opening out a new and direct road from Botchergate to Caldewgate was a desideratum the want of which had been long felt, and was at length obtained by the erection of the Nelson Bridge. The road once formed, houses rapidly sprung into existence, and the new town on the western bank of the Caldew may be said to owe its origin to the building of the bridge. This, however, was not all that the gas works produced. Three streets now radiate from the tall chimney that was called into being, where before there was nothing but the green fields and a dank reservoir to supply the gaol with water. At the end of one of these is the celebrated and extensive marble works of the Messrs. Nelson; opposite stands the equally well-known hattery of the Messrs. Carrick, which formerly stood on the other side of the dam course; in another of the streets may be heard the constant whirl of the steam saw as it divides the huge tree or the slim plank in one of the largest saw mills in the country; and on the other side of the same street is another of those wonderful biscuit manufactories the fame of whose productions has been wafted across the sea to the ends of the earth. Two thoroughfares diverge from the west end of Nelson Bridge. One leads to the little colony founded by the Cumberland Land Society on the Denton Holme property, and to the extensive and celebrated beetling works of Messrs. Ferguson Brothers; while it also furnishes a convenient route to the Cemetery. The other road is along Charlotte-street, at the end of which it is intersected by Milbourn-street, and the old road to the Holme Head.

Junction-street, opened out by the Messrs. Dixon, gives a direct communication with the Dalston road and Caldewgate. In this locality several manufactories have been erected. During the period mentioned Messrs. Dixon have laid alongside their great factory a commodious building in which several hundred power-looms give work to a large number of our population. Within a few yards from the place Messrs. Joseph Robinson and Co. have built a large flour mill and biscuit manufactory; and close adjoining is another tall chimney and a power-loom shed belonging to Messrs. John Ferguson and Co. In the immediate vicinity the enterprising firm of Messrs. Nelson have erected works of the most novel character—being no other than a manufactory where, by means of steam and the proximity of a railway, thousands of perforated bricks are daily finished and transported to their destination.

“Ten years ago, or a little more, two railways and a canal had their termini at Carlisle. The one railroad carried our citizens and their merchandise to the banks of coally Tyne; the other had only recently opened a direct route to Maryport and the west. The canal brought the bales of cotton for our manufacturers from Liverpool, our timber from Quebec and the Baltic, and transported the coals that came along the Newcastle line to Scotland and Ireland. Then was opened out one of the most prosperous railways in the kingdom,—the Lancaster and Carlisle—an “impracticable” scheme in its day, but its success has since belied the prophecy—and there rolled along it the traffic of the south. Next came another gigantic undertaking—the Caledonian Railway, which forded the Esk and gave a direct communication to the heart of Scotland. A direct line was then laid down from London to Edinburgh and Glasgow; into which ran the traffic of the north-west part of the island. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway next opened up another extensive district, and brought traffic to Carlisle, which thus found itself the centre of a net-work of railways. With the railways came improvements—one of the first of which was the clearing away of extensive blocks of old property. The Citadel Station reared its beautiful form amid the surrounding waste, and is now the radius of four lines of railway, and one of the most attractive features in the town. The canal has now been converted into a railway, and a new line diverges from it to the Solway.

“But to take five years from our decade, and what do we find? What has been pulled down and what built up? Some of the finest streets of houses have risen into shape and form since then; a first-class hotel stands on the site of a carrier’s warehouse; gentlemen's handsome villas overlook the Eden from overhanging banks; manufactories have been enlarged or rebuilt, and one of the most extensive locomotive building premises in the kingdom is now in course of erection at St. Nicholas, by the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway Company; chapels have been extended and repaired; handsome shops greet the eye at almost every step; one of the finest ecclesiastical structures in the country has been restored, if not to its original dimensions, at least to its pristine beauty; schools have been erected, and the benevolence of a single gentleman has sufficed to provide a home for the outcasts and wanderers amongst our juvenile population; the voluntary exertions of our citizens and neighbours will ere long result in the providing of a suitable Dispensary for the relief of the sick poor; the clay will this year be moulded for the bricks to be used in the erection of an asylum for the most helpless of God's creatures; and already has been laid down an extensive system of sewerage, which daily sweeps away, in its underground course, the filth of thirty thousand people.

"Over and above these multifarious works, which religion, philanthropy, or the requirements of commerce have called forth for the comfort and accommodation, the protection and occupation of the living, the last want of man here below has also been provided for. The grave has been closed that used to spread the seeds of disease among our population, and has been re-opened on a sunny hill far away from the din and bustle of the town. At Spital Moor, a mile and a half from the centre of the city, stands the Cemetery, which public decency demanded for the repose of the dead, as well as for the protection of the living. To this place hundreds of our citizens—some bound by the tenderest ties and others led by admiration of the lovely landscape that is unfolded to the view—take their summer evening ramble, rendered more pleasant and refreshing by the presence of rustic seats which the Burial Board have provided in different parts of the ground, and more easy of access by the footpath which has recently been made. Here are the graves of the unforgotten dead—for they are all new, and unfurrowed with age. It is a temple of Nature, but the footprints of Art are already traceable. It has none of that soft melancholy which lingers about older cemeteries—it is not shaded by trees, nor are its walks embowered by the majestic ivy or the enduring yew; but its broad expanse is turned to the open sky, and the graves are visited by the gentle sunshine and the refreshing shower. The warble of birds is not heard in the overhanging boughs; but the lark carols in the clear atmosphere above. There is not the mournful urn, or the storied monument, or the sculptured bust, that arrest the eye in other burial-grounds; but there is hardly a grave where a shrub or a flower is not planted to note that the hand of affection has been there. Simple headstones there are too—differing in design, but having a sameness in the general effect, from their uniform size; and there are four which may more appropriately be called monuments. One is a tapering pedestal surmounted by a cross, around which a wreath of evergreens is twined, to the memory of a loved child. Another, and the only one which has been erected some time, is dedicated to a man of genius—whose bones rest not there, but whose memory lives in his works,—the late Peter Nicholson; a third is a square pillar, with pointed summit, bearing the name and age of a worthy country gentleman,—the late Mr. John Dalton, of Cumsersdale; and the fourth, a newly-erected structure of filial affection, is one of the neatest little monuments in this locality. It is of Gothic style, and has a well-proportioned base, with a slender pillar and a cross. The monument is in a prominent position—being at one corner of the Roman Catholic ground—and has a striking effect. Of the two chapels and the curator's lodge it is sufficient to mention their general neat appearance; the continued absence of a chapel for the Roman Catholics; and take our departure from the place where

'Nature provides for all one common grave,
'The last retreat of the distressed and brave.'

Such is a resumé of the chief improvements that have been effected within the boundaries of our ancient city during a period of only ten years."

THE CATHEDRAL.

Twelve centuries have well nigh elapsed since St. Cuthbert, quitting his beloved Lindisfarne, visited Carlisle, and founded there a centre of Christian worship and teaching. Previous, however, to his time, the city possessed religious institutions, and there is little doubt that as soon as Christianity was planted in this part of the country, which was about the year 400, there was a church erected in Carlisle; tradition informs us that the site of this early church is that now occupied by the cathedral. During the Danish invasions, the religious edifices of our Saxon forefathers were completely destroyed, and lay in ruins for four centuries; nor were they restored till Saxon and Dane were alike brought under the yoke of the Norman conquerors of England.

The foundation of Carlisle cathedral is generally ascribed to Rufus, the second Norman king; but his premature death prevented him from completing the structure, a work reserved for his brother Henry I., who dedicated it to the Blessed Virgin in 1101, and attached to it a college of secular priests. Thirty years later Henry founded the bishopric; and, with the authority of the Pope, changed the secular priests into a college of regular monks of the order of St. Augustine. "We have very little means of knowing," says the present Bishop of London, "what was the extent of the buildings of the old Norman establishment. As to the form of the church, we can make a tolerably good conjecture. It was built of a white stone, now grey with age. Its nave, with arches such as we find in St. Mary's parish church, and windows such as are in the corner between the transept and the nave, must have extended into the site of Mr. Gipp's house, nearly the whole way to Paternoster-row. The north transept, now entirely gone, must have a good deal resembled the south transept now standing; and the choir probably was very short, not reaching so far as the present robing-room of the minor canons, that is, about the length of the present stalls. The conventional buildings would of course be on the south side, though what they were it is impossible to conjecture; for, as far as I am informed, not a single vestige of them now remains,—cloisters, chapter-house, frater, and prior's residence having been almost all rebuilt, it would appear, from the very foundation, in the following age."¹

In the reign of Henry III. it was thought expedient to rebuild and enlarge the choir. The style of architecture visible in the walls of the north and south aisles, with their windows and arcades, shows them to have been erected about the year 1250; and from the same data we may infer the erection of St. Catherine's Chapel, as well as the arch and pillar leading into the north transept, and the window over the door in the south transept, to have taken place at the same period. How far the work of enlargement proceeded we have no means of knowing; but a fire which broke out in 1292, and is said to have consumed many houses in the city, and greatly damaged the cathedral, no doubt interfered materially with the rebuilding of the church, and prevented for some time the completion of the works. During the reign of Edward I. the new north transept was finished, and the choir raised to the height of the triforium; the east end also was probably carried up to the same height. The four small windows at the eastern end of the aisles are also specimens of the style of architecture prevalent at this period.

From the time of the first Edward we hear no more of the cathedral of Carlisle till the episcopacy of Bishop Kirby, who, to secure a fund by means of which the rebuilding of the church might be proceeded with, appropriated for a time for this purpose the revenues of the churches of Sowerby and Addingham. But it was not till 1352 that the work prospered. Bishop Welton and his successor, Bishop Appleby, made every exertion to have the church finished, granting indulgences of forty days, upon the usual conditions, to those who should render aid; and we are told that the king, the principal families of the neighbourhood, and the public treasury of Carlisle, contributed to the work. To this period belong the fine east window, with its nine lights; the graceful triforium; the beautiful carving of the great arches, with their rich tracery of leaves and flowers, and the decorated windows of the clerestory; all of which mark the most beautiful period of Gothic architecture. In 1401 Bishop Strickland commenced the rebuilding of the central tower, a structure not at all in harmony with the splendour of the choir; and shortly afterwards some alterations were made in the north transept.

Little more was done to the building till near the beginning of the sixteenth century, when Thomas Gondibour was elected prior, who at once set about ornamenting the details of the building, and restoring whatever was decayed. The beautiful tabernacle work of the stalls is usually ascribed to him, but by some they are considered to be older. The grotesque paintings, at the back of the stalls, appear to have been executed under his direction; and the screens of St. Catherine's chapel, and others of similar workmanship, which once enclosed the centre of the choir from the stalls to the high altar, are said to have been erected by him. Dr. Tait says, "He probably inserted two very indifferently executed Perpendicular windows, one on the north, the other on the south side of the choir, for the purpose of admitting light to the part of the building in which the high altar, we may suppose at that time stood. . . . And now we have come to the last prior, who was not unwilling, at the bidding of Henry VIII. to become the first reformed dean. His initials, L. S., Lancelot Salkeld, you see on the screen, close below the pulpit to the north side, a somewhat remarkable piece of workmanship, speaking, when examined minutely, of the waning taste in architectural decoration."

From this time there is little to relate concerning the cathedral, and we may say it all in a few words. It suffered severely from the fanatical zeal of the first reformers, who thought they were doing a service when they were destroying the monuments which the piety of their ancestors had raised, and which for so many centuries had adorned the length and breadth of the land. Carlisle cathedral shared the fate of other churches; the monumental brasses were torn from the tombs, the stained glass of its windows destroyed, and the ornaments and images completely demolished. But the most serious blow was inflicted upon it by the orders of Cromwell during the Parliamentary wars. The damage done on this occasion can never be repaired. In contempt of the articles of capitulation, which stipulated that "no church should be defaced," more than two-thirds of the nave of the cathedral were pulled down, and the stones carried away to erect guardhouses, in different parts of the city, for the more effectual suppression of any feelings of attachment to royalty which might be supposed to linger in the breasts of the citizens. In 1745 the cathedral served as a prison to the unfortunate adherents of Prince Charles, and was much injured during the time they were detained there. The building having fallen into a very decayed state, it was found necessary to have it repaired, and this was done by the dean and chapter in 1764. On this occasion a new groined ceiling in plaster was put up, hiding completely the fine old timber roof; the fine screens which filled the spaces between the piers of the choir were removed, and others of much inferior workmanship placed in their stead. In the year 1852 the dean and chapter made an arrangement with the Cathedral Commissioners, by which they agreed to convey to the latter the estates of the chapter, and to receive a certain fixed income, with a suitable provision for the support of the establishment and the maintenance of the fabric of the cathedral. The Commissioners having caused a survey to be made by Mr. Christian, their architect, on his report determined to expend the sum of £15,000 upon the necessary repairs and improvements, including the purchase of the leasehold interests in two houses, the property of the dean and chapter, which had long been condemned by public opinion, as they concealed from view the matchless east window, and now stood in the way of the projected new entrance to the cathedral. In the autumn of 1853 the work of restoration was begun. The repair of the tower was the first work of the architect, and this was followed by the raising of the roof of what is left of the nave to its original height.

In its perfect state the cathedral of Carlisle must have presented a noble and imposing appearance, but the wars of the Commonwealth swept away its glories, and what is now remaining gives us only an imperfect notion of what the structure was previous to the time of Cromwell. The church is at present nearly surrounded by lofty lime trees, and being situated on the most elevated site in the city, is seen from a great distance on every side. It is, like the great majority of cathedral churches, a cruciform structure, consisting of nave, transepts, choir, aisles, and central tower, and its original length was about 330 feet.

The nave formerly extended 135 feet from the intersection of the transept, but 39 are all that now remain, the other 96 feet being destroyed during the civil wars. The original nave seems to have consisted of eight bays, six of which have been destroyed; the remaining two are in the Norman style, of a simple and massive character. The exterior of the nave is somewhat enriched, the windows having small detached shafts inserted at their sides for the springing of the arches, which have the zig-zag, billet, and other usual ornaments of this style. The interior of the nave is massive in its character. The main arches are circular, with plain architraves springing from immense piers, whose height is only fourteen feet, while their circumference is more than seventeen. Some of the capitals have the chevron and bell ornament, but others of them are plain. The fragment of the nave still standing has been galleried and pewed, and now serves as the parish church of St. Mary; the space formerly occupied by the remainder has been converted into a burial ground.

The transepts, which are without aisles, are 114 feet long by 28 broad, and consist of three stories. The south transept is in the same style as the nave, and is entered from the abbey by a richly decorated doorway, the capitals and arch mouldings of which are profusely decorated with foliage and figures, carved in the most beautiful manner; a gable rises over it, terminating in a cross; and on each side it is supported by strong buttresses, canopied and decorated with finely carved crockets. In this transept, on the eastern side, is a chapel dedicated to St. Catherine, but now used as a vestry for the choristers. This chapel was founded at an early period by John de Capella, a wealthy citizen, and endowed by him with certain rents, lands, and burghage houses. In the year 1366, a portion of its revenues being fraudulently retained, Bishop Appleby commanded the chaplain of St. Mary's and St. Cuthbert's to give public notice that the offenders were required to make restitution within ten days, on pain of excommunication. Its revenues, according to the King's Book, were valued at £3 2s. 8d. per annum. In this chapel is a large altar-tomb, ornamented on the sides with large quatrefoils, and supporting a figure of Bishop Barrow beneath a rich canopy, who, in his will, dated in 1420, bequeathed some plate to the cathedral, and £20 to a priest to sing masses in this chapel for the repose of his soul. The monument is well executed, and in a tolerable state of preservation. On the western side of the south transept, about a foot from the ground, there is a Scandinavian Runic inscription, which was discovered in 1855, soon after the recent restorations. The runes are of a slender character, and some are not over well defined. The Rev. Mr. Maughan, of Bewcastle, has suggested that the inscription might perhaps be read thus,—“Dolfin [raised] this stone in sorrow for the soul of his son.” Dr. Charlton is of opinion that the inscription is not sepulchral, but a simple whim of a workman, the signification being, “Tolfin made these marks on this stone.” There is but one other Danish inscription known to exist in England—one recently discovered in London; and as this in Carlisle is in great danger of being effaced and lost, it has been suggested that some means be taken for its protection and preservation. The screens here are ancient, and contain some curious tracery, with the initials of Prior Gondibour. In the south transept is a monument, erected by subscription, to the memory of Robert Anderson, the “Cumberland Bard,” a native of this city, and of humble birth. His songs in the Cumberland dialect are truthful as well as amusing delineations of rustic life as it still exists in this county. In the Norman part of the transept are two wells, from the presence of which it has been inferred that the cathedral served in times of pressing danger as a place of refuge as well as of devotion. The north transept, in its restored state, presents a fine example of the Early English style. The heavy Perpendicular tracery of the large window of this transept has been removed, and its place supplied by a very fine one of geometrical tracery, and with the best effect. Over this the newly-erected gable is pierced with a circular window of the same style, which has been fitted with stained glass, the gift of Mr. Scott, of Carlisle. In this transept is the altar-tomb of Prior Simon Senhouse, and in the west side of the same transept is a monumental window, erected by subscription, to the memory of the late chancellor of the diocese, the Rev. Walter Fletcher. This window contains a full-length portrait of the deceased in the attitude of prayer.

The choir, which is elegantly furnished for the cathedral service, is 138 feet in length, 72 feet in height, and 72 feet wide, inclusive of the aisles. It consists of eight bays, those at the several extremities being narrower than the rest, and the most easterly serving as a passage behind the communion table. The altar formerly stood two arches from the eastern end, and, for the purpose of throwing additional light upon it, had the narrow lancet-shaped windows in the corresponding division of the aisle displaced, on either side, by one large Perpendicular window; it was removed one pier nearer to the east end in the middle of the last century. The general style of this part of the edifice is Early English; at its junction with the transept the flat mouldings of the arches indicate an early period of that style, but towards the east it becomes more advanced, and the last division, with the whole of the eastern end, is in the Decorated style. “The east front,” says Rickman, “contains one of the finest, if not the finest, Decorated window in the kingdom. It is considerably decayed; but its elegance of composition and delicacy of arrangement, the harmony of its parts and the easy flow of its lines, rank it even higher than the celebrated west window of York Cathedral, which it also exceeds in the number of divisions.” This window fills up the whole space between two uncommonly bold buttresses, which rise to the ridge of the roof, where they are terminated with fine crocketed pinnacles; they have niches with enriched canopies, which have recently been filled with statues. The whole of the accessories, including the shafts, mouldings, and buttresses, are very chaste and beautiful. The aisles at the east end have each a fine small window of two lights, with rich tracery, deep mouldings, and clustered shafts. The south aisle has a low parapet supported by a range of brackets, and is flanked by two bold buttresses, which are crowned with fine pinnacles. The north aisle differs from the south, having its parapet carried higher, and partially enriched; its buttresses have no pinnacles, and do not reach to the parapet, but they are pannelled and have enriched canopies. At the north angle is a small octagonal turret.

The tower has an embattled parapet, with a small turret at its north-east angle, and previous to the Restoration had a leaden spire. This is the latest portion of the building, and appears to have been erected about three hundred years later than the nave. Between two small windows in the second floor is a niche containing an angel bearing a shield, as a pedestal for a statue, but there is nothing to show that it was ever occupied. The tower was thoroughly repaired during the recent restorations. Its height to the top of the vane is about 130 feet.

The interior appearance of the choir is very beautiful, and seldom if ever fails to excite the admiration of the beholder. The heavy screens which formerly stood betwixt its clustered pillars have been taken away, and the visitor has an uninterrupted view of the entire structure, exhibiting a lengthened array of massive columns, with their high overhanging roof “stretching in aisles majestic,” terminating in the glorious eastern window, with its slender mullions and delicate flowing tracery. It is in very truth—

"A dim and mighty minster of old time!
A temple shadowy with remembrances
Of the majestic past!"

The main arches of the choir are equilaterally pointed, and have a deep architrave consisting of various mouldings, enriched with the dog-tooth ornament, and finished with a dripstone, whose extremities are supported by a variety of heads. These arches spring from fine clustered piers of eight shafts, whose capitals are ornamented with foliage and grotesque figures, illustrative of domestic and agricultural pursuits, such as sowing, reaping, grape gathering, and the like. At the base of the piers on the south side, the foundations of the original Norman piers of the old choir may yet be traced. The arches of the clerestory have a pierced parapet ornamented with quatrefoils. Its windows, in each compartment, consist of three pointed arches, the centre one being carried higher than the other two; they are Early English windows, but are filled with tracery of the succeeding style, which nearly corresponds in every alternate group. The two Decorated windows of the clerestory in the most easterly bay of the choir are very curious, especially that on the north side, the arch of which, instead of being pointed, is elliptical, and its tracery is continued half way down the uprights. The Early English windows of the aisles are strangely diversified in their style, form, and arrangement; and not less so in the manner in which their workmanship is executed. The form which prevails in the north aisle is that of four long lancet arches of equal height, with rich mouldings. Of these the two middle ones have been pierced for windows. They have detached shafts, with bands and capitals between them, and the space between their heads is occupied by a quatrefoil panel. But there are singular variations from this form, and there are also some Decorated and Perpendicular insertions. Under these windows, against the wall, on both sides of the church, is a range of elegant small arches, with cinquefoil heads, and a series of deep and rich mouldings running round the cinquefoil, and springing from shafts which are generally detached, but towards the east end they form an integral part of the wall. Two crowned heads occur in the south-east corner of the building.

The lath and plaster ceiling of the choir of 1764 has been taken down, and the ancient and unique wagon-shaped ceiling, with its azure and gold decorations is once more displayed. A manuscript of the arms which originally were carved on the bosses is preserved in the Heralds' College; among them occur those of the ancient families of Percy, Warren, Montagu, Mortimer, Clifford, Greystoke, Beauchamp, Dacre, Musgrave, Fitz Hugh, Neville, Vaux, Curwen, Lamplugh, and Lowther, all of whom, there is little doubt, were benefactors of the cathedral. Under the great east window, a little to the south, is an ancient piscina, which was long built up, but has recently been restored. The stalls in the choir are composed of fine tabernacle work, supplied by Bishop Strickland, about the year 1401. They are ornamented with numerous niches, formerly filled with small statues, surmounted by canopies terminated with enriched pinnacles. The images were removed about 1649. The seats of the stalls are so constructed as to turn up, when they form small shelving seats called misericordes, and exhibit knots of very curious carving, in a great variety of grotesque designs. The door by which the choir is entered from the north aisle, is a fine, and the only remaining, example of the original screens of the choir. The upper part of it is filled with rich tracery, and on the lower panels are exhibited several profiles and other carved work skillfully executed. This screen bears the initials of Lancelot Salkeld, the last prior and first dean of Carlisle. The bishop's throne is a much more recent production; it is formed of oak, and though not splendid, is in keeping with the plainscotted screens which run round the more easterly part of the choir, and which were erected from a design furnished by Lord Camelford, nephew to Bishop Lytton, who formerly held the see. The whole design and appearance of the choir may be pronounced elegant; but that which contributes most to this effect is the great east window before alluded to. This beautiful structure, allowed to be the finest in the kingdom, consists of an equilateral pointed arch, divided by slender mullions into nine lights; the upper portion being filled with delicate flowing tracery, remarkable for its elegance and graceful arrangement. This tracery is filled with stained glass; but owing to its great elevation and the smallness of the figures, the subject depicted cannot be distinctly seen from below. It is thus described by Mr. Purday:—"The subject is the favourite one for such situations—the Last Resurrection and Judgment. In the uppermost compartment is a sitting figure of our Saviour surrounded by angels bearing the crown of thorns and other emblems of the Passion. Lower down are angels sounding trumpets, while on every side the dead are seen pushing aside the sculptured gravestone and rising from the tomb. Among them may be distinguished popes, kings, bishops, priests, &c. Two central compartments are occupied by the procession of the redeemed to the New Jerusalem.

The towers and gates of the city appear to the right guarded by angels; and the river of life flows under its walls. In the lowest central compartment is a representation of the punishment of the lost." It is understood that there is in the hands of the dean and chapter a fund, raised by subscription, sufficient to substitute stained glass of the richest character for the present plain glazing of the lower part of this splendid window, and the whole of the large window in the northern transept. When these improvements have been effected, the venerable cathedral church of Carlisle will bear a comparison with many of the more highly favoured minsters of England, and may be looked up to with no small feelings of pride by the natives of the ancient border city. A powerful organ has been placed over the north entrance to the choir, and has added materially to the solemnity and impressiveness of the daily services.

Among the ancient tombs in the choir and aisles of the cathedral, are two placed in low recesses in the wall of the north aisle, the arches of which are ornamented with very peculiar mouldings, in the form of the ragged staff. These are supposed to be the tombs of Bishop Welton, who died in 1362, and his successor, Bishop Appleby, who died in 1395. Under the next window, in a low arched recess, is a slab, supporting the figure of a bishop, now much decayed. This is said to be the monument of Bishop Strickland, who died in 1419. Speaking of this tomb, the Messrs. Lysons say, "The sides of the slab supporting the effigies are ornamented with foliage, like that of Bishop Kilkenny, in Ely Cathedral. It is much more ancient than 1419, and from the style of it, was probably designed for some bishop who died before the middle of the thirteenth century." This tomb, with the two just mentioned, having been opened, and the foliage removed, since 1808, the period at which Lysons visited Carlisle, it is impossible now to judge from its style of the accuracy of the deduction then made, but if it be correct, the tomb in question may probably be that of Bishop Halton, who died in 1324, and is said to have been buried in the north aisle of the cathedral. About half-way up the north aisle is the last resting place of Archdeacon Paley; a small brass plate let into the stone, and a small marble slab upon the wall, bearing his name, and the date of his decease, are all that mark the place of his interment. In the south aisle, near the vestry, in an arched recess, is the tomb of Sir John Skelton, Knight. In the middle of the choir, between the pews, there is a fine example of the monumental brasses so much in use during the fourteenth century. It marks the last resting place of Bishop Bell, who, after presiding over the see for eighteen years, resumed the monastic habit, and died in the year 1496. The monument consists of a large slab of blue marble, on which is the representation in brass of a bishop, in his pontifical vestments, with a book in his right hand, and a crosier in his left. This tomb has been well preserved, but since the removal of the litany desk, which formerly stood at its head, it has been much worn, in consequence of persons walking over it, and, unless some means be taken for its preservation, the inscription upon it will soon become illegible.¹ A small monumental brass plate, in memory of Bishop Henry Robinson, is preserved. He was a native of this city, and died of the plague in 1601. It is a finely engraved copy from the original plate in the chapel of Queen's College, Oxford, and was presented to this cathedral by his brother. It is finely engraved; the bishop is represented in his episcopal robes, kneeling, with one hand supporting a crosier, the other holds a lighted candle, and a cord, to which three dogs are attached, who appear guarding sheepfolds from the attack of wolves. Below the candle is a group of figures, bearing implements of agriculture and peaceful industry; near their feet is a wolf playing with a lamb, and various warlike instruments scattered and broken. Each part is illustrated with appropriate Greek and Latin sentences. At the bottom of the plate is a Latin inscription, to this effect. "To Henry Robinson, of Carlisle, D.D., a most careful provost of Queen's College, Oxon, and afterwards a most watchful bishop of this church for eighteen years, who, on the 13th calend of July, in the year from the delivery of the Virgin, 1616, and of his age, 64, devoutly resigned his spirit unto the Lord. Bernard Robinson, his brother and heir, set up this memorial as a testimony of his love."² This plate was discovered in taking down the hangings and ornaments of the high altar, in the middle of the last century; it is now fixed in the wall of the north aisle of the choir. In the choir towards the altar, is a flat stone, inscribed to the memory of the munificent Bishop Smith, who died in 1702; at the head of the stone is a shield charged with his armorial bearings, and followed by a Latin inscription. Against a pillar, behind the pulpit, is a beautiful monument, to the memory of Bishop Law—above the tablet is the figure of Religion resting upon the mitre, and supported by the cross. Bishops Ralph de Irton, who died in 1292; John de Kirkby, who died in 1352; John Best, who died in 1570; John Mey, who died in 1597, and Richard

² This plate is engraved in Jefferson's "History of Carlisle," p. 130.

Senhouse, who died in 1626, were all buried in the cathedral, but their tombs cannot now be identified. There are in the transepts and other parts interesting monuments or tablets to the memory of the following: Bishop Fleming, who died in 1747; his son, Archdeacon Fleming, who died in 1742; Thomas Wilson, D.D., fourteen years dean of the cathedral, who died in 1778; Sir J. D. A. Gilpin, Knt., inspector of hospitals and an alderman of this city, who died in 1834, and Hugh James, M.D., who died in 1817.

On the screens behind the stalls of the choir are a number of curious paintings, of great age, and rude execution, said to be the gift of Prior Gondibour. They occupy the spaces between several of the arches. Three of them are the legends of the saints, Anthony, Cuthbert, and Augustine; as related by the early chroniclers. A fourth is intended to represent the twelve apostles. The rhymes describing the different stages of the life of each saint as pictured below, are as rude as the paintings, and are said to have been written by Prior Senhouse. These paintings were long concealed by a covering of whitewash, which was removed by Dean Percy.

Among the relics of antiquity yet remaining in the cathedral, the most remarkable is the cornu eburneum, or ivory horn, which is said to have been given to the priory in the twelfth century, instead of a written document, as evidence of certain grants made by Henry I. It was originally mounted with some precious metal, the whole of which has now disappeared. There are also two copes, used in the cathedral before the Reformation. One of these is of embroidered silk, with a broad border of needlework, in which are representations of several saints of the church; the other is of crimson velvet, richly wrought with gold, and having a gold border. These copes are in a decayed state, and have been deprived of some of the ornaments with which they were formerly enriched.

In addition to St. Catherine's Chapel above alluded to, the cathedral comprised two chantries, those of St. Roch and St. Cross, the former of which was founded in the year 1422, by Bishop Whelpdale, who, at his death, left the sum of £200 for the purpose of founding and endowing a chantry for the celebration of masses for the repose of the souls of Sir Thomas Skellory, Knt., and Mr. John Glaston, two of his intimate friends, who were buried in the cathedral. Nicolson and Burn consider it probable that this was the chantry of St. Roch; its revenues were valued at £2 14s. per annum. There was another chantry, that of St. Cross, but we possess no record of the date at which, or the person by whom it was founded. It was granted by Edward VI., with all messuages, lands, tenements, profits, and hereditaments belonging thereto, valued at £3 19s. per annum, to Henry Tanner and Thomas Bucher.

ANNALS OF THE BISHOPS.

On the foundation of the see, in 1133, Athelwald, a Saxon, and prior of St. Mary's, was appointed the first bishop. He appears to have been also prior of St. Oswald's, at Nostell, in Yorkshire, and the king's confessor; and in 1136 his name occurs as a witness to a charter of King Stephen. The churches of Wetheral, Warwick, and other places, having been granted to the abbey of St. Mary, at York, Athelwald confirmed this grant, stipulating, however, that the abbot and convent should take care that the cure of souls in those places should not be neglected, but that a decent maintenance should be allowed to the clergymen whom they were bound to provide. This prelate died in 1155.

Bernard, the second bishop, was consecrated in 1157, and in 1169 officiated at the dedication of the church of St. Mary Magdalen, at Lanercost. He died in 1186, and the see remained vacant for thirty-two years. We find, however, that King John granted it in 1200 to the Archbishop of Slavonia, who was succeeded in the following year by Alexander de Lacy; but the next regular bishop was

Hugh de Bello Loco, abbot of Batele, in Sussex, who was elevated to the see in 1218. Two years later his name occurs as making grants to the abbey of St. Mary, at York, and to the monks of Wetheral. This prelate appears to have stood high in the estimation of his sovereign, Henry III., who requested the Pope to restore the rectories of Penrith, Newcastle, Corbridge, and Whittingham, to the see of Carlisle. He also appears as one of the suttees of Henry III. for the due performance of engagements which that monarch had entered into with the King of Scotland. This bishop died at the abbey of La Ferte, in Burgundy, and was succeeded by

Walter Maleclerk, who was consecrated in 1223, and received the temporalities of the bishopric on the 26th of October in the same year. In 1230 Henry III. granted the manor of Dalston to Walter and his successors, bishops of Carlisle. Two years later the same king, by charter, made this prelate treasurer of his exchequer, an office which the bishop retained but a short time, though he had been appointed for life. In 1234 he was instrumental in effecting the contract entered into between the king and the daughter of the Earl of Winchester, and subsequently we find his name as a witness to the great charter. In 1239 he was appointed catechist to Prince Edward, and in 1243 was joined in commission with the Archbishop of York and William de Cantelupe as lords-justices of the realm in the king's absence. He held the office of sheriff of Cumberland for the space of ten years. In 1246 he resigned his see, and became a Dominican friar at Oxford, where he died in 1248.

Silvester de Everdon, archdeacon of Chester, was consecrated bishop of Carlisle in 1246, on the resignation of Walter Malclerk, and in the following year confirmed the grants of his predecessors to the abbey of St. Mary, at York. He was afterwards made Lord High Chancellor. In 1253 Bishop de Everdon supported the Archbishop of Canterbury and others in their opposition to the king, who wished to encroach upon the liberties and privileges of the church. Two years afterwards the bishop died in consequence of a fall from his horse, his successor being Thomas Vipont, or de Veteripont, of the family of the earls of Westmoreland, who was consecrated in 1255. This bishop only held the see for a year, dying in 1256.

Robert de Cheverel, or de Chauncy, called by Leland the Queen's chaplain, was the next occupant of the see, to which he was elevated in 1258. He appears to have been for some time engaged in an unhappy controversy with the sheriff of Cumberland, although he himself filled the office for two years. On his demise, in 1278, William de Rotherfeld, dean of York, was nominated, but he refused the proffered elevation, and the prior and convent elected

Rodolph, or Ralph de Ireton, prior of Gisborne, who was consecrated in 1280. This bishop, who was of a Cumberland family, was a firm defender of all ecclesiastical rights, nor could he be deterred from upholding those rights and privileges by any person, however high his rank or station. In 1281 he maintained a suit against Sir Michael de Hercla, by which he recovered the manor and church of Dalston. He also strove to obtain the tithes of newly-cultivated lands within Inglewood Forest, which he held to have been granted to the church of Carlisle, by Henry I. "who enfeofed the same per quoddam cornu eburneum." This suit was decided against the bishop, and the tithes were adjudged to the king, Edward I., who subsequently granted them to the prior and convent. Bishop de Ireton was called upon to take part in the various events which occurred in the country during the time he held the see of Carlisle. He was joined in commission with the Bishop of Caithness, to collect tenths within the kingdom of Scotland; and in 1291 was a confidential commissioner to the English monarch for adjusting the claims to the Scottish crown. He was also one of the plenipotentiaries empowered to contract Prince Edward in marriage with Queen Margaret of Scotland. He died at Linstock, March the 1st, 1292, and was succeeded by John de Halton, canon of Carlisle, who was elected on the 9th of the following May. The powers granted to his predecessor seem to have been continued to Bishop de Halton, who took an active part in Scottish affairs. He was present when Baliol was adjudged the rightful claimant for the Scottish throne, in 1292, and five years afterwards witnessed Robert Bruce swear fealty to Edward at Carlisle. In 1302 Bishop Halton was appointed governor of the castle of Carlisle, and had the custody of the Scottish prisoners and hostages. Three years afterwards his name occurs as one of the petitioners for the canonisation of Thomas de Cantelupe, bishop of Hereford; and in 1307 we find him entertaining the English monarch and his retinue for six days at Linstock Castle. Next year he was summoned to attend the coronation of Edward II. In 1314 he was summoned to a parliament at Westminster, but not being able to answer the summons, in consequence of Carlisle Castle being blockaded by the Scots under Edward Bruce, he was obliged to request the rectors of Levington and Brough-under-Stanemore, to appear for him, and to excuse his personal attendance on account of the position in which he was placed, and the troubles in which his diocese was involved. This prelate died in November, 1324, and William Ayreyn, canon of York was elected, but the pope appointed.

John de Rosse, canon of Hereford, who, in 1330, was summoned to appear before the papal delegate, the prior of Durham, to answer charges preferred against him by the prior and convent of Carlisle, for interfering with their peaceable enjoyment of several churches appropriated to them, as likewise for his seizure of their rents, which he disposed of as he thought fit. This bishop subsequently excommunicated the prior for neglecting to pay some tenths that were in his hands. He died at Rose, in 1332.

John de Kirkeby, prior of St. Mary's, Carlisle, and the next bishop, was invested with the temporalities of his diocese by the king, on the 8th of May, 1332. This prelate, says Hutchinson, "came to his episcopacy in a most unhappy era, both in regard to the public troubles and agitations in the state, and the litigious and unhappy disposition of the clergy. He was continually subject to alarms from the Scots, in consequence of the king of England's unfortunate expeditions and unsuccessful arms; and, added to this, he had gained the hatred and contempt of that people before his advancement to the see: so that, it is said, his ordinations were held in very distant parts of the kingdom, and he was frequently out of this diocese; and to render his life still more distressful, he was involved in innumerable suits with his clergy." Passing through Penrith, in the spring of 1337, he was attacked by a band of ruffians, and several of his retinue were severely wounded. In the same year he was not able to raise the tenths, in consequence of most of his clergy having fled from the Scots, and was obliged to certify to the barons of the exchequer to that effect. In October the Scots burnt Rose, and devastated the surrounding country. In 1341 he received £200 from the receiver of the royal funds, to pay the men whom he had in his service for the safe keeping of the western marches. Two years later he was appointed one of the commissioners to treat with others from Scotland, to settle and preserve peace and commerce, and in the following year was required to assist Edward Baliol, king of Scotland, who had been appointed by Edward III. captain-general of all his forces in the north. In 1348 he received instructions to convey the Princess Joan to her husband, she having been betrothed to Alphonus, king of Castile. He died in 1352, when John de Horn-castle, prior of Carlisle, was elected, but he was set aside by the pope, and the see given to

Gilbert de Wilton, in 1353. Shortly after his elevation, Bishop de Wilton assembled the clergy of his diocese, for the purpose of obtaining a subsidy, which was at once granted, and amounted to 200 marks. He was one of the commissioners appointed by the king to treat for the ransom of King David of Scotland, and for the establishment of peace between the two nations. In 1359 he was joint warden of the western marches with Thomas de Lucy; and subsequently, as one of the commissioners, took part in the treaties which acknowledged David as king of Scotland, and renounced the claims of the English monarchs to the sovereignty of that country. As we learn from his registers, this bishop took great interest in the repair of public bridges, and the erection and adornment of churches and monasteries. After a life of great usefulness, he died in 1362.

Thomas de Appleby, canon of Carlisle, was the next occupant of the see, being consecrated at Avignon, on the 18th of June, 1364. In 1365, he, amongst other prelates, took an oath in the king's presence, at Westminster, "to keep and observe inviolably all the articles of peace lately concluded and agreed upon by his majesty and the French king." Two years afterwards, he received a joint commission with Roger de Clifford, Anthony de Lucy, and Ralph de Dacre, for the wardenship of the western marches. In 1369, in obedience to the king's writ, the bishop ordered the rural dean of Cumberland to summon all the abbots, priors, and other religious and ecclesiastical persons, to array all the men capable of bearing arms, between the ages of sixteen and sixty, apprehensions being entertained of a French invasion; and in the same year he was again appointed to the wardenship of the western marches, in conjunction with Roger de Clifford, Thomas de Musgrave, and others. In 1373 Bishop de Appleby, with the Bishop of Durham, Edward Mortimer, Earl of March, and other noblemen, were appointed to hear and determine all complaints and causes of action upon the borders; and they were required to see satisfaction made for injuries done by any of the king's subjects. In 1384, during the reign of Richard II. the Bishop of Carlisle, the Bishop of Durham, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord of Raby, and the Sub-dean of York, were appointed special commissioners and ambassadors, to treat with the King of Scotland, for a truce between the two kingdoms, and for the adjusting of all differences on the borders. Eight years after this, the bishop was again appointed a commissioner, to see executed "that part of a late treaty of peace, concluded with the French king, which related to the kingdom of Scotland." This prelate died in 1395, and William Strickland was chosen to succeed him, but was set aside by the pope in favour of

Robert Reade, who was translated from the see of Waterford and Lismore, in Ireland, in 1376, and obtained the royal warrant for all the mesne profits of the see, from the demise of Bishop de Appleby. He was translated to Chichester in the course of the same year, and was succeeded by

Thomas Merkes, who was invested with the temporalities of his see by Richard II., and received a provision from the pope in 1397. From the will of the unfortunate Richard we learn that Bishop Merkes was one of the five prelates whom that monarch numbered amongst his executors, and to whom he bequeathed a gold ring of the value of £20. It is a remarkable fact that the Bishop of Carlisle is the only bishop who is recorded to have taken letters of protection from Richard, and placed himself under an obligation to personally attend the king towards the coast of Ireland. On the removal of Richard, Bishop Merkes remained faithful to the fallen monarch, and in the first parliament courageously showed his attachment by speaking in favour of the deposed king. For this he was accused of high treason in January, 1400, and was soon after deprived of his see, and committed a prisoner to the Tower. On the 23rd of the following June, the bishop was placed in the custody of the Abbot of Westminster, in whose community he had formerly been a monk, and on November 28th received the king's pardon, and was set at liberty. In consequence of his "notable poverty," he was allowed to receive from the pope, who had conferred upon him the title of Bishop of Samothrace, ecclesiastical benefices to the value of 200 marks, which the king increased to 300. He held the vicarage of Sturminster, in Dorsetshire, and, in 1404, the Abbot of Westminster bestowed upon him the rectory of Todenham, in Gloucestershire. It is probable he died in the latter place about the end of the year 1409.

William Strickland was the next prelate appointed to the see of Carlisle. He was elected in 1399, consecrated at Cawood by the Archbishop of York, August 24th, 1400, and received the temporalities of his see on the 15th of the following November. Bishop Strickland was a devoted adherent of Henry IV., from whom he received a commission to arrest all those persons in the diocese of Carlisle "who should assert that Richard II. was still alive, and abiding in the parts of Scotland." In 1406, the Bishop of Carlisle was one of the prelates that signed and sealed the act of succession, by which the crowns of England and France were entailed upon the king's four sons. The erection of the tower and belfry of the cathedral is ascribed to this prelate, as is also the tabernacle work in the choir, and the covering of the spire on the tower with lead. He built the tower at Rose Castle, called Strickland's tower, and constructed a watercourse from the river Petteril through the town of Penrith. A chantry in the church of St. Andrew, in the same town, is likewise of his foundation. He died on the 30th of August, 1419, after an episcopacy of twenty years, and was buried in his cathedral. His successor was Roger Whelpdale, provost of Queen's College, Oxford, who was consecrated by the Bishop of London in 1420, and had restitution of the temporalities on the 12th of March, in the following year. This prelate, who was a native of the county, having been born at or near Grey-stoke, did not long enjoy his elevation to the episcopate, for he died in London on the 4th of February, 1422, and by his will ordered his body to be interred in St. Paul's Church, in that city, leaving £200 for the foundation and endowment of a chantry in his cathedral of Carlisle. Bishop Whelpdale was a learned man, and well versed in the literature of the period in which he lived. His works are a book with the title De invocato Deo, and some treatises on logic and mathematics.

William Barrow, bishop of Bangor, was the next occupant of the see of Carlisle, to which he was translated on the death of Bishop Whelpdale, and received the temporalities on January the 16th, 1423. In 1429 his name occurs among the bishops who protested against Cardinal Beaufort appearing at Windsor, on Saint George's day, as prelate of the order of the garter, in right of his bishopric of Winchester. In the July following he bore a joint commission with the earls of Northumberland and Salisbury, on behalf of the King of England, for the truce concluded with Scotland, at Harden Stank. He died at Rose Castle, the seat of the bishops of Carlisle, on September 4th, 1429, and was buried in the chapel of St. Catherine in his cathedral church. His successor was Marmaduke Lumley, archdeacon of Northumberland, who was raised to the see in 1430, and received restitution of the temporalities on April the 15th, 1431. In 1433 he was licensed to attend the Council of Basil, the eighteenth general council, and two years later was appointed one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots. During the episcopacy of Bishop Lumley, the diocese suffered so severely from the ravages of the Scots, that the bishop could not obtain wherewithal to support the dignity of his office, and in order to enable him to do this, an application was made to the throne, in consequence of which a royal grant was issued in June, 1441, by which the churches of Caldbeck and Rothbury were annexed to the see for ever. These appropriations, however, did not take place, and the two churches are to this day rectorial. Bishop Lumley, who was of the noble family of Lumley, in the county of Durham, filled the offices of lord treasurer, lord chancellor, and chancellor of Cambridge University. He was translated to Lincoln in 1449, when

Nicholas Close, archdeacon of Colchester, and one of the king's chaplains, was appointed bishop, receiving restitution of the temporalities on the 14th of March in the following year. In 1451, he, with the Bishop of Durham and others, was commissioned to superintend "the conservators of the truce and wardens of the marches, and to punish their negligence and irregularities." In 1452 he was one of a commission appointed to receive the homage of James, earl of Douglas, and all other Scottish noblemen who should apply for that purpose. These are the notices of this prelate that occur during the time that he filled the see of Carlisle. He was translated to Lichfield and Coventry in 1452, and was succeeded by William Percy, a son of the Earl of Northumberland, and a prebendary of York, Lincoln, and Salisbury, who was invested with the temporalities of his bishopric on the 24th of October, 1452, and, though he held the see for ten years, nothing is on record respecting him, except that he was chancellor of Cambridge. He died in 1462.

John Kingscotes, archdeacon of Gloucester, was elected by the chapter bishop of Carlisle on the demise of Bishop Percy, but he only held the see one year, dying on the 16th December, 1463, when

Richard Scrope, rector of Fen-Ditton, Cambridgeshire, succeeded to the vacant mitre. Nothing whatever is recorded of this prelate, except the dates of his elevation and decease; the latter event occurring on the 10th of May, 1463; his successor was Edward Story, chancellor of Cambridge, who being elected by the chapter and approved of by the pope, had restitution of the temporalities on September 1st, 1468. Three years later we find his name among those of the prelates and chief of the nobility who took an oath of fealty to Edward V., then Prince of Wales; and shortly afterwards, he, with the Bishop of Durham, the earl of Northumberland, and others, was appointed a commissioner to treat with those of Scotland at Alnwick, and the year following at Newcastle; and in 1473 at either of these places or any other place. In 1474 he again appears as a commissioner in the treaty of marriage between the Prince of Scotland and the Princess Cicely, daughter of Edward IV. Three years later he was translated to Chichester, where he died in 1502.

Richard Bell, prior of Durham, was the next prelate, being elevated to the see in 1478, shortly after the translation of Bishop Story. While prior of Durham, he was several times in the commissions of Edward IV., on treaty with the king of Scots. All that we learn of him during his episcopacy is, that he built the tower at Rose Castle, which still bears his name. He died in 1496, and was interred in the middle of the choir of his cathedral, where a monumental brass still recalls his memory, and requests a prayer for the repose of his soul. His successor,

William Sever, abbot of St. Mary's, at York, was shortly afterwards elected, and received restitution of the temporalities of his see on the 11th of December, in the same year, when he also received a license to hold his abbacy in commendam, and was included in a commission with the Bishop of Durham and others, to treat about the marriage of the king's daughter, Margaret, with James IV. of Scotland. The following year his name occurs as one of the royal plenipotentiaries in a general treaty between the English and Scottish monarchs. In 1499 Bishop Sever's services were again brought into requisition, and he was appointed one of the conservators of the truce, which had just been agreed upon between the kings of England and Scotland. Three years later he was translated to Durham, and crated on the 1st of September, 1503, and received restitution of the temporalities on the 15th of the following October. He was a native of Westmoreland, and was educated at Cambridge, where he became master of Pembroke Hall. Little is known of him, and even the year of his demise is uncertain. His will, in which he expresses a wish to be buried in St. James's Hospital, near Charing Cross, London, bears date July 17th, 1507; but, whether he died in that year or the following one we have no means of ascertaining.

John Penny, bishop of Bangor, was translated to the see of Carlisle by a papal rescript, bearing date, Rome, September 21st, 1508; and on the 23rd of the following January he made his promise of canonical obedience to his metropolitan, the Archbishop of York. He held the see for twelve years, dying in 1520, and the following year

John Kite, archbishop of Armagh, in Ireland, was translated to the vacant bishopric, when he relinquished the primacy of Ireland, but was appointed archbishop of Thebes, in Greece. Cardinal Wolsey and he appear to have been intimate friends; and it is to the influence of the former that Bishop Kite is said to owe the alterations in his preferments. Jefferson informs us that the fees of the translation of this prelate, "with the commendams for Carlisle and his other benefices, amounted to 1890 ducats. But the cardinal successfully pleaded for the remission of 270 ducats." Bishop Kite, in 1524, was appointed by Henry VIII. as one of his commissioners to meet those of the King of Scotland, concerning a cessation of hostilities; and two years later, he, in conjunction with Ralph, Earl of Westmoreland, and others, was named as a plenipotentiary to conclude a treaty of peace with the Scottish monarch. In 1529 a document having been signed by several of the English bishops, approving of the reasonableness of the scruples of Henry VIII. in the matter of his marriage with Catharine of Arragon, and advising that the case should be laid before the Holy See for speedy settlement, Bishop Kite's name appears among the subscribers. In the following year he was one of the four bishops, who, with Cardinal Wolsey, Archbishop Warham, and the majority of the English nobility, addressed Pope Clement VII., on the question of the king's divorce. In 1536 his name again occurs in the history of the period. He appears to have been much attached to the old religion, and zealously assisted his metropolitan, the Archbishop of York, in opposing the innovations proposed by Cramer, in the convocation of the clergy. During his occupation of the see he made several additions to the episcopal residence at Rose, and otherwise improved it. He died in London, on the 19th of June, 1537, and was buried in Stepney Church. He was succeeded the same year by

Robert Aldrich, provost of Eton College, and canon of Windsor. This prelate, who was a native of Burnham, in Buckinghamshire, received his early education at Eton, and in 1507 became scholar of King's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. In 1529 he became B.D. at Oxford, and was subsequently advanced to the dignity of D.D. Among his contemporaries he appears to have been eminent as an orator and poet; and, in conjunction with Cranmer and others, wrote the work commonly called the "Bishop's Book." He performed the duties of chaplain and almoner to Lady Jane Seymour, queen of Henry VIII. and mother of Edward VI. Although he held this office, Bishop Aldrich was, nevertheless, a firm supporter of the tenets of the old religion, and, in 1540, was consulted by the king on the teaching of the church with respect to the seven sacraments. When Cranmer strove to propagate the new doctrines, he met with the most determined opposition from the Bishop of Carlisle, who clung to the ancient faith in its entirety during the whole of his life. He died in 1555, and

Owen Oglethorpe, dean of Windsor, was appointed his successor, in October, 1556; but the papal confirmation did not arrive until the 28th of the following January. This prelate was born at Newton Kyme, near Tadcaster, in Yorkshire, and becoming a member of Magdalen College, Oxford, was made proctor of that university in 1531. Four years afterwards, having attained the degree of B.D., he was chosen president of his college, and was elected vice-chancellor in 1551. He was shortly afterwards appointed first canon and then dean of Windsor, and in the first year of the reign of Queen Mary became secretary of the Order of the Garter. In 1554 a public disputation on the mass was held at Oxford, at which Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer stated their opinions, and were opposed by several members of the ancient faith, among whom Bishop Oglethorpe stands conspicuous. Two years after this he was raised to the see of Carlisle, as above stated. When Queen Elizabeth ascended the throne, in 1558, she at once proceeded to reintroduce Protestantism, and to put down the religion which Queen Mary had restored. One of the first indications of this change was her command to the Bishop of Carlisle not to elevate at mass the consecrated host; a command with which the bishop refused compliance, adding, at the same time, "My life is the queen's, but my conscience is my own." Suspecting the queen's intentions from this prohibition, the English bishops publicly declared that they could not, in conscience, administer the coronation oath, and refused, therefore, to assist at the forthcoming ceremony. This announcement greatly embarrassed the court; but at length Bishop Oglethorpe was induced to separate himself from his colleagues, and the coronation was performed. The services of the Bishop of Carlisle were, however, soon forgotten; for refusing, in common with the other members of the English episcopacy, with the exception of the Bishop of Llandaff, to take the oath of supremacy, he was deprived of his see in 1559, when it was offered to Bernard Gilpin, rector of Houghton-le-Spring, in the county of Durham, but by him declined.

John Best, prebendary of Wells, and the first Protestant bishop, was consecrated on the 2nd of March, 1560. He was a native of Yorkshire, and received his education at Oxford, but embracing the principles of the Reformers, was obliged to live retired during the reign of Mary. In 1564 he received a commission from Elizabeth, by which he was empowered to arm himself and his dependents; a measure deemed necessary in consequence of the unsettled and turbulent state of the diocese. Nothing further is recorded of this prelate, whom Fuller speaks of as "a grave and learned divine." He died on the 22nd of May, 1570, and was buried in Carlisle Cathedral. His successor was

Richard Barnes, who came to the see in the same year. This prelate was born at Warrington, in Lancashire, and entering Brazenose College, Oxford, received there his degree of M.A. in 1556. He became B.D. at Cambridge, and, in 1561, was made chancellor and prebendary of York, and subsequently styled Bishop of Nottingham. When raised to the see of Carlisle he was allowed to retain in commendam his stall and dignities at York, for one year after his consecration. In 1577 he was translated to Durham, and John Mey, prebendary of Ely, was appointed to the vacant bishopric, having previously been master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and vice-chancellor of that university, for which he appears to have procured a new body of statutes. He held the see of Carlisle for twenty years, and fell a victim to the plague in 1597, being buried in his cathedral church on the evening of the same day on which he died.

Henry Robinson, provost of Queen's College, Oxford, was the next bishop. He was a native of Carlisle, where he was born in the year 1556. At an early age he entered the University of Oxford, and making great proficiency in his studies, soon became a fellow, attaining a high character as a preacher. In his twentieth year, having just taken his master's degree, he was chosen principal of Edmund Hall, and in 1581 was unanimously elected provost of Queen's College, an office which he held for eighteen years, during which time the college enjoyed a high degree of prosperity. He was also chaplain to Archbishop Grindall. On the 27th of May, 1598, he was chosen to fill the see of Carlisle, was consecrated on the 23rd of the following July, and in the next year named one of the royal commissioners for ecclesiastical causes. From the records of the exchequer we learn that, in 1613 Bishop Robinson filed a bill in that court against George Denton, of Cardew Hall, who had refused all suit to his lordship's court, and having obtained a decree in his favour, secured thereby the rights and privileges of the see of Carlisle. This prelate died, it is supposed, of the plague, at Rose Castle, on the 19th of June, 1616, and was interred the same night in his cathedral church, where a mortuary brass, on the wall of the north aisle of the choir, still perpetuates his memory. Bishop Robinson's character as a scholar stood high amongst his contemporaries. He took part in the conferences held at Hampton Court, and is said to have been held in great estimation by Queen Elizabeth. His successor was

Robert Snowdon, prebendary of Southwell, who was consecrated on November 24th, 1616, in York Minster, by Archbishop Matthews. He only held the see for a little more than four years, dying in London, in May, 1621. Of the incidents of his episcopate we have nothing recorded. In the following September, Richard Milbourne, bishop of St. David's, was translated to Carlisle, which he held till 1624, when he died, leaving a bequest for the endowment of a school and the foundation of an hospital. This prelate was born at Utterbank, in Gilsland. Previous to his promotion to the see of St. David's, he had been respectively vicar of Sevenoaks, in Kent, and dean of Rochester.

Richard Senhouse, dean of Gloucester, the next bishop, was of an old Cumbrian family, the Senhouses of Nether Hall, on whom he reflected the greatest credit by his talents and abilities. Having entered as a student in Trinity College, Cambridge, he shortly afterwards removed to St. John's, where he gained a fellowship, and took his degree of D.D., in 1622. He served as chaplain to the Earl of Bedford, Prince Charles, and subsequently to James I., the latter of whom gave him the deanery of Gloucester. He had the reputation of a great preacher, and was styled the "Cambridge Chrysostom." He was killed by a fall from his horse, on the 6th of May, 1626, and was interred in Carlisle Cathedral. The Dean of Carlisle,

Francis White, was his successor, being consecrated bishop on the 3rd of the following December. He however, only continued at Carlisle till the 9th of February, 1628, when he was translated to Norwich, and Barnabas Potter, provost of Queen's College, Oxford, appointed bishop. He was consecrated in London, on the 15th of March, 1628. This prelate was born at Kendal, or, as Atkinson says, in Winstler Chapelry, in 1577, of poor but respectable parents. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he took the degree of D.D. in 1615, and the following year was elected provost, an office which he held for about ten years. He was chaplain to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles I., by whom he was much esteemed. Bishop Potter died at his lodgings in Covent Garden, in January, 1642, the fourteenth year of his episcopate, and was buried in St. Paul's Church, Covent Garden, where the monument erected to his memory, with the sacred edifice, was destroyed by fire in 1795.

James Usher, archbishop of Armagh, was the next occupant of the see. "This great advocate of what has been invidiously termed 'moderate episcopacy,' was born in Dublin, on the 4th of January, 1580, and he became one of the earliest students of Trinity College, in that city. He early distinguished himself in the Roman Catholic controversy, and gaining thus the favour of James I., he was, in 1620, appointed to the see of Meath, whence he was, five years later, translated to Armagh, the primatial see of all Ireland. He came to England in 1640, and the rebellion in the next year preventing his return to Ireland, he repaired to the king at Oxford, and as a means of subsistence was allowed to hold the see of Carlisle in commendam. He was greatly esteemed by the king, and was expressly summoned to assist him with his advice at the Treaty of Newport. Archbishop Usher produced many laborious works, written amid trouble and danger, and his learning and virtues commanded the respect of many who were the avowed enemies of his order. Thus he was allowed to hold the professorship of Lincoln's Inn after the bishop's lands had been sold, and Cromwell listened to his earnest remonstrances in favour of the despoiled clergy, who owed some alleviation of their sufferings to him. Usher found a home in the house of the countess dowager of Peterborough for several years, and he died under her roof at Reigate, March 21, 1656. His remains were honoured with a public funeral, to the cost of which Cromwell contributed £200 by letter of privy seal, April 2nd, 1656."¹ On the death of Archbishop Usher, the see was vacant four years. On the Restoration of Charles II., in 1660

Richard Sterne, master of Jesus' College, Cambridge, was nominated to Carlisle. He was a native of Nottinghamshire, and educated at the college just named, and while there took his degree of D.D. Being domestic chaplain to Archbishop Laud, he attended him on the scaffold at his execution, and was subsequently imprisoned, with some other heads of houses in the universities, on a charge made by Cromwell, that they had conveyed their college plate to Charles I. at York.² He was then deprived of his mastership, and obliged to retire into private life till the restoration of the regal power, when he was promoted to this see. During his episcopate he erected a chapel at Rose Castle, which, however, was taken down shortly afterwards. He was translated to York, in 1664, and was succeeded by

Edward Rainbow, dean of Peterborough. Bishop Rainbow was a native of Bilton, in Lincolnshire, and entered Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1623, being then in his fifteenth year. He remained there for two years, after which he proceeded to Magdalene College, Cambridge, where he became tutor to several noble pupils, and obtained a fellowship. In 1642 he was appointed master of Magdalene, and four years afterwards received the degree of D.D. In 1650 Dr. Rainbow was requested to sign a protestation against Charles II. then in course of signature, but having refused he was deprived of his office, which he did not regain till the Restoration. In 1662 he was nominated vice-chancellor of his university, and two years later he was promoted to Carlisle. This prelate made considerable additions to the episcopal residence at Rose, rebuilt the chapel erected by his predecessor, and carried out many other improvements. He died at Rose Castle, March 26th, 1684, and was buried at Dalston. The next bishop was

Thomas Smith, dean of Carlisle. This prelate was born at Whichall, in the parish of Asby, Westmoreland, on the 21st of December, 1614. He was educated at Appleby School, and in the sixteenth year of his age was admitted into Queen's College, Oxford, where his early proficiency in his studies "gained him a singular repute in the university." After he had taken the degree of M.A. he obtained a fellowship, and soon became eminent as a tutor, most of the gentlemen of the college being committed to his care. When Charles I. resided at Oxford he was one of those who were appointed to preach before his majesty, at Christ Church, and before the parliament at St. Mary's. In consequence of the events which soon after occurred he removed to the north, where he remained till the Restoration, after which he took his degree of D.D., and became chaplain to Charles II. He was appointed to a prebend in Carlisle Cathedral in November, 1660, and a few months later received one of the "golden" prebends of Durham. He became dean of Carlisle in 1671, on the promotion of Dean Carleton to the see of Bristol; and while holding this office he restored the deanery at his own expense, bestowed a communion service to the cathedral, endowed the Grammar School, made additions to the capitular library, and proved himself in every way a public benefactor. Nor were his good deeds confined to Carlisle, for Dalston, Penrith, Appleby, Asby, and other places experienced his bounty. On the death of Bishop Rainbow, in 1684, Dr. Smith succeeded to the see, which he held for eight years, and died at Rose Castle on the 12th of April, 1702. He was buried in Carlisle Cathedral, where there is an inscription to his memory.

William Nicholson, archdeacon and prebendary of Carlisle, was the next occupant of the see. He was born at Orton, about the year 1655, and, in 1670, was entered at Queen's College, Cambridge. In 1678, and the early part of the following year, he visited Germany and France, and on his return home was admitted a fellow of his college, having previously taken the degree of M.A. He received a prebend in Carlisle Cathedral and the vicarage of Torpenhow from Bishop Rainbow, in 1681, and next year was made archdeacon. In 1702, on the demise of Bishop Smith, he was elected bishop, and was consecrated at Lambeth on the 14th of June in the same year. The first four years of his episcopate were spent by Bishop Nicholson in inspecting the various churches, parsonage houses, glebe-lands, &c. in his diocese. In 1715 he was appointed lord high almoner by George I., and three years later was translated to Londonderry, which see he held till February, 1726, when he was made archbishop of Cashel, but he died on the 14th of that month, and was buried at Londonderry. This celebrated man was well versed in the several departments of human knowledge, but particularly in that of history, which he appears to have cultivated with the greatest assiduity and success, and to his industry and learning the historians of this county are particularly indebted. In 1678, when at Leipsic, he translated into Latin Hook's Essay on the Motion of the Earth from the Sun's Parallax, which was subsequently printed. Two years later he published an account of Denmark, Poland, Norway, and Iceland, in the first volume of the English Atlas, of which he afterwards published the second and third volumes, containing Germany. These were followed, in 1685, by a letter to the master of University College, on the Runic inscription at Bewcastle, which was published in the philosophical transactions, No. 178, and also a letter to Sir William Dugdale, concerning the font at Bridekirk. In 1696 appeared the first part of his English Historical Library, the second part was published the following year, and the third in 1699. After an interval of three years he published a similar work for Scotland, and in 1724 one for Ireland. Between the publication of the two latter works, he produced, in 1705, his Border Laws, with an appendix of charters and records. Besides these works, he wrote, in 1715, an essay to be inserted in Chamberlain's book, containing the Lord's Prayer in one hundred languages; and in 1719 the preface to the third edition of Wilkin's Leges Anglo-Saxonice. The bishop published several sermons, and left to the caputular library at Carlisle his MS. collections for a history of the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland and the diocese of Carlisle. In 1809 John Nichols, F.S.A. published in two octavo volumes, Letters on Various Subjects, Literary, Political, and Ecclesiastical, to and from William Nicolson, D.D.

Samuel Bradford, prebendary of Westminster, succeeded Bishop Nicolson, in the see of Carlisle, when the latter was translated to Londonderry. This prelate was a native of London, received his education at Bennet College, Cambridge, and having been admitted to orders, became chaplain to Bishop Compton, and tutor to the children of Archbishop Tillotson. He subsequently became rector of St. Mary-le-Bow, London, prebend of Westminster, master of Bennet College, and ultimately dean of the most honourable order of the Bath. After holding the see of Carlisle for five years he was translated to Rochester; and dying in 1731, was interred in the north aisle of Westminster Abbey. His successor was John Waugh, dean of Gloucester, a native of Appleby in Westmoreland, where he was born in 1660. He received his early education at Appleby School, and subsequently entered Queen's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He was rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill, London, in 1708; ten years later prebendary of Lincoln; two years afterwards dean of Gloucester; and in 1723 bishop of Carlisle. For eleven years he governed the diocese with great zeal and ability, and with the greatest credit to himself. He died in Westminster, in 1734, and was buried in St. Peter's, Cornhill.

Sir George Fleming, Bart., the next bishop, was the son of Sir Daniel Fleming, Knt., of Rydal Hall, Westmoreland, where the future bishop was born, in 1667. He seems to have had his school education at Appleby, whence he was transferred to Edmund Hall, Oxford, which he entered in 1688, and having received his degree in arts, became domestic chaplain to Bishop Smith of Carlisle, by whom he was collated to the vicarage of Aspatria, and in 1700 to a prebendal stall in the cathedral. The favour shown to Mr. Fleming by Bishop Smith was continued by that prelate's successor Bishop Nicolson, who, in 1705, promoted the subject of this notice to the archdeaconry. He became dean in 1727, and was raised to the see of Carlisle, in 1734. He enjoyed his elevation for thirteen years, and died at Rose Castle on July 2nd, 1747, in the eighty-first year of his age. He was interred in his cathedral church where a marble monument perpetuates his memory. His successor was Richard Osbaldiston, dean of York, who was descended from a good family at Hummantly, in Yorkshire, and received his education at Cambridge. He held this see from 1747 till 1762, when he was translated to London, which see he held for two years, dying in 1764.

Charles Lyttleton, dean of Exeter, his successor, was the third son of Sir Thomas Lyttleton, Bart., of Hagley Hall, in Worcestershire, at which place he was born in 1714. Having received his early education at Eton, he entered University College, Oxford, and on the completion of his studies became a member of the Middle Temple. He was in due course called to the bar, but not finding legal studies congenial to his disposition, he returned to Oxford, and subsequently took orders. He was appointed to the rectory of Alve, in his native county, in 1742, and in 1747 became chaplain-in-ordinary to George II. The following year he was made dean of Exeter, and in 1762 received the bishopric of Carlisle, which he held for six years. He died in London on December 22nd, 1768, and was interred with his ancestors at Hagley. Bishop Lyttleton was a zealous antiquarian, and was for some time president of the Antiquarian Society, to which he gave a considerable number of books and manuscripts.

Edmund Law, the next bishop, was a native of Lancashire, being born at Cartmel in that county in 1703. He received his early education at Cartmel and Kendal, and afterwards entered St. John's College, Cambridge, from which he removed to Christ's College, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1737 he was presented by the university to the living of Greystoke, and in 1743 was appointed archdeacon of Carlisle by Bishop Fleming; and as the archdeaconry has the rectory of Salkeld annexed to it, he went to reside there in 1746. In 1754 he took the degree of D.D., and two years afterwards he was elected master of Peter House, upon which he resigned his office of archdeacon. About 1760 he received the appointment of head librarian of the university. He subsequently became archdeacon of Staffordshire, prebendary of Lichfield, and in 1767 received a prebendal stall in Durham Cathedral. He was elected bishop of Carlisle in the following year, and held the see till 1787, when he died at Rose Castle on the 14th of August, in his eighty-fourth year. He was buried in his cathedral. During his residence in Christ's College he published a translation of Archbishop King's "Essay on the Origin of Evil," with notes, and prepared for the press an edition of Stephen's "Thesaurus." He also formed an acquaintance with several literary celebrities, among others the learned Dr. Jortin, Dr. Taylor, the editor of Lysias and Demosthenes, and Dr. Waterton, the master of Magdalene College. In 1734 or 1735 he published an "Inquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time," &c.; and while resident at Salkeld his "Considerations on the Theory of Religion." About 1777 he edited Locke's works, which he published in three volumes quarto, with a preface and life of the author. Bishop Law devoted a great portion of his time to metaphysical studies, and is said to have held the writings of Locke in the highest esteem. "He was distinguished by a mild and tranquil disposition, and the amenity of his manners endeared him to all who knew him. His countenance always wore the same kind and composed aspect, truly indicating the calmness and benignity of his temper." He was succeeded in the see of Carlisle by John Douglas, canon residentiary of St. Paul's, who was born at Pittenween, in Fifeshire, and in 1736 was entered a commoner at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, from which he removed, in 1738, to Balliol College. Having been appointed chaplain to the 3rd Foot Guards, he went to the continent with his regiment, and was present at the Battle of Fontenoy. He subsequently became tutor to Lord Pulteney, with whom he travelled for some time, and, in recognition of his services, was rewarded by the Earl of Bath with considerable church preferment. He was consecrated bishop of Carlisle in 1787, having previously held the dignities of canon and dean of Windsor. In 1791 he was translated to Salisbury, and died the 18th May, 1807. Bishop Douglas held the office of chancellor of the most noble order of the garter, was a fellow of the Royal Society, a vice-president of the Antiquarian Society, and a trustee of the British Museum. The next bishop was

The Hon. Edward Venables Vernon, who was appointed on the translation of Bishop Douglas, at which time he was canon of Christ Church, Oxford. This prelate, the second son of George, Lord Vernon, was born on the 10th of October, 1757, educated at Westminster School, and afterwards removed to Christ Church, Oxford. He subsequently became Fellow of All Souls' College, chaplain to the king, prebendary of Gloucester, and canon of Christ Church. In 1791 he was appointed to the bishopric of Carlisle, and upon inheriting the Harcourt estates, assumed the surname of Harcourt. In 1808, Bishop Harcourt was translated to York, and the see was offered to Dr. Thomas Zouch, prebendary of Durham, who declined to accept it, in consequence of his advanced age and retired habits.

Samuel Goodenough was elected bishop on the 26th of January, 1808, and held the see till his death on the 14th of August, 1827. Bishop Goodenough was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, when he took the degree of L.L.D. in 1772. He was appointed dean of Rochester in 1802, and six years later was promoted to Carlisle, as above stated. His lordship was a vice-president of the Royal and Linnean Societies, and one of the council of the first named learned body. Bishop Goodenough was the author of some papers, which were printed in the transactions of the Linnean Society, and also of some sermons.

The Hon. Hugh Percy, bishop of Rochester, was translated to Carlisle in September, 1828. This prelate, the third son of Algernon, first earl of Beverley, was born on the 29th of January, 1784. He entered the University of Cambridge as a member of Trinity College, and graduated M.A. in 1805, but subsequently placed his name on the boards of St. John's College. Having married a daughter of Archbishop Manners Sutton, he was by him collated, in the year 1809, to the rectories of Bishopbourne and Ivychurch. He subsequently became, in 1811, chancellor and prebendary of Salisbury; in 1816, a prebendary of Canterbury, and of St. Paul's; in 1822, archdeacon of Canterbury; and in 1825, dean of that cathedral church. He was con-separated bishop of Rochester in June, 1827, and translated to Carlisle as above, retaining the chancellorship of Salisbury and the valuable living of Finsbury, during his episcopacy. Dr. Percy died at Rose Castle in February, 1856, aged 72 years, and was succeeded by

The Hon. H. Montague Villiers, the present bishop.

THE SEE OF CARLISLE

When the see was founded by Henry I. in 1133, it was made suffragan to York, and its jurisdiction comprised the greater part of the two counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, which were taken from the diocese of Durham, to which they had up to that time belonged. From its establishment till 1856, this diocese was the smallest in England, the whole of it being comprised in one archdeaconry, containing only 137 benefices; but on the demise of Bishop Percy, on the 5th of February, in the year just named, it was, under the provisions of 6 and 7 William IV. c. 77, and of an order in council made in August, 1847, greatly enlarged by the creation of the new archdeaconry of Westmoreland, abstracted from the diocese of Chester, with a view to the equalising of the two sees, and by which arrangement upwards of 120 benefices, comprising an area of 662,076 acres, were added to the former. The diocese of Carlisle now comprises the whole of the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland (excepting the parish of Alston, which is within the bishopric of Durham), and Furness and Cartmel (Lonsdale North of the Sands), in the county of Lancaster. It is divided into two archdeaconries—the archdeaconry of Carlisle, comprising the deaneries of Carlisle, Allerdale, Cumberland, and Westmoreland; and the archdeaconry of Westmoreland, containing the deaneries of Copeland, Furness and Cartmel, Kendal, and Kirkby Lonsdale. The see of Carlisle has given to the state one lord chancellor, two lord treasurers, and three chancellors to the University of Cambridge. We subjoin a list of the archdeaconries, deaneries, and parishes which at present (1858) form the diocese.¹

THE PRIORS.

The first foundation of the Priory of St. Mary is involved in obscurity, but it is generally supposed to have been founded in the reign of Rufus, when the city was rebuilt, and its various edifices restored. Little progress, however, was made during the lifetime of the Red king, and it was reserved for the first Henry to finish the work and attach to it a community of secular priests, over whom he placed the Saxon Athelwald, as prior. This was in 1101. Some years afterwards, in 1129, Henry's son, Prince Henry, was lost with many of his companions in the ill-fated White Ship, and all traditions agree that it was to the sorrow felt by the English monarch on that occasion that we owe the foundation of the bishopric of Carlisle. "Twenty years before," says the present Bishop of London, "the king had gone on with William Rufus' work, and had, as we have seen, founded here a college of secular priests. He had completed the Norman church, with its nave, transepts, and a choir much smaller than the present structure, and in proportion to the nave; he had endowed it with the tithes of the churches in the forest of Inglewood, and now, by the advice of Prior Athelwald, he determined to do a greater work for this northern district. He founded the bishopric, and changed his secular priests into monks. This design, however, took some time to be matured, and probably was not fully accomplished till 1133, within a few years of Henry's death," when Athelwald became the first bishop of Carlisle.

His successor in the government of the priory was Walter, who, previous to his embracing the religious life, had been a soldier, and had followed the fortunes of the Conqueror from Normandy. As a reward for his valorous conduct the guardianship of Carlisle was entrusted to his care, and during his term of office the walls and fortifications of the city were restored. Extensive grants of lands and manors in the neighbourhood seem to have been bestowed upon him; and amongst other possessions he held the lordship over Stanwix and St. Cuthbert's. He subsequently joined the community of St. Mary's, and when Athelwald was raised to the episcopate, became the second prior. Walter enriched the priory with the lands and other possessions which his stout arm had won, and was long looked up to by the brotherhood as their greatest benefactor. The property given to the convent by this prior consisted of the manors of Linstock, Rickerby, Crosby, Little Crosby, Walby, Brunskew, Carleton, Little Carleton, and the Wood; also the churches of St. Cuthbert, in Carlisle, and St. Michael, Sanwix.¹

The patronage of the bishop consists of the right of presentation to the archdeaconries of the diocese, the four canonic in the cathedral, and the following thirty-eight benefices:—

Prior John succeeded Walter, and governed the community in Bishop Bernard's time. He is stated to have granted Waitcroft and Flimby to the lord of Workington.

Bartholomew occurs as fourth prior. His name is found as a witness to several old charters; and he and the community confirmed the appropriation of the church of Orton, in Westmoreland, to the priory of Conishead.

Ralph is the next prior on record, and during his government the abbey of Holme Cultram, received from the prior and convent of Carlisle, the appropriation of the church of Burgh-upon-Sands.

We know no more than the names of the next six priors, they were respectively, Robert de Morville, Adam de Felton, Alan, John de Halton (who was raised to the see in 1292), John de Kendal, and Robert.

Adam de Warthwic succeeded Prior Robert. Hutchinson says that "he was in contention with the bishop, and in 1300, at his visitation, articles were exhibited against him. Warthwic being old and infirm, resigned in 1304, with a pension of twenty marks arising out of Langwathby tithes."

William de Hautwyssel was the next prior, but he only held the office for four years, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Robert de Helyperton, who governed the convent for about seventeen years.

Symon de Hautwyssel, William de Hastworth, 1325: John de Kirby, and Galfrid were the successors of Robert de Helyperton.

John de Horncastle, 1352, was the next prior. During the period of his government Bishop Welton made inquiries concerning the appropriate churches belonging to the convent, and certified them accordingly. The convent underwent four episcopal visitations during the time Prior Horncastle held office. In consequence of his age and infirmities he resigned in 1376, his successor being Richard de Ridal, who, having leave of absence for a time, Martin de Brampton was appointed to the guardianship of the convent.

John de Penrith was his successor, and resigned in 1381.

William de Dalston, the next prior, refused to take the oath of canonical obedience to the bishop, who thereupon excommunicated him, but the prior appealed to the king, who issued a writ to stop further proceedings. The difficulty was shortly afterwards amicably arranged, and the prior, being preferred, at once resigned his priory, and was succeeded by Robert de Edenhall, who was elected in 1386.

Thomas de Heton, of an ancient Cumberland family, was his successor, and was followed by Thomas Elye, who built New Layth's Grange, near Carlisle.

Thomas Barnaby became prior in 1433; after whom Thomas de Haithwaite was elected.

Thomas Gondibour was the next prior. He improved the priory building, to which he made considerable additions, and in many ways proved a great benefactor to the community.

Simon Senhouse succeeded Prior Gondibour in 1507, and carried on the works commenced by his predecessor. He repaired and beautified the square tower within the precincts of the priory, besides ornamenting other portions of the building. He was succeeded by Christopher Slee, who erected the gatehouse at the western entrance to the priory, on which the request, "Orate pro anima Christopher Slee, prioris, qui primus hoc opus fieri incepit, A. D. 1528," is inscribed.—Growing old and infirm, Prior Slee resigned his office in 1532, and retired upon a pension of £25 per annum.

Lancelot Salkeld, the next and last prior, lived at the period of the suppression of the religious houses, and, on the 9th of January, 1540, surrendered the priory to the commissioners of Henry VIII., who, two years afterwards, founded, in its stead, an establishment consisting of a dean, four prebendaries, eight minor canons, a sub-dean, four lay clerks, or singing men, a grammar master, six choristers, a master of choristers, six alms-men, a verger, two sextons, and other persons; granting to them the site of the priory and the greater part of its revenues, together with the revenues of the dissolved priory of Wetheral. In the 1507. In the church recorded "The Church of the Holy and Undivided Trinity," and Salkeld was constituted the first dean. Thus ends the history of the priory of St. Mary. The revenues were valued by Dugdale at £418 3s. 4d.; by Speed at £461 8s. 1d. We subjoin the succession of deans, prebendaries, &c., from the foundation to the present time:—

THE CASTLE, WALLS, ETC.

The castle occupies a fine situation on an eminence at the north-west extremity of the city, and is popularly said to stand upon the site of a Roman fortress. Its origin is generally ascribed to William Rufus, though some writers think, and not without good reason, that the Conqueror would not fail to perceive the strong and important position occupied by Carlisle, and would not think of leaving it unprotected, or exposed to the attacks of the Scots, without some means of defence. It is, however, certain that in the reign of Rufus the castle was put into a state of defence, and the fortifications were further strengthened by Henry I., in 1122. David of Scotland, who obtained possession of Carlisle in 1135, assisted in the completion of the works. From the numerous sieges which the castle from time to time sustained, its defences became much weakened, and when, in 1217, Archbishop Gray arrived at Carlisle, to take possession of the fortress for the English crown, he found it in a very dilapidated condition. In 1256 it is again reported as in a decayed state. In 1303 Bishop Halton, who was governor of the castle, expended £275 14s. 7d. in repairing the structure; in 1344 repairs were again needed. We hear no more of the fortifications till 1522, when the castle appears to have mounted 45 pieces of cannon. During the reign of Henry VIII. some additions were made, and the whole fortress put into a state of repair. It was at this period that the citadel was built, to strengthen the defences of the southern part of the city. In the reign of Elizabeth, in consequence of a report being made of the condition of the fortifications, the queen ordered the whole to be repaired, and the castle and citadel to be furnished with guns and ammunition. During the period of the Commonwealth, the keep was converted into a battery, and other alterations made in the defences of the place. From this time nothing of importance is recorded of the castle till the rising of 1745, when it fell into the hands of the Scots, as we have seen at page 94.

The castle contains two wards, an inner and outer, the entrance to the latter being from the south, through a tower, which is embattled and defended by a strong gate and portcullis. In front of this entrance there was formerly a drawbridge across the moat which extended along that side of the fortress. The outer ward is extensive, and includes a good parade ground for the garrison, barracks for fifteen officers and upwards of 200 men, an hospital, and a house for the master gunner. On the north-west angle of the wall is a bastion, upon which six guns were formerly mounted; five guns were upon the battery of the south-west angle, and between these is a sandcastle, which contains embrasures for two guns. The walls of this ward are embattled, and are eighteen feet in height by nearly nine in thickness. The inner ward, which is separated from the outer one by a rampart, is entered through an arched gateway, the passage to which, up to a recent period, was protected by a halfmoon battery, and a ditch with a drawbridge, to which the approach was by a covered way; a subterranean passage connected this battery and the keep. The chapel, Queen Mary's Tower, a hall, and a barracks, were all in this ward. The hall was taken down in 1827, and a magazine erected upon its site; the chapel has been converted into barracks and a mess-room for the officers of the garrison; the old barracks was taken down in 1812. Queen Mary's Tower was situated at the south-east angle of the castle, and derived its name from having been the place in which the unfortunate Scottish queen was confined during her stay in Carlisle. It was of a much better style of architecture than the other buildings; but, in consequence of its insecure state its demolition was deemed advisable in 1834-5. On the south side of this ward the castle was defended by a battery of eight guns, and on the north by a battery armed with nine; the total number of guns mounted on the castle, when its defences were complete, being thirty. The keep is, however, the most prominent and most interesting part of the castle, and though it has borne the storms of seven hundred winters, and sustained many a fierce assault and many a lengthened siege, it still stands a noble and enduring monument of the architecture introduced by the Norman conquerors of England. It is nearly square; its dimensions are sixty-six feet by sixty-one, and its height sixty-eight feet. The wall fronting the city is eight feet in thickness, the others are each fifteen feet thick. A well, seventy-eight feet in depth, and supposed to be the work of the Romans, is situated within the north wall. The keep comprises three stories, exclusive of the ground floor, each of which is sixteen feet in height. The dungeons are situated in the latter; the upper rooms serving as military store-rooms or barrack-rooms.

WILLIAM IV.
Lieut.-gen. the Hon. J. Ramsay.¹

The ancient walls from which the citizens of Carlisle so often resisted the attacks of the Scots have well nigh disappeared, the only remaining portions being nearly all on the west side of the city. They were long in a state of great dilapidation, and, in many places, had become quite ruinous. This added to the fact of their being no longer needed for defence, leave to remove them was obtained early in the present century. Previous to their removal they had long served as a promenade for the citizens, and from that part of the west wall which yet remains, fine views of the distant mountains of the Lake district may be obtained. Of the portion of the walls still standing, that part which extends from the south-west angle of the castle to the Gloucester Tower (so called from its having been erected by the Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., during his governorship) is the most perfect. From this spot the wall extends in a southerly direction, and about fifty yards from the tower stood the Irish Gate, the site of which may be known by the narrowness of the road from Abbey-street to the bridge. From the Irish Gate the wall proceeds without interruption until it approaches the gaol, but its height has been considerably reduced, and near its termination on the south it is concealed by numerous buildings which have been erected against it on the outside. This is the west wall, and when complete it formed the line of defence between the Irish and English Gates, the latter of which was connected with the citadel by a short wall. The east wall extended from the citadel to East Tower-street, along a line which may be described as from four to five yards distance from the present footpath on the west side of Lowther-street. At the point of junction of the east and north walls was a circular tower, called the Springold, from which the north wall was carried to the Scotch Gate, along East Tower-street, upon a line close to its north side. Between the Scotch Gate and the castle were three semi-circular and one square tower.

The gates of the city were semi-circular, with double iron-studded doors of great strength, but without any architectural features deserving of particular mention, and until almost the close of the last century were shut every evening at sunset. There were apartments over the Scotch Gate, which served for some time as a prison for debtors. On this gate, as well as on the English Gate, were exposed the heads of the unfortunate followers of Prince Charles Stuart, where they remained for many years; and Allan Cunningham informs us that an old lady of Dumfries-shire often mentioned to him the horror which she felt when she saw several heads upon the Scotch Gate at Carlisle, one of which was that of a youth with very long yellow hair. Tradition tells us that a lady, young and beautiful, used to come from a distant part and gaze at the head every morning at sunrise, and every evening at sunset—at last the head and lady disappeared. To each gate a guard-house was attached, the whole of which, as well as the main guard in the market-place, were built during the wars of the Commonwealth, by the orders of Cromwell, with the materials obtained by the destruction of the greater part of the nave of the cathedral. The main guard was removed in 1855.

Nothing authentic is known respecting the origin of the citadel, but it is generally believed to have been erected in the reign of Henry VIII., though some writers state that it formed part of the ancient fortifications of William Rufus, and that Henry repaired and strengthened it. These repairs do not seem to have been very substantial ones, for in an account given in the reign of Elizabeth, it is stated that "the great round tower at the east side being paved with stone and sand upon a lead roof was thereby so overcharged that a great part had fallen to the ground; and that two houses called the buttery and the boulding house, standing within the rampire wall were falling to the ground in consequence of their being overcharged with earth." The citadel consisted chiefly of two strong circular towers, united by a curtain wall facing the south. The ward was entered from English-street, and contained besides the buttery and the boulding house a large hall, but there was little accommodation for a garrison. Previous to the towers being converted to their present use, their roofs were covered with soil and served as gardens. An act of parliament was obtained in 1807, by the provision of which the citadel and walls of Carlisle were granted to the justices of the county of Cumberland for the purpose of building courts of justice for the county; and for the carrying out of this object the whole of the ancient fortifications, with the exception of the eastern bastion, were removed.

ANCIENT RELIGIOUS HOUSES.

Of the ancient conventual buildings of the Priory of St. Mary, as seen in their original state, we have no authentic account; but it is generally believed by those most capable of forming a correct judgment upon the subject, that they formed a quadrangle, the east side of which abutting upon the south transept of the cathedral, extended in the same direction to the house occupied by the late Canon Goodenough, as is evident from the vaulting of its cellars. The ruins of the cloisters were visible at the commencement of the present century; the only portion now remaining is a blocked up doorway near the present south entrance to the cathedral. Over the cloisters on this side were the chapter house, and no doubt dormitories. The refectory, or frater, formed the south side of the cloister quadrangle, which was completed by cloisters and dormitories from the west end of the refectory to the nave of the cathedral. The refectory fortunately escaped the destruction which befel the adjoining buildings, and in its original state was a noble structure in the Perpendicular style, about eighty feet in length by thirty in breadth; it has lately been restored and beautified. The interior originally formed the noble and spacious dining hall of the priory, occupying nearly the whole area of the building, but it is now divided into several apartments, the principal being the chapter house, which is fitted up in an elegant style. On the wall opposite the windows are three ancient niches, of considerable beauty, with projecting semi-hexagonal crenellated canopies, ornamented with panels, and osse and cinque-foil arches: they are supported by large projecting corbels, and appear formerly to have held statues. At each end of this apartment there is a fine picture, of large dimensions,—one of which represents St. John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness, the other the Resurrection; they were presented to the capitular body, about the beginning of the present century, by the Earl of Lonsdale. The apartment at the west end of the refectory is fitted up for the library of the dean and chapter, which, though not extensive, contains many valuable works, on history, divinity, &c., as well as several volumes of MSS. The original library appears to have been scattered during the civil wars, as the present one was founded by the Rev. Arthur Savage, who was a prebendary in 1660. It has been enlarged by subsequent contributors, among whom Bishop Smith stands foremost, many of the most valuable books having been given by him. In the apartment at the east end, elevated above the floor by three steps, is a stone ambo, or pulpit, from which grace was said, or passages of Scripture, or parts of the lives of the saints, read to the monks during dinner. The basement story consists of a double range of vaulting, plainly groined, supported in the middle by short octagonal piers, from which the groining springs without capitals. At the intersection of the groins, there is, in one instance, a boss charged with the letters P. T. G., the initials of Prior Thomas Gondibour, thus pointing out the end of the fifteenth century as the period at which the building was erected; at the south-west angle is a circular staircase, conducting to the upper apartments; and at the south-east is a small octagonal turret. A little to the west of the refectory is a square embattled tower, which at present forms part of the residence of the dean. It is not unlikely that this tower was formerly fortified, and in times of war used by the community as a place of retreat, and it may have been the usual residence of the prior. This ancient structure was repaired by Prior Senhouse, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and its principal apartment is well worthy of particular notice. It is lighted by two oriel windows, in part ornamented with stained glass, and the ceiling, which is of oak, is carved and painted with armorial and other bearings, among which the ragged staff and escallop shell are conspicuous. It is in a good state of preservation. The buildings connected with the tower are of more recent date, the greater part of them having been erected about the year 1690 by Bishop Smith. The deanery was a short time ago improved and enlarged by the late dean, the present bishop of London. The western gate house was erected in 1528, by Prior Slec, as we learn from an inscription on its inner arch.

A Convent for the Franciscan, or Grey Friars, was founded in Carlisle in 1233, and occupied a site on the east side of English-street, near the south-east corner of the city. It was burnt down in a dreadful conflagration which took place on the 19th of May, 1292, but was subsequently rebuilt, and in 1315, when Carlisle was besieged by Bruce, the Chronicle of Lanercost tells us that the besiegers "caused the greater part of their army to make an assault on the eastern part of the city, against the place of the Friars Minors, that they might draw thither the party within." From Bishop Nicholson's MSS. we learn that Edward III., in 1331, honoured the convent with a visit, but we are not informed how long he remained. Nothing further is known of this house, except that in some of the gardens on its site, many bones have from time to time been dug up, and portions of the foundations of buildings have sometimes been met with.

The Dominicans, or Black Friars, were introduced into Carlisle in 1233, when a convent was founded for them. The information relating to this house is very meagre, and Tanner can only inform us that it was founded before 1267. It appears that the friars first took up their residence without the walls, but Leland mentions them as within. During the siege mentioned above, some of the besieging army "posted themselves on the western side, over against the place of the Canons and the Preaching Friars," the latter name being borne by the Dominicans, from preaching being the peculiar end and object of the order. The site of the convent was between the English Gate and St. Cuthbert's Church, and the name Blackfriars-street still recalls the locality where the community resided. Every vestige of the convent and buildings has long since disappeared, but part of the old county gaol is said to have been a portion of their convent. Jefferson says, "It is supposed that the buildings and site were granted to the Aglionby family, and it was in a garden here that Camden saw the Roman sepulchral inscription, which has since been removed to Drawdikes Castle."

A Nunnery seems to have been founded at Carlisle at a very early period, of which the sister of Egfrid, king of the Northumbrian Angles was an inmate, and where she was visited by St. Cuthbert.¹ It appears to have been destroyed during the Danish invasions, as every record or memorial appertaining to it has perished. Another institution of the same kind is said to have been founded here by David, king of Scotland, but we possess no further knowledge relating to it. When the foundations of the present church of St. Cuthbert were being dug, the workmen discovered, below the foundation of the church, the remains of a building still more ancient, as also several pieces of broken sculpture, amongst which was one representing a nun with veil or hood; and from this discovery the church of St. Cuthbert is supposed by some to occupy the site of the nunnery.

The Hospital of St. Nicholas was situated in the suburbs of the city, near the southern extremity of Botchergate, and although the period of its establishment is unknown, it is said to have been of royal foundation. Bishop Nicholson's MSS. state that it was endowed for thirteen lepers, male and female, but the Messrs. Lysons inform us it was for twelve poor men and a master. A moiety of the tithes of Little Bampton was granted to it, before the year 1180, on condition that the parish of Bampton should always enjoy the privilege of appointing two of the almsmen. The hospital was burnt and totally destroyed during the siege of Carlisle by the Earl of Buchan, in 1296, but being afterwards rebuilt, it again experienced the same fate in a subsequent siege. In the year 1477, the hospital of St. Nicholas, with its lands, was granted to the prior and convent of Carlisle, and with the other possessions of the priory became the property, at the Reformation, of the dean and chapter. Among the payments charged on the capital body by this transfer are £2 6s. 8d. to the chaplain of St. Nicholas' Hospital, and £5 17s. to three poor bedesmen there. The buildings connected with this hospital are supposed to have been destroyed in the civil wars, about the year 1646.

Carlisle formerly possessed a free chapel dedicated to St. Alban, the proto-martyr of Britain, which is supposed to have been founded by some one of our English kings, and to which a burial ground was attached. It occupied a site at the head of Scotch-street and Fisher-street, and St. Alban's Row still points out the situation. The cross which formerly ornamented the eastern end of the building is preserved in the Museum of the Literary and Philosophical Society, and the bell on the Town Hall is supposed to have belonged to this chapel. Some remains of the foundations may yet be discovered in the cellars of the houses which have been erected on its site. In 1856, Bishop Welton having discovered that the chapel and burial ground had not been consecrated, forbade, under pain of suspension and excommunication, anyone to celebrate or attend divine service in it. It appears to have been afterwards consecrated, for it continued till the reign of Edward VI., when it shared the fate of similar establishments throughout the country, and was then granted by letters patent, with several houses belonging to it, to Thomas Dalston and William Denton.

CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.¹

The Catholic Church of Sts. Mary and Joseph is situated at the east end of Chapel-street, facing Albert-street. Adjoining is the Rectory, within an enclosure of rather more than half an acre of ground, part of which was for some years used as a cemetery. This church was opened for divine service on Christmas-day, 1824. It owes its existence to the almost unaided exertions of the late venerable incumbent, the Rev. Joseph Marshall, who was appointed to this mission at Christmas, 1800. After conducting its pastoral duties with great care and successful zeal for exactly half a century, he officiated for the last time on the morning of Christmas day, 1850, when he suddenly fell at the altar, and was carried in a state of unconsciousness from the church. He survived this accident four years, when his long and arduous labours were brought to a peaceful close on the 4th January, 1854, in the eighty-seventh year of his age, and the fifty-fourth of his residence in Carlisle. He was justly venerated by his flock, which he had seen increase from the small number of 20 to upwards of 4000, and was also held in high estimation by all classes of his fellow-citizens. The first Catholic place of worship established in Carlisle after the change of religion in this country, was at the close of the eighteenth century, when a small building in the West Walls was provided for that purpose by Mr. Fairbairn of the Bush Hotel, and was served for a short time by the Rev. Charles Saul. He was succeeded by Mr. Marshall, the late venerable founder of the present church. It is a spacious building, measuring ninety feet in length, by thirty-eight in breadth, and has a gallery at the west end which will accommodate about two hundred. In its original state it was not so large, and without much pretension to ecclesiastical style; but within late years it has undergone considerable alterations, which have improved its general appearance. A handsome Gothic porch has been built for the staircase to the gallery, and a rather lofty bell-turret erected on the east gable, with spaces for three bells. The presbytery has been enlarged to nearly double its original size, and the whole premises are enclosed with a strong wall surmounted with iron palisading. In the interior of the church we perceive that the old ceiling has been removed, and the roof thrown open, and the old organ replaced by a new and very fine instrument built by the late Mr. Bishop, of London. The high altar, on which stand six massive brass candlesticks of great beauty, with its altar-piece of "Christ rising from the tomb," executed by Mr. Nutter, a native artist, and the two neatly-painted side chapels, (one dedicated to the Blessed Virgin and the other to St. Joseph) which are separated from the rest of the church by open screen-work, give to the interior a very imposing appearance. The present rector of the church is the Rev. L. Curry, his assistant the Rev. J. Dunderdale. The congregation is estimated to be at present about 5000.

The Evangelical Union Church meets for worship in the Athenæum, Lowther-street, temporarily, and is under the pastoral care of the Rev. John Whitson who commenced his ministerial labours with the formation of this body in November, 1854. In doctrine this church is Armenian, and in government Independent. It has been characterised by steady growth since its commencement, and its members anticipate being able, before long, to erect for themselves a neat and suitable place of worship.

The Friends' Meeting-house is near the upper part of Fisher-street, where it was erected in 1776. The Society of Friends have had a meeting-house in Carlisle since the time of George Fox, who was imprisoned in the city in 1653, during the time of the Commonwealth.

The Independent or Congregational chapel in Lowther-street was opened in 1813. It is built of white freestone, from a design by Mr. Nichol of Edinburgh, is well fitted up, and will seat 800 persons. There are also commodious rooms beneath the chapel used for instructing the young and other purposes. The Independents had a chapel in Annetwell-street, which was occupied until the present one was erected. The first Congregational minister of the old chapel was the Rev. C. Hill, who was appointed in 1808. He died some time before 1814, when the Rev. John Whitridge was appointed; he resigned in 1819. In 1820 the Rev. Thos. Woodrow became the minister, and resigned in 1835. He was succeeded by the Rev. Percy Stoutt in 1836, who resigned in 1837. The next minister was the Rev. Robert Wolstenholme, who continued from 1837 to 1843, and resigned. These were the ministers of the old chapel. The Rev. H. Wright was the first minister in the new chapel: he entered on his duties in 1843, and resigned in 1846. The Rev. Thomas Hind was minister from 1847 to 1854, and resigned. The Rev. W. A. Wrigley became minister in 1855, and resigned in 1858. The Rev. Ninian White is the present minister.

A new Congregational Church has been established under the ministry of the Rev. W. A. Wrigley, which meets in the Mechanics' Hall, Fisher-street, as a temporary place of worship. The first service was held January 10th, 1858.

The Presbyterian Church (Scotch), Chapel-street, in connection with the Established Church of Scotland, was erected in 1834, and will accommodate upwards of 700 persons. The Rev. David R. Lowson, M.A., is the present minister.

The Presbyterian Church (United), situate in Fisher-street, is an elegant structure, capable of accommodating about 700 persons. It was erected in 1855-6, at a cost of £1,150, and was opened for public worship on the 29th of June of the latter year. The style is Transition between the Norman and Early English. The congregation was in existence as early as the year 1707, but how long before that period cannot be determined, and was thus one of the early English Nonconformist Churches. At that time they met for worship at a place called Blackfriars, under the west wall of the city. The names of any of the ministers officiating there are not known. In the year 1731 they removed to the church they had erected in Fisher-street. Among their ministers since that period we find the names of Thomas Dickinson, minister in 1733; Israel Bennett, translated from Brampton, and inducted in Carlisle, in 1745; Robert Miln, A.M., author of Physico Theological Lectures on the State of the World from the Creation to the Deluge, and other works. He was ordained about the year 1768, and died in 1801. His successor was Jame Kyle, a licentiate of the Associated Synod, but who, when in Carlisle, was not in ministerial connection with that synod. He was pastor of the congregation from 1800 to 1809, when he met an untimely end by drowning. During the vacancy caused by his death the congregation connected themselves as a congregation with the Associated Synod, and on the 31st of October, 1810, George Henderson, M.A., was ordained over them by the Presbytery of Selkirk. He laboured among them for eight or nine years, and then resigned his charge and went to Canada, where it is believed he still is. The next minister was Richard Hunter, who was ordained on the 31st of August, 1819, and died on the 22nd of March, 1853. By the union of the General Associate Synod and the Associate Synod, in September, 1820, the United Secession Church was formed, and again by the union of the United Secession and Relief Denomination, in May, 1847, the United Presbyterian Church was formed—a denomination adhering to the Westminster Confession, and which in all its parts has ever protested against patronage; and has asserted the right, the privilege and the duty of the Christian people to elect and support their own ministers. With this denomination the congregation in Carlisle came then to be connected. The late pastor, the Rev. Robert S. Drummond, M.A., was ordained on the 29th of September, 1853. During his ministry the congregation increased so much that it was found necessary to build the present large and commodious church upon the site of the old one. Mr. Drummond removed to Edinburgh in February, 1858, and was succeeded by the Rev. Henry Miller.

Wesleyan Methodism was introduced into the city of Carlisle about the year 1767, by Mr. William Bell, an excise officer, who, at that time, resided at Longtown, on the Scottish border, eight miles from Carlisle. The Wesleyan Methodists having passed through great persecutions in the city and neighbourhood were favoured with the presence and services, for the first time, of the Rev. John Wesley, on Good Friday, April 13th, 1770, when he preached in a barn in Abbey-street. In 1785 the first Wesleyan chapel was built in the city, in Fisher-street, and ten years afterwards, being found much too small, it received considerable additions, and the chapel, as then enlarged, is still standing, the underpart of it having been converted into two dwelling-houses, and the upper part making the place of worship occupied, a few years ago, by a congregation of Baptists. A new and elegant chapel was built in another part of Fisher-street, capable of containing about 1100 persons, in 1817, at a cost of about £2000; and from that time to the present, the services conducted in it have shed a beneficial influence upon a considerable portion of the population of the city and neighbourhood. There is a large room underneath which serves as a Sunday school. In 1790 Carlisle first became the place of the residence of Wesleyan ministers, and has continued so ever since.

The Wesleyan Free Church, Lowther-street, is a neat and graceful structure. The front is in the Early English style, and is divided into three parts, a centre and two side wings. The chief window is in the front, and consist of five lights, glazed with round and stained glass. There are two principal entrances, one in each wing, and each of the porches is lighted by a two-light window above the entrance. At each angle of the front there is a buttress crowned with a roof-shaped canopy. The front rises in a pyramidal form, having towards the top the date 1857, in a circular panel. The apex is finished by an elegant cross. The ceiling of the interior is supported on two ranges of lofty pillars, its central portion curved and ribbed, and the sides rather inclined from the horizontal. In the centre is an elliptical dome-light of plain and stained glass. The arrangements of the interior are well adapted to the requirements of the congregation. The organ is a fine instrument by Nicholson, of Newcastle. This place of worship formerly belonged to the Wesleyan Methodist Association, the Carlisle members of which forming a junction with a large body of Wesleyan Reformers, constituted themselves the Wesleyan Free Church.

In addition to these churches and chapels, the Latter Day Saints have a meeting house in Barnes' Yard, Castle-street; the New Testament Church meets for worship in Porters' School room, West Walls; and the Primitive Methodists have a chapel in Cecil-street.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Foremost among the schools of Carlisle, both for its antiquity and usefulness, stands the Grammar School, which, as we learn from a register in the library of the dean and chapter, was founded by St. Cuthbert, about the year 686. Like the other ecclesiastical and educational establishments of the country it suffered much from the ruthless ravages of the Danes, who appear to have been, in this country at least, enemies to all mental culture. When Rufus began the priory of St. Mary, he also gave his attention to this school, making it an appendage to the monastic establishment, from which the teachers were appointed, and thus it continued till the time of Henry VIII., who, in refounding the cathedral, re-established the school, and endowed it with an annual payment of £20. Bishop Smith, during his occupancy of the see of Carlisle, gave £500 to be applied for the benefit of this school, with which sum an estate in the parish of Addingham was purchased, from the rent of which the principal part of the income, about £140 per annum, is at present derived. Dr. Thomas, bishop of Rochester, who received his early education here, left £1000 stock, the interest of which was to be applied for the benefit of two sons of clergymen, educated here, and sent to Queen's College, Oxford. For a long period the school was held in the room over the Abbey Gate, but, in 1832, a new and commodious school was erected in Eaglesfield Abbey, and, in consequence of the rapid increase in the population of the city, greater accommodation being necessary, large additions have since been made, with great advantage to the comfort both of masters and pupils. Among the eminent men which this school has produced we may mention the names of Bishop Thomas, of Rochester; Bishop Carleton, of Bristol; Dr. Tullie; and Professor Carlyle.

The British or Lancastrian School, Mary-street,

Water-gate, is a large and commodious structure, erected by subscription, aided by a grant of £300 from government, in 1833, and comprises two large rooms, in which about 400 children of both sexes are educated. Previous to the erection of the present building, the school business was transacted in a large room in Water-gate, which was opened in 1811, when the Lancasterian school was first founded. Since its commencement, this school has been eminently successful, and has conferred great benefits upon the population of the city. It is supported by subscription, and is managed by a committee of the subscribers.

The Central School, for children of the Established Church, is situated on the West Walls, and is a spacious building, erected in 1812, upon ground leased from the corporation, at a nominal rent, for a long term of years. It is managed by a committee of subscribers. As it was intended to be a school for the training of masters for other schools in the diocese, as well as for the instruction of children, it receives the name of the Diocesan Central School.

Christ Church School, Day and Sunday, for boys, girls, and infants, is situated in Crown street. It was erected by subscription in 1842, aided by grants from the Committee of Council on Education, and the National Society, at a cost of £1400, inclusive of the master's house, and the purchase of the site, and will accommodate nearly 400 children. This school was the first in Carlisle built under the minutes of the Committee of Council. It is under government inspection, and conducted by certificated teachers, assisted by pupil teachers.

The Fawcett School was erected by public subscription in 1850, as a testimonial of the veneration and love of the parishioners of St. Cuthbert's for their pastor, the Rev. John Fawcett, and to commemorate the fiftieth year of his incumbency. As it was erected during his lifetime, he was a witness of this gratifying proof of public feeling. It stands upon a piece of ground adjoining the West Walls, granted by the corporation, at a small annual rent, and embraces a day school for boys, girls, and infants, and a Sunday-school for boys and girls; in connection with the Sunday-school there is a sick club, and a library for the teachers and scholars. The building is of brick with stone dressings, and comprises three schoolrooms, a committee room, open and covered play grounds, and is well supplied with gas and water. The cost of erection was £1700, including a government grant of £334. The schools, which are under government inspection, are taught by certificated teachers, aided by pupil teachers, and supported by voluntary subscriptions and donations. From the annual report for 1857, we learn the following particulars. The treasurer's financial statement showed a balance in his favour of £7 7s. 8d., against £41 4s. 5d. due to the treasurer last year. The attendance, &c., during the year was as follows:—

	Average Attendance.	Times Received.	Number in the Books.
FIRST-CLASS.
In the boys' school....	708	5 12 6	139
In the girls' school....	702	4 15 11	139
In the infants' school....	804	4 16 3	135
SECOND-CLASS.
In the boys' school....	91	7 6 5	126
In the girls' school....	76	4 14 3	103
In the infants' school....	102	5 17 5	111

In the girls' school....	77	5 12 1	124
In the infants' school....	78.4	1 9 13	148

The average attendance of boys, girls, and infants during the past year has, therefore, been 2205, and the number of scholars falling off in the attendance at the Infant school during the last quarter is chiefly attributable to a suspension of payment received.

In the Sunday-school the number of scholars is 220, the number of teachers, 35. Evening classes under an efficient teacher, have lately been added to the other departments of these schools.

St. Patrick's Catholic Schools, near the Catholic Church, with which they are in connexion, were founded in 1825, on a site granted by the Duke of Devonshire. They consist of separate schools for boys, girls, and infants, and have for some years been placed under government inspection. The boys' school is under the care of a certificated teacher, who is assisted by two pupil teachers. A certificated mistress and three pupil teachers superintend the girls' and infants' school. The total average weekly attendance is about 250.

Trinity Church School, in Caldewgate, is a plain commodious brick structure, erected in 1832, and attended by about 100 children. It is partly endowed.

Besides these schools, there are the Ragged School, Caldewgate, built and supported by G. H. Head, Esq., and the Shadongate Schools, near the extensive works of Peter Dixon and Co., erected and supported by the firm for the education of the children of the workmen in their employment. There are also many private schools, as well as some day schools connected with the Dissenting places of worship, and several Sunday-schools.

RELIGIOUS, ETC., SOCIETIES.

Besides the religious agency at work in the various churches, chapels, and Sunday-schools, there is in the city a number of societies by means of which various religious and other praiseworthy objects are greatly promoted. We subjoin the names of the different societies:—Carlisle Auxiliary of the London Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews; the Carlisle Branch of the Irish Society of London, for Promoting the Education and Religious Instruction of the native Irish, established in 1847; Carlisle Church Missionary Association, instituted 1817; Carlisle Ladies' Bible Association; Carlisle Town Missionary and Scripture Readers' Society; Cumberland and Carlisle Auxiliary Bible Society, instituted 1813; Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; Northern Sub-division of the Evangelical Alliance; Peace Society; Religious Tract Society; Wesleyan Benevolent Society; and the Wesleyan Missionary Society. In addition to these, which are strictly of a religious character, there are the Carlisle Auxiliary of the United Kingdom Alliance, the Anti-capital Punishment Society, the Carlisle Temperance Society, and the Female Visiting Society for the Relief of the Aged and Indigent.

CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

The Cumberland Infirmary stands foremost among the charitable institutions of Carlisle. It is situated on the western outskirts of the city, and is a handsome Grecian building of white stone, with lodge in correspondence, the grounds of which are nearly six acres in extent. The building was completed in the year 1830, but owing to disputes with the contractors, which ended in a chancery suit, it was not opened for the reception of patients until the beginning of the year 1842. From that time until his death, which took place in 1856, the late Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Percy, as president of the institution, took an active constant personal interest in the management, and it is doubtless in great part owing to the known care bestowed at all times upon the expenditure that the accumulated benefactions have reached at the present time to £16,000. At the death of the late president, the governors, in general meeting assembled, with the present bishop, Dr. Villiers, as his successor in the chair, determined on naming the principal ward "Bishop Percy's Ward." The building has accommodation for fifty-two in-patients; and cases, oftentimes the most formidable, are constantly congregated within its walls, not only from that part of the kingdom whose name it bears, but also from the surrounding counties. Carlisle being a manufacturing town, and a centre of many railroads, accidents in great numbers are brought for treatment. The number of out-patients annually is about 2000. A special fund maintains a chaplain, who also acts as curate in the parish (Trinity) in which the Infirmary is situate. The institution is managed by a committee consisting of the principal gentlemen in the town and neighbourhood, which meets every Wednesday morning. The medical conduct of the institution is confided to a physician, a surgeon, and a house surgeon, and his assistant. The receipts for the year ending the 27th of July, 1857, amounted to £2,005 7s. d., and the expenditure to £1,786 3s. 6d., leaving a balance of £219 3s. 7d. in favour of the institution.

The following extracts from the statutes and rules will no doubt be acceptable to many of our readers:—

"Benefactors of twenty guineas or upwards, to be governors for life.

"Subscribers of two guineas or upwards annually, to be governors during payment.

"A subscriber of half-a-guinea annually, or a benefactor of five guineas, to be entitled to recommend two out-patients annually.

"Every annual subscriber of one guinea, or benefactor of ten guineas, shall be allowed to recommend two out-patients and one in-patient annually.

"Every annual subscriber of two guineas, or benefactor of twenty guineas, shall be allowed to recommend two in-patients and six out-patients within the year; and benefactors and subscribers to a larger amount after the same ratio.

"No subscriber or benefactor to have more than one in-patient at a time.

"No person to be admitted a patient but by recommendation of a benefactor or subscriber, unless in cases of accident or emergency which admit of no delay.

"In-patients are admitted by the committee on Wednesdays at 10 o'clock. Accidents and cases of emergency are received at all times."

The Carlisle Dispensary was founded in 1782, under the auspices and patronage of the Earl of Arundel and Surrey and the clergy and gentry of the city and neighbourhood, and since that period has been the means of affording medical aid to thousands of the indigent sick of Carlisle and the surrounding district. For some years the institution carried on its good work amidst many difficulties, in a small house up a narrow passage in the entrance of the Abbey, but was at last compelled to cease from lack of funds, and Carlisle was for several years without a dispensary. In 1809 the medical gentlemen of the city and neighbourhood took the matter into consideration, and, having made a representation to the dean and chapter, obtained from that body the grant of the use of the room over the Abbey Gate which had formerly been the High School of Carlisle. The dean and chapter likewise gave the institution a yearly subscription of ten guineas, and other very liberal subscriptions having been sent in, the promoters were enabled to open the Carlisle Dispensary on the 1st of February, 1810. From that time the subscription list has been a good one, and the institution has gone on prosperously and most satisfactorily to our own day. In 1824 application was made to the dean and chapter for the room at the head of the Abbey Gate, but an offer was made by the chapter to allot to the institution a part of the Tithe Barn in Head's Lane for that purpose, and on the acceptance of that offer, they further subscribed a sum of £30 towards the fitting up of the place. This done the dispensary was carried on in that building till April, 1858, when it was removed to the new edifice in Chapel-street, the foundation stone of which was laid by John Walde, Esq., on September 17th, 1857. The present building is of Prudhoe stone, in the Italian style; the cost, inclusive of the site, was £723 10s. 6d. The ground floor comprises patients' waiting room, consulting room, drug room, entrance and staircase to the apothecary's house, and the requisite offices. The upper floor is occupied by the apothecary's apartments and the committee room. The design was furnished by John Hodgson, Esq., and is very pleasing and effective.

We subjoin the following extracts from the rules:—

"An executor paying over a legacy of £100 shall be a life governor; and all donors of ten guineas at one time, or who make up their contributions to that amount within the year, shall be governors for life, have two votes, and power to recommend an unlimited number of patients. All subscribers of ten guineas per annum are governors, entitled to recommend an unlimited number of patients. A subscriber of one guinea per annum, is a governor with two votes, and can have two patients constantly on the books. A subscriber of ten shillings is a governor, has one vote, and can have one patient constantly on the books. No persons are deemed objects of this charity, but such as are really necessitous."

The receipts for the year 1857 were £186 19s. 10d., and the expenses £173 6s. 4d. The number of patients who received the benefit of this institution during 1857 amounted to 3788. Of these there were casualties cured, 917; patients recommended by subscribers' tickets, cured, 2362; ditto relieved, 157; ditto irregular, 69; ditto died, 46; ditto no better, 25; transferred to parish surgeon, 50; remaining on the books, 162; total, 3788.

situation. From the report for the year ending December, 1857, we learn that very great and necessary improvements have been effected in the house, so as to render it more efficient for the purpose to which it is applied. The total number of patients admitted into the house during the year amounted to 108; 55 of these were affected with typhus fever, 18 with scarlatina, and 35 with smallpox; of the 55 typhus fever cases admitted, 42 were discharged cured, five died, and 8 remained under treatment; 15 of the scarlet fever patients were discharged cured, and three died; of the 35 small pox cases, 33 were discharged cured, and two died; of the 17 cases remaining in the house at last report, six were labouring under typhus fever, two of whom recovered and four died, one of scarlatina was discharged cured, the remaining 10 were small pox cases, of which eight recovered and two died. The receipts for the year ending November, 30th, 1857, were £420 10s. 9d., and the expenditure £412 16s. 3½d.: balance £8 3s. 5½d.¹

INSPECTOR.—David Little. MATRON.—Mrs. Little.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, ETC.

The Athenæum, Lowther-street, was erected in 1840, from designs furnished by Messrs. Williams of Liverpool, at a cost of about £6,500, raised in £5 shares, but it has since become the property of G. H. Head, Esq., who purchased it for £4,000. This building has supplied a want long experienced in Carlisle, which, previous to its erection, possessed no room sufficiently large for general purposes. The external appearance is very striking; the façade is of white stone from the Prudhoe quarries, and is in what may be called the Roman style of architecture. The centre part is composed of four massive pilasters, with Corinthian capitals, and windows in the intermediate spaces. The cornices are surmounted by an open balustrade, with sunk panels, and the angles are ornamented with massive pilasters. The interior is divided, on the first floor, into entrance hall and staircase, committee room, library, museum, and lecture room; second floor, gallery over the library, with spacious concert room, fitted up in an appropriate manner, and well suited for the purposes for which it was erected.

The County Assize Courts are situated at the head of English-street, on the site of the ancient citadel, at the southern entrance to the city, adjoining the gaol. They were erected in 1810-11, from the design of R. Smirke, jun., R.A., pursuant to an act of parliament which was passed for the purpose of "enabling his majesty to grant the citadel and the walls of the city of Carlisle, &c., to the justices of the peace for the county of Cumberland, for building courts of justice for the said county, &c." The courts are built in the Gothic castellated style, and two projecting corridors, give the whole the semblance of a fortified gateway, and recall to mind the ancient citadel. They present elegant fronts of polished freestone of a reddish colour, and are surrounded with cast iron railings. The Crown Court occupies the western tower, and is connected with the adjoining gaol by an underground passage, through which the prisoners are conveyed to the dock. In the entrance hall is a fine statue of the late Major Aglionby, for many years chairman of the Quarter Sessions of the county. Over the judge's seat is a fine bust of George III. by Rossi, on each side of which are statues of Justice and Mercy. The eastern tower on the opposite side of the street serves as the Nisi Prius Court, and, like the Crown Court, is finished and fitted up in a very handsome and appropriate manner. Attached to this court are suitable rooms for the grand jury, counsel, witnesses, &c., with the usual offices. In the centre of the street, between the two courts, is a fine statue of the late Earl of Lonsdale.

The County Gaol and House of Correction stands upon the spot formerly occupied by the Dominican Convent, near what was, in bygone days, the English gate, and is a fine structure, in the Gothic style, consisting of a centre and two wings, surmounted by an embattled parapet. It was completed in 1827, at a cost of £42,534, inclusive of the purchase of some land. The interior arrangements consist of a governor's house, from which six wings radiate, affording accommodation to thirteen classes of prisoners, with separate areas, divided by walls and lofty iron rails. The prison contains room for 150 prisoners, with means of extension for a much larger number. The whole is enclosed with a wall of red freestone. This edifice was begun from the designs of William Nixon, Esq., of Carlisle, but he dying during the progress of the work, the completion of the structure was entrusted to C. Hodgson, Esq., who added several improvements to the original plan. During the progress of the building several Roman and other antiquities were discovered. The office of governor or gaoler is at present held by Mr. Redin, whose salary is £365 per annum. The chaplain is appointed by the magistrates, at a salary of £125; he is not allowed to engage in any parochial duty, and is required to perform divine service in the chapel twice and to preach every Sunday, and on Christmas-day and Good Friday; to read prayers daily, and to attend on prisoners under sentence of death, unless in such cases where prisoners, not belonging to the Church of England, desire to be attended by a minister of their own religion. The Rev. John F. Simpson is the present chaplain. A surgeon is appointed by the magistrates, with a yearly salary of £70, and an allowance for medicine at prime cost. Besides these, the principal officers, there are a matron, a schoolmaster, six turnkeys, and other subordinate assistants. For the year ending 30th September, 1857, the number of prisoners received into the gaol was 476. The number of criminals was 89 less, and debtors 29 more, than those received in the preceding year. The greatest number in custody, at any time, was 102; the lowest 59, and the daily average 75. The number of County Court debtors has much increased of late, being now nearly one-fifth of the number received. In the workroom, the prisoners manufactured 663 brush mats, 272 Samot mats, 672½ yards of matting, and 2372 brushes, from which a profit was derived of £86 19s. 8½d. From the chaplain's report for the year mentioned above we learn that the total number of criminals committed was 375; and by comparing this number with those of 1855 and 1856, it appears there is a diminution of 89 in favour of this year over the last, and of 48 over the preceding one. As suggesting a reason for the unusual increase of 1856, the chaplain found that while in 1857 the committals upon military charges were 6, they amounted in 1856 to 47, and in 1855 to 16. If the military offences be deducted, and they cannot fairly be reckoned among the crimes of the county, the numbers would stand thus—1855, 407; 1856, 417; 1857, 369—showing the real decrease in the criminal committals. The number of debtors continues rapidly on the increase. In 1855 it was 58, in 1856, 72; and in 1857, 101; confirming the conjecture—thrown out in a former report—that an increase might be anticipated from the introduction of the alteration in the County Court Act, by which the cost of the conveyance of debtors to gaol, after the first commitment, was transferred from the plaintiff's account to that of the counties. The behaviour of the prisoners, with two or three exceptions, was satisfactory, and their conduct in school and the classes for religious instruction met with the chaplain's entire approbation, and the report concluded by his tendering thanks to a few magistrates and friends, through whose kind liberality a small organ had been procured. Their services in chapel being now conducted with a simplicity and order second to none in the kingdom. The surgeon reported that the general state of health of the prisoners during the year was good. No death occurred, and of the 363 cases of indisposition, but two were of sufficient importance to render removal to the Infirmary requisite. A girl of unsound mind was committed to the prison, who was afterwards removed to a lunatic asylum.

The Guild Hall, Green Market, is a quaint old building, in which the meetings of the guilds or incorporated companies of the city are held.

The Town Hall is an ancient structure, situated in the Market Place, but without architectural pretensions.

The ground floor consists of shops, held upon a peculiar tenure, called cullery tenure, one equal to freehold, and this circumstance prevents being effected in the building those alterations and improvements which the convenience of the public demands. The hall is entered by a double flight of steps. Above the mayor's seat are four fine old paintings, three of which are portraits of William and Mary, and Charles, the first Earl of Carlisle of the Howard family. In the passage leading to the magistrates' office stands the ancient city chest, which is formed of oak, strengthened by thick ribs of iron, and secured by five massive padlocks. The edifice is surmounted by a cupola, containing a clock with four dials, one of which is illuminated. Previous to the erection of the Court Houses, the assizes for Cumberland were held in this building, and it was here that the devoted adherents of the Stuarts were arraigned after the rebellion of 1745.

The Carlisle Library and Newsroom, situated at the junction of English and Devonshire-streets, is a very elegant modern structure of white freestone, exhibiting a fine example of the Decorated style. The south-west front consists of a gabled centre, flanked by two wings with embattled parapets, and containing a doorway with flowered mouldings and an enriched triangular canopy; above the door is a large window of four lights, having its head filled with good flowing tracery. The elevation in Devonshire-street is more extended. It contains in the centre a bay window, all the lights of which have crocketed canopies; the buttresses are particularly light and elegant, and are crowned with enriched pinnacles. In various parts of the exterior there is some good carving, and the ornaments discover considerable luxuriance of design and sharpness of execution. On the ground floor of the building, which has beneath a range of cellars, is the Newsroom, and other offices. On the first floor is the Carlisle Library, having a separate entrance from Devonshire-street, which is elegantly furnished in a style corresponding somewhat to that of the building. The structure was completed in 1831, from designs by Rickman and Hutchinson, and the cost of erection was defrayed by shares of £50 each. The building is the property of a company.

The Police Office for the city of Carlisle is on the West Walls. The police force of the city was established in the year 1829, and has been increased from time to time as found necessary; one chief constable, three sergeants, and twenty-five constables at present constitute the force, for which the corporation obtained the government grant last year. In addition to their other duties, they have charge of the fire engines of the city. We annex the cost of the police establishment for each of the last ten years—1848, £1,176 19s. 6d.; 1849, £1,184 4s.; 1850, £1,186 8s. 11d.; 1851, £1,154 9s. 10d.; 1852, £1,167 7s. 2d.; 1853, £1,185 7s. 8d.; 1854, £1,294 1s. 5d.; 1855, £1,325 1s. 9d.; 1856, £1,424 12s. 4d.; 1857, £1,614 11s. 4d. The rateable value of the property in the city in the years 1848 and 1857 was respectively £45,493 10s. 2d., and £60,968 7s. 8d.

LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTIONS, NEWSPAPERS, ETC.

The Carlisle Library was established in 1768, but for many years after its formation the number of its supporters was very limited, and consequently its sphere of usefulness was much restricted. In 1804, however, measures were adopted by which the institution was placed upon a broader basis, and this change bringing a greater number of subscribers, the institution began to flourish, and has since continued in a very satisfactory state. The subscription list includes the names of nearly all the leading families of the city and neighbourhood, and even some from the more distant parts of the county. The institution possesses about 10,000 volumes in the various departments of literature. The government is vested in a committee of thirteen subscribers, chosen yearly. The number of members at present is 80, who pay a subscription of one guinea each per annum.

The Church of England Religious and Literary Association, established in the Athenæum, Lowther-street, "consists, as its name imports, of members of the Church of England, and was designed to provide instruction and agreeable recreation for such of the operative and industrious classes of that communion as might, without such a resource, have become connected with institutions in which opinions are tolerated, if not openly encouraged, calculated to corrupt and mislead those whose education may not have sufficiently provided them with means to counteract the subtle poisons, or the open assaults of infidelity." It is well supported by the higher classes of the community, and possesses a good library, consisting chiefly of donations from persons who feel an interest in its success. The newsroom is well supplied with the metropolitan, provincial, and local newspapers. The present number of members is 106. Lectures are frequently delivered on subjects of general interest, and are usually well attended.

The Mechanics' Institution, Fisher-street, was first founded in 1824, but not meeting with adequate support, was closed in 1831. Two years afterwards it was re-opened, and has since maintained its place among the institutions of Carlisle. It possesses a good reading room and newsroom, with a lecture hall, and the members have now the privilege of access to a well-selected library of 4074 volumes, which is rapidly increasing. The number of members is 520.

The Union Newsroom was opened to the shareholders and subscribers in 1831. It occupies the ground of the same building as the Carlisle Library, in Devonshire-street, and is supported by subscribers, who each pay two guineas a year.

The Young Men's Christian Association, Fishers'-street, was established in 1856, and is based upon the principles of the parent society in London. This institution possesses a good reading room and library, and is at present in a very flourishing condition. "To young men separated from their friends, it offers a comfortable and convenient place of resort, where they may enjoy Christian communion, and the sympathy and friendship of those who, like themselves, are engaged in the battle of life." The Bishop of Carlisle is president of the association, and the dean is one of its most active supporters.

One of the most interesting and promising features connected with the institutions of Carlisle has yet to be mentioned. This is the existence of a number of reading rooms, libraries, and schools, which are exclusively under the management of working men. It is a fundamental rule of these societies that no man shall exert an influence by holding office unless he be one dependent upon weekly wages for support. It is also a rule, that any member capable of getting and doing work, shall be expelled if he leave his contribution for a month unpaid; but in the manly spirit which has guided the whole management of these institutions, it is also a law that any member that is out of work, through real inability to obtain it, or to do it, shall be entitled to continue in the enjoyment of the privileges without payment and without responsibility. There is no one who has taken a deeper interest in the progress of working men's reading rooms than Dr. Elliot, of this city, whom Lord Brougham has well designated the "worthy successor of Dr. Birbeck in these good works." "In April, 1848," says a writer in Dickens' Household Words, "when everyone was daily listening for the great tidings which that period of strange excitement was continually furnishing—in April, 1848, a few poor men, most of them hand-loom weavers, clubbed their wits together for the purpose of getting a weekly newspaper. Obviously it was found requisite that they should also club their pennies. The result was, that within the first week after the suggestion had been made, fifty persons had come forward as the subscribers of a weekly penny, and a school-room had been lent to them, wherein to meet and read their papers. These men were all of the same class; they had originated their idea, and they were themselves managing its execution. Companions multiplied about them; there was formed quite a prosperous little society of men contributing their weekly pennies, and it was resolved, therefore, to attempt the formation of a permanent reading room, and a committee was appointed to draw up a code of rules. The working men's reading room in John-street, Botchergate, became thus one of the institutions of Carlisle, and flourished for a few months; then news became less interesting, trade also was bad, members fell off, funds declined, and the experiment would have been abandoned but for the judicious and well-timed assistance of Dr. Elliott, and other members of the middle class. These aided the efforts of the working men to help themselves, with advice, and cash, and books; their aid was fairly given, fairly taken, no abandonment of independence on the part of the men being asked or offered. This is what working men can do; and there is no duke who can be made, by virtue of his title, more noble than the labourer who thus strives in his own behalf. He need not mind the good old gentleman who informs him that he ought to touch his hat and be respectful to his betters. The good old gentleman who has let the world outrun him, and made little effort to keep pace therewith, might much more properly uncover the head to him. The best minds claim him as their kindred, and the help of others ever presses upon him who helps himself. Two or three men, however poor, if they will have faith in the force of a right heart and a stout will may gather to their council other poor mechanics like themselves; and there is no town in which, according to its size, one or a dozen true mechanics' institutions may not rise to occupy the place which Dr. Birkbeck's institutes were meant to fill, but which they have insensibly vacated."

The following is a list of the working men's reading rooms, and the years in which they were established:—

- 1846. Duke-street Adult School and Reading Room, Shalldergate. No. of vols. 519, No. of members 90.
- 1847. John-street Working Men's Reading Room, Botchergate. No. of vols. 1000, No. of members 150.
- 1848. Lord-street Working Men's Reading Room, Botchergate. No. of vols. 700, No. of members 250.
- 1853. Parham Beck Adult School and Reading Room. No. of vols. 300, No. of members 10.
- 1854. Caldewgate Adult School and Reading Room, Brewery Row. No. of vols. 200, No. of members 108.
- 1854. Trinity Buildings Reading Room. No. of vols. 177, No. of members 30.
- 1857. Shadongate Adult School and Reading Room. No. of vols. 70, No. of members 40.

Carlisle possesses two weekly papers and one tri-weekly, the "Carlisle Journal," the "Carlisle Patriot," and the "Carlisle Examiner." The "Journal" was first published in November, 1798, by Mr. Francis Jollie, in whose family it remained for many years. It was subsequently purchased by the late Mr. Steel, at that time the editor, and it is still published by his family. It advocates whig or liberal principles, and has an extensive circulation. The "Patriot" was commenced on the 3rd of June, 1815, by a company of proprietors in £25 shares. It is now, however, private property, and is conservative in its political principles. The "Examiner" issued its first number in May, 1857, and has for its editor and proprietor Mr. Wilks. In politics it is popularly liberal, and "goes for peace, retrenchment, and reform."

COURTS OF LAW.

In 1435, in consequence of the assizes having been removed to other places during the Scottish war, an act of parliament was obtained, the provisions of which are as follow:—"Whereas, by a statute made in the time of King Richard II., it was ordained that the justices assigned, or to be assigned, to take assizes and deliver gaols, shall hold their sessions in the principal or chief town of every county, that is to say, where the shire courts of the county heretofore and hereafter shall be holden. Our lord the king, willing the same statute to be observed and kept in the county of Cumberland, considering that the city of Carlisle is the principal and chief town of the said county, and in which the shire court of the same county hath been holden before this time, hath granted and ordained by the authority of the same parliament, that the sessions of the justices to take assize and to deliver gaols in the county of Cumberland, be holden in time of peace and truce in the said city of Carlisle, and in none other place within the same county, as it hath been used and accustomed of old times." The assizes are now held here in spring and autumn, each assize being attended by two judges, who hold their courts in the County Court Houses, which are described at page 128.

The midsummer and Christmas quarter sessions for the county are held at Carlisle.

Quarter sessions for the borough of Carlisle are held in the Town Hall, on the Monday preceding each county sessions, by the mayor and two senior aldermen.

The county magistrates also sit at the Town Hall, every Monday, Wednesday, and Saturday; and the county magistrates at the Court House, every Wednesday and Saturday.

The court of the mayor and bailiffs of the borough of Carlisle sits every Monday in the Town Hall, to try actions of debt and trover, to the amount of forty shillings. It may be adjourned at pleasure, and is held quarterly, when, by a concurrent jurisdiction, actions of debt, &c., amounting to upwards of forty shillings may be tried and determined.

A Court Leet and View of Frank Pledge for the city of Carlisle was formerly held twice, but now only once a year, in October, by the dean and chapter, in their manors of Botchergate and Caldewgate.

The County Court of Cumberland for the recovery of debts under £50, is held at Carlisle, and other places in the county.

BANKS, MARKETS, FAIRS, ETC.

There are three banking establishments in Carlisle, two of which issue their own notes, viz., the Carlisle City and District, and the Carlisle and Cumberland Banking Company. The Carlisle Old Bank, J. M. Head and Co.'s, is a private bank, and issues Bank of England notes. The first banks established in Carlisle were opened about the middle of last century, by Messrs. Foster and Son, and a Mr. Wilson, and were found to be of considerable service to the trade of the city.

The Market Place is situated in the centre of the city, where English-street, Scotch-street, Castle-street, and Fisher-street meet. The Market Cross is a stone structure, erected in 1632, and consists of an Ionic column, with a plain shaft and pedestal, rising from the centre of a flight of circular steps. It is surmounted with a square block of masonry, the sides of which serve as sun-dials, and is terminated by a lion bearing the arms of the corporation. Above the capital of the column is the inscription, "Joseph Reed, Mayor, 1682." The market days are Wednesday and Saturday, the latter of which is perhaps the best attended market in the north of England, large quantities of grain and other farm produce being brought from a distance of twenty and thirty miles around the city. The shambles consist of two rows of butchers' shops, extending from Scotch-street to Fisher-street, and were erected by the corporation, who, in 1790, purchased and renewed the old shambles, which stood in the Market Place. The Fish Market occupies the spot upon which formerly stood the Main Guard, and is well supplied with various kinds of fish.

Fairs for the hiring of servants and the sale of cattle are held here on the nearest Saturdays to Whitsuntide and Martinmas. Fairs are also held on the 26th of August, when they continue for fourteen days, and on 19th of September. During the last named fairs, all persons are free from executions issued by the borough court. A series of fairs for horses and cattle commences on the Saturday after the 10th of October, and continues until Christmas. There is an annual show of cattle in the large Cattle Market, near the race course, when prizes are distributed by the Agricultural Society.

Races are held here annually in July. The race course is situated on the Swifts, on the south side of the Eden, and possesses a grand stand, erected in 1839. Races were first established in Carlisle about the middle of the last century—the first King's Plate was run for in 1763.

RAILWAYS, GAS, WATER WORKS, ETC.

Carlisle possesses railway communication with almost every part of Britain, a fact that has much improved its position as a commercial and manufacturing town. The Newcastle and Carlisle line connects it with the German Ocean, and the Carlisle and Silloth with the Irish Sea; the Maryport and Carlisle with West Cumberland, as well as with Ulverston and the peninsula of Furness, and so onward into Lancashire; while the Caledonian unites it with Edinburgh and Glasgow, and the Lancaster and Carlisle with London and the south. The whole of these lines, with the exception of the Newcastle and Carlisle, make use of the Citadel Station, a fine structure, in the Elizabethan style, erected in 1847-8. The Newcastle and Carlisle Station is a mean structure, situated on the London Road, about a mile from the city, and possesses few, if any, of the requisites of a railway station. Two schemes are now before parliament for connecting Carlisle with Hawick, one by Langholm, and the other by Longtown and Cannobie.

In 1819 an act of parliament was obtained for the formation of a Gas and Coke Company, and works were shortly afterwards erected at a cost of about £10,000, raised in shares of £25 each. The works were situated at the south end of the town, upon a plot of ground forming part of the present general railway station. In 1846, the corporation purchased nearly all the shares, at £43 per share, and in the following year erected the present gas works, the site of the old being required for the railway station.

The want of pure water was long felt in Carlisle, and many schemes were from time to time propounded to obtain an adequate supply. At length, in 1846, a joint stock company was formed for the purpose of furnishing the city and its environs with the limpid element, from the river Eden, and operations being at once commenced, the city is now in a very fair position as far as water is concerned. The water is raised from the Eden through a deep bed of gravel, by powerful steam engines, and forced into a reservoir on the hill, near the London Road, about a mile from the Market Place, whence it is distributed to all parts of the city.

Carlisle has been put under the operation of the Health of Towns Act, and a Board of Health established, through the instrumentality of which the city has been sewered, many nuisances removed, and its sanitary condition much improved.

BRIDGES.

Carlisle is connected with the surrounding country by five bridges, one of which crosses the Eden, three the Caldew, and one the Petteril. During the sixteenth century, two wooden structures, called Eden and Prestbeck bridges, formed the communication between Carlisle and Stanwix, but one of them having fallen down, and the other being in a state of great dilapidation, an act of parliament was passed in 1600 for rebuilding them at the expense of the county, and in their stead two narrow stone bridges were erected. In 1807 an act of parliament was again obtained for the rebuilding of Prestbeck Bridge, and a new structure was commenced in 1812, from designs furnished by Robert Smirke, jun., Esq., R.A. It was completed in 1815, at a cost of £70,000, towards which government advanced £10,000, in consequence of its being in the line of the intended new north road to Port Patrick. The bridge consists of five elliptical arches of sixty-five feet span each, and is connected with the city by an arched causeway. The piers are founded partly on the solid rock and partly upon piles, ten or twelve feet below the surface of the Eden. The material employed in the principal portions of the structure is white freestone, brought from near Gretna, in Scotland. The entire length of the bridge and its approaches is 400 yards; its breadth within the parapet, twelve yards; and there is a flagged pavement on each side of the carriage way for pedestrians. On the completion of this fine structure the old bridge was removed. In 1820 two bridges were erected over the Caldew, one of three arches, and the other of one, for the purpose of facilitating the communication between the city and its western suburb. Ten years afterwards a bridge of three semicircular arches was built over the Petteril, at the southern entrance of the city; and five years ago, another bridge, Nelson Bridge, was erected over the Caldew, opening a new and direct road from Botcher-gate to Caldewgate. On the south battlement of this bridge is the following inscription:—The Nelson Bridge. The foundation stone of this bridge was laid June 25th, A.D. 1852, by Thomas Nelson, Esq., mayor. On the north battlement is the following:—The Nelson Bridge. This Bridge was built by the following subscribers, and completed A.D. 1853. Family of the late John Milbourne Dixon, Ferguson Brothers, Peter Dixon and

CORPORATION.

We have no positive information relating to the first incorporation of the burgesses of Carlisle, or the form of the original city government. The city has, however, received many marks of favour from the different monarchs of England, who, in their charters, granted to the citizens many privileges and immunities. Many of these documents are no longer in existence, having been lost or destroyed during the various scenes of war and tumult of which Carlisle has been the theatre. "The first charter granted to Carlisle now named in history, was granted in the reign of Henry II., and was burned in a fire which destroyed great part of the city. This charter was confirmed by Henry III., in the 35th year of his reign, granting to the citizens freedom from toll, passage, pontage, all customs belonging to the king, with the privilege of dead-wood for fuel, and timber for their houses, in divers places within the forest of Carlisle, by the assignment of the king's sergeants and foresters, with a free guild for trade and merchandise. Edward I., by his charter bearing date the 28th June, in the 21st year of his reign, setting forth that Henry III.'s charter was also burned, recites the tenor thereof from the enrolment in chancery, and confirms the same verbatim. Edward III., by his charter bearing date the 7th of February, in the 26th year of his reign, setting forth that it having been found upon inquisition taken by his trusty and well-beloved Richard de Denton and John de Harrington, and returned into the chancery, that the citizens of the city of Carlisle had from time immemorial enjoyed the following privileges, grants and confirms the same to them accordingly,—viz., return of writs; a market on the Wednesday and Saturday of every week, and a fair yearly on the feasts of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and fifteen days after; a free guild, and election of mayor, bailiffs, and two coroners; assize of bread, beer, and wine; trial of felonies, infang-thief, and all pleas of the crown which belong to the office of sheriff and coroner; goods of felons and fugitives; freedom from all fines, amerciaments, and suits to the county court and wapentake; common of pasture for all their beasts, at all times of the year, upon the King's Moor, and liberty to get turf there; with freedom throughout the whole realm of England from toll, pontage, passage, lassage, wharfage, carriage, murage, and stallage; and that they shall have the place called 'Battail Holme' for their markets and fairs; and shall have power to divide and devise their tenements, and shall have the city mill and the king's fishery in the water of Eden. Richard II. (May 26th), in the fifth year of his reign, by his charter recites and confirms all the same. Edward IV. (December 9th), in the first year of his reign, on the petition and representation of the citizens, that the city had suffered greatly in the late civil wars, when besieged by the said king's enemies, Margaret, late queen of England, Edward, late prince of Wales, and Henry, duke of Exeter, by burning the suburbs, and even the very gates of the city and the mill, and other devastations,—remit unto them £40 yearly of their fee farm rent of £80, and further grants unto them the keeping of the king's fisheries of Carlisle, otherwise called the Sheriff's Net, otherwise called the Fishery of Frithnet, in the water of Eden. Henry VII. (February 11th), in the third year of his reign, recites and confirms their former charters; also Henry VIII., in the first year of his reign; Edward VI., in the first year of his reign; and Queen Elizabeth, and James I. Charles I. (July 21st), in the thirteenth year of his reign, by Inspecimus, recites and confirms all the aforesaid grants, except the free election of mayor, bailiffs, and coroners; and further grants that the mayor and citizens shall be one body corporate and politic, by the name of Mayor, Aldermen, Bailiffs, and Citizens of the city of Carlisle. This charter, comprehending all others, was surrendered for the use of Charles II., August 7th, 1684, to the Lord Chief Justice Jeffries; the surrender not being enrolled, was therefore a void surrender. But this charter, with many others, was restored, and declared valid and effectual, by proclamation of James II., on the 17th of October, 1688."¹

The charter of Charles I., under the provisions of which the city was governed till the year 1835, enacted, "That in all times coming, the mayor and citizens shall be one body corporate and politic by the name of the Mayor, Aldermen, Bailiffs, and Citizens of Carlisle, and shall have a common seal; that one of the aldermen shall be mayor; that there shall be besides the mayor, eleven other aldermen, two bailiffs, and two coroners; that there shall be within the city twenty-four other men, capital citizens, to be of the common council and assistants to the mayor, &c." They were also empowered to elect a recorder and town-clerk, one sword bearer, three sergeants at mace, and other officers. The charter also states that the mayor, aldermen, bailiffs, and twenty-four capital citizens, or the major part of them in Guild Hall assembled, on the Monday next after Michaelmas-day, shall have power to choose annually one of the aldermen to be mayor for the ensuing year; and in case of an equal number of votes, the then mayor to have a casting vote. The new mayor so chosen must be sworn into office by the last mayor, if he be living, otherwise by the aldermen or major part of them; and he must continue in office till another is chosen and sworn. In like manner the two bailiffs and coroners are to be annually chosen and sworn. On the death of an alderman, the mayor and surviving aldermen, or the major part of them, are to elect another who shall be sworn by the mayor, and shall continue for life. The charter then states the penalties for refusing to serve any of these offices. The twenty-four capital citizens continued in office during pleasure. The mayor, recorder, and two senior aldermen, were, ex-officio, justices of the peace. "And finally," continues the charter, "the mayor, aldermen, bailiffs, and citizens, shall have such and the like court leet and view of frank pledge, and other courts, issues, fines, ransoms, penalties, forfeitures, amerciaments, waifs, estrays, deodands, goods of felons and fugitives, felo de se, and persons put in exeget and outlawed, and other emoluments, as former mayors, aldermen, bailiffs, and citizens, have enjoyed, by whatever name of incorporation they were called or known." This charter, comprehending the spirit of all previous grants, and giving some new privileges to the corporation, was surrendered in 1084, to Judge Jeffreys, as above stated, but was afterwards restored as we have seen. In 1835 an act was passed for the regulation of municipal corporations in England and Wales, and under its provisions the old corporation of the city was dissolved, and a new body, consisting of ten aldermen and thirty councillors established. The style of the corporate body now is the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the city of Carlisle. The municipal and parliamentary limits of the city of Carlisle are co-extensive, and comprise the townships of Botchergate, English-street, Scotch-street, Fisher-street, Castle-street, Abbey-street, Ricker-gate, Eaglesfield Abbey, and part of Caldewgate township. For municipal purposes the city is divided into five wards, the citizens or burgesses of each ward electing six councillors, who retain their office for three years, but are eligible to be re-elected. The aldermen are elected by the councillors, and during their appointment, which is six years, they are members of the council, but possess no power or authority above the councillors. From the town council, consisting of both aldermen and councillors, the mayor is chosen annually. He is an unpaid officer, and the business of the town council is transacted monthly, at meetings which are open to the public. Since the establishment of this new body, many improvements have been effected, including a more efficient police establishment, and the funds of the corporation are now applied for the advantage of the citizens generally. The funds of the corporation amount to between £2,000 and £3,000 a year, derived principally from rents and tolls, but the latter, by an arrangement with the railway companies, have been almost entirely commuted. The following is a list of the charters granted to Carlisle:—

29th June, 21st Edward I.	1194 February, 3rd Henry VII.
12th May, 9th Edward II.	32nd February, 1st Henry VIII.
12th January, 9th Edward III.	9th December, 1st Edward VI.
7th February, 26th Edward III.	11th February, 5th Elizabeth.
26th May, 5th Richard II.	21st November, 9th Elizabeth.
19th March, 3rd Henry IV.	1st May, 2nd James I.
12th May, 13th Henry IV.	21st July, 13th Charles I.
9th December, 1st Edward IV.	9th April, 16th Charles II.
28th January, 1st Richard III.	3rd December, 36th Charles II.

LIST OF THE MAYORS OF CARLISLE.

"The following list," says Jefferson, "has been compiled from the audit-book of the corporation, where the names incidentally occur. From the circumstance of the mayoralty commencing in one year, and terminating in the next,—in some cases, the date given may be the year in which the mayor was elected, whilst in others, it may be the year in which he left office, but the names may be relied on as being those of the actual mayors."

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT FOR CARLISLE.

Intimately connected with the representation of the city are the incorporated companies, or guilds, of which Carlisle comprises eight, viz., merchants, butchers, smiths, tailors, tanners, weavers, skimmers, and shoemakers. The privileges of a free burgess are restricted to those who belong to one or other of these companies or guilds, and consist in a freedom from tolls within the city, and the right of voting in the election of members of parliament. No one is admitted to these guilds but the sons or apprentices of freemen. The sons of burgesses are free of all the guilds of which their father may be a member, and also of the guild or trade to which they have served an apprenticeship. The number of freemen having the right of voting for members of parliament was curtailed by the Reform Act, which disfranchised all freemen living beyond the distance of six miles from the city. They now amount to about one-third of the electoral body, or nearly 400. The number of electors is 1134.

The city of Carlisle has sent members to parliament since the reign of Edward I. The members were elected by the free burgesses, the members of the various guilds of the city. On a dispute in the House of Commons, in 1711, it was declared that the sons of burgesses born after their freedom, and persons serving seven years' apprenticeship within the city, have a right to be made free. We subjoin a list of the members of parliament for the city, from their first summons to the present time, as far as we have been able to ascertain.

POOR LAW UNION.

Carlisle Poor Law Union is divided into six sub-districts, viz., St. Cuthbert's, comprising the townships of Carleton, High Blackwell, Low Blackwell, Harraby, Upperby, Brisco, Botcherby, Botchergate, English-street, and Wreay Chapelry; St. Mary's, embracing Scotch-street, Fisher-street, Castle-street, Abbey-street, Rickerby, and Caldewgate townships, with the extra-parochial place called Eaglesfield Abbey; Burgh, including the parishes of Beaumont, Grinsdale, Kirk-andrews, and Burgh-on-Sands, with the townships of Boustead Hill, Longburgh, and Moorhouse; Dalston, which contains the township of Orton, Baldwinholme, Cummersdale, Dalston, Buckabank, Raughton and Gatesgill, Ivegill, Hawkesdale, and Cundevoek; Stanwix, comprising the townships of Stanwix, Rickerby, Linstock, Tarraby, Houghton, Eterby, Stainton, Cargo, Church Town Quarter, Castle Town Quarter, and the extra-parochial place called Kingmoor; Wetheral, consisting of Walby, Brunstock, Low Crosby, High Crosby, Aglionby, Warwick, Warwick Bridge, Great Corby, Wetheral, Coathill with Cumwhinton, and Scooby townships. The area of the union is 70,810 statute acres. Its population in 1851 was 41,557, of whom 20,138 were males, and 21,419 females. The number of inhabited houses at the same period was 6923, of uninhabited 165, and 57 were in course of erection.

This union possesses three workhouses, viz., St. Mary's, for the reception of infirm paupers; St. Cuthbert's, for able-bodied paupers; and Caldewgate, for children. St. Mary's Workhouse, situated near Irish Gate Brow, was erected in 1785, for the reception of the paupers of the four townships of St. Mary's parish within the city; it is a large building, with a spacious yard attached. St. Cuthbert's Workhouse, on Harraby Hill, was built in 1809, at a cost of about £4,000, including furniture, &c. It is a large structure, covering an area of ground, which was purchased with a bequest of £20 aided by parish money. Caldewgate Workhouse, on Coal Fell Hill, is a plain brick building, erected in 1829, at an expense of £750, and has since been enlarged and otherwise much improved.

The following statement of accounts shows the receipts, expenditure, and balances for the year ending 25th March, 1858. Balance in favour of parishes last year, £2,011 3s. 3½d.; payments and workhouse rents during the year, £14,821 0s. 4d.; balance against parishes at the end of this year, £223 3s. 8½d.; total, £16,255 7s. 8¾d. Averages, £66,874; number of paupers, in-door, 1050; out-door, 6653; balance against parishes last year, £46 13s. 4¾d.; in-maintenance, £1,299 10s. 2½d.; out-relief, £2,419 9s. 3d.; relief to irremovable poor, £4,972 7s.; lunatics in asylum, £458 1s. 9d.; extra medical fees, £13 10s.; vaccination fees, £54 12s. 6d.; registration fees, £135 16s. 6d.; county and police rate, £1,867 8s. 1d.; establishment charges, £1,714 11s. 6d.; collectors' salaries, &c.; £326 11s. 9d.; total expenditure this year, £13,133 6s. 11¾d.; total expenditure for the year ending March, 1857, £12,243 11s. 1¼d.; increase £1,032 0s. 10½d.; diminution, £142 5s.; balance in favour of parishes, £2,946 12s. 4d.; total, £16,225 7s. 3¾d. The average weekly number of in-door paupers for the first half year was 236, for the second half-year, 237. The weekly cost per head was as follows:—first half-year, food and necessaries, 2s. 7½d.; clothing, 3½d.; total, 2s. 11d.; second half-year, food and necessaries, 2s. 9½d.; clothing, 5½d.; total, 3s. 2½d.

ANTIQUITIES.

In giving an account of the antiquities found in Carlisle, it must necessarily prove brief and imperfect, from the limited space at our disposal. A particular account of all the Roman remains which have been found in this city, would alone fill volumes. Carlisle may indeed be said to be Roman in its soil and foundation, since no search can be made beneath the surface without turning from its resting place of nearly two thousand years some valuable relic of antiquity, the cunning workmanship of the imperial masters of the world. Many centuries have elapsed since the Romans left Carlisle, and during that time the spade and axe have been continually bringing to light some of the concealed proofs of their having had a residence in the city; and yet the store is unexhausted; year after year some fresh memorials are continually dug up, and additional relics brought to light to be preserved in the cabinets of the curious.

A labourer who was excavating some ground in Fisher-street, in 1782, met with a large quantity of silver coins, within a few feet of the surface. They were in a state of high preservation, and consisted of those of Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, Commodus, and the Empress Faustina.

In the year 1787, in making a drain in Scotch-street, two Roman altars were found, one of which had figures in bas-relief, but without any inscription, and was much mutilated. The other altar, an account of which was sent by Mr. Rooke to the Society of Antiquaries, was in better preservation. It has a figure in bas-relief, which that gentleman supposed to represent Silvanus, or some other rural deity, holding a ram in his right hand; but the Messrs. Lysons suppose it to have been intended for a goat; the left hand holds what appears meant for a patera or cup.

At the latter end of the last century, some workmen discovered, near the West Walls, between the citadel and the deanery, the top of a stone arch; and on removing some of the stones, they gained an entrance into an arched room, thirty feet in length, twelve feet in breadth, and fifteen feet high in the centre. The end was not so lofty, and rather narrower: it was supposed to have had communication with other similar rooms, the entrance to which was walled up. A circular funnel of stone-work rose from one side of the room to the footpath on the walls, where it was covered by a large flat stone. Another funnel, nearly square, extended from the middle of the arch towards the city; this was about two feet broad, and three feet high. Search was made into it, but it was found to be choked up with rubbish. A vase, and the thigh-bone and parts of the ribs of a bison, were found in this curious cavity. The ribs were about four inches broad.

In 1804, an accidental discovery was made in Sewell's Lane, Scotch-street, of a small aperture in the ground, having the appearance of a communication with a subterraneous passage. This excited curiosity, and it was found there was a wall beneath, of the depth of twenty-seven feet, twenty-four of which were water. The earth was removed, and the workmen then found themselves on the brink of an abyss, whose depth no light could render visible, and into which the rubbish fell with a hollow reverberation. After this large opening was emptied of the water, they found a loose bottom, composed of clay, and mixed with the bones and offal of animals, among which was the head of a bullock or cow, with the horns as perfect as when slain. Amidst this heterogeneous mixture, they brought up two Roman sacrificial vases, of beautiful workmanship, with carved handles, ornamented with figures in alto-relief. One of these vases was very perfect, and measured above eleven inches in height, and twenty-one inches in circumference. They were both very elegant in their form, and resembling Etruscan vases. From the number of bones found, it was conjectured that this had been a place where the Romans had been accustomed to offer their sacrifices, and from the style and workmanship displayed in the vases, they were attributed to the period between the reigns of Nerva and Marcus Aurelius. No inscription, however, was discovered to attach any certainty to these conjectures of their probable date. This description of vase, generally known by the title prefericulum, was appropriated for containing the incense used in sacrifice. The two vases are formed of metal, appearing to be a composition of brass, or a kind of bronze, refined to a degree capable of being exquisitely wrought and of bearing a high polish. Their tops and bottoms have evident marks of having been turned and finished in a lathe. The handles contain four distinct tiers of figures or groups in bas-relief, illustrative of sacrificial rites. The upper tier represents two persons preparing a bullock for sacrifice; the second, a bear held for a similar purpose; the third, a priest, habited in sacerdotal robes, holding a victim on an altar; and the lower one, the most beautiful of the four tiers, represents on one side, a man in armour, holding a knife, and another person presenting a sheep or lamb for slaughter; on the other side is a priest with a knife or sword. These most curious vases were sold as old brass by the labourers who discovered them, for the sum of eighteen-pence! But they were eventually secured from being melted down, and purchased by the late Mr. Townley, the antiquarian. They are now preserved in the British Museum.

Horsley describes a Roman inscription which he saw at Carlisle:—

LEG. VI.
VRS. PP.
G. P. R. E.

which he reads,—Legio sexta victricis pia fidelis Genio Populi Romani fecit. Camden speaks of it in his time as being "in the garden of Thomas Middleton," but it appears to have been destroyed or removed, and Hutchinson says it was unknown what had become of it.

In 1808, some men employed in digging a cellar, also in Fisher street, discovered the handle of a Roman vase, made of stone and highly ornamented, with a small hand-mill, also of Roman origin. These remains of antiquity were found beneath two distinct pavements, which were exposed in excavating the earth. Pavement has been frequently discovered at the depth of from ten to eighteen feet below the present surface of the city; proving beyond doubt the devastation committed by the Picts and the Danes.

In digging the foundations for the new gaol, many specimens of Roman antiquities were found on the site of the convent of the Black Friars. At the depth of fifteen feet from the surface, a tank was discovered, composed of oak frames and boards of very rude workmanship, and stuffed all round with a light blue clay rarely to be met with in this neighbourhood. They found two pitchers in the tank; and also several fragments of red earthenware, bearing ornaments in bas-relief; coins of Vespasian, Trajan, Antonius Pius, Tacitus, &c.; various urns containing bones; and two sandals, or shoe-soles: these were embedded in a stratum of rubbish, of the depth of from twelve to twenty-seven feet, which covered the natural soil. These antiquities are now in the valuable collection of Mr. C. Hodgson.

On excavating the earth on Stanwix bank, in 1812, in a field belonging to the Earl of Lonsdale, preparatory to building the bridge over the Eden, the workmen found at about four feet from the surface of the ground, the capital and part of a pillar of the Tuscan order, which was fifteen inches in diameter, and lying horizontally. An aqueduct was also discovered, formed of large stones laid with cement, and several pieces of hewn stone and large bricks. The base of a massive column with pedestal were dug up, about five feet below the surface, near the same place, in 1815. In the following year, on widening and improving the road at that place, a very large quantity of human bones was discovered in a vault about eight feet long and four in breadth, which was flagged at the bottom, lined with clay, and covered at the top with earth about a foot in depth. A fragment of Roman pottery was found at the time, with this inscription on the rim—S A R R I, which may probably mean, Severus Augustus Restitutor Romanorum Imperii, in allusion to the services rendered to the Roman empire by Severus, in checking the irruptions of the northern barbarians.

In 1829, during the excavations made at Gallow Hill, near this city, for the purpose of levelling the turnpike road, a considerable number of interesting remains of antiquity were found. Gallow Hill is an extremely interesting place, not only from its having been the place selected for the execution of the rebels of 1745,¹ but also from its being on the line of the great Roman road from Lugbualia to Voreda, and from the evidences of its being a place of sepulture during the Roman period. When the road was levelled through this hill, many Roman urns, lamps, jet rings, lacrymatories, and coins, were found, and also the head of a statue, the capital of a Corinthian column, and a well executed sepulchral stone, in good preservation. This latter represents a female, in alto-relievo, three feet long, and one foot two inches and a half broad. The stone itself is a red freestone, five feet four inches long, two feet nine inches and a half in width, and about seven inches in thickness. The figure is holding a flower in her left hand, and underneath is the following inscription, in letters an inch and a half in length:—

D · M · AURE · AURELIA · VIX · SIT
ANNOS XXXVI · ET · V ·
APOLINARIS · CONIUGI · CARISSIME ·
POSUIT.

The following reading has been suggested as correct:—Diis Manibus Aurelie. Aurelia vivit annos 41. Ulpus Apolinaris coniugi carissima posuit; or, To the Diis manes of Aurelia. Aurelia lived 41 years. Ulpus Apolinaris placed (or consecrated) this to his most dear wife. The same year a silver buckle, or fibula, with the inscription, "JESUS NA.",—Jesus Nazarenus, was found in a garden in Botchergate.

In 1830, when the workmen were digging for the foundation of the Newsroom and the adjoining houses, in Devonshire street, they found a great quantity of Roman antiquities, particularly the remains of a bath; also some portions of the pillars which were supposed to have belonged to the convent of Grey Friars. A part of a Roman jug was also found, most singularly ornamented with grotesque faces, which is now preserved in the collection of Mr. Christopher Hodgson, of this city.

A large number of curiosities was discovered in various parts of Carlisle while the workmen were engaged in the recent operations connected with the sewerage of the city.¹

CHARITIES.

Ridley's Charity.—The sum of fifty shillings is paid out of the funds of the corporation of Carlisle, as Ridley's Charity, but the origin of it is unknown. The corporation fix upon some day in the month of September yearly, when the sum is distributed by the mayor, amongst fifty poor women, who attend at the Town Hall to receive it.

Woodle's Charity.—The sum of forty shillings yearly is also paid out of the funds of the corporation, and distributed in the month of December, in like manner, amongst forty poor women, as Woodle's Charity. The origin of this is also unknown.

Pott's Charity.—Mary Potts, who died in 1814 or 1815, bequeathed to the corporation of Carlisle £36, the interest thereof to be distributed annually at Christmas, amongst six poor widows of freemen of Carlisle, and six spinsters, daughters of deceased freemen, of the age of forty years and upwards; the said widows and spinsters to be nominated by the mayor for the time being. This legacy, after the payment of the duty thereon, was paid to the corporation in 1815, but they agreed to pay the interest of the full sum of £36 out of their funds, notwithstanding the deduction above mentioned. One moiety of the interest has been distributed annually by the chamberlain to six poor widows.

Lord Wharton's Bible Charity.—This city is entitled to receive a certain number of bibles from Lord Wharton's Bible Charity. They are usually sent to the Dean of Carlisle, and disposed of by him.

EMINENT MEN.

We subjoin an alphabetical list of those eminent men, who, having distinguished themselves in their several pursuits, have lent a lustre to the place of their birth, and have become the pride of their fellow citizens:—

¹On applying to Mr. Cartmell, city treasurer, for an account of these antiquities, he kindly informed us that they had been out of his hands for some time, for the purpose of classification, and had not yet been returned; but he promised that as soon as he received them we should hear from him. We therefore hope to be able to give some account of them in a subsequent portion of our work.

Aglondy, John, D.D., divine and linguist, one of the eminent men engaged in the translation of the New Testament; James I., in 1604; born about 1565; died, 1609.

Anderson, Robert, poet, the "Cumbrian Bard"; died in Carlisle in 1833.

Bacon, John, author, writer of a number of essays tending to promote public and patriotic institutions, and, in 1786, of a larger work entitled "Labor Regis, vel Thesaurus Regni Ecclesiasticarum."

Best, William Thomas, musician, celebrated organist; born, 1826.

Bell, John, engineer, who made several improvements in the art of mining.

Bowman, Robert, mathematician, who, though blind from infancy, made considerable progress in the various departments of science and literature.

Carlyle, Joseph Dacre, divine, traveller in the East, Arabic scholar, and poet; died, 1804.

Harrington, Robert, physician, and author of several works on chemical subjects.

Gilpin, Sir Joseph Dacre Appleby, physician, who rendered great service to the army, with which he was connected for a lengthened period.

Gilpin Sawrey, R.A., artist, superior painter of animals, and engraver; born, 1783; died, 1807.

Head, Grey, eminent painter; died, 1800.

Jefferson, Samuel, historian, &c.; died in London a few years ago.

Morris, Capt. Thomas, song writer and biographer; died, 1732.

Mulcaster, Richard, M.A., divine, poet, linguist, and master of Merchant Tailors' School; died, 1611.

Stephenson, Joseph, landscape painter; born, 1756; died, 1792.

Thompson, William, mathematician, about the beginning of the present century.

Strong, Joseph, mechanic, lived in King's Arms-lane. He was blind from infancy, yet he made a fine-toned organ and other musical instruments, altogether with his own hands. He was also tailor to his family, and made part of his own furniture; died, 1803.

Tullie, Thomas, learned divine and controversialist; born, 1620; died, 1675-6.

Wilkinson, Rev. Joseph, author.

AMUSEMENTS, CUSTOMS, ETC.

The principle amusements of the people of Carlisle, as well as those of the whole country, are wrestling and quoits. They know nothing of bowls, football, or cricket. The last-named is played mildly by boys of the middle and upper classes.

The best attended ceremony is that of a funeral. At one time the bellman went round, to announce that on a certain day and hour so-and-so would be buried at such a place. This custom still lingers. Perhaps one or two hundred persons may accompany the corpse of a neighbour to church, most of whom never attend a place of worship at other times. They attach great importance to the churchyard where their relatives have been buried; and the middle class, and some even of the upper, will attend a church chiefly for the reason that their departed relatives are interred in the churchyard adjoining. It is also a custom for ladies to attend the interment, wearing black silk scarfs over their bonnets, with the broad ends hanging down, not unlike the head dress of the Swiss peasantry.

PARISH OF ST. CUTHBERT.

This parish, as at present constituted, consists of English-street township, comprising the principal shops of the city, and numerous lanes and courts closely packed together, with the residences of a few gentle and professional men. The majority of the inhabitants are hand loom weavers, who are, for the most part, generally in very-straitened circumstances, in consequence of the variable rate of wages. The area of English-street township is 1,542 acres. Its population is given at page 83. The parish has been much improved by the sewerage and draining of the city. Since the passing of Lord Blandford's Act, in 1850, the outlying townships have been severed from the mother church, and now form two separate and distinct parishes, formerly ecclesiastical districts, called respectively Christ Church and Upperby parishes. The corporation of Carlisle are lords of the manor and lords of the soil within the ancient bounds of the city; lords of the soil meaning of the open places, such as streets, lanes, and squares. There are two banks within this parish, Messrs. Head and Co. and the City and District Bank. The county gaol post-office, Athenaeum, &c. are also in the parish, through which run the Lancaster and Carlisle and the Caledonian railways. The rateable value of St. Cuthbert's Within, in 1848, was £9,220 8s. 10d.; in 1857, £11,303 6s. 8d.; that of St. Cuthbert's Without, for the same years was respectively £9,129 7s., and £15,404 7s. 8d.

THE CHURCH.

The church, which is dedicated to St. Cuthbert, is situated in Blackfriars-street, on the south side of the cathedral. The original church of St. Cuthbert was erected at a very early period; but having been destroyed by the Northmen in the ninth century, remained in ruins for a considerable time, and was rebuilt shortly after the Conquest. It continued till the seventeenth century, when the steeple, being in a very decayed state, was taken down, and a large quantity of Anglo-Saxon coins discovered. The church was rebuilt at the expense of the inhabitants, in 1778. It has no pretensions to architectural elegance, but is large and commodious, capable of accommodating about 1200 persons. The tower is low and square, and possesses one bell. The church contains a number of mural tablets, and a monument inside the communion rails, to the memory of the Rev. John Fawcett, who was incumbent of the parish for fifty years, and died in 1851, at the advanced age of eighty-two. The monument contains a well executed bust of the deceased, with an appropriate inscription. The living is a perpetual curacy, to which the dean and chapter of Carlisle have the right of presentation, the lands and tithes of which body have passed into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The gross annual income of the living is £155 10s., made up in the following manner:—rent of fields, £58; cottages, £7 16s.; Queen Anne's Bounty, £33 18s. 10d.; Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £33; railway stock, £9 9s. 4d.; dean and chapter as impropricators, £5 6s. 8d.; fees, £3; total, £155 10s. 10d. Deductions and allowances amount, in round numbers, to £15; nett income £140. The parish registers extend from 1693 to the present time. A tax, now extinct, was laid upon registers of burials and baptisms; thus notified in the parish register—"1783. N.B. By Virtue of an Act of Parliament which commences this day, viz. 1st Second Day of October, 1783, a Stamp Duty of Threepence is granted to His Majesty for every future Entry in ye Register of any Christening, Burial, &c."

INCUMBENTS.—Henry Richardson, 1751; D. Carlyle, professor of Arabic at Cambridge, 1783; John Fawcett, 1809; Clement Moody, 1851; B. A. Marshall, 1853.

A parsonage of modern style, was erected in 1815, at the expense of the congregation of St. Cuthbert's Church, as a testimonial of affection to their beloved pastor, the Rev. John Fawcett. Over the garden door is inscribed on a stone, in Hebrew, "The gift of my people. J. F. 1815."

Connected with this parish is a District Visiting Society, for distributing tracts, giving relief by bread tickets, and reporting the cases of sickness, &c. to the incumbent; as also a Female Visiting Society, for the relief of the aged and indigent, founded in 1803, which gives a small sum weekly to each pensioner, besides supplying blankets to the most necessitous—it is supported by voluntary subscriptions.

CHARITIES.

Rev. George Ritschell's Gift.—By will dated 14th June, 1717, the Rev. George Ritschell bequeathed £500 to his sister, and directed her to purchase therewith a real estate of the yearly value of £20 or thereabouts, and pay thereout, amongst other charities, forty shillings a year to the minister and churchwardens of Carlisle, to be by them distributed to forty poor widows, inhabiting within the same city, on the feast day of St. Thomas, to every one a shilling. The estate out of which this payment is made is called Nunbush, and is situate in the parish of Wardon, near Hexham, from which place twenty shillings are annually received by the clergyman of St. Cuthbert's, who distributes the same to twenty poor widows in the parish.

Blacklock's Charity.—Thomas Blacklock, by will, about the year 1722, left to the parish of St. Cuthbert £20, the interest to be distributed every year, at the discretion of the overseers of the poor. "The name of Blacklock," say the Charity Commissioners, "was not known in this parish, as a benefactor, at the time of our inquiry; but there was in the church chest an indenture, dated 1st March, 1736, whereby in consideration of the sum of £20 an acre of ground at a place called Gallow Hill, was conveyed to four persons therein named, churchwardens and overseers of the poor, and trustees of the said parish, to hold to them and their successors in trust, for the use of the poor of the parish of St.

Cuthbert for ever. It was also understood that this piece of land was purchased with some money left to the parish. From these circumstances it appears, most probable, that this land was purchased with Blacklock's legacy." This land was formerly let at £1 a-year, and the rent carried to the churchwarden's account. But a workhouse was subsequently built upon part of the land, and the rest was turned into a garden for the use of the workhouse, and for some time no rent was allowed for it. Since the inquiry of the Charity Commissioners, a vestry has been held, at which it was agreed that £1 rent should be paid for this acre of land, of which £2 was to be given to poor persons of the city townships of the parish, not receiving relief, and the same to poor persons in the out-townships yearly, between Candlemas and Easter.

PARISH OF CHRIST CHURCH.

THIS parish consists of the township of Botchergate, which, until the passing of Lord Blandford's Act in 1856, was comprised in St. Cuthbert's parish. For the most part it is densely peopled by the labouring classes, there are, however, a few respectable houses and shops. It contains three cotton mills, one woollen factory, and three foundries, which afford employment to a large portion of the population, many of whom are engaged on the railways. Botchergate township contains 846 statute acres. For population, see page 83. Like the other parts of Carlisle, this parish has been improved by sewerage, a good water supply, and the erection of a better class of dwellings for the poor. The manor of Botchergate, formerly belonging to the prior and convent of Carlisle, and now to the dean and chapter, extends over the greater part of the old parish of St. Cuthbert. This township is said by some to owe its name to one Botchard, a Fleming, who formerly possessed extensive property here.

THE CHURCH.

Christ Church is a neat building, in the early English style, erected from designs furnished by Mr. Rickman, and will seat about 1,000 persons. Its exterior appearance is handsome, and it possesses a neat spire. The amount subscribed towards its erection by the parishioners was £2,140, the remainder being defrayed by the Commissioners for building new churches. The church contains a mural tablet, to the memory of the late Mr. Rothwell, of the Mains. The benefice is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the dean and chapter of Carlisle; gross income about £125, derived chiefly from pew rents. The church was consecrated in 1831, when the Rev. B. Ward, the first and present incumbent was appointed.

The parsonage, a plain brick structure, was erected by subscription and a grant from Queen Anne's bounty, in 1833, on a site given by the dean and chapter, in Eaglesfield Abbey.

There is a District Visiting Society in this parish.

Hardwick Lodge, the property of G. H. Head, Esq., now the residence of the Rev. J. H. Burton, chancellor of the diocese; and the Mains, the residence of Miss Rothwell, are in the parish.

PARISH OF ST. MARY.¹

This parish comprises the townships of Abbey-street, Castle-street, Fisher-street, Scotch-street, Rickergate, Middleseugh and Braithwaite, Caldewgate, Cummersdale, and Wreay, the latter of which is a chapelry. Caldewgate and Cummersdale form the ecclesiastical district of Holy Trinity. The Port Carlisle and Silloth railway runs through a portion of the parish. The rateable value of St. Mary's Within, in 1848, was £11,971 7s. 9d.; in 1857, £12,637 10s. 2d. That of Rickergate, for the same years, was £5,900 10s. 5d., and £8,654 15s. 5d. respectively.

The manor of John de Capella, belonging to the dean and chapter, extends over a great portion of this parish. Hutchinson, quoting from Milbourne's additions to John Denton's MS. gives an account of the manor of Caldcoats, or Harrington House, afterwards called Coldale Hall, which belonged successively to the Canterelle, Semen, Coldale, Brisco, Sibson, Dacre, and Foster families. The manors of Caldcoats, Newbiggin, New Laithes, and Botchardgate, which, previous to the suppression of the religious houses by Henry VIII. belonged to the priory of Carlisle, were granted by that monarch to the dean and chapter. The three first named manors seem to have merged into what is now termed the manor of John de Capella. The parish also seems to have included the ancient manor of Shaddongate, which was granted by Henry I. to Morvin, whose granddaughter brought it in marriage to Gwercius Flandrensis, and which afterwards became the property of the Dentons, from whom the demesne, called Denton's Holme is said to derive its name. This property was purchased about the close of the seventeenth century, by Mr. Norman, from whom it passed to the Dixon family. Most of the lands at Shaddongate are now held under the manor of Low Dalston, or that of John de Cappella. The Sockage manor of Carlisle comprises the whole of Scotch-street township, and extends over 500 acres of land in the neighbourhood. It was demised by Queen Elizabeth to Henry, Lord Scrope, and next to George Clifford, earl of Cumberland, subsequently coming into the hands of the Howards, earls of Carlisle; but the Duke of Portland having succeeded in his claim to this manor, as part of the forest of Inglewood, it was included in the Duke of Devonshire's purchase in 1787.

THE CHURCH.

The parish church of St. Mary is within what remains of the ruined nave of the cathedral, in our notice of which it will be found described. The benefice is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the dean and chapter, to whom the great tithes are appropriated, and is worth about £70 per annum.

INCUMBENTS.—George Braithwaite, —; Robert Simpson, 1754; John Bird, 1784; Michael Wheelwright, 1801; Samuel R. Hartley, 1809; William Rees, 1819.

CHARITIES.

Rev. George Ritschell's Gift.—The parish of St. Mary is entitled to twenty shillings, left by the Rev. George Ritschell, to be given annually to twenty poor widows, as stated in the account of St. Cuthbert's parish. This is received regularly, and distributed as directed.

Kirk Michell's Gift.—The interest of the sum of £10, supposed to be a legacy from a Mr. Kirk Michell, formerly of Carlisle, is annually distributed to poor widows of the parish.

MIDDLESEUGH AND BRAITHWAITE.

This township, though ecclesiastically in St. Mary's parish, is locally situated in Leath Ward, at a distance of from nine to ten miles south of Carlisle. It is bounded on the north by Dalston, on the west by Castle Sowerby, on the south by Skelton, and on the east by Hesketh-in-the-Forest and Sebergham. Its area is 2010 acres, and rateable value £1,553. The population in 1801 was 156; in 1811, 167; in 1821, 221; in 1831, 195; in 1841, 181; and in 1851, 163; who are located in single houses dispersely. Agriculture is the chief employment, and Penrith is the market usually attended. The soil is a strong arable, with a portion of meadow land, resting on a strong clay subsoil. The manor of Middleseugh belongs to Sir H. F. Vane, Bart., and that of Braithwaite to Lord Brougham. The common was enclosed under the act of 1803 for enclosing the forest of Inglewood. The principal landowners are Sir H. F. Vane, Bart., Mrs. Wilson, James Atkinson, Mrs. Price, John Pollock, William Pollock, Mrs. Foster, and Messrs. Wakefield. The inhabitants attend the chapel at Ivegill or Highhead, and marry and bury at Sebergham, for which privilege they keep in repair a hundred yards of road near the church; they support their own poor. Middleseugh Hall is at present a farmhouse. Middleseugh Forest or Wood is a noted place for fox hunting.

¹ Englesfield Abbey.—Extra Parochial Place.—This is an extra-parochial place, the returns for which, up to 1811, were included in those of St. Mary's parish. It comprises ten inhabited houses; its population in 1811 was 53, and in 1851, 69.

HOLY TRINITY ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICT.

THE district attached to the church of Holy Trinity includes the townships of Caldewgate and Cummersdale, part of the parish of St. Mary, Carlisle. The soil here is of a heavy clay, partly mixed with gravel, upon a wet subsoil, except in the valley of the Eden and Caldew, where it is of a red sandy alluvium. The habits of the people are similar to those of any other manufacturing district. The Port Carlisle, Silloth, and Newcastle and Carlisle railways run through this district, in which are situated the Infirmary and Fever House.

CALDEWGATE.

This township comprises an area of 1,564 acres; its population will be found at page 83. It was enclosed by act of parliament in 1786. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the various branches of the cotton manufacture. The Roman wall passed through part of the township of Caldewgate upon the banks of the Eden. The manorial rights are vested in the dean and chapter. The rateable value of Caldewgate, in 1848, was £9370 16s. 2d.; in 1857, £12,968 7s. 9d.

THE CHURCH.

The District Church of Holy Trinity was begun in September, 1828, and opened in 1832. It is in the Early English style, from a design by Rickman, and will seat about 1,000 persons. The cost of erection was about £6,000, towards which the £1,890 was subscribed by the parishioners; the remainder of the required sum being furnished by the Commissioners for building new churches. There is a handsome painted window in the chancel, presented by Mrs. Ann Thwaytes. The living, a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the dean and chapter, is worth about £160 per annum.

INCUMBENTS.—Edward Salkeld, 1831; James Thwaytes, 1839; James Tasker, 1845.

The parsonage is in Eaglesfield Abbey.

CHARITY.

Davison's Charity.—John Davison, who died December 2nd, 1774, bequeathed £600, the interest of which, after paying a small sum to a person for keeping the accounts, was to be distributed amongst eleven or twelve poor housekeepers, who had not been in receipt of parish relief. The money was invested, in February, 1776, in the purchase of £692 8s. stock, in the 3 per cent. Consols, and the dividends are divided annually, amongst eleven or twelve poor persons of Caldewgate township.

CUMMERDALE.

This township contains an area of 1,911 acres, and its rateable value is £2,800. Its population in 1801 was 382; in 1811, 462; in 1821, 512; in 1831, 488; in 1841, 620; and in 1851, 659. The soil is a light black mould incumbent upon a red clay subsoil, generally well drained by tiles, and from its proximity to Carlisle in a high state of cultivation. The Carlisle and Maryport railway intersects the township. The principal landowners are the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Joseph Ferguson, Esq.; Dr. Barnes; Colonel Sowerby; John Dalton, Esq.; Gustavus Gall, Esq.; George Thompson, Esq.; Messrs. John Birket, Thomas Armstrong, Thomas Dalton, and William Nixon. The tithes have been commuted for £27 18s. The Bishop of Carlisle is lord of the manor.

A large cotton factory (spinning) and flour mill are carried on here by Messrs. John Dalton and Sons; and at Holme Head, which is partly in this township, and partly in that of Caldewgate, are the extensive dyeing and bleaching works of Messrs. Ferguson, Brothers. Here are also situated the printworks of Messrs. T. and H. McAlpin, Stead, & Co. This place was erected in 1801, by Mr. John Forster, banker, Carlisle, and commenced business under the name of Forster, James, and Co. (afterwards Forster, James, Wastell, Donald, and Co.), under the management of Mr. David Donald. The garment prints produced by this firm were in great request, and considered second to none at that time for good workmanship and fastness of colours. The works were continued by the above firm until the year 1817, when they ceased, and for seventeen years remained totally unoccupied. At the end of that time the place, then in a most ruinous state, was taken by Thomas McAlpin & Co., who put it in thorough repair, and having laid down new machinery, moved by a large and powerful water-wheel, commenced working on the 31st of August, 1835, since when, up to the present time, under the able management of Mr. H. McAlpin, the works have been successfully carried on. Some years after commencing, the firm underwent a change, it is now T. and H. McAlpin, Stead, & Co. There are several distinct branches in the business, each presided over by its own foreman; the number of hands altogether employed being about two hundred and twenty. The work produced is of the highest class of block chintz furniture printing, and for many years the firm has stood unrivalled in this important branch of

The village of Cummersdale is two miles south-west of Carlisle.

Newby is another village in this township, about one and a half miles north-west of Cummersdale. Here is a school for children of both sexes, erected by subscription in 1823, aided by a grant from the National Society.

There is also a school at Holme Head, erected in 1841, by Messrs. Ferguson Brothers, for the education of the children of their workpeople. The average attendance is about 70.

Carlisle Cemetery.—The new cemetery, which has been provided as the last resting place of the inhabitants of the old border city, is situated in this township, about a mile south-east of Carlisle, and comprises an area of thirty-five acres, purchased from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It was opened for interment on the 20th of May, 1855, and the present Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Villiers, consecrated that portion, sixteen acres, allotted to the members of the Established Church, on the 23rd of June, 1856. The cemetery is beautifully situated on elevated ground, which commands an extensive view of the Scottish, Northumbrian, and Cumbrian mountains. In the foreground appear the cathedral and other churches, the grey keep of the castle built by Rufus, the ancient priory, and the only remaining portion of the wall by which the city was formerly surrounded. There are two handsome chapels in the Early English style, built of brick, with white stone dressings and buttresses. Each chapel is surmounted by a belfry and cross. The floors of the interior are laid with encaustic tiles, by Minton, and have a very pleasing effect. The lodge and entrance gateway form a neat structure in the same style as the chapels. The ground was laid out and the chapels and lodge erected from designs furnished by the Messrs. Hay, of Liverpool; Mr. J. Creighton, of Carlisle, was the contractor. The cost amounted to £14,000. Several handsome monuments ornament the cemetery. Outside the boundary wall, but in the neighbourhood of the cemetery, are the remains of some ancient wells, at the foot of a gentle eminence, called in the ancient writings "Seven Well Bank," and on which tradition reports there formerly stood an ancient chapel, the foundation of which may still be traced. On the principal remaining well, of a circular form, is an inscription in Mediæval Latin, which, divested of its contractions, reads as follows:—

Purgatus, dedicatumque, Ubsculd, die quinto
Decembris, Frater, de sub rupe lapidena venerabili Sancto Bede, ore rotundo.

Venerable Bede, to whom this well seems to be dedicated, was contemporary with St. Cuthbert, to whom, as has been seen at page 84, a grant was made of all the land within fifteen miles of Carlisle. The Burial Board of Carlisle have therefore placed a copy of the golden cross worn by the saint, sculptured of a beautiful white stone, on the eastern gable of the Church of England chapel, and have adopted the device for their common seal. It appears also alternated with the sacred monogram in the diamonds of Hartley's patent glass, with which the windows are filled. This interesting relic of antiquity was found upon what was considered by many to be the saint's body, when his stone coffin was opened at Durham, in 1827. The following is the statement of interments in the cemetery, for the year ending 31st December, 1857:—

WREAY CHAPELRY.

This chapelry, whose mother church is that of St. Mary, Carlisle, is bounded on the north and west by the new parish of Upperry, on the south by High Hesket, and on the east by the river Petteril. The inhabitants who reside in the small villages or hamlets of Wreay and Foulbridge, and some scattered houses, are principally engaged in agricultural pursuits: they attend the Carlisle and Penrith markets. There is a tile manufactory carried on by Mr. Howe, of Carlisle. The soil here is good and fertile, with a portion of meadow and arable land resting on a clayey, and in some parts a sandy subsoil. The Lancaster and Carlisle Railway runs through the chapelry, and there is a station close to the village.

The population of Wreay township in 1801 was 118; in 1811, 104; in 1821, 130; in 1831, 166; in 1841, 151; and in 1851, 149. Its area is 1,088 acres. The parsonal rights of the township are vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. James Losh, Esq., William S. Losh, Esq., Miss Losh, Joseph Scott, Esq., William Carrick, Esq., John P. Fletcher, Esq., John K. Saul, Esq., and Mr. William Thomlinson, are the principal landowners.

The village of Wreay occupies a pleasant situation, five miles south by east of Carlisle, at the southern extremity of Cumberland Ward.

THE CHAPEL.

The chapel was entirely rebuilt in 1843, at a cost of about £1,200; the whole of which sum, with the exception of a small donation from the patrons of the living, and the contributions of a few friends, was defrayed by Miss Losh, of Woodside. It is in the Norman style, consisting of nave and chancel, with turret, crowned by a Roman eagle, and containing, in two niches, statues of Saints Peter and Paul. The western doorway, which is arched, is much admired, being ornamented with flowers of the water lily, &c. The interior is very neat, and all the windows being of stained glass, the "dim religious light," adds much to the impressiveness and solemnity of the sacred edifice; the three in the west end are richly executed. The chancel, which is semi-circular in form, is very beautiful, and its windows are cut to represent antediluvian flowers. Here are seven lamps, apparently lighted, intended to represent the seven spirits mentioned in the Book of Revelations. Two eagles in brass, support the communion table; another, richly carved in wood, serves as a reading desk; and numerous figures of angels, birds, &c. ornament the interior of the structure. The oaken roof of the chapel is also beautifully carved, and was furnished from the well wooded lawn of Woodside, the seat of Miss Losh, whose prolific mind furnished the various devices for this splendid little edifice, which is fitted up in the style of some of the Italian churches. In the adjoining churchyard, there is a beautiful monument, by Dunbar, to the memory of the late Miss Catherine Losh. It consists of a figure of the deceased in white polished marble, and occupies an antique Druidical cell, near to which stands a stone cross, eighteen feet high, a copy of one in Bewcastle churchyard, with a Latin inscription to the memory of the late John Losh, Esq. and his wife. The cemetery, at a short distance from the chapel, as also the sexton's house, was the gift of Miss Losh. The former contains a neat oratory, a copy of one at Perranzabuloe, Cornwall.

The chapelry of Wreay existed at least as early as the reign of Edward II., but how much greater its antiquity may be, we have no means of ascertaining. In 1319, Bishop Halton allowed a chaplain to it, to celebrate the divine offices and administer the sacraments, on condition that he constantly resided within his chapelry. In 1739, the old chapel was consecrated by Bishop Fleming, and the incumbent's salary was made into £20 a year, with a house. Wreay had no other endowment than the interest of a chapel stock of £200, till augmented in 1757, by Queen Anne's Bounty. The living, a perpetual curacy, is in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Carlisle, and is now worth £86 per annum. The tithes were commuted in 1830, for £30 11s. 7d.

The parsonage is a neat building, in the Elizabethan style, erected by the present incumbent, in 1846, on the site of the old parsonage, at a cost of £656.

CHARITIES.

School.—John Brown, Esq. of Woodside, by will dated 27th March, 1763, left to certain trustees, £600 in trust, to pay the interest of £200, part thereof for and towards increasing the salary of the schoolmaster of Wreay School. A part of the money was laid out soon afterwards in the purchase of land in Wreay, amounting to rather more than ten acres. The land is now let by the school trustees for the benefit of the master. The school-house was built by subscription in 1760. In 1830 Miss Losh built a new school, near the site of the old one, and endowed it with thirty acres of pasture land, which now lets for about £10 a year, which sum is applied to the education of poor children of the adjoining townships. The master's house erected by the same lady, is on the model of one discovered among the ruins of Pompeii. The school is now under government inspection, supported by the quarter pence of the children, and has an average attendance of 60 pupils. There is also a girl's school, attended by about 20 scholars. The late Miss Margaret Losh bequeathed to each of the above schools £50, which is invested in the Newcastle and Carlisle railway, and the interest applied as directed.

Louthian's Gift.—Richard Louthian gave £50 to the minister and twelve men of Wreay, to be distributed, or otherwise invested, as they should think proper. This legacy was received in the year 1786, and is in the hands of the family of Losh, by whom the interest is regularly paid. The amount, £2 5s. is given away at Candlemas, to three or four poor persons not receiving parochial relief.

Wreay Working Men's Reading Room was established in 1856. It is well supplied with periodicals, and comprises a library of nearly 400 volumes. The members pay a subscription of two shillings per annum.

Foulbridge is a hamlet in the township, about a mile south-west of Wreay.

BEAUMONT PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the north by the river Eden, on the west by Burgh-upon-Sands, on the south by Moorhouse, and on the east by Grinsdale. It has no dependent townships. The inhabitants are located in the village of Beaumont, and in a few scattered houses and farms. Agriculture is their principal employment, and they attend the markets at Carlisle. The soil here is rich and fertile.

Beaumont township comprises an area of 1470 acres, and its rateable value is £1,288. The population in 1801 was 219; in 1811, 270; in 1821, in consequence of many labourers being employed in this and the adjoining parishes, in the construction of a canal, it was 323; in 1831, 276; in 1841, 288; and in 1851, 294. A portion of the township is intersected by the Carlisle and Port Carlisle railway, formerly a canal. The Roman wall passed through this parish, and some traces of it, as well as of the vallum, are still to be seen. The course of the wall was as follows:—It entered the parish at Beaumont Beck, near the Eden, and proceeding in a direct line to the church, went thence in a westerly direction to Burgh-upon-Sands.

The manor of Beaumont was held in ancient times by the Bruns, lords of Bowness, who were also the patrons of the living. Previous to 1380 it became, by purchase, the property of the Dacre family, and has since continued annexed to the barony of Burgh, now held by the Earl of Lonsdale, who is therefore lord of Beaumont. The principal landowners, in addition to the lord of the manor, are, John Hodgson, Esq.; Rev. J. Hodgson; Robert Faulder, Esq.; G. H. Oliphant, Esq.; William Jackson, Esq.; Mary Wilson; George Gill Mounsey, Esq.; William Daud, Esq.; Christopher Elliot, Esq.; — Rothwell, Esq.; and Elizabeth Brown.

The village of Beaumont occupies a gentle eminence on the west bank of the Eden, about four miles north-west of Carlisle, and commands beautiful views of that city, as well as of the Solway Frith, and the irregular country about Rockliff. Here are a tile manufactory and a corn mill.

THE CHURCH.

The church, which since 1692 has been common to the parishes of Beaumont and Kirkandrews, is dedicated to St. Mary. It is a plain structure in the Norman style. The chancel arch has at some time been removed, otherwise the church is in a fair state of preservation. The Earl of Lonsdale is patron of the united livings of Beaumont and Kirkandrews-on-Eden. Among those who have exercised the right of presentation to Beaumont, we find the name of Robert de la Ferete, lord of Beaumont, in 1296; in 1306, Sir Richard de Brun, Knt., presents; in 1339, Matilda Brun, lady of Beaumont; in 1366, William Beauchamp, rector of Kirkoswald, Thomas de Tughall, vicar of Torpenhow, and Robert Page, chaplain, present; in 1380, Sir Hugh de Dacre; in 1562, Sir William Dacre, Knt.; in 1581, the Earl of Arundel; in 1611, Anne, Countess Dowager of Arundel, and again in 1615; in 1616, Bishop Snowdon. The living, a rectory, valued in the King's Book at £8 1s. 8d., is worth about £134. The tithes were commuted for £134 2s. 9d., in 1827, by special act of parliament. The parish register commences in 1692.

Monkhill and New Sandsfield are hamlets in this parish. The single houses having particular names are, Priest Hill; Casson Dyke; Kinney Garth, anciently Coney Garth, now a place for cattle to shelter in; and Holmes Mill.

CHAIRMAN.

Pattinson's Charity.—Thomas Pattinson left the interest of £50 to the schoolmaster of this parish, Kirkcandrewston Eden, and Grimsdale, shares and share alike, if more than one, for teaching the children of those parishes who should not receive parish relief.¹ There is no school at Beaumont, but the inhabitants subscribed to the building of one at Kirkcandrews, the master of which receives the interest of Mr. Pattinson's bequest.

Mrs. Hodgson's School.—The children of parents, within the parish of Beaumont, not possessed of a real estate of £12 per annum, are entitled to free instruction at the school founded by Mrs. Hodgson, at Wiggonby, in Aikton parish; but the distance between Beaumont and Wiggonby is too far to render this privilege of much value.

BOWNESS PARISH.

BOWNESS occupies a large headland stretching eastward into the Solway, and extends about six miles in length from east to west, and two miles in breadth from north to south. It is bounded on the north by the Solway, on the west by the Solway and the river Wampool, on the south by the Wampool and Aikton parish, and on the east by Aikton, Kirkbampton, and Burgh-on-Sands. It comprises the townships of Bowness, Anthorn, Drumburgh, and Fingland, whose united area is 1794 acres. Carlisle and Wigton are the markets usually attended by the inhabitants. A large track of moss-land, containing several hundred acres, called Bowness Flow, situated near the river Wampool, in Bowness and Anthorn townships, has been recently drained and reclaimed.

POPULATION.

The population of this township in 1801 was 220; in 1811, 318; in 1821, in consequence of the presence of labourers employed in the construction of a canal, it had increased to 471; in 1831, it was 358; in 1841, 624; and in 1851, 508. Its rateable value is £2,053 15s. The soil here varies from a good reddish clay or marl to a light gravelly soil resting on blue clay. The Carlisle and Port Carlisle railway runs through an angle of the township. On Bowness Flow there is a chemical works, carried on by Mr. David Dick, of Burgh-on-Sands; and an asphaltic manufactory, carried on by Mr. John Hollingworth, of Carlisle.

"Bowness," says Collingwood Bruce, "is the name of the bow-shaped ness, or peninsula, at the extreme point of the left bank of the Solway Frith. It is slightly elevated above the surrounding country, as is plainly seen when it is viewed from a distance. A little to the east of the site of the station (Roman), the Solway is easily fordable at low water; but no one in the memory of the inhabitants of these parts has forded the estuary westward of the town. This circumstance would render Bowness a fit place to terminate the barrier wall. With difficulty the antiquary may see some slight traces of the walls of the station, its southern lines near the church being those which are most apparent. No quarry being within several miles of the spot, the wall and station have furnished the materials of which the church and most of the habitations of the town are composed. A small altar built up in the front of a barn in the principal street, has an inscription importing that it was dedicated to Jupiter, the best and greatest, by Sulpicius Secundianus, the tribune of the cohort for the safety of our lords the emperors Galbus and Volusianus. Bowness may be the Gabrosentum of the Notitia; Horsley reckoning Watchcross among the stations of the line, conceives it to be Tunnocelum."

Bowness appears to have been at a very early period parcel of the barony of Burgh, and was given by one of its first barons to Gamel le Brun, or Broynne, as the family afterwards spelled the name. The Bruns, or Broynes, continued to possess Bowness for several generations, and had their seat at Drumburgh, generally supposed to have been one of the stations on the Roman Wall, which ran through this parish, and from its contiguity to the wastes in this district, the family was sometimes called De la Feritate. Richard le Brun, and after him Robert le Brun, enjoyed it in the reign of Edward I. In the year 1307, the first year of the reign of Edward II., Richard le Brun obtained the king's license to crenellate "his house at Drombogh, in marchia Scotie;" and a similar license was given to Thomas Dacre, baron of Burgh, as lord paramount. Robert le Brun occurs in the reign of Edward III., and John Brun in that of Richard II. The last of this name and family at Bowness was Richard le Brun, who died about the latter part of the fourteenth century, and his co-heiresses having married into the Curwen, Harrington, and Bowett families, Bowness appears to have been re-united to Burgh Barony, as it still continues, being now the property of the Earl of Lonsdale, the lord paramount; besides whom, W. Hodgson, Esq.; Mrs. Wood; John, Daniel, and Thomas Lawson; John Topping; Robert Robinson; Pattinson Lawson; Mrs. Reed; John Lawson, senr.; and John Wills, are the principal landowners.

The village of Bowness is pleasantly situated on a rocky promontory, overlooking the Solway Frith, fourteen miles west-by-north of Carlisle, and ten miles north-by-west of Wigton.

THE CHURCH.

Bowness church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient building, the date of whose erection is unknown, but the materials employed are generally said to have been brought from the Roman station. The living, a rectory, has always been appendant to the manor, and is consequently in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. The benefice is valued in the King's Book at £21 18s. 11d., but is now worth about £450 a year, arising from the tithes, commuted for £326 5s. 6d. in 1838; 57 acres of glebe; 72 acres of land on the west common, let for £42 a year; and 191 acres of uncultivated land. The parish register commences in 1648.

The old rectory is about to be rebuilt; the rector resides at present (1858) in the village.

The parish school is a stone building, enlarged in 1835, with an average attendance of 40 pupils. It is under inspection, and is supported by quarter pence, donations from Pattinson's charity (as below), and William Hodgson, Esq.

CHARITIES.

Pattinson's Charity.—Thomas Pattinson, by will, dated the 16th of March, 1785, gave all his personal estate, after a few specific legacies, in trust, to be put out at interest, and the interest of £160, part thereof, to be paid annually, on the 1st of May, to the master teaching school at the new school-house at Easton, as an encouragement for teaching the children of the poor inhabitants of Drumburgh Quarter, not receiving alms, such children to be chosen by the trustees. And the testator declared his will to be, that in case the school-house should be vacant, or the trustees should not approve of the incumbent, in that case the interest of the money should accumulate for the benefit of a new incumbent. And that the trustees should pay the interest of £20 more for supplying fires for the school; and that the interest of other £100 should be paid annually, on the 1st of May, to the schoolmasters teaching school in the quarters of Bowness, Anthorn, and Whitrigge, to be divided equally among them, share and share alike, if more than one; and the interest of £20 towards instructing the poor children of the parish of Bowness in singing psalms. He also directed that the interest of another £100 should be paid annually to the schoolmaster of Burgh, Longburgh, and Moorhouse, in the parish of Burgh-on-Sands, as an encouragement for his or their teaching poor children of the parish of Burgh aforesaid, who should receive alms of the said parish. Also, the interest of another £100 to a schoolmaster of the parish of Orton, for teaching children of the parish not receiving relief. Also, the interest of another £50 to the schoolmasters of the parishes of Beaumont, Kirkandrews-on-Eden, and Grinsdale, share and share alike, if more than one, for teaching the children of these parishes who should not receive relief. Also, the interest of other £50 to the schoolmaster teaching school in the townships of Harraby, Carlton, and Brisco, share and share alike, if more than one. Also, the interest of other £100 to the schoolmaster of Blackball. The several sums above mentioned were invested in the year 1787, by the trustees, in the purchase of stock in the Three-per-cent Consols, at 77½, thus producing, for every £100 so laid out, £3 17s. yearly, which rate of interest is paid regularly every year, on the 1st of May, to the different parishes entitled to receive the benefit of these donations.

Troutbeck's Charity.—Robert Troutbeck, by will, proved 6th June, 1700, gave to the poor of Bowness £50, the interest thereof to be distributed every year by a Troutbeck or the minister and churchwardens for the year. This sum was laid out in the purchase of about three acres of land at Wigton, which produces about £13 a year. The rent is distributed about Easter, every year, by the minister and churchwardens, amongst poor persons not receiving parish relief.

Port Carlisle, formerly Fisher's Cross, is a village within the township, situated near the junction of the Eden and the Esk with the Solway Frith, twelve miles north-west of Carlisle. Less than thirty years ago it contained only two houses, Kirkland House, and a small inn, called the "Binnacle." It has now grown to a respectably-sized village, and possesses an hotel, inns, and good accommodation for sea bathers, by whom the place is much frequented. It is connected with Carlisle by a railway, an account of which will be found at page 65; previous to the construction of the railway a canal joined the two places. The Solway Frith has been well buoyed and lighted, and a considerable trade is carried on with Belfast, Liverpool, and other ports. The depth of water at the entrance of the port is 18 feet 6 inches. There is a private school in the village, under the direction of the rector of the parish. At Port Carlisle is a mound resembling an ancient British Barrow, called Fisher's Cross. About half a mile to the westward of it is another, which has been somewhat encroached upon by the road that runs along the margin of the Solway, and is denominated Knock's Cross. The proverb is common throughout Cumberland, "As old as Knock's Cross." In the front of the Steampacket Hotel, Port Carlisle, is built up the fragment of a small Roman altar, bearing the inscription, "SVIS MATRIBVS." It is one of the numerous instances that we meet with along the line of the Roman wall, of altars dedicated to the Dea Matres. Between Port Carlisle and Bowness the site of the Roman wall may be traced nearly the whole way; not unfrequently the foundations of it and its fosse may be discerned. In one place some large stones resembling those used in forming the gateways of the mile castles will be noticed.

ANTHORN.

Anthorn township contained in 1801, 170 inhabitants; in 1811, 161; in 1821, 203; in 1831, 230; in 1841, 207; and in 1851, 211. The soil here is chiefly of a gravelly nature, with a large tract of moss; 410 acres are called "Ancient land," the rest was enclosed in 1826. This township forms part of the manor of Bowness, of which the Earl of Lonsdale is lord paramount. The principal landowners are Messrs. John R. Donald, George Donald, John Messenger, John Pape, Thomas B. Topping, John Pattinson, Mrs. Backhouse, and Mrs. Wilson.

The village of Anthorn is situated on the north bank of the estuary of the Wampool, about four miles south-west of Bowness.

Cardarnock is another village in this township, four miles west-south-west of Bowness, on the verge of a tongue of land which terminates the parish.

Longcroft is also a village in this township, three miles south by west of Bowness. Here there is a school, a small plain building, with an average attendance of thirty children. It is under inspection and supported by quarter pence.

DRUMBURGH.

The rateable value of this township is £2,314 10s. 6d. Its population in 1801 was 299; in 1811, 299; in 1821, in consequence of the formation of the canal, it had increased to 418; in 1831 it was 384; in 1841, 470; and in 1851, 430. The soil is partly fertile, with some mossy barren land. The Port Carlisle, and Carlisle and Silloth railways run through this township, and have a station at this village. The principal landowners here are the Earl of Lonsdale (lord paramount), Mrs. Anna Lawson, Miss T. Lawson, and Messrs. William Borradaile, Edward Barnes, Thomas Lawson, John Lawson, Faulder Lawson, William Nixon, Christopher Watson, Thomas Pattinson, John Norman, John Watson, Joseph Pattinson, Jeremiah Sharpe, and Thomas Sanderson.

Drumburgh contains distinct remains of a small stationary Roman camp. This, if Watch Cross be rejected, was the sixteenth station of the wall, and consequently the Axeldunum of the Notitia, which was garrisoned by the first cohort of the Spaniards. The camp is on the ground of Richard Lawson, Esq. The ramparts are well defined, as well as the ditch which surrounds them. The whole area is covered with a luxuriant sward, and its northern margin is shaded by some thriving ash trees. No portion of the wall remains in its vicinity, but its present proprietor remembers witnessing the removal of the foundation. The northern rampart of the station did not come up to the wall, but was removed a few yards from it; probably, the military way ran between the station and the wall. The station at Barr Hill, on the Antonine Wall, is similarly situated. South of the station is a well, enclosed by a circular wall of Roman masonry. It is still in use, though the water is drawn up from it by a pump.

Drumburgh Castle, the ancient seat of the Bruns, lords of Bowness, is a fine specimen of the ancient fortified manor-house. It is built of Roman stones, and now serves as a farmhouse. It appears to have been rebuilt in the reign of Henry VIII. by Thomas, Lord Daere. John Aglionby, Esq., purchased the demesne of Drumburgh, in the year 1678, of Henry, Duke of Norfolk, and, according to Denton, repaired the castle, which was then in ruins; some years afterwards he conveyed it to Sir John Lowther, in exchange for Nunnery.

The village of Drumburgh occupies a pleasant situation, on an eminence, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Bowness, at the junction of the Port Carlisle and Carlisle and Silloth lines of railway. Here is a school, erected by subscription and a grant from the National Society, in 1834, at a cost of £150. It is under government inspection, and is supported by quarter pence and an annual grant of £20 from W. Hodgson, Esq., of Bowness. The average attendance of children is about 70. In 1849, the Earl of Lonsdale gave £10 for the erection of a gallery, ventilation, &c., a part of which was given to Bowness School. W. Hodgson, Esq., is about to erect a school here at his own expense.

Easton is a hamlet in Drumburgh township, four and a half miles east-by-south of Bowness. The school here, which receives £6 18s. 8d. a year from Thomas Pattinson's charity, has been closed for some time.

Glasson is another hamlet in this township, two miles south-east of Bowness, where there is a small Primitive Methodist chapel, which was erected in 1844, at a cost of about £80. A subterraneous forest was cut through in the excavation of the canal, near the banks of the Solway Frith, about half a mile north-west of this village, and extending into Kirkland. The trees were all prostrate, and they had fallen with little deviation, in a northerly direction, or a little eastward of it. Some short trunks of two or three feet in height were in the position of their natural growth; but, although the trees, with the exception of the alburnum and all the branches, were perfectly sound, yet the extremity of the trunks, whether fallen or standing, were so rugged, that it was not discoverable whether the trees had been cut down, or had fallen by a violent storm. The level upon which the trunks lay was a little below that of high tides, and from eight to ten feet above the surface of the ground they were embedded in; which, excepting the superficial soil, is a soft blue clay, having the appearance of marine alluvion. . . . Although the precise period when the forest fell is not ascertainable, there is a positive proof that it must have been long prior to the building of the wall, because the foundations of the wall passed obliquely over it, and lay three or four feet above the level of the trees. Arch. Æl. ii. 117. The forest extends over a considerable tract of ground. It is probable that it was overthrown by a tempest from the south or south-west, at a time when the sea occupied a lower level than it does at present. The wood was so sound that it was used in common with other oak timber in forming the jetties at the outlet of the canal into the Solway Frith.

FINGLAND.

The area of this township is 1864 acres, and its rateable value £1,524 2s. 6d. The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 136; in 1811, 129; in 1821, 128; in 1831, 104; in 1841, 187; and in 1851, 236. The Carlisle and Silloth railway intersects the township. The landowners are Mrs. Hodgson, Messrs. William Nixon, Robert Pattinson, John Halifax, William and James Corry, William Carr, John Story, Nathan Hollday, and William Beaty. Fingland forms part of the manor of Bowness. Whitrigge, in this township, was anciently the property of a family to whom it gave name, one of whose co-heiresses carried it by marriage to the Skeltons.

The village of Fingland is five miles south-south-east of Bowness.

The hamlet of Whitrigge is situated on the north bank of the Wampool, three miles south-by-east of Bowness.

The school is a neat stone building, erected by subscription and a grant from the School Building Society about the year 1844; it is under government inspection, supported by quarter pence and private subscriptions, and has an average attendance of forty pupils.

BURGH-UPON-SANDS PARISH.¹

This parish is bounded on the north by the river Eden and Rockcliffe parish, on the west by Bowness, on the south by Orton and Kirkcrampton, and on the east by Beaumont. It includes the townships of Burgh-upon-Sands, Long-burgh, Boustead Hill, anciently Burghstead Hill, and Moorhouse and Thurstonfield, whose united area is 7,839 acres. Burgh Marsh is a stinted pasture of about 1400 acres of alluvial soil, extending from Old Sandsfield to a brook called Fresh Creek in the township of Boustead Hill.

The population of this township in 1801 was 326; in 1811, 357; in 1821, 499; in 1831, 457; in 1841, 512; and in 1851, 541. The inhabitants are principally yeomen, who reside in the village of Burgh-upon-Sands and a few detached dwellings. They attend the Carlisle markets. The soil here is very fertile, consisting of good vegetable mould. The township is intersected by good public roads, and by the Carlisle and Silloth and Port Carlisle railways, a station on which is situated at Burgh, and also a dépôt for coal and lime.

In Horsley's day the remains of the ramparts of the Roman Wall were to be seen at a place called Oldcastle, a little to the east of the parish church. He says, "On the west side these remains are most distinct, being about six chains in length; and Severus's Wall seems to have formed the north rampart of the station. I was assured by the person to whom the field belonged that stones were often ploughed up in it, and lime with the stones. Urns have also frequently been found here. I saw, besides an imperfect inscription, two Roman altars lying at a door in the town, but neither sculptures nor inscriptions are now visible upon them. . . . If, besides all this, we consider the distance from the last station at Stanwix, I think it can admit of no doubt but there must have been a station here, though most of its ramparts are now levelled, the field having been in tillage many years. I shall only further add, that it was very proper to have a station at each end of the marsh, which, if the water flowed as high as some believe, would make a kind of bay." At present little meets the eye of the inquirer to inform him of the spot where the station stood, but when the surface of the ground is broken, the traces of a Roman city are still sufficiently distinct. The churchyard is filled with fragments of red sandstone blocks. At the depth of two feet it contains several distinct lines of foundations. Entire lachrymatory vessels, and fragments of unglazed jars and urns, and glazed bricks for the pavement of baths, have repeatedly been dug up. A small bronze figure was recently found. When the canal was cut, blocks of stone, blackened by smoke, were dug out of the soil to the south-east of the church. A few inscribed stones have been found since Horsley's day, but none of them name the cohort which was stationed in the camp. Hence we have no means of knowing whether Burgh is, as Horsley states it to be, the Axeldunum of the Notitia, or Congavata, according to the opinion of Hodgson. Among the Roman altars which have been found here there is one inscribed "DEO RELATVCA;" another, "DEO RELATVCADEO POSVIT AEMMI PRO SE ET SVIS;" a third, "ALATVN . . . EPO S. CENSORIVS SALVTE NVA . . . ES ET POS."

Near to Burgh is the site on which the castle of Sir Hugh de Morville formerly stood. The adjoining field is called "Hang-man-tree," doubtless because the lord had his gallows here always ready for use. A neighbouring enclosure bears a designation not less ominous, "Spillblood Holme."

After the Conqueror had given the county of Cumberland to Ranulph de Meschines, the latter divided the same into seven baronies, of which Burgh is one, and comprises the parishes of Burgh, Bowness, Aikton, Thursby, Orton, Kirkbampton, Kirkandrews-on-Eden, and Grinsdale. It was given by Ranulph de Meschines to his brother-in-law, Robert D'Estrivers, or Trivers, who married a sister of the said Ranulph, and received from his brother-in-law the office of chief forester of Ingleswood, which dignity with its liberties and privileges continued to be held by the successive lords of Burgh until Thomas de Multon of Gilsland forfeited the same by joining in the insurrection of Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, in the reign of Henry III. Ibrida, the heiress of Robert, married Ranulph Engayne lord of Isell, and with her husband gave Haraby, near Carlisle, to the prior and convent of that city, which gift was confirmed by Hugh de Morville. Their granddaughter Ada brought this barony in marriage to Simon de Morville, son of Hugh de Morville, who in the third year of King Stephen (1188) was one of the witnesses to the charter of protection then made by David king of Scotland to the monks of Tynemouth. This Simon de Morville, in 1187, gave fifty marks for Engayne's lands. He had issue by his wife two sons, Roger and Richard, the latter of whom in 1069 gave 200 marks to Henry II for livery of those lands which he claimed with the daughter of William de Lancaster, and left issue Helena his daughter and heir married to Roland de Galway. Roger de Morville, the eldest son of Simon, had issue a son and heir, Hugh de Morville, who was one of the four knights who, on December 29th, 1170, assassinated Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, before the altar of St. Benedict, in his cathedral church,¹ "which done," say

¹ This township comprises Burgh Head and West End, formerly two independent townships, but owing to the difficulty of defining the boundaries of each, they are now united.

Nicolson and Burn." they entered the archbishop's stables, and taking his horses, rode to Knaresburgh in Yorkshire, (a town belonging to this Hugh,) where they stayed till all the inhabitants were weary of them. Mr. Denton says, the sword that killed Becket was in his father's time at Isell, which place belonged to the Morvilles as heirs of Engayne; after that, the said sword remained with the house of Arundel." This Hugh de Morville espoused Helewis de Stuteville, with whom he received the manors of Kirkoswald and Lazony; and in 1200 he obtained license to enclose the woods in Kirkoswald, as likewise to crenellate his manor house and have a fair once every year with a weekly market. "He also," say the writers just quoted, "gave the King (John) fifteen marks and three good palfreys to enjoy his court, with the liberties of toll, theam, infangtheof, fire and water ordeal and all other such privileges as belong to the crown, during the continuance of Helewis his wife in a regular habit." Hugh died without male issue leaving two daughters, Ada and Joan, the former of whom was married twice, the first time during her father's life to Richard son of Reginald de Lucy, lord of Egremont, and afterwards to Thomas de Multon. Joan, the younger, was married after her father's death, to Richard Gernon. Upon the division of Hugh's estates, in 1204, between these his daughters and co-heirs, Richard de Lucy paid a fine of 900 marks and five palfreys for the share of Ada his wife, and the forestership of Cumberland, as fully as the said tenure had been enjoyed by Hugh de Morville; and Richard Gernon gave 600 marks for liberty to marry Joan, with the share belonging to her of the land of which her father had died seised. Two daughters, Amabel and Lucy, were the fruit of Ada's marriage with Richard de Lucy. To her second husband Thomas de Multon, she bore a son Thomas de Multon, who became heir to her portion of the Morville estates. This Thomas, in 1251, had livery of his lands, for which he paid a fine of £40; and the forestership of Cumberland also descending to him from his mother, he, in 1252, paid for that dignity 400 marks. He married Maud, daughter and heir to Hubert de Vaux, baron of Gilsland, and in 1253 obtained for himself and his wife a charter of free warren in all his demesne lands in Cumberland, Yorkshire, Norfolk, and Suffolk; and that "they and their heirs, after the decease of Maud de Vaux her mother (then the wife of William Everard) should have free warren in all the demesne lands they held in the counties of Somerset and Devon, being of the dowry of the said Maud the mother, and of the inheritance of Maud the daughter." In 1258 he was summoned to attend with horse and arms, and to march with the other barons of the north into Scotland for the purpose of rescuing the King of Scots, who was then a minor, and said to be kept in restraint by his own subjects; and by another summons he was required to be at Chester on the Monday before the feast of St. John the Baptist (June 24) to restrain the incursions of the Welsh. He died in 1268 or 1269, leaving a son and heir Thomas de Multon, who performing homage came into possession of his lands. This Thomas received a considerable accession to his property on the demise of Helwis de Levington, widow of Eustace de Baliol, in 1271, when he was found to be her heir as to the whole manor of Aikton, and the other moiety of Burgh-on-Sands, Kirkoswald, and Lazony; all which Eustace de Baliol (having had issue by her which lived for some time) held of her inheritance as tenant by the courtesy of England till his death, which happened in 1274, when Thomas de Multon came into possession. He died in 1293, and the estates devolved upon his son and heir Thomas de Multon, who at that time was in the twenty-sixth year of his age; but he did not enjoy them long, for he died two years afterwards, being then seised of the manor of Denham in the county of Norfolk, as also of the manors of Burgh-upon-Sands and Kirkoswald, also of the barony of Gilsland, and lands in Santon, Irtton, Bolton, and Gosforth, leaving Thomas, his son and heir, thirteen years of age, and Isabel his wife surviving, who had for her dowry the manor of Denham, which had been made over to her by transfer of title. Thomas de Multon paid £100 for relief, and in 31 Edward I. (1303) served in the war with the Scots, and again in 1306. The following year he was ordered to fit himself with horse and arms, and join John de Lancaster and Ingleram de Gysnes, in resisting the incursions of the Scots under Robert Bruce. Two years later we find him in the Scottish wars, and again in 1310. In 1316 he obtained for himself and Margaret his wife a special charter from Edward II., by which he was empowered to hold a market weekly on Wednesdays, and two fairs every year, one on the eve, day, and morrow after the festival of Our Lady, the other on the eve, day, and morrow after the festival of Sts. Simon and Jude at Ayshall in Somersetshire; as also free warren in all his demesne lands at Seven Hampton in the said county of Somerset, and Pyubo in the county of Devon. He was summoned to Parliament amongst the barons of the realm, from 1297 to 1314 inclusive, and died after the last-named year, leaving issue Margaret, married to Ranulph de Dacre, who performing fealty to Edward II., his wife making proof of her age, came into possession of her estates. Her uncle William, the brother of her father, was, however, the heir male, and held the manor of Lazonby during his life; but on his death in 1341, the whole of the Multon estates became centred in her, and by this means became the property of the Dacres, which family received a further large addition of fortune by marriage with the heiress of Greystoke. The eldest branch of the Dacre family terminated in a daughter, to whom descended, with some others, the original estate at Dacre. The other estates, Greystoke, Gilsland, Burgh, &c., were settled upon "a younger branch of the Dacres of the male line, which continued in that name for four descents further, and then that branch ended in coheirs; for George lord Dacre, in the 11th year of Queen Elizabeth (1569), dying without male issue, was succeeded by his three sisters, one of whom dying unmarried, the estate came to the two other sisters, Anne the elder, married to Philip earl of Arundel, and Elizabeth the younger, married to the lord William Howard, both of them sons of Thomas duke of Norfolk. The barony of Burgh, in the partition, was allotted to the lady Anne, whose descendant in the fourth generation, Henry Howard, Duke of Norfolk, sold the same about 1689, to Sir John Lowther, of Lowther."¹ The barony is now held by the Earl of Lonsdale, the present head of the house of Lowther. The customs of the manor of Burgh, as confirmed by a decree of Chancery in 1674, are as follow:—Upon every general fine or change of tenant by death, the tenants pay a twentypenny fine, or two years improved value, at the option of the lord; and a thirtypenny fine, or three years improved value, upon every change of tenant by sale or alienation, at the like option. Customary courts are occasionally held here by the Earl of Lonsdale. Most of the tenements are now enfranchised. An ancient and singular custom of holding races on the death of the lord of the manor is still preserved, when a silver prize cup is given by the new lord; the race being restricted to horses bred in the barony. The last of these sports was in 1844, on the accession of the present Earl of Lonsdale. In addition to the lord of the manor, the landowners are, Mr. George Blaylock, Miss Aglionby, G. H. Oliphant, Esq.; Mr. John Norman, Mrs. Moffatt, Mr. Matthews Hodgson, Mrs. J. Hodgson, Mr. John Hodgson. Mr. Samuel Blaylock, Mr. W. Tinnion, Mr. R. Liddell, and others.

The village of Burgh-upon-Sands occupies a fine situation five miles west-by-north of Carlisle, near and along the site of the celebrated Roman Wall. In and around the village is a large number of boulder stones, some of them half a ton in weight. They are of granite, and in some distant age have been torn from the summit of Criffel, the hill which lends so much beauty to the landscape on the northern side of the Solway. On Burgh Marsh, about a mile north of the village, is a monument to the memory of Edward I.—"Malleus Scotorum"—who died there in 1307. It was erected by the Earl of Lonsdale, in 1803, upon the site of an old one, and bears the following inscription:—"OMNI VENERATIONE PROSEQUENS INVICTAM EDWARDI PRIMI FAMAM, OPTIMI ANGLIE REGIS, COLUMNAM HANC HUMILITUS AMBUTAMQUE, HIC REPENDENDAM CURAVIT GULIELMUS VICECOMES DE LOWTHER, ANNO SALUTIS MDCCCIII." Camden tells us that Burgh Marsh, or rather the very estuary of the Solway, was the scene of a fight between the English and Scots.

THE CHURCH.

Burgh Church, dedicated to St. Michael the archangel, is very ancient, but having undergone great alterations in the course of ages, presents many different styles of architecture—the north entrance is Saxon. The tower is very strongly fortified, the walls on three sides being from six to seven feet thick. The vaulted chamber on the ground floor is only ten feet by eight, and the entrance to it from the church is secured by a ponderous iron door, six feet eight inches in height, with two large bolts exactly resembling one remaining at Naworth Castle. On the north side of the chamber is a very narrow opening, or arrow slit, at the end of the recess in the wall, six feet three inches deep; and on the west side are two such openings, (one of them only three inches wide), with steps leading up to them. At the south-west angle is a stone staircase, leading to the upper chamber, the dimensions of which are 10 feet 9½ inches by 11 feet 7½ inches. On the east side of the room is an opening into the upper part of the nave of the church, and on the south and west sides are small narrow windows. This tower was probably built in the reign of Edward I., and there can be no doubt that it often served as a place of refuge during the border wars. Many hewn stones appear in different parts of the building with the exterior surface reticulated, evidently taken from the Roman Wall, or the station the site of the churchyard and church. The church, which was anciently rectorial, was granted by Sir Hugh de Morville, one of the lords of Burgh, to the abbey of Holme Cultram, "for the finding of lights, wine, and other necessities for the ornament of the church of Holme Cultram, and the service of the altar there." This grant was confirmed by Richard de Lucy, first husband of Ada, daughter of Hugh de Morville, and afterwards by Thomas de Multon, her second husband, who granted further to the abbot and convent common of pasture in the village of Burgh after the hay and corn should be carried off, and two acres of arable land in Burgh Marsh, and a fishery in Eden, with two nets for every carucate of land which they had in Burgh. Joan de Morville, second daughter of Sir Hugh, confirmed the said grant, for the health of her soul and of the soul of her husband Richard de Gernon, of her father, Hugh de Morville, and all her ancestors and successors. The same was likewise confirmed by Pope Innocent IV., who granted to the abbot and convent liberty to apply the revenues of the said church to the use of their own house, for hospitality and maintenance of the poor, reserving a competent portion for a chaplain to officiate at Burgh. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the crown. It is valued in the King's Book at £5 1s. 11½d., but was certified to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, at £13 8s., after which, in 1758, it was augmented by Joseph Liddell and Queen Anne's Bounty, with £400, with which land was purchased. In 1843, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners granted to it £30, and in the same year the tithes were commuted for a yearly rent-charge of £23, so that the benefice is now worth about £120 per annum. The rectorial tithes, which formerly belonged to a number of lay impropiators, were redeemed by the landowners in 1829, except that portion belonging to Dovenby School, which was also purchased by the proprietors of the soil in 1846, for the sum of £500, so that the whole is now merged in the land. The parish register commences in 1653.

CHARITIES.

Pattinson's Charity.—Thomas Pattinson, by will, in 1785, directed that the interest of £100 should be paid annually to the schoolmaster of Burgh, Long Burgh, and Moorhouse, in this parish, as an encouragement for his or their teaching poor children of Burgh, who should not receive alms of the parish.¹ The sum of £3 17s., as interest of £100, is paid in equal proportions to two schoolmasters, one at Moorhouse, and the other at Burgh. The trustees send to each school as many poor children of the parish as the interest will pay for at the usual rate of quarterage.

Mrs. Hodgson's School.—The children of parents within the parish of Burgh, not possessed of a real estate of £12 per annum, are entitled to free instruction at the school founded by Mrs. Hodgson, at Wiggonby, in Aikton parish.¹

Hodgson's Charity.—Richard Hodgson, who died about 130 years ago, left £100 to the parish of Burgh, one moiety of the interest thereof to be distributed amongst poor householders of the parish not receiving relief, and the other moiety to be applied for the educating of poor people's children. The interest of this sum, £4, is divided annually, on Easter Monday, as directed by the testator.

Liddle's Charity.—John Liddle, who died in 1804, left £50 in trust, for poor people of the parish of Burgh not receiving parish relief. The interest of this sum, £2, is distributed annually, on Easter Monday, amongst poor householders not receiving assistance from the parish.

Mrs. French, Chelsea, grand-daughter of the Rev. Thomas Ismay, has for some years transmitted £3 10s. to be distributed according to her direction at the discretion of the vicar.

There are schools for boys, girls, and infants in the parish. There is also a subscription library, supported by about twenty members, and also a Sunday-school library.

John Stagg, the author of some poetical pieces in the Cumberland dialect, was a native of this place.

At West End, in this township, is a chemical works, about to be removed to Drumburgh Moss, Bowness parish, carried on by Mr. David Dick, who manufactures coppers, acids, sulphate of ammonia, &c.

BOUSTEAD HILL.

Boustead Hill township contained, in 1801, a population of 84 persons; in 1811, 65; in 1821, 80; in 1831, 63; in 1841, 74; and in 1851, 72. Its rateable value is £624 18s. The acreage is included in the parish returns. The principal landowners are Messrs. Samuel Rigg, W. Nixon, W. Morton, John Faulder, Thomas Rigg, and John Beattie.

The village of Boustead Hill is beautifully situated on a rising ground overlooking the Solway Frith, and on the south side of the Carlisle and Port Carlisle Railway, two miles west of Burgh.

LONG BURGH.

The number of inhabitants in this township in 1801 was 106; in 1811, 111; in 1821, 154; in 1831, 118; in 1841, 124; and in 1851, 127. The rateable value is £857 17s. The Roman Wall ran through part of this township. The principal landowners are G. H. Oliphant, Esq.; Messrs. John Hodgson, Robert Hodgson, and Samuel Blaylock; Miss Robson; and M. Hodgson, Esq. The soil here is a rich loam, and partly gravel. Long Burgh is intersected by the Port Carlisle Railway.

The village of Long Burgh is situated one mile west of Burgh, south of the Port Carlisle Railway, and contains two private schools.

Dykesfield, a hamlet in this township, north of Long Burgh, was long the seat and property of the family of Dykes, who removed thence to Dovenby. It is now the residence and property of Matthew Hodgson, Esq. On the western side of the hamlet is a common which contains several earthen ramparts and temporary camps.

MOORHOUSE.

The population of the township of Moorhouse in 1801, was 264; in 1811, 135; in 1821, 254; in 1831, 277; in 1841, 293; and in 1851, 343. Moorhouse possesses light but good soil, and its rateable value is £1,168 10s. The principal landed proprietors here are Major Ewart, Messrs. John Ostell, John Galloway, William and Thomas Stordy, and Robert Lamony. There are three corn mills in the township and a tannery.

The village of Moorhouse is pleasantly situated about two miles south of Burgh, and contains several neat houses. The school, which is entitled to a moiety of Pattinson's Charity, is in ruins.

Moorhouse Hall is a neat structure, the property of Mr. John Galloway, who purchased it of Major Ewart, and is now the residence of his son, Mr. J. Galloway.

The Society of Friends have a meeting house here, a brick building, erected in 1733, adjacent to which is their burial-ground, enclosed by a brick wall, and over the entrance to which is a slab bearing the date 1694.¹

Thurstonfield is a hamlet in this township, one mile west of Moorhouse, where there is a tannery.

¹ Thomas Stordy, who died in 1684, and Jonathan Ostell, who died in 1755, were natives of this parish, and zealous members of the Society of Friends. Being by law entitled to the impropriation of certain tithes, they demised them to the several owners on whose estates they arose. Mr. Stordy suffered many persecutions for his attachment to the principles of the society. In 1682, being at Carlisle Assizes, he went to see some of his friends then in prison in that city, when he was illegally detained by the gaoler, and next day brought before the court. As he refused to take the oath of allegiance then tendered to him, he was committed to prison, and next day sentence of peremure passed upon him, which entailed the loss of all his real and personal estates. In consequence of this sentence he was kept a close prisoner at Carlisle for ten years, but was at length released by the king, in 1672, and, through the intercession of the Earl of Carlisle, his real estate was restored to him. A few years afterwards he fell a victim to a statute of the 23rd of Elizabeth, and, for absenting himself from public worship, was cast into prison, where he died in 1684.

CROSBY-UPON-EDEN PARISH.

THIS parish comprises the townships of High Crosby, Low Crosby, Brunstock, and Wally, whose united area is 3500 acres. It is bounded on the north by Scaleby, on the west by Stanwix, on the south by the river Eden, and on the east by Irthington. A survey has recently been made for the commutation of tithes, but not completed. It may be worthy of remark that a curious boundary, or double fence, exists on the east side of the parish, adjoining the parish of Irthington, known by the name of the "Baron's Dyke," being a division between the barony of Gillsland and the barony of Linstock. The inhabitants, who are engaged entirely in agricultural pursuits, are industrious, cleanly, peaceable, and contented. They generally attend the Carlisle markets. The quality of the soil in the parish is various. Adjoining the river Eden is a rich dry loam, on a gravelly subsoil; in other parts there are portions of a strong clayey soil, with a portion of moor and meadow. The rateable value of the parish is, at the present time, £3,392. The military road between Newcastle and Carlisle intersects the parish, and runs nearly parallel with the old Roman Wall, which was on the northern side of the parish. This road was formed and completed soon after the rebellion of 1745, for the purpose, according to an old act of parliament, "of keeping a free and open communication between the city of Carlisle and the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and for the passage of troops, horses, and carriages at all times in the year." A great part of the labour required in the making of this road is supposed to have fallen to the lot of General Wade's army. There are also distinct remains of a Roman road running through the middle of this parish, in a direction of nearly east and west, the same as the present military road, and at a short distance from it. Many old coins have been discovered at various times, but none particularly worthy of notice. This parish possesses no ancient edifices or other objects of antiquarian curiosity, except that a grange is said to have been erected here after Linstock was given to the Church of Carlisle, and that it was called Crosby, on account of its belonging to the Church. It may be remarked that Linstock Castle, in the neighbouring parish of Stanwix, was formerly the residence of the bishops of Carlisle.

LOW CROSBY.

The population of Low Crosby township in 1801 was 156; in 1811, 161; in 1821, 184; in 1831, 204; in 1841, 133; and in 1851, 148. The soil here is a rich loam.

The manor or barony of Crosby, which has always been annexed to Linstock, and which includes the whole of the parish of Crosby-upon-Eden, is vested in the Bishop of Carlisle, to whose predecessors it was assigned by Gualo, the papal legate, on a partition of the estates of the bishop and priory. The other claimants are the Earl of Carlisle; Mr. Maude, of Sellaby, in Yorkshire; and the Vicar of Crosby. The Earl of Carlisle's claim would exist during the last century, and long before,—the vicar's from time immemorial. The other small manor, held by Mr. Maude, has not been long in his possession. Small sums, or lord's rents, are paid annually to the lords of the manors just named. The land in this manor is nearly all held by customary tenure, except a little of leasehold and freehold. The bishop's court was formerly held in this parish four times a year, but recently only once. The court rolls extend through a long period of time. The principal landowners in the township are Mrs. Saul; Richard Carruthers, Esq.; William Nicholson Hodgson, Esq.; and Thomas Phillips, Esq.

The village of Low Crosby stands upon the gently sloping banks of the river Eden, about four miles east-north-east of Carlisle.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. John, occupies the site of the ancient church of Crosby. It was erected in 1854, at a cost of £1,800. It is a beautiful and substantial structure, in the Gothic style, consisting of nave and chancel, with gallery for organ and choir, and contains about 200 sittings, the greater part of which are free. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle, who has been impropriator and patron for a long period. It is valued in the King's Book at £7 11s. 4d., but is now worth upwards of £150 per annum. The vicar receives, under commutation, the annual value of the hay and small tithes, together with the rental of the glebe. The whole tithes, great and small, have lately been commuted for £375. The parish registers commence in 1659.

CHARITIES.

Jackson's Charity.—Joseph Jackson, by will proved 13th November, 1773, bequeathed to the overseers of the poor of the parish of Crosby-on-Eden, £40, the interest of which was to be given to the poor annually in Easter week, at the discretion of the overseers. The interest, amounting to £2, is distributed as directed.

Patrickson's Charity.—This is another bequest left by the late Miss Patrickson, the interest of which is distributed to the poor at Christmas.

The parish school is a neat stone building in the Elizabethan style, erected by subscription in 1844, at a cost of £350. It is under government inspection, has an average attendance of upwards of 50 scholars, and is supported by voluntary subscriptions, with the interest of a legacy bequeathed by the late Miss Patrickson.

Eden Grove, a delightfully-situated villa in this township, is the seat of Richard Carruthers, Esq. Several houses in this parish take their names from the Roman wall, viz., Wall Head, Walby, Wall Dub; and fields also bear the names of walls.

BRUNSTOCK.

Brunstock township contained in 1801, a population of 65; in 1811, 63; in 1821, 53; in 1831, 108; in 1841, 75; and in 1851, 70. The land here is fertile and good, but rather cold, on a clayey subsoil. The principal landowners are Mrs. Saul, R. S. Dixon, Esq., and Mr. John Forster.

The village of Brunstock is about three miles north-north-east of Carlisle. Here stands Brunstock House, the beautiful seat of Mrs. Saul. It is a fine building in the Gothic style, surrounded by excellent grounds, and adds very much to the general appearance of the landscape. Crosby Lodge is also the property of the same lady.

HIGH CROSBY.

The population of this township in 1801 was 102; in 1811, 134; in 1821, 136; in 1831, 133; in 1841, 146; and in 1851, 162. The soil here is partly rich good land, with some poor, on a gravelly subsoil. The principal landed proprietors are Mrs. Saul, W. N. Hodgson, Esq., M.P., and Rev. Joseph Hudson, Messrs. John Nicholson, Robert Bell, and Mrs. Wright.

The village of High Crosby is about half-a-mile east of Low Crosby. Here are the Vicarage House, Crosby Lodge, and Crosby House, the latter of which was erected by the late Rev. Dr. Lowry, vicar of this parish, and now belongs to his grandson, the Rev. Joseph Hudson.

Newby Grange in this township, the seat of William Nicholson Hodgson, Esq., J.P. and M.P., is a handsome building in the Elizabethan style.

WALBY.

The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 36; in 1811, 52; in 1821, 46; in 1831, 52; in 1841, 49; and in 1851, 35. The landowners are Messrs. John Jameson, John Thompson, and John Dixon, and Mrs. Saul and Miss Heward.

The village of Walby is about four miles north-east of Carlisle.

DALSTON PARISH.

THE parish of Dalston extends about six miles in length by three in breadth. It is bounded on the north by portions of the parishes of St. Mary and Upperville, on the west by that of Thursby and Westward, on the south by Sebergham, and on the east by Leath Ward. The soil in general consists of a dry loam, except near the village of Dalston, where it is gravelly, and is mostly "laid down to grass for pasturage and meadow;" but all kinds of grain thrive well in every part of this extensive parish. A great part of the arable land lies rather low, with a gentle inclination to the river Caldew. Besides this river the parish is watered with the Raugh, Ivegill, and Shalk rivulets, and is remarkable for its ancient mansions, foremost amongst which stands Rose Castle, the seat of the bishops of Carlisle for many centuries. Dalston parish comprises the townships of Dalston, Buckhowbank, Cumdevoek, Hawkesdale, Ivegill, and Raughton and Gatesgill, whose united area is 15,072 statute acres.

DALSTON.

The population of this township in 1801 was 701; in 1811, 914; in 1821, 955; in 1831, 1109; in 1841, 1024; and in 1851, 1022. Its rateable value is £1788 15s. 9d. The Maryport and Carlisle Railway intersects the township.

The barony of Dalston was given by Ranulph de Meschines to a brother of Hubert de Vallibus, of Gilsland, named Robert, who thereupon assumed the name of Dalston, and it continued in the possession of his descendants till King Stephen gave Cumberland to David of Scotland, when the latter gave it to Henry Morison. It was, however, subsequently seized by Henry II. as an escheat, and remained in the possession of the crown till the year 1228, when Henry III. gave to Walter, Bishop of Carlisle, and his successors in the see for ever, "the manor of Dalston, with the advowson of the church there, with sac and soke, and woods and mills, and all other appurtenances; to hold the same disafforested, with power to assart¹ and make enclosures, and dispose of the wood at their will and pleasure, without the view and interruption of his foresters, verderers, regarders, or other officers; and that they shall be free from suits, and summonses, and pleas of the forest; and have liberty to hunt and take deer and other game within the said manor, and no other shall have such liberty without their permission; and shall hold the said manor as a forest, as the king held the same before the said grant. The said bishop and his successors to find one canon regular to say mass every day in the Church of St. Mary, Carlisle, for the souls of the king, and of his father, and all his ancestors and successors." And, by another charter, the same monarch further grants, "that if they, or any person with their permission, shall chase any game within their forest of Dalston, and the said game shall fly into the king's forest, they may pursue and take the same within the king's forest, and return without the molestation of the king's foresters, or other officers." In the reign of Edward I. this manor was claimed against the bishop, in a writ of right, by Michael de Hercla, who grounded his pretensions upon his descent from an heiress of the elder branch of the Dalston family, but without success. The barony of Dalston comprises the parish of Dalston, and the manors of Great Dalston, Little Dalston, Cardew, High Head, and Raughton and Gatesgill. The north part of the barony, which is in the parish of St. Mary, Carlisle, was assigned to the prior, and now forms the manor of John de Capella, belonging to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who have succeeded to the manors, &c., of the dean and chapter of Carlisle. The manor of Great Dalston comprises the principal portion of the parish, and is a mixed manor, consisting of freehold, copyhold, and customary tenements, with some leaseholders for life. The wife of a copyhold or customary tenant in this manor cannot be deprived of her dower by the husband selling or surrendering his estate, unless she join in such surrender. On the failure of male issue, the daughters of tenants inherit equally as coparceners. The principal land-owners here are Mrs. Richardson, Mrs. Cowen, Joseph Richardson, &c.

The village of Dalston is large and populous, occupying a pleasant situation on the picturesque banks of the Caldew, about four miles south-by-west of Carlisle, and has a weekly market for flesh on Fridays. An ancient cross, raised on several steps, and bearing several coats of arms, formerly stood at the east end of the village; it was, however, removed in 1815.

THE CHURCH.

Dalston Church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a neat and substantial structure, consisting of nave, chancel, and small transept, on the south-east. It contains a handsome font by Billinge, and a fine organ presented by George Cowen, Esq., in 1847. In the chancel there is a handsome marble monument to the memory of the late Rev. W. Fletcher, M.A., for thirty-two years chancellor of the diocese of Carlisle, and vicar of this parish for fifty-three years. He died April 1st, 1856, aged 79. The monument is by Watson of London, a native of this place, and contains a fine bust of the deceased. There is also a handsome tablet to the memory of the late Mrs. Salkeld, of Holm Hill. In the churchyard there is a monument to the late bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Percy, who died in February, 1856, and was buried here. The benefice is a vicarage, valued in the King's Book at £8 18s. 1½d.; but after the Restoration, it was augmented with corn tithes to the amount of £30 a year, and with a legacy of £300 left by Bishop Smith, which was expended in the purchase of land adjoining the Vicarage, so that the living is now worth about £300. The great tithes of Dalston are appropriated to the Bishop of Carlisle, who is patron of the living.

RECTORS.—Americ Theobald, 1203; Robert Pickering, 1204; John de Drockenford, 1292.

The Vicarage is a plain but neat building, close by the church, and has lately been enlarged and improved.

The Wesleyan Association Methodist Chapel is a small building, erected in 1851, at a cost of £250. It will accommodate about 300 hearers, and is attended by local preachers and the Carlisle ministers. There is a Sunday-school held in connection with this chapel.

The Grammar School was erected by subscription in 1815, and is open to all the children of the parish at a low quarterage. This school appears to have been founded at an early period, but part of the original endowment was lost during the civil wars in the reign of Charles I. From an account entered in a book belonging to this parish, called the School Book, it appears that there was, in 1663, the sum of £108 15s. 6d., the interest of which was applied as the salary to a school-master. In the year 1673, the school stock is entered as £110 15s. 6d.; and the following additions have subsequently been made by benefactions given expressly for the increase of that stock:—1678, by Bishop Rainbow, £10; 1684, Mrs. Elizabeth Painbow (widow of the bishop), £5; 1685, John Rayson, £2; 1694, 1695, two gifts made by Bishop Smith, £30; 1703, Madam Rainbow, £10; making in the whole, £167 15s. 6d. About the year 1703 there appears to have been paid towards the expenses of recovering part of this school stock, which was in the hands of one George Denton, £29 15s. 6d., leaving a balance of £138. This sum was afterwards reduced by expenses in repairing the school-house to £110, which was invested in the funds. In 1808 the stock was sold out for £120 10s. 4½d., and out of that money £10 10s. 4½d. was expended in enclosing an allotment made to the school, and £50 was added to a sum amounting to nearly £300, raised by subscription for the building of a new school-house. These expenses reduced the school stock to £60, which was placed out at interest. In addition to the £30 above mentioned, Bishop Smith, by indenture, dated March 22nd, 1696, gave to this school a cottage, and about seven acres of land in Hawkesdale, in this parish, and he also built a school-room at his own expense. About the year 1806, on the enclosure of the common land, in this parish, an allotment of two acres was made to the school, in pursuance of a clause in the enclosure act, which directed that a parcel of ground should be set out for the erection of a school-house for the parish and manor of Dalston. In 1847, the sum of £200 was left to this school by Mrs. Fletcher and Mrs. Hodgson, executrices of the late Chancellor Fletcher, who was the surviving trustee to the will of John Tiffin of Brownelson, whereby a sum of money was at his disposal for charitable purposes.

The National School is held in the old Methodist Chapel, erected in 1825, and is under the patronage of the vicar, who rents the chapel for the purpose. It will accommodate over 100 scholars, the average attendance is about 90.

There is a Working Men's Reading-Room here, which was established in 1848, and numbers about fifty members, who subscribe one penny per week, for which sum they have the use of a library containing about 400 volumes, and a daily and local newspapers. The entire management is in the hands of working men.

CHARITIES.

Benson's Charity.—Dr. Benson, who died about the year 1726, bequeathed £50 to the poor of this parish. The legacy was received in the following year, and, about 1798, it was invested in the funds. In 1808, this stock was sold for £54 16s., which sum was placed out at interest. It amounts now to £65 19s. 4d., three-per-cents, which is distributed annually by the minister and churchwardens amongst poor persons of the parish.

Strong's Charity.—Mary Strong, who died in 1814, left by will to the Rev. Walter Fletcher, and his successors, vicars of Dalston, £100, to be placed out, and the interest to be for ever applied to the instruction of poor girls of the parish. It has been since increased to £171 5s. 3d. The vicar is trustee for this charity.

There are two other charities, viz.:—Thomlinson's Charity for the poor, £27 13s. 5d. three-per-cents; and Tiffin's Charity for the poor, £100 three-per-cents,—the interest of which is distributed at Christmas.

Hutchinson tells us "there was a hermitage near Dalston; the recluse, in 1343, who occupied it, was called Hugh de Lilford; but where his cell was, or when, or by whom it was first constructed, there is no record or tradition to point out." It seems that there was a chapel appertaining to it, dedicated to St. Wynemius the Bishop, and indulgences were granted by Bishop Kirby, about the year 1343, to all such as should give any money, books, or vestments for the repair, &c., of the chapel. At some distance from the parish church, in a deep and romantic part of the vale of Caldew, surrounded by rock and hanging woods, there is a field called Chapel Flat, which is commonly supposed to have been the site of this chapel.

There was formerly a circle of rude stones, ten yards in diameter, near the village, supposed to have been the remains of a Druidical temple; and, at a little distance from it, was a tumulus, three yards high and eight in diameter. In the rich vale of Dalston there was a large earthen embankment, called a bar, or barrow, extending from Dalston Hall to Cumdevoek, a distance of three miles, raised for the purpose of protection against the incursions of the moss troopers. Near this embankment several "bar houses" were erected, and occupied by people whose duty it was, on the approach of the enemy, to give an alarm by the ringing of bells and blowing of trumpets, on the sound of which the inhabitants drove their cattle, &c., behind for safety.

The manor of Little Dalston belonged, from an early period, to the ancient family of Dalston, descended by a younger branch from Robert de Vallibus, to whom the barony of Dalston had been granted by Ranulph de Meschines. Sir William Dalston, the immediate descendant, a zealous royalist, was created a baronet in 1640. The title and the male line of the elder branch of this ancient family became extinct by the death of Sir George, the fifth baronet, in 1765. Four years before his death he sold his estate at Dalston to Monkhouse Davison, Esq., after whose demise it was purchased, in the year 1795, by John Sowerby, Esq., and is now the property of Colonel Sowerby.

Dalston Hall, at present a farmhouse, is a very ancient castellated structure, but the date of its erection cannot be ascertained; the chapel is now used for some of the purposes of the farm. Dalston Hall was the head quarters of General Lesley during the siege of Carlisle in 1644 and 1645.

BUCKHOWBANK.

This township contained in 1801, 493 inhabitants; in 1811, 471; in 1821, 570; in 1831, 668; in 1841, 636; and in 1851, 676. Its rateable value is £2,696 4s. The manorial rights of that part of the township in the manor of Great Dalston, are vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and those of the portion in Little Dalston manor in Colonel Sowerby. The principal landowners are Thomas Salkeld, Esq., Colonel Sowerby, Rev. Mr. Parker, Mr. George Robinson, and Mrs. Richardson.

Here are two corn-mills, one carried on by Mr. Bewley of Carlisle, the property of Mrs. Cowen, and the other by Mr. Gibson, the property of Colonel Sowerby. There are three cotton-mills, two carried on by J. Cowen and Sons, and the other by Messrs. Johnson and Dover. There are besides a saw-mill and iron-forge, the property of G. Cowen, Esq., and carried on by Mr. John Dover; at this forge, which was established in 1756, are manufactured agricultural implements of a superior description. There is also a flax-mill, carried on by Mr. Arthur Parker, who is also a canvas manufacturer.

Brownelson, two farms in this township, were formerly given to the priory of Carlisle by Henry Dalston, the second of that family who resided at Dalston Hall.

Unthank and Lingley Close Head are two small hamlets in this township.

This township, a suburb of Dalston village, is partly on the east side of the Caldew, and partly on the west side.

CUMDEVOCK.

The population of Cumdevock in 1801 was 283; in 1811, 315; in 1821, 333; in 1831, 348; in 1841, 361; and in 1851, 337. The soil here is generally good loamy land, and the rateable value is £3,190. The principal landowners are the Earl of Lonsdale, Mrs. Thomlinson, Messrs. Robert Blamire, John Guardhouse, William Dobinson, T. K. Atkinson, — Dixon, John Richardson, John Armstrong, and several small owners.

The manor of Cardew in this township belonged, at an early period, to a family who took their name from the place. In the reign of Edward I. it became the property of John Burdon, who in default of issue from his son of the same name, entailed it on John Denton and his wife Ivan, the heiress of Kirkbride and his heirs. This John Denton is said to have distinguished himself in the service of Edward Baliol, who gave him as a crest, a castle burning with a flaming sword in a lion's paw, which was afterwards borne by his family, for defending a castle in Annandale against Robert Bruce. In 1686 George Denton, Esq., sold the manor of Cardew to Sir James Lowther, Bart., from whom it has descended to the present Earl of Lonsdale. The customary tenants of the manor were enfranchised in 1672, by George Denton, Esq., who reserved only a small quit rent and the royalties.

Cardew Hall, long the seat of the Dentons, is now a farmhouse. Here resided Mr. John Denton, whose voluminous MS. History of Cumberland has proved of the greatest service to all those who have taken an interest in the history and antiquities of this county.

The village of Cumdevock is about one and a half miles south-west of Dalston.

Cardew Lees is a hamlet in this township, one and a half miles north-west of Dalston, and is included in the manor of Parton.

The Gill, another hamlet, is partly in this and partly in Hawkesdale township, one mile south-west of Dalston, near to which is Thomlinson Lodge, a neat building in the Elizabethan style, erected about twenty years ago.

Shalkfoot is also a hamlet in this township, two and a half miles west of Dalston. In this hamlet there is a school for boys and girls, built by the parishes of Westward and Dalston, in 1780. It is a small stone building, capable of accommodating about thirty children. The brook, at the foot of which this place stands, and which is variously called Shalkbeck, Shawbeck, Chalkbeck, and Chokebeck, runs into a level bog, two miles long, and a quarter of a mile broad, formerly consisting of reeds and bulrushes, but latterly, by a judicious system of drainage, converted into arable and pasture land. The rivulet rises on Warnel Fell, and divides this parish from that of Westward, and, joining Loughbeck, they together take the name of Wampool. On its rugged and rocky banks are the Shalk quarries, where three different beds of stone are wrought, viz., one of red freestone, of an open grit; another of very white freestone, of a close body; and a seam of limestone. The extent of the workings, the quality of the stone, and an inscription on one of the cliffs, clearly prove that the Romans obtained materials here for the erection of that part of the wall westward from Carlisle. There is, on an overhanging cliff, seven or eight yards above the rivulet, the following Roman inscription:—

LEG. II. AVG. .
MILITES PE. . . .
COH. III. COH. IIII.

which has been read, "LEGIONIS SECONDE AUGUSTE MILITES POSTERUNT COHORS TERTIA COHORS QUARTA." The cliff formerly rose several yards above the inscription, and was called Tom Smith's leap, from a person of that name having thrown himself over the precipice to avoid being taken prisoner, and was killed on the rocks beneath. Christ Church, Carlisle, has been built of stone from these quarries. About a quarter of a mile south from this place, is a sulphurous spring, rising from a bed of grey limestone. The Green Quarries have yielded large quantities of excellent red slates. Lady's Hill Quarry is on the west side of the stream, in Westward parish; and here are extensive old workings, in which there were once a few stones with Roman names upon them. Cuninggarth appears to have been a Roman intrenchment, and near the quarries are several ancient barrows, one of which bore the name of Toddle Hill; it was forty yards in diameter, and seven yards high. Several urns, containing ashes, skulls, bones, &c., have been found on this hill, which has been entirely taken away for the reparation of the roads and for building purposes.

HAWKESDALE.

The population of Hawkesdale township in 1801 was 321; in 1811, 376; in 1821, 336; in 1831, 427; in 1841, 411; and in 1851, 353. The rateable value is £3,437 16s. 8d. The soil here is chiefly loam by the river side, on the high ground clayey incumbent on a red sandstone. The manorial rights are vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who, with Thomas Salkeld, Esq.; Wm. Blamire, Esq.; J. J. Watts, Esq.; Messrs.

Robert Twentyman, and John Bunting, are the principal landowners. The township extends along the west side of the Caldew, from one to three miles south of Dalston.

Rose Castle, the episcopal palace of the see of Carlisle, is situated in this township, in a pleasant vale near the river Caldew, about seven miles south by west of Carlisle. From having been repaired at different times, according to the prevalent architectural taste, it has assumed a somewhat incongruous appearance, when compared with its original castellated style. The castle presents a fine mass of towers built on the north side of the vale, surrounded by hanging gardens that rise, terrace above terrace, up to the level lawn upon which it stands. It is not certain that this castle occupies the site of the ancient baronial mansion of Dalston, though there is every probability that it does, and such is the generally received opinion. In 1300, Edward I., while prosecuting his claim to the Scottish crown, resided for a few days at Rose Castle, and after the termination of the siege of Carlaverock, we find him here again, when he was joined by his queen. During his residence here, he received a communication from the Pope respecting the affairs of Scotland, which seems to have been the principal cause of his summoning his parliament to meet him at Lincoln, in the following February. The writs for this parliament are dated Apud la Rose, September 25th and 26th, 1300. In 1322, the baronial mansion of Rose, in which the bishops of Carlisle now occasionally resided on account of the numerous attacks to which Linstock was exposed, was burnt by the Scots under Bruce. Some years later it again suffered from the same enemy, in consequence of which Bishop Kirby, in 1336, obtained a royal license to castellate his manor-house at Rose; and from this time it is known in all documents, &c., as Rose Castle. As built by Bishop Kirkby, the castle formed a quadrangle, encompassed by a rampart and ditch, and such continued to be its form till the seventeenth century, numerous additions, however, having been made to it in the interval, by successive bishops. These additions consisted of a tower, built by Bishop Strickland, another by Bishop Bell, and a third by Bishop Kyte. "The north side of the quadrangle," says Jefferson, "consisted of the Constable's Tower, the chapel, Bell's Tower, a chamber called the council chamber, with one chamber under it, denominated Great Paradise, and Strickland Tower, containing together sixteen rooms. On the east side were situated the great dining-room, kitchen, buttery, with lodging rooms and cellars. The south side contained a long gallery leading to the hall, and a variety of store rooms and domestic offices, with two or three little turrets. The west side contained Pettenger's Tower,¹ and Kyte's Tower, and various other rooms; the total number of apartments appears to have exceeded sixty. The stables and coach-house were enclosed within the mantle wall or rampart, in the outer court; this wall was defended by a number of turrets placed at intervals upon it. In the centre of the inner court or quadrangle, was a fountain, which conveyed water to all the offices of the house. No historical events of any interest in reference to the castle are recorded between the time of Bishop Kirby and the period of the parliamentary wars, during which few fortresses remained unscathed, and Rose being held in 1645, by Mr. Lowther, the constable of the castle, with about twenty or thirty men, was attacked and taken by a party of Colonel Heveringham's regiment, and for some time served as a prison for the royalists. In 1648 it was again garrisoned by a company of royalists, amounting to forty men, and was attacked by a detachment of General Lambert's army. The governor, though twice summoned, would not surrender, being determined to hold out as long as possible: but after sustaining an assault of two hours, the castle was taken by storm, and was afterwards burnt by order of Major Cholmley, who appears to have been in command of the detachment. A few weeks after this event, the army of the Duke of Hamilton, which had been raised in Scotland for the King's service, was here joined by Sir Marmaduke Langdale's forces. The survey of Rose Castle, made by order of the parliament in 1649 or 1650, describes it to be in a state of great decay, and values the materials for sale at £425. Mr. Heveringham, who possessed a moiety of the manor during Cromwell's time, fitted up the office for his own residence. When Bishop Rainbow came to the see in 1664 no part of the house was habitable. He built a few rooms for immediate use, and was obliged to rebuild the chapel, which had been insufficiently built by his predecessor. Bishop Smith built the tower adjoining the staircase, and by him and his immediate successor the house was again rendered a comfortable habitation. Bishop Lyttleton repaired Strickland Tower, built a new kitchen and other offices, and made great improvements in the habitable part of the house. Several alterations conducive to comfort and convenience have since been made, and the external and internal appearance of the castle much improved. In ancient times every bishop of Carlisle was obliged to leave for his successor a certain number of books of divinity and canon law,

104 oxen, 10 heifers, and other live stock in proportion." The castle, as it appears at present, occupies only the north and west sides of the quadrangle, the other two sides not having been restored since their destruction in the civil wars. Its present state is owing in a great measure to the exertions of the late bishop, Dr. Percy, who made every effort to restore the castle to a complete state, and to render it worthy of its ancient name. Notwithstanding the repairs which had taken place under his lordship's predecessors, the edifice was in a very dilapidated state when Dr. Percy was raised to the see in 1827; the floors were rotten, the roofs gave little or no protection against the weather, and the exterior presented a strange mixture of styles, according to the periods at which the several portions were erected or restored. The bishop, in 1829, commenced a complete renovation of the entire edifice, and under the guidance of Messrs. Rickman and Hutchinson, the castle was completely restored in the style that prevailed when Strickland's Tower, the oldest part of the castle remaining, was erected. With the exception of this tower, together with those of Bishops Bell and Kyte, and Pettenger's tower, which form an inconsiderable part of the building, the castle was entirely renewed. A new range of offices was also erected on the western side, to supply the place of those which existed previous to the wars of the parliament. A new tower, called Percy's Tower, was also added to the north-west angle of the main building. The ancient gateway and mantle wall with its turrets still remain. The entrance door of the house, is at the point where the Constable's Tower stood, and is secured by a large and curious lock, presented to the castle by Ann Countess of Pembroke, which bears the inscription A. P. 1673. The staircase is an elaborate and extremely elegant structure, composed of polished oak, with a private balustrade, consisting of cinque foils, charged in the centre with the armorial bearings of the see, and those of the bishop alternately. On the staircase is a full length portrait of Bishop Smith, and a half-length of Ann Countess of Pembroke.

The chapel, which occupies the north side of the house, and has beneath it the bishop's library and study, is 44 feet in length, by 22 in breadth. It is lighted by four large windows on the south side, and one at the east end, all filled with tracery in the Perpendicular style; the carved panels of the stalls were brought from Lambeth Palace, where they had been used for a similar purpose by Cardinal Pole in the sixteenth century.

At the north-east angle of the chapel is a door conducting to the chaplain's apartment, in Bell's Tower, which contains the small library belonging to the see. To the east of the chapel was formerly the apartment called Great Paradise, covered by a massive curtain wall uniting Bell's Tower with Strickland's. The latter is a square tower now detached, situated at the north-east angle of the house, and was formerly the keep or donjon of the castle; its form is similar to most of the border peel-houses, consisting of three apartments; of these the lower one is vaulted, and has walls seven feet thick; the staircase leading to it commenced at the end of a narrow passage, on a level with the first floor. The apartments on the first floor, which, from its ruinous state, is open to the roof, has, at its south-east gable, a piscina which renders it probable that the apartment was used as a chapel. In a closet at the same angle of the second floor, which is reached by a dilapidated staircase, is a small opening about a foot square cut or left in the substance of the wall, running down to the dungeon, and supposed to have been used either for conveying food to the prisoners there confined, or for overhearing their conversation.

The west side of the building contains the principal apartments of the castle. The dining and drawing-rooms are spacious and elegant, the two mantle-pieces in each of them contain some fine carving, and the oriel windows, looking into the quadrangular court, towards the river, command an extensive prospect, and on the exterior have a very fine appearance. The older portions of the castle are thickly mantled with ivy, and on the cornice of the tower erected by Bishop Bell, is just visible, the emblematical device of a bell with the initials, R. B.

Hawkesdale Hall, many years the property and residence of the Nicolson family, is now in a very dilapidated state. A monument on the outside of the chancel of the parish church of Dalston, commemorates several members of this family.

Holme Hill, many years the residence of the family of Holme, passed to George Holme Summer, Esq., M.P., and having been since sold, is now the property of the Salkelds.

Watts of Hawkesdale Hall.

This family claims descent from the old Yorkshire house of Le Fleming, of Wath. From an ancient pedigree it appears that

SIR JOHN LE FLEMING, lord of Wath, on Dearn, co. York, who died 14 Edward II., left, by Joan his wife, daughter of Walter de Fauconberg, three sons, viz.,

THOMAS, of Wath and Dearn, ancestor of the Flemings of Wath, whose eventual heiress married Saville, of New Hall.

RAISNER, of whose descendants we treat.

LAUBERT, a Knight Templar, put to death at Paris, with the Grand Master, by order of Philip le Bel.

The second son.

RAINER DE FLEMING, called "Rainer de Wath, Chevalier," was in the Scottish wars in the retinue of Lord Perry. He married Ada, daughter and heir of Thomas de Bethune, and had, with other issue, a second son,

SIMON DE WATH, who married Alice, daughter and coheir of John de Eston, and was father of

JOHN DE WATH, or WATHES, who possessed, jure matris, a moiety of Eston, co. Worcester, and considerable landed property in Yorkshire, temp. Edward III. He married Emma, daughter of Sir Hugh Golofre, and was succeeded by his son,

WILLIAM WATHES, of Eston, living 1397, who married Blanche, daughter of William de Wellesburne, and had a son,

SIR THOMAS WATHES, of Eston, who served in the French wars, and is frequently mentioned in the Acts of the Parliament of Paris as "Sir Thomas Wathes de Eston," and as "Sir Thomas d'Eston, Chevalier Anglaise." He had a grant from Henry V. of the seignurie of Langeais, on the Loire, and other property in France, the forfeited possessions of the Vicomte de Brosse, who had deserted the English faction. Sir Thomas married Isabeau, daughter of Bertrand Goyon, seigneur de Matignon, and widow of Amboise, Vicomte de Thouars; and dying 1424, left a son,

SIMON WATHES, of Eston, 7 Henry VI., 1428. He married Margery, daughter and heir of Thomas de Stobesbury of Whitfield, co. Northampton, and left a son,

SIR RICHARD WATTS, who fought under the banner of York at Wakefield, where he fell, or died soon after the conflict, of his wounds, leaving by his wife Isabel Stafford, a son and heir,

THOMAS WATTS, who was plaintiff in an action-at-law against William de Stobesbury, William de Lovett, and others, for the recovery of the manor of Whitfield, in the last year of the reign of Henry VI., 1461. By his wife, Alice, heiress to an estate at Beby, co. Leicester, he had issue,

1. John, heir.

11. Richard, who had a son, Richard, and two daughters, Mary, the wife of George Gage, of Raundes, in the co. Northampton, and Joan, the wife of Gervas Astley.

111. Thomas, the father of John, from whom descended the family of Watts, seated in Norfolk.

1. Elizabeth, the wife of Richard Osborne.

The eldest son,

JOHN WATTES, of Beby, co. Leicester, married twice. By his second wife he had issue John and Francis. By his first wife, Magdelaine, daughter and heiress of Thomas Berkeley, of the city of Worcester, John Wattes had a son and heir.

THOMAS WATTES, Esq., of Beby, who had a grant, A.D. 1560, of the lands and lordship of Blakesley, co. Northampton. By his first wife, Anne, daughter and co-heir of Sir John Crouch, of Crouch, co. Kent, he had a son and heir WILLIAM. His second wife was Catharine Sulyard, of Essex. Mr. Watts died in 1593, and was succeeded by his son,

WILLIAM WATTES, Esq., of Blakesley, who died 16 June, 1614. He married Mary, daughter of the famous Lord Chief Justice Sir Edward Montagu, Knt. of Boughton, co. Northampton, and had issue, 1. EDWARD his heir; 11. Montagu, barrister-at-law; and Mary, wife of Anthony Palmer, Esq., of Stoke-Doyley. The elder son and heir, EDWARD WATTES, Esq., of Blakesley, married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Ralph Coningsby, Knt., of North Myms; Heris, and had issue, WILLIAM; 11. Edward, a royalist, whose only daughter and heir, Mary, married Rev. John Pettifer; 111. CONINGSBY, of whom presently. 1v. Amphylus; v. Ralph; 1. Mary; and 11. Elizabeth. The third son, CONINGSBY WATTES, early embarked in the royal cause, and suffered in consequence, both in person and property. By his wife Barbara, daughter and eventually sole heir of George Danet, Esq., of the city of London, he had

1. Montagu, who died young.

11. John, who removed into Leicestershire, and purchased a considerable estate there, which had originally belonged to the ancient family of Danet, his mother's house, built Danet's Hall, and took up his residence there. He held the office of Receiver-General for the county, projected and nearly completed the water-works for supplying the city of Leicester with spring-water, and was also of considerable service to the early manufacturers of Leicester, by lending them money in the infancy of the hosiery business. It is said he had the honour of handing the first cup of liquor to William III. on his landing in England. He died in 1743, aged 80. Mr. Watts married Catherine, daughter of — Carter, Esq., of Leicester, and niece of Sir Lawrence Carter, one of the barons of the Court of Exchequer, and had issue,

John Watts, jun., of Danet's Hall, who was a barrister-at-law, and sunk a considerable fortune in the South Sea scheme. He died in 1738, aged 32. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Nicholas Mosley, Esq., and niece of Sir Oswald Mosley, Bart., of Holliston. By this lady (who died in 1736, aged 35) Mr. Watts had issue,

The Rev. William Watts, M.D., who was educated as a physician, and practised at Leicester. He subsequently entered the church. Dr. Watts was chiefly instrumental in the establishment of the Leicester Infirmary, of which he was one of the governors. He married the daughter of George Whalley, Esq., of Norton, and had by her JOHN MOSLEY WATTS, who married Sarah, daughter of Samuel Bolton, of Fair Mile, near Henley-on-Thames, and had issue,

WILLIAM MOSLEY, of whom hereafter.

Alaric Alexander, the distinguished poet, married Zillah, sister of the late J. H. Wiffen, Esq., the translator of Tasso, and has had issue Alaric William, who died young; ALARIC ALFRED; Francis Coleridge, who died young; and Zillah-Emily-Frances.

Anastasia.

The elder son,

WILLIAM MOSLEY WATTS, of Byfield House, Barnes, co. Surrey, born 12 September, 1786, married Mary, daughter of Thomas Pitter, Esq., of Crawley, and died 7 October, 1845, having had issue, William Power, who died young.

Frederick Mosley, M.A., of Lincoln College, Oxford, in holy orders, born 11 March, 1825.

Mary, who died in 1832.

111. GEORGE, of whom hereafter.

1. Barbara, wife of George Bentley, Esq., of Monmouth.

The third, but second surviving son,

GEORGE WATTS, a Turkey merchant in the city of Bristol, married twice. By his first wife Mary, daughter of George Dennis, Esq., of Bideford, he had a daughter Mary, who married Andrew Nelthorpe, Esq. By his second wife, Miss Anne Harrington, he had

1. CHARLES, of whom presently.

11. Montagu, who inherited the greater part of his father's fortune, which he lost by embarking in the South Sea bubble. He married Miss Jane Seymour, and left issue.

111. William, M.A., in holy orders.

1. Florence, died young.

11. Anne, wife of Captain Fraser.

111. Elizabeth, wife of Sir Samuel Goodyer, Bart.

The eldest son,

CHARLES WATTS, a captain of the Royal Life Guards, offended his father, and was disinherited. He married Katherine, daughter of Robert Scrope, Esq., colonel in the French service, and Chevalier of St. Louis, descended from the Scropes of Hameldon, Bucks (by his wife Katherine Middleton, of the family of Stockeld), and dying 1745, left a son,

THE REV. WILLIAM WATTS, A.M., rector of Moresby, Cumberland, J.P., who mainly assisted Joseph Nicolson, Esq., in his arduous undertaking of compiling the History of Cumberland. He married Mary, daughter (by Mary his wife, daughter of Bellingham Mauleverer, Esq., of Arncliffe) of John Nicolson, Esq., and sister and eventually sole heir of John Nicolson of Hawkesdale Hall, in Cumberland, and great-niece of Dr. William Nicolson, bishop of Carlisle, afterwards of London-derry, and eventually archbishop of Cashel, by which lady he left issue a daughter, Mary, wife of the Rev. William Brisco, of Launceston, co. Cumberland, and a son,

The Rev. CLEMENT WATTS, M.A., vicar of Holme Cultram, co. Cumberland, J.P.; married Mary, daughter of William Benn, Esq., of More Row, and only sister of Sir John Benn Walsh, Bart., of Ormathwaite Hall, by whom (who died 1818) he had issue. The eldest son, JOHN NICOLSON WATTS succeeded, on the death of his great uncle, John Nicolson, Esq., of Hawkesdale, to that and other estates in Cumberland. Mr. Watts went out to India early in life, in the Company's civil service, on the Madras establishment, where he died in 1815, at the early age of 35. He married in 1800, Ann Pitt, daughter of James Dodson, Esq., of Reading-hill, Berks, by Sarah his wife, daughter and coheir of John Philip Carey, Esq., of Compton, co. Gloucester, and by her (who died 17 July, 1820) had issue,

I. JOHN JAMES, his successor.

II. MONTAGUE, Lieut.-Colonel Madras Horse Artillery, born 5 March, 1798; married Jane, daughter of John Bird, Esq., Madras Civil Service.

III. HENRY, Lieutenant in the Madras Engineers, born 20 January, 1810, died unmarried in India, in 1838.

IV. Helen Cramer, married 1826, Henry Dickinson, Esq., of the Madras Civil Service, and died 29 May, 1831.

V. Mary Anne, married 1830, Henry Briggs, Esq., of the Madras Light Cavalry.

Mr. Watts died June, 1815, and was succeeded by his son, JOHN JAMES WATTS, Esq., of Hawkesdale Hall, born 15 March, 1803.

IVEGILL, OR HIGH HEAD.

The township of Ivegill, or High Head, contained in 1801 116 inhabitants; in 1811, 109; in 1821, 129; in 1831, 141; in 1841, 124; and in 1851, 154. The rateable value is £1437 6s. The population, whose principal employment is agriculture, is very much scattered over the township, and in the small village of Ivegill. Carlisle and Penrith are the markets attended. In the immediate neighbourhood of the township, though not in the township itself, are the remains of a Roman camp, but they are not very distinct. In a field, near to this place, a few Roman coins, one a gold piece, have been discovered.

The manor of High Head, in this township, belonged in the reign of Edward II. to John de Hercla, who was attainted for being concerned in rebellion with his brother, the Earl of Carlisle. In 1342, William L'Angleys, or English, had the king's license to crenellate his mansion at High Head, yet it appears there had been a castle there before, belonging to the crown, for in the year 1326, Ralph Dacre had a grant of the custody of the castle of High Head, for ten years, and the next year the custody was granted for life to William L'Angleys, who took possession under that grant, whereupon Ralph Dacre, in 1330, petitioned parliament to be reinstated for the remainder of his term. In 1335 the son of William above mentioned had a license from the bishop to build a chapel here, and to have a chaplain to officiate therein. About the year 1550, High Head Castle was purchased of the family of Restwold, by John Richmond, Esq., in whose posterity it continued till the demise of Christopher Richmond, Esq., when it became the property of two of his daughters. Isabel, the eldest daughter, born 1679, married S. Gladhill, Esq., whose descendants sold their half of the estate to Lord Brougham. Margaret, the seventh daughter, born 1689, was married to W. Gale, Esq., merchant, of Whitehaven, whose descendants took, in 1776, the name of Braddyll. Colonel Braddyll, born 1776, is their representative. Lord Brougham's family is connected with the Richmond family, through Elizabeth, second daughter of the Christopher Richmond above mentioned, born in 1680, who married Peter Brougham, Esq., of Skelton. Their eldest son, Henry Richmond Brougham, Esq. of Scales and High Head Castle, was high sheriff of Cumberland in 1749, and died unmarried in that year. This family connection accounts for the purchase of the portion of the estate now in the possession of Lord Brougham. The mansion belongs to that nobleman, who shares the manorial rights, &c., with Colonel Braddyll, in addition to whom, Messrs. John Knight, Thomas Knight, Isaac, and Christopher Williamson, John Dennison, and Christopher Hudson, are the principal landowners.

High Head Castle, the manor house, is a substantial building, but at present unfit for residence, having been allowed to go out of repair. It has, however, been somewhat restored lately, and is now occupied as a farmhouse. There was formerly a good deal of carved wood-work about the building, but this has been removed to Brougham Hall. The house occupies a most picturesque situation, on a steep rock overlooking the neighbouring scenery, backed up by the range of Skiddaw Forest in the distance, while the little river Ivo winds its way immediately beneath, through a rocky channel completely overshadowed with timber.

Braddyll Family.

JOHN VANCE, of Catterton, married Mabel Musgrave in 1616, and by her had issue, Mabel, who was married to Christopher Richmond, of High Head, to whom she bore two sons and a daughter, CHRISTOPHER, of whom presently, John, and Magdalen. Mr. Richmond married 2ndly Magdalen, daughter of A. Huddleston, of Hulston John, and by her had issue:

CHRISTOPHER RICHMOND, married firstly Maud, daughter of Sir W. Lawson, Bart. of Isall Hall, by whom he had one son and two daughters. His second wife was Isabella, daughter of Thomas Reynolds, of London, by whom he had issue,
1. Erasmus, born 1684, died an infant.

2. Henry, the only son surviving infancy, who bequeathed High Head estate to his mother on his death, 1710.

3. William, who died an infant.

4. Isabel, born 1690, who married S. Gledhill, Esq.

5. Elizabeth, born 1690, married Peter Brougham, of Skelton, collector of excise, and had issue,

1. Henry Richmond Brougham, of Seales and High Head Castle, high sheriff of Cumberland, 1749, who died unmarried, in April, 1749.

2. John, who died unmarried.

3. Mary, who died young.

IV. Sarah, born 1681, married G. Simpson, of Thackwood, gent.
5. Anne, died young.

V. Mabel, married Henry Brisco, youngest son of J. Brisco, of Crofton Hall.

VI. Susannah, to whom High Head Castle was bequeathed by her mother's will, as well as Catterlen in fee.

VII. Margaret, born 1680, married W. Gale, of Whitehaven, merchant, and had issue,

1. John Gale, of Whitehaven and of Cletor Hall, who married Sarah, daughter and coheir of Christopher Wilson, of Bardsley Hall, Lancashire, by Margaret, aunt and heir of Thomas Braddyl, born 1728, died 1754. Mr. Gale had issue, WILLIAM GALE, of Conshead Priory, Lancashire, baptised 24th February, 1756, took the name of Braddyl in 1776. He married in the latter year, Jane, daughter of Martha Gale, of London, merchant, and by her had JOHN GALE BRADDYL, Esq., of Conshead Priory, born 14th November, 1776, who took the surname of Richmond before that of Braddyl, and the arms of Richmond and Gale quarterly with those of Braddyl, by license, 6th October, 1819. William Gale, Esq., died 9th November, 1818.

VIII. Martha.

The village of Ivegill is eight miles south of Carlisle.

High Head chapel, in the immediate neighbourhood of the castle, and one mile distant from Ivegill, is a chapel-of-ease to Dalston. It is a plain and somewhat mean-looking building, with small bell turret, erected in 1836, upon the site of an older building. The interior is better than the exterior. The font is hexagonal, and is the gift of the late Miss Blamire, of Thackwood Nook. The chapel contains a memorial window to that lady by O'Connor,—subject, Our Lord bearing the Cross; two other windows are also by the same artist, and the remaining four are filled with the stamped quarries of Messrs. James Powell, &c. All are the gift of the present incumbent. The dedication of the chapel is unknown. The townships of Ivegill, Middleseugh, in the parish of St. Mary's Without, Carlisle, and Itonfield, in the parish of Hesketh-in-the-Forest, have seats in the chapel and are united for educational purposes. The living, a perpetual curacy, was only endowed with £300, which has been since augmented from Queen Anne's Bounty, and Parliamentary grants, &c., the whole present value is about £94 13s. 6d. There are no tithes. Baptisms only are solemnised in the chapel. The register commences in 1705.

INCUMBENTS.—John Hudson, 1702; Thomas Robinson, 1706; Joseph Ashbridge, 1711; James Mauns, 1717; Joseph Hudson, 1784; Samuel Hudson, 1790; Joseph Hudson, 1826; Hugh Elliot, 1840; Richard Dunsdale, 1841; Arthur Emilius Hudson, 1853.

There is a small school at Ivegill, erected in 1835; for the townships of Ivegill, or High Head, Itonfield, and Middleseugh.

CHURCH.

Chapel Stock.—It is stated in a terrier of this chapelry, dated 1777, that there was then the sum of £300, called ancient chapel stock. By reference to the will of Isabella Miller, dated 1st May, 1736, it appears she directed that those who, after her decease, should become possessors of the castle, manor, demesne lands of High Head, should pay yearly, and every year for ever, out of the same, the sum of 20s. to such person as should be reader and schoolmaster at High Head chapel. Provided always that the reader and schoolmaster should be nominated and appointed by or with the consent of the said possessor or possessors, and their successors, and that the school should be taught in the parish of Dalston as formerly. The interest of the £300 and the 20s. yearly, is paid to the incumbent of the chapelry.

There is a corn-mill close to High Head Castle, the property of Lord Brougham, and carried on by Mr. George Rayson.

There are two bridges in this township; one over the Roe, called High Bridge, the other over the Ive, immediately below High Head Castle.

The people here are very general in their invitations to funerals, which all in the neighbourhood or laiting are expected to attend; and much unnecessary expense is consequently often incurred.

RAUGHTON AND GATESGILL.

The population of this township in 1801 was 206; in 1811, 184; in 1821, 294; in 1831, 330; in 1841, 318; and in 1851, 302. Its rateable value is £2,326 6s. 1d. "Gatesgill and Raughton," say Nicolson and Burn, "were at the Conquest all forest and waste ground, and were first enclosed by way of purpresture by one Uthred, to be holden of the king in fee by serjeantry for keeping the eryies of hawks for the king, which bred in the forest of Inglewood. Gateskale, being a whiney place, where the inhabitants of Raughton made scales or shields for their gates (or goats) from thence took its name, as Raughton did from the beck or river, called Raugh (or Raghe), which signifies a rough rapid water. The posterity of Ugthred took their surname of the place, and gave the sparhawk for their cognizance. It continued in this name and family for several generations; till the last of the name settled it upon his wife Margaret (Stapleton), and she dying without issue, her brother William Stapleton of Eden Hall succeeded to the inheritance. In like manner the Musgraves succeeded the Stapletons by a female heir, and towards the end of the fourteenth century settled it upon a younger son, whose chief seat was at Hayton, in which house it still continues."

The principal landowners are the representatives of the late George Cowen, Esq., Thomas Salkeld, Esq., the executors of the late John Bond, Esq., Lord Brougham, Robert Mounsey, Esq., and William Bond, yeoman.

GRINSDALE PARISH.

THIS parish is bounded on the north and east by the river Eden and the parish of Stanwix, on the west by Kirkandrews, and on the south by the parish of St. Mary Carlisle. It possesses no dependent townships.

The area of Grinsdale is about 720 acres (890 in the Census returns), and its rateable value £580. Its population in 1801 was 86; in 1811, 118; in 1821, 138; in 1831, 135; in 1841, 115; and in 1851, 95. It is now about 100, inhabiting 23 houses. Their occupation is entirely agricultural. The land here is well cultivated, and the houses clean and comfortable. The village of Grinsdale is the only collection of houses. There are three separate farm-houses situated at Millbeck, where there is a corn-mill moved by water-power; Cornhill and Knockupworth Hall. The quality of the soil near the river Eden, comprising about one-fourth part of the parish, is a deep rich deposit; and in the highest part near the borders of it, is situate the village of Grinsdale, so that the inhabitants are near their good land, and yet out of the reach of the water, when in the highest flood they are nearly surrounded. On going from the village to the southern part of the parish, the land becomes poorer. Previous to the year 1808, nearly the whole of this part (450 acres) was a wet unproductive common, but it was divided and enclosed in that year, and is now under good cultivation, and produces most excellent crops. The subsoil is of a red gravelly nature, with bands of clay; and the surface varies from good loam to blacktop earth towards the south. Carlisle markets, held on Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, are those attended by the inhabitants.

The Roman wall and vallum ran through this parish. The wall as it entered the parish on the east, came a little south of the footpath, which now leads from Carlisle to Grinsdale by the river side. Instead of bending with the footpath when it reaches the south end of the island, it held its direct course, and sought the high ground where the footpath now is between Grinsdale and Kirkandrews; and this footpath is the site of the wall, except where it passes through the Bleachhouse-field, and here it was a little diverted from it a few years ago by Mr. Thomas Sibson, who in straightening the path, removed the only remaining foundations of the wall. It leaves this parish here, and enters Kirkandrews at Sour Milk Bridge. The traces of the vallum or ditch are not distinct in this parish.

The parish of Grinsdale is a manor in the barony of Burgh, and gave name to a resident family who lived here during the reigns of Henry I., Stephen, Henry II., and John. In the reign of the latter monarch the manor came to two daughters of the Grinsdales or Greensdales, called Marriot and Margaret. In the time of Henry III., when Thomas de Multon was lord of Burgh, Thomas de Newton, a descendant of one daughter, held a moiety; and William de la Sore, a descendant of the other daughter, held the other moiety.¹ In the reign of Henry IV. the two moieties were sold to the Dentons of Cardew, a daughter of whom married Sir Thomas Dacre of Lanercost. In Queen Elizabeth's time the estates of the Dacres were forfeited to the crown by the rebellion and attainder of Leonard Dacre, whose sisters (Anne and Elizabeth) marrying the Earl of Arundel and Lord William ¹ In 1295, and again in 1304, Robert de Grinsdale represented the city of Carlisle in Parliament. This Robert was the son of Gilbert, whose father Robert de Grinsdale, a citizen of Carlisle, and an inheritor of lands both at Grinsdale and Parton, was a second brother of Askeill de Grinsdale, one of the first of that family connected with this manor. The said Robert had a son Alan de Grinsdale, who was member for Carlisle in 1305 and 1306, and one of the representatives for the county in 1312. After him was Robert de Grinsdale, who represented Carlisle several times in the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III.

Howard, the sons of the Duke of Norfolk procured the estates to be granted to them again by the crown. This manor being in the barony of Burgh came thus into the hands of Philip, earl of Arundel, who died in 1595; and in 1685 his descendants sold the barony to Sir John Lowther for £14,000, who in 1696 was created Baron Lowther and Viscount Lonsdale. The present Earl of Lonsdale is lord of one part of the parish, and Joseph Dacre, Esq., of Kirklington Hall, of the other part. The principal landowners are Mr. Thomas Sibson, Miss Jane Robson, Mr. Sibson Graham, Mr. Richard Burn, and Mr. John Graham.

The village of Grinsdale is two-and-a-half miles north-west of Carlisle.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Kentigern, is a small but neat building, delightfully situated on the banks of the river Eden, and from its quiet and secluded position, its graveyard is a most fitting depository for the remains of the dead. It was formerly rectorial, and belonged to the lords of the manor of Grinsdale, up to the reign of Henry II., when Hugh de Morville, lord of the barony of Burgh, and Richard de Newton and Robert de la Sore, coparceners in the manor of Grinsdale, granted and confirmed the church of Grinsdale, with all its rights, to the canons of Lanercost Priory. At the dissolution of this priory, the rectory and advowson passed to Sir Thomas Dacre by the grant of Edward VI.; and his descendants have always appointed a curate with a salary of forty shillings yearly, though the church lay in ruins for many ages. It was rebuilt by Joseph Dacre, Esq., at his own expense, in 1740. The living has been several times augmented by grants from Queen Anne's bounty office, with which lands have been purchased at Dapley Moor, in the parish of Stapleton, and at Mildburnhead, &c., in the parish of Kirklington. Its present value is about £115 per annum. The tithes were paid in kind previous to the year 1751, when they were purchased by the landowners of the late Joseph Dacre, Esq., the patron and lay impropriator, for the sum of £1,696, passed by fine and recovery, Hilary Term, 26 George II. The patron is Joseph Dacre, Esq., Temple, London, who appoints a perpetual curate, with a stipend of £2 annually, to maintain his ecclesiastical right, paid by the parish. The parish register commences in 1738, and is continued till the present time. There is an entry made on a small fly-leaf of a pocket-book by the late Mr. Thomas Sibson,—“On Sunday, April y^e 19th, 1741, service first performed at Grinsdale church by Rev. Mr. Stamper, the text was in y^e 122 Psalm and vers y^e first, viz., ‘I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the house of the Lord.’” Grinsdale is not mentioned in the King's Book, nor is there any presentation or other account of it in the bishop's registers.

INCUMBENTS.—John Stamper, 1738; William Baty, 1760; Thomas Pattinson, 1776; Jonathan Wilson, 1820; Henry Gough, Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, 1848; John Burton Norman, 1855.

There is no parsonage house. The present incumbent living at Kirkandrews, about a mile from the church.

This parish is entitled to a third of Pattinson's charity for the education of poor children. There is no school in the parish, but the inhabitants subscribed towards the erection of that at Kirkandrews-on-Eden, the master of which receives the interest of £50.¹

KINGMOOR EXTRA PAROCHIAL PLACE.

KINGMOOR is an extra parochial place, nearly encircled by Stanwix parish. It is bounded on the north by Rockliffe parish, on the west by Cargo township, on the south by that of Stanwix, and on the east by Houghton. Since 1841 it has been included, for church purposes, in Houghton Ecclesiastical District.

The area of Kingmoor is 1,110 statute acres, and its rateable value £1,604 2s. 6d. Its population in 1801, was 103; in 1811, 132; in 1821, 162; in 1831, 426; in 1841, 412; and in 1851, 502. A light blackish soil, incumbent on a red clay, prevails in the district, which is intersected by the Caledonian railway. “Kingmoor,” says Hutchinson, “was formerly vested in the crown, the citizens, or corporation of Carlisle, having a prescriptive right to depasture their cattle, and get turves thereon, which right was confirmed to them by the charter of Edward III., and the subsequent ones granted by most of the other kings and queens of England, down to Charles II. In the year 1682 the corporation leased out a part of this moor for their lives, at a small rent; and so from time to time granted other parts thereof in like manner, which leases were regularly renewed on the dropping of one or two of the lives, on payment of 20s. as a fine for every new life. The whole of the moor hath been thus held ever since, except Mr. Lamb's, the principal estate, of which the corporation granted the fee about fifty years ago. In the year 1792, some of the freemen of this corporation being disposed to revive the exercise of their rights of common pasture and turbary on this moor, an action-at-law was commenced in consequence thereof, which was argued at the assizes held at Carlisle the year following, and determined in favour of the occupiers or lessees of the corporation." The principal landowners at present are George G. Mounsey, Esq., Charles J. Lamb, Esq., Richard Ferguson, Esq., Mr. C. Armstrong, with some small proprietors. Charles J. Lamb, Esq., possesses the manorial rights and privileges.

The village or hamlet of Kingmoor is on the high road to Scotland, about two miles north of Carlisle. The freemen of the city have for a considerable period held their guild races here on a small waste.

KIRKANDREWS-ON-EDEN PARISH.

THIS parish is bounded on the north by the river Eden, on the west by Beaumont and Burgh-on-Sands, on the south by the parish of Orton, and on the east by that of Grinsdale. It comprises no dependent townships.

Kirkandrews comprises an area of 1,050 statute acres, and its rateable value is £620. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 98; in 1811, 100; in 1821, 141; in 1831, 107; in 1841, 142; and in 1851, 131,—living in the village of Kirkandrews, and two or three farm-houses in other parts of the parish. Hoskett Hill is a small hamlet situated on the side of the common. This is a well-cultivated parish; the north-eastern part, lying alongside the river Eden, is a fine rich holme, with the drawback of being occasionally flooded by the river. The middle part is divided from this holme by the eminence which forms the site of the Roman wall, and is a steep about twenty feet higher than the holme. This part contains the village of Kirkandrews, with its crofts of strong productive loam and clay subsoil. Higher still is the third part, divided from the middle part by the eminence called Brackenhill Brow; this is of a variable quality of soil, from the loamy to the blacktop with red roacheys subsoil. Here is situated the yet unenclosed common; but the division of it under the Enclosure Acts has just been completed, and a few years will materially improve this part of the county. This common contains about 130 acres. The remainder of this third part, about 250 acres, are ancient enclosures, which have been granted to the tenements of Kirkandrews from time to time by the lords of the manor. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in agriculture. There are no mines or minerals. The Port Carlisle railway passes through this parish, touching the village at the west end, where there is a station. Carlisle is distant about three miles, and is the market town on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

The Roman Wall and Vallum pass through this parish, entering on the east side at a place called Sour Milk Bridge, where they are about 200 paces apart, and continue in a westerly direction. The wall, following the top of an eminence which bounds the holme land, passed through where the churchyard now is, on the north side of the village, and entered Beaumont parish where Beaumont Beck empties itself into the river. The ditch, pursuing a similar direction, passed on the south side of the village, and entered the parish of Beaumont where the same beck crosses the Monkhill road, and here it is distant from the site of the wall about 500 paces. On the higher parts, towards the south of this parish, there are several traces of Roman earthworks. At a place on the common near Janet Hill, where the plough has not yet stirred the surface, there are three mysterious circular ditches on the highest part of the ground of no great dimensions, being respectively five, seven, and nine yards in diameter. Here it is said some urns were found about eighty years ago. These circular ditches are deep, and their interior spaces are a little elevated. Apparently they are very ancient, and the purpose for which they were made has belonged to a period now long gone by. There are also on this same common most curious traces of what tradition says was an aqueduct to bring water from the river Caldew down into Beaumont Beck for some purposes of water-power. It is first seen in this parish on the Far Moor, where it winds round the south and east side of this brow; thence it proceeds in a northerly direction through Lammonby Close plantation, and behind Maxwell Cottage, thence to the southern side of the brow on which stands Hoskett Hill; and still proceeding in a northerly direction, as it finds its desired decline, it enters the parish of Beaumont at a place called Cowper Nook, and bending to the east runs in that direction, to Beaumont Beck: at Cowper Nook, where there is some uncultivated ground, the traces are very distinct.

In this parish, Kirksteads deserves the attention of the antiquarian. It is situated on the south side of the farm-house called Cobble Hall. Here tradition tells us a church once stood to serve the parishes of Kirkandrews, Beaumont, Grinsdale, and Orton. Yet we cannot find, either from internal evidence, or from any ancient documents whatever, that the building which once stood here was dedicated to Christian worship. Many Roman remains have been dug out; an altar, with many sculptured stones now in the garden of Mrs. Norman of Kirkandrews, and illustrated in Bruce's Roman Wall,¹ many Roman coins, and some beautiful specimens of Roman decorations of the vine tracery cut in relief in stone, now in the possession of Mr. Norman of Bow, and Mr. Stordy of Thurstonfield. Remains of human bones have also been exposed here, but still no traces of mediæval architecture. But the strongest evidence against this tradition is, that the churches in Beaumont and Orton, as well as what recently remained of the old church which stood in Kirkandrews' churchyard, all bear evidence that they have been erected during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. And previous to that time it is not likely that the inhabitants here would be either so numerous or so wealthy as to maintain a separate church. No doubt the human bones that have been dug up, and the sculptured stones that have been removed, led our forefathers, who were not skilled in Roman remains, to think that this was the site of some "auld kirk," and therefore they named the field "Kirksteads."

About 300 paces from Kirksteads, in a field called Hainings, the property of Mrs. C. Norman, there was found, in the summer of 1855, in the northern angle of the field, and a very little way beneath the surface of the ground, an earthenware vase containing about 1,100 Roman denarii. The coins were of bronze, and principally of the reigns of Constantine and Diocletian.

The discoverer of this treasure was a labouring man who was hedging at the place, and cutting some fresh sods for an adjoining fence. On his spade coming in contact with this buried treasure, his wits were sorely tried as to how he could conceal them and convert them into real money. Often and often he paid a visit to this treasured angle, and bore away some prize every time; but one day he had filled his pockets too full, and some of the coins were found by his master on the barn floor at Cobble Hall, where they were living. To his enquiries the man turned a deaf ear. But the master was a "vary canny Scotchman," and collected all the coin he could find, and throwing his plaid over his shoulders set off to the silversmith's at Carlisle to make as good a bargain as he could. When he offered them he was sadly crestfallen to find that the silversmith would not buy them, as he had already purchased at a good price more than he wanted; and when he learned that they had all come from a place which he recognised as his own home, and brought by his own servant, he wended his way back again, and dismissed his "fa'se and knarish loon of a servant."

This parish forms part of the barony of Burgh belonging to the Earl of Lonsdale. T. Denton says that it was for a while severed from Burgh, and made parcel of the barony of Levington, but afterwards was re-annexed to Burgh. It is now nearly all freehold. The landowners are Mrs. Dorothy Norman, Mrs. Catherine Norman, Rev. John Burton Norman, Mr. John Hind, Mrs. Ruth Graham, and the Misses Blamire. It is enclosed with the exception of 130 acres on the common, which has just been divided under the Enclosure Acts, and will be enclosed in another year.

The village of Kirkandrews is situated three miles west-north-west of Carlisle.

CHURCH.

The church which formerly stood here was dedicated to St. Andrew, from which the parish takes its name. No part of it is now in existence, nothing save the undulations in the green sward remain to show the site where it stood. There are some persons yet living who recollect the old chancel arch which remained for many years after the other portions of the church had been removed. It was used to perform the burial service under, and from what we can learn it was a Norman arch, and the church, in all probability would be in that style of architecture. Bishop Nicholson, in his Itinerary through this diocese in A.D. 1703, says, "The church here at Kirkandrews is quite demolished. The parishioners bury their dead in the churchyard, and the late rector (Mr. Hume) lyes buried, sub Dio, in y^e Quire; but the divine service is at Beaumont, about half a mile off. The parsonage-house is a long row of low buildings of clay, improved by the late incumbent, who also was at about £10 charges in walling in an orchard. The glebe is about four acres of good land. The value of this and Beaumont (jointly) not above £30. I moved the parishioners here to a compliance with the men of Beaumont, rather than run the hazard of being put upon the expence of repairing their own church; offering, that, towards the making all things the more easy to them, the old timber in that church should be brought for the improvement of the parsonage house here. They seemed to like the proposal well; and, I believe will peaceably comply. They have a tradition that the three little neighbouring churches (of this town, Beaumont, and Grinsdale) were built by three sisters, who, I must say, were not too generous in subsisting their chaplains, I rather think they have been small oratories supplied by y^e religious of Carlisle." This parish is still united with Beaumont in ecclesiastical matters, and the church in the latter place is used by the parishioners of Kirkandrews, precisely as if it stood in their own parish, contributing towards its repairs, &c. The advowson and right of presentation is in the hands of the Earl of Lonsdale, to whose family it has belonged since 1692, when George Hume was presented to this living and that of Beaumont,¹ on the annexation of the two parishes by Sir John Lowther, Bart. The present value of the living, which is a rectory, is £270. The great and small tithes of these united parishes were abolished by a private act of parliament, dated 14th June, 1827, and compensation in lieu thereof was made amounting in Kirkandrews to £57 3s. 3d., and in Beaumont to £134 2s. 9d. Previous to this time the living was of very small value. It was augmented in 1740, by a grant of £200 made by the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, which in the year following was laid out in the purchase of two dwelling-houses, and out-buildings called Upper Town and seventy acres, part of a tenement called Dapley Moor in the parish of Stapleton. In 1772, land was purchased near Sedberg in Yorkshire with £400 (half of which was given by the Countess Dowager Gower,) to the value of £14 per annum, but now let at 9s per annum. There are also about seven acres of good glebe, situate near the rectory at Kirkandrews. The parish register commences in 1746, and is very imperfect at the commencement.

There is a most excellent parsonage-house adjoining the churchyard which commands a beautiful view to the east and north over the rich and fertile vale of the Eden, whose winding course may be traced to a considerable distance. The house was erected in 1847 by the Rev. Mr. Benn, rector, at a cost of £800, borrowed of the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty. It is a plain substantial building of brick, and the interior accommodation appears to have been more aimed at than any architectural beauty.

There is a small school, with an endowment of £1 18s. 6d. from Thomas Pattinson's Charity, for which two children are instructed free. It was erected in 1817, by the contributions of the inhabitants of Kirkandrews, Beaumont, and Grinsdale, and has an average attendance of fifty children.

KIRKBAMPTON PARISH.

THIS parish is bounded on the north by Burgh-upon-Sands, on the west by Aikton and Bowness, on the south by Aikton, and on the east by Burgh-upon-Sands and Orton. It comprises the townships of Bampton Great, Bampton Little, and Oughterby. The parish was surveyed for the purposes of the tithe commutation, and there are maps deposited in the different townships. The population, who are principally employed in agriculture, are located in the villages of Kirkbampton, Little Bampton, and Oughterby, and the hamlets of Flat, Longrigg, Ploughlands, and Studholme, and a number of detached farm-houses. The state of the parish as to cleanliness and comfort is generally good, and as regards the village of Kirkbampton remarkably so. A considerable portion of the parish, viz., the lauds near the three principal villages, consists of good vegetable earths, resting on gravelly clays; another considerable portion consists of poor soils resting on cold clays; and there are some mossy lands. The soil varies much and abruptly, hence improvement has been effected of late years by draining. The residents here attend the Carlisle and Wigton markets,—chiefly the former. Almost all the parish is enclosed, but not under any Act of Parliament. The lands not enclosed are nearly all subdivided, and assigned to their several owners.

KIRKBAMPTON, OR BAMPTON GREAT.

The township of Kirkbampton comprises an area of 1,260 acres, and its rateable value is about £1,178. The population in 1801, was 149; in 1811, 175; in 1821, 193; in 1831, 192; in 1841, 193; and in 1851, 220.

The manor of Kirkbampton is within the barony of Burgh, and seems to have anciently included the whole parish. Its first recorded possessor was Hildred de Carlisle, who had his seat here in the reign of Henry II. After his death, it was divided by his descendants, Richard and Robert, children of his son Odard. In the year 1227, Eudo de Carlisle, tenant of Kirkbampton, gave four carucates in Oughterby and Little Bampton to Walter de Bampton by fine, which by an inquisition taken in 1295 was valued to £20 land, and to be held of the manor of Burgh. Another part was held in 1252 by Elizabeth Montacute, Countess of Salisbury, as of the inheritance of William Montacute, earl of Salisbury; and in the same year Sir Brian Stapleton of Bedale in Yorkshire, held it (by purchase, as it appears) whose posterity sold it in the reign of Henry III. to the Dacres of Lanercost, whose son Christopher sold it in severalties to the tenants. In 1582, Thomas Brisby, gentleman, in consideration of £200 conveyed to John Southaick, Esq. and Richard Tolson, their heirs and assignees, the manor or lordship of Little Bampton, which four years later was again sold to John Dalston, Esq., who sold it in the following year to the respective tenants. Some lands in this parish are held by Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; in respect of which courts are held at Orton.

There seems to have been numerous defensive works in this parish, against the predatory incursions of the moss-troopers. The remains of the most considerable of these are situated south of Kirkbampton village, on a rising ground commanding an extensive view along the shores of the Solway. It consists of a strong enclosure covering more than an acre of ground. The greatest portion of it appears to have been defended by a double rampart of earth and a double ditch, the other portion, which probably was appended to the principal work, was surrounded by a single rampart and ditch. Tradition says that the cattle of the district were driven to this place for protection, on the appearance of the moss-troopers; and, in consequence, the work is commonly ascribed to the time of these freebooters. The irregularity of the work favours this supposition, but the discovery of a stone, with the following Latin inscription on it, in the adjoining field, in the year 1843, seems to connect the Romans with this locality.

VES. (Rest defaced.)

Further examination may probably establish a connection between this and works of a similar character in the neighbourhood; or, at all events, may show that a line of defence, consisting of an earthen rampart and a ditch, extended from it to a considerable distance, as they can be clearly traced in the adjoining field, which is called "Foldsteads." Not far from this a notorious moss-trooper, called Boothill, was killed in a singular manner. He was found asleep on the ground, by a person of Kirkbampton, called Hody, who, determined not to let the opportunity slip of freeing himself and neighbours of a formidable enemy, coolly drew the freebooter's sword out of its scabbard, and with it severed his head from his body. The Scot lies buried in Kirkbampton church-yard, and his grave is covered with a stone, on which is engraved a sword.

No feasts or wakes are at present observed in this parish; formerly, it is said, there was annually a bonfire near Kirkbampton. It is stated to have been on the evening of the day before Midsummer Day, but it was probably in reality on the eve of St. John the Baptist's day. The children and young people ran through the flames and smoke of the bonfire, singing, "awake, awake, for Sin Gal's (St John's) sake."

The village of Kirkbampton is pleasantly situated about six miles west of Carlisle, and seven north-north-east of Wigton, and commands beautiful and extensive views of the surrounding country.

THE CHURCH.

Kirkbampton church, dedicated to St. Peter, is an ancient structure, the great arch and doorway of which are in the Saxon style: within the latter there is a rudely-sculptured bas-relief, representing two animals, and what seems to have been designed for an abbot. The benefice, which is a rectory, valued in the King's Book at £14 17s. 11d., pays a pension of 3s. 4d. to the Bishop of Carlisle. A moiety of the rectory was given in the reign of Henry II. by Adam, son of Robert, to the hospital of St. Nicholas at Carlisle, and is now held by the dean and chapter. The right of presentation to the second moiety, long called the rectory of Kirkbampton (the other moiety having no concern with the cure) has been disputed ever since the reign of Queen Elizabeth. There were then three claimants, Cuthbert Musgrave, Esq., William Brisco, Esq., and Christopher Daere, Esq. In 1710 those families joined in a presentation. In 1740, on the death of the Rev. Thomas Story, who had held the incumbency for six years, and who is said to have buried every one of the parishioners who were living at the time of his induction. Henry Viscount Lonsdale presented the Rev. Michael Burn, who died in 1786, after which the living seems to have been vacant for some years, owing to the disputes regarding the right of presentation. Ultimately the Rev. John Wheatley was presented by the Earl of Lonsdale; and since that period the advowson is understood to be jointly in the Earl of Lonsdale and Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart. The living was augmented some years ago by £152 12s. 4d. from the "Parliamentary Fund," reduced three-per-cents, now yielding a half-yearly dividend of £6 15s. 9d., so that the benefice is now worth about £100 per annum, including seven acres, three roods, twenty perches of glebe. The tithes were commuted in 1840 for a yearly rent-charge of £94 4s., viz., Kirkbampton township £16 8s. 1d.; Little Bampton, £67 8s. 8d.; and Oughterby, £10 6s. 3d. A rent-charge of £58 6s. 6d. was awarded in lieu of the moiety of the great tithes of Little Bampton, which formerly belonged to the dean and chapter of Carlisle. This rent-charge was transferred with the capitular estates to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who have bought the lease of James Losh, Esq., and who are in consequence in full possession thereof. The parish register commences in the year 1695.

There is a neat rectory, but the date of its erection is not known.

There is a parish school here, as also a Sunday school, the latter of which is supported by voluntary contributions, and is attended by about fifty children.

Haverlands House and Bank House (the last name is applied to the neighbouring detached houses) are in this township.

Longrigg is a hamlet in this township about a mile west of the village of Kirkbampton. The lands here and in some other parts of the parish are in the lordship of the rector.

Flat is another hamlet one and a half miles south-east of the village.

BAMPTON LITTLE.

Little Bampton township contains 1,337 acres, and its rateable value is £929. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 190; in 1811, 176; in 1821, 172; in 1831, 213; in 1841, 212; and in 1851, 210. This manor formed originally a part of the manor of Kirkbampton; but in 1327 Eudo de Carlisle gave four carucates of land here and in Oughterby to Walter de Bampton by fine, which by an inquisition taken in 1295, were found to be worth £20, and to be held of the barony of Burgh. This estate appears to have passed to the Musgraves of Crookdake, the co-heiresses of which family enfranchised the lands. We find also, that in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Thomas Brisley conveyed an estate called the manor of Little Bampton, to Messrs. Southaick and Tolson; the latter conveyed it to John Dalston, Esq., by whom it was sold in severalty to the tenants.

The village of Little Bampton is situated two-and-a-half miles west-south-west of Kirkbampton, and five miles north of Wigton. There is a spring on the edge of Little Bampton Moss, the waters of which are collected in a well, and are used for the dressing of sores, being considered to have a healing power. New Bampton, Westfield House, Windmill House, and The Building are single houses having particular names in this township.

Ploughlands is a hamlet in the township of Little Bampton.

OUGHTERBY.

The area of this township is 905 acres, and its rateable value £760. In 1801 it contained 117 inhabitants; in 1811, 107; in 1821, 105; in 1831, 118; in 1841, 131; and in 1851, 116.

The village of Oughterby is one mile south-west of the parish church, and six miles north-east of Wigton.

The Rev. William Hodson, D.D., fellow, tutor, and finally master of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, was born here. He died in 1847.

Studholme is a hamlet in this township three miles west of the village of Kirkhampton, and is separated from the rest of the township by the hamlets of Ploughlands and Longrigg and their lands.

ORTON PARISH.

THE parish of Orton is bounded by those of St. Mary, Barchon-Sands, Kirkhampton, Kirkandrews, Ailton, Thursby, and Dalston. It comprises the townships of Great Orton and Baldwin Holme, whose united area is 4,277 acres. The soil is chiefly clayey with a mixture of gravel; several attempts have been made to discover coal here, but without success. The rateable value of the parish is £2,580.

ORTON.

The population of this township in 1801 was 173; in 1811, 205; in 1821, 208; in 1831, 210; in 1841, 204; and in 1851, 285. They are principally engaged in agriculture, and attend the Wigton and Carlisle markets.

The manor of Orton, held under that of Levington, belonged at an early period to a family to whom it gave name. The first of the name that is recorded is Simon de Orton, who had issue Alan, and received from Henry III. a grant of free warren in Orton. He was succeeded by John, his son, to whom was granted, in 1340,¹ a license for making a park here. John de Orton was succeeded by his son Giles, whose daughter and heir Joan was married to Sir Clement de Skelton, who by her had four daughters, coheirs, one named Agnes, married to one of the Leighs of Isell, another to a member of the family of Bellasis, a third to one of the Ridleys, and the fourth to a Blennerhasset. The manor was thereupon divided into three parts, which came into the possession of the Leigh, Ridley, and Blennerhasset families; and the land was charged with a rent of £8 to Bellasis, who sold the same to a Mr. Coldale, a merchant in Carlisle, and it afterwards came by marriage to a younger branch of the Briscos. Subsequently John Brisco purchased Leigh's part of Wilfrid Lawson and Maud his wife, and of Thomas Blennerhasset the other portion. Accordingly, in 1588, it was found by an inquisition that "William Brisco, of Crofton, son of the said John, died seised of the manor of Orton, with 20 messuages, 400 acres of land, 40 acres of meadow, 200 acres of common, 100 acres of wood, in Orton aforesaid, together with the donation and right of patronage of two parts in three to be divided of the parish church of the aforesaid manor of Orton, holden of Edward Musgrave, gentleman, as of his manor of Levington, by two parts of one knight's fee. And that the third part of the said manor of Orton, late the inheritance of Nicholas Ridley, Esq., deceased, and all and every the messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, to the said third part belonging, were holden of the queen in capite by the service of the third part of one knight's fee; and that the said two parts were worth by the year above reprises £5 6s. 8d., and the said third part £3 13s. 4d." Not long after Ridley's portion came into the same family by purchase. For in 1625, John Brisco, son of the William above mentioned, claimed the entire patronage, which being appendant to the manor, was, when it was severed and divided into three parts, enjoyed alternately by all the three; but ever since that time it has remained in the Brisco family, and is now enjoyed by Sir Wastel Brisco, the present lord of the manor, who holds a court here annually, and receives about £40 a year as lord's rent.

The manor of Wiggonby, in this parish, long ago annihilated, belonged to the Ortons, and was divided among their representatives. The principal landowners in the township are Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; Messrs. George Robinson, George Blaylock, William Lowther, John Sturdy, the trustees of the late John Moore, Thomas Wannop, William Nixon, and Thomas Norman.

The village of Orton is five miles west-by-south of Carlisle. From an adjacent enclosure called Parson's Thorn, no fewer than fifteen churches may be seen in Cumberland, and several in Scotland, with beautiful views of Carlisle, Gretna, and many other places. From the many Roman causeways and other foundations which have been from time to time dug up near the village, it is evident that Orton was at one time a place of some consequence, and most probably a market town. At the extremity of a lane that extends 300 yards northward of the village, is a large foss or double ditch, where an iron chain went across the road, and was locked every night, called Barrass Gate, made as a defence against the frequent incursions of the Scots or Moss Troopers. The entrance from the east had a similar defence, and the whole parish was surrounded with a ditch and an embankment, called the Ringfence, within which was found several years ago, a very curious and neat sandal, buried in the peat moss. Tradition says, that on one occasion, a trooper, while reconnoitring near Barrass Gate, was nailed to his saddle by an arrow discharged from a great distance by a yeoman of the name of Wilson.

THE CHURCH.

Orton church, an ancient structure, situated near the centre of the parish, is dedicated to St. ———. The living, a rectory in the patronage of Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart., is valued in the King's Book at £9. In 1795 it was valued at £140, and is now worth about £370, including seventy acres of glebe land. The tithes have been commuted. The parish register commences in 1569.

Rectors.—John, 1309; John de Whitrigg, 1337; William de Arthureth, 1337; Richard de Langworthy, 1376; Thomas de Raughton, 1407; Richard Place, —; Leonard Lowther, 1578; William Mey, 1585; Mr. Burton, 1643; John Pearson, 1665; Gaven Noble, —; Rowland Noble, 1693; David Bell, 1709; John Brisco, 1730; William Taylor, 1771; James Brisco, 1772; John Mason, 1835; Robert Pearson, 1845; Frederick Paget Wilkinson, 1857.

The parish school is a stone building, situated near the church, and has an average attendance of forty children. The master receives £3 17s. 6d., the interest of £100, left by Thomas Pattinson, in 1785, for which eight children are taught at half the usual quarterage.¹ About a mile from Orton is another school, built in 1836. New schools are just about being built by Sir Wastel Brisco, on a beautiful site, at the south entrance to the village.

Bishop Nicolson was a native of this parish; an outline of his life will be found in the annals of the Bishop of Carlisle, page 111.

Richard Dixon was master of Orton school for nearly fifty years, and styled himself "Happy Dick," an appellation which was ever afterwards bestowed upon him by the parishioners, most of whom he educated. He died in 1811, and his long and faithful life is commemorated by the following inscription on his tomb:—

"Seven times seven years he taught this school,
And canvassed many a tedious rule;
Five times seven years, as you may mark,
He served here as parish clerk.
He was a just and upright man,
As far as we his life could scan,
And now he rests beneath this clod,
Till called upon to meet his God."

Bow is a hamlet in this township, one and a half miles north of the village.

BALDWIN HOLME.

The number of inhabitants in this township in 1801 was 205; in 1811, 217; in 1821, 234; in 1831, 235; in 1841, 278; and in 1851, 234. The soil here is similar to that of Great Orton, clayey with a mixture of gravel. Baldwin Holme forms part of the manor of Orton, and as such its manorial rights and privileges are possessed by Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart. The principal landowners are Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; Messrs. Twentyman, James Hayes, Mrs. Pattison, John Hind, Robert Blamire, John Newton, Mrs. Bowes, Joseph Railton, Robert Story, Joseph Wood, John Mc.Kn ght, and Arthur Westmoreland.

The hamlet of Baldwin Holme is one and a half miles south-by-east of Great Orton. Baldwin Holme is not far from the line of the ancient Roman road from Lugubalia, Carlisle, to Olenacum, Old Carlisle. The other hamlets are Little Orton, one and a half miles north-east; Orton Rigg, one mile south, and Wood Houses, one and a half miles south of the same place. Hylton Castle, about two and a half miles south-east of Orton, is also in this township. It is an elegant mansion, erected a few years ago by Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart., for his son, Hylton Brisco, Esq., an officer in the army. Near to Little Orton is a spring of excellent water, never known to run dry.

ROCKLIFFE PARISH.

ROCKLIFFE parish is bounded on the north by the estuary of the rivers Esk and Line, on the west by the Solway Frith, on the south by the river Eden and Stanwix parish, and on the east by Kirkcubright parish in Eskdale Ward. The name is derived from the conspicuous red sandstone cliff on which the village stands. It was anciently written Routhelive, and sometimes Redcliffe.

The manor of Rockcliffe, which was coextensive with the parish, was anciently a fee or appendage of the Barony of Burgh, though not within the boundary of that barony. It was granted by Hugh de Morvill, baron of Burgh, in the reign of Henry II., to John de Routhelive; to hold of his Barony of Burgh by render of homage, service, and 2s. rent. William de Routhelive, son of John, in the year 1205 sold and conveyed the 'Vill of Routhelive' to Radulf de Bray, who was one of the king's marshalls for England. He granted the rectory to John, prior of Saint Mary's, in Carlisle, who appropriated the same to the Priory. Richard de Bray, son of Radulf, had an only child, Matilda, who married William de Hardreshull. In the 33rd year of Henry III., W. de Hardreshull and Matilda his wife (with the concurrence of John de Ladbrook and Joan his wife, which Joan was widow and dowress of Richard de Bray) conveyed the manor to John le Franceis. To him succeeded Gilbert le Franceis, who died in 1278, leaving a son Richard, aged sixteen years. A dispute ensued concerning the wardship of this manor. Thomas de Multon, baron of Gillesland and Burgh, claimed it in virtue of Rockcliffe being held of his barony of Burgh. The crown claimed on an assertion that the manor was held of the king in capite. A writ of diem clausit extremum was issued, and an inquisition found that the manor was held of Multon, by payment of 2s. rent, and by payment of 13d. cornage to the king's exchequer at Carlisle. How this cornage payment arose it does not appear. Meantime, Michael de Hercla took possession of the minor, and married him to his daughter: in consequence of which the king seized Michael's lands and fined him. The real name of this family was Vernoun—Franceis, or Francigena being an appellation given in consequence of their French origin, as Denton says. Thus, in the 18th year of Edward I., Richard Vernoun surrendered the manor to the king—and in the 22nd Edward I. took a fresh grant of it to himself for life, with remainder to his son Richard and Alienor his wife, and the heirs of their bodies, remainder to the heirs of Richard in fee. Isabella, daughter and heiress, carried it in marriage to Thomas Danyell, who died 1349, leaving an infant daughter, Margaret, who afterwards married John de Radcliff. In 1368, they created an entail of the property on collaterals, having then no issue themselves. It was subsequently sold by a Radcliff to the Dacres; and so became reunited to the barony of Burgh. The precise date of this reunion does not appear, but it certainly was in possession of Ranulf Lord Dacre in 1460. Camden informs us that here was "a little castle built not long since by the Dacres for their own private defence." It stood on the cliff, commanding a fine view of the Scottish border, and was admirably placed as an outpost for the defence of Burgh against the Scots. It was seized and garrisoned by Leonard Dacre, on his rebellion in 1569, and soon afterwards demolished. Nothing remains of it save some foundations. On the partition of the Dacre estates Rockcliffe fell to the Countess of Arundel, and from her to the Duke of Norfolk. The castle and demesnes, and most part of the customary tenements, were sold, in 1682, by the Duke, to the Rev. Charles Usher, a descendant of Archbishop Usher, who erected a mansion on the site of the castle. His granddaughter, Madam Usher, in 1745, was there residing, and is said to have been visited there by the young Pretender, Charles Edward, who, with the Highland clans, crossed the river Eden at Rockcliffe, on their march to Carlisle. Mrs. Usher devised to William Strong, Esq., who, in 1760, enfranchised most of the customary estates, and his descendant sold the demesnes and remaining customary tenements to Robert Mounsey, Esq.

The village of Rockcliffe occupies a pleasant situation on a long cliff above the Eden, five miles north-north-west of Carlisle, and commands a beautiful view of the surrounding country. A little below the village, within reach of the tide, there is a remarkable mineral spring; there is another in one of the farmyards.

The parish contains two townships, viz., Rockcliffe Castletown and Rockcliffe Churchtown; but for all practical purposes of rating, maintenance of poor, highways, &c., they are conjoint.

ROCKLIFFE CASTLETOWN.

The population of this township in 1801 was 296; in 1811, 338; in 1821, 360; in 1831, 422; in 1841, 471; and in 1851, 466. Its area is 5,225 statute acres, and its rateable value £2,289. The principal landowners are, George G. Mounsey, Esq.; Rev. John Hodgson; the Misses Lowry; Mrs. Skelton, John Nixon, and Robert and William Edgar. The soil in the neighbourhood of the Eden is a rich loam, with a large extent of alluvial salt marsh; in other parts there is arable land of a cold clay description, and also of black peat soil. The Caledonian railway runs through this township.

At Castletown is the mansion of George Gill Mounsey, Esq., beautifully situated on the north bank of the Eden, and surrounded with woods, shrubberies, &c.

Mounsey of Castletown.

The Rev. ROBERT MOUNSEY, perpetual curate of Ravenstonedale, co. Westmoreland (son of George Mounsey, of Heltonedale, Westmoreland), married Mary Winter, of Tebay, in the same county, and had issue,

GEORGE, Robert of London; Mary Elizabeth; and Anne. The elder son,

GEORGE MOUNSEY, Esq., of Carlisle, married, in 1752, Margaret, daughter of John Stephenson, of Carlisle, and by her (who died 1807) had issue,

I. George Stephenson, major E. I. Co.'s service.

II. ROBERT, of whom presently.

III. John, who died unmarried.

IV. William, post-captain R.N.

V. Thomas.

VI. Henry, of London, died unmarried.

VII. James, married Anne Ewart.

- i. Barbara, married to Thomas Ramsley, of Naworth.
- ii. Mary, died unmarried.
- iii. Margaret, married to James Dundas.
- iv. Elizabeth, married to John Gray.
- v. Ann, died unmarried.
- vi. Dorothea, married to Christopher Thornhill.

The second son,

ROBERT MOUNSEY, of Rockcliffe Castletown, married 23rd November, 1789, Mary, daughter of Captain Joseph Gill, and by her (who died 1849) had issue,

- i. GEORGE GILL, his heir, now of Castletown.
- ii. William Henry, late capt. 4th Regt. Infantry.
- iii. Margaret.
- iv. Juliana, married to John Lambert, Esq., of Alnwick.
- v. Mary, died unmarried.
- vi. Anna, married to Thomas Brown, Esq.
- vii. Elizabeth.

Mr. Mounsey died 26th July, 1842, and was succeeded by

GEORGE GILL MOUNSEY, of Rockcliffe Castletown, born 27th May, 1797, married 6th September, 1827, to Isabella, daughter of John Heysham, M.D., and by her (who died 14th May, 1848) has issue,

- i. ROBERT HEYSHAM, born 20th July, 1828.
- ii. George William, born 3rd April, 1831.
- iii. John Giles, born 22nd August, 1832.
- iv. Augustus Henry, born 27th August, 1834.
- v. Charles James, born 13th December, 1835.
- vi. Elizabeth Mary, died 6th June, 1836.
- vii. Isabella Dorothea.

Arms—Chequy, or and gu; on a chief of the second, three mullets of the first.

Crest—A demi-griffin, with a wreath of oak round the neck, and bearing, with three claws, a banner, erect.

Motto—Semper paratus.

Redhill, Floristown, Garistown, Cross, Croft End, Tod Hills, and Wetheral, are hamlets scattered over this township at various distances from Rockcliffe Church.

ROCKCLIFFE CHURCHTOWN.

This township contains 1,347 acres, and its rateable value is £1,061. Its population in 1801 was 222; in 1811, 250; in 1821, 362; in 1831, 463; in 1841, 353; and in 1851, 535. The soil is rich and loamy near the Eden. The Caledonian railway intersects the township, and there is a station within half a mile, or thereabouts, of the village.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small but neat structure of hewn stone, in the Decorated style, erected in 1848 at a cost of £1,400, raised partly by subscription, but chiefly by the liberality of George Gill Mounsey, Esq., of Castletown. It consists of nave, chancel, north transept, and a handsome spire at the south-west corner. The windows are filled with stained glass, of beautiful colours and design. The eastern window contains the Crucifixion, Resurrection, and Ascension, while the west one contains figures of the Blessed Virgin, St. Peter, and St. Paul. The church contains sittings for 170 persons, the whole of which are free and unappropriated. The benefice is now a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Carlisle, to whom, on the dissolution of the priory, the appropriate rectory was granted by Henry VIII. It is worth about £100 per annum, arising from Queen Anne's Bounty and a money payment by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in whom the tithes of the parish (commuted for a rent charge of £294) are now vested. There is no glebe nor house of residence.

INCUMBENTS.—William Robinson, 1754; Jeremiah Reed, 1780; George Topping, 1839. Previously to 1754 it seems not to have been a benefice, but a mere curacy under the dean and chapter of Carlisle.

There is no parochial school. A school is maintained by Mr. Mounsey capable of accommodating seventy scholars; the average attendance is about sixty.

CHARITIES.

Grierson's Gift.—Mr. John Grierson, about a century ago, left the sum of 26s., payable yearly out of his lease of the tithes of Rickerby, in the parish of Stanwix, to be distributed weekly in bread to poor persons in this parish. This payment was regularly made, and seven penny loaves given away every Sunday, until the lapse of the lease within a short time past, when it was lost.

Usher's Gift.—Mrs. Hannah Usher, by her will, dated 24th September, 1747, gave to the minister and churchwardens of Rockcliffe £20, the interest to be distributed yearly amongst poor housekeepers. This money is in Mr. Mounsey's hands, and 20s. are yearly distributed according to the bequest.

Harker is a hamlet in this township, situated at the eastern extremity of the parish, three miles north-by-west of Carlisle.

Harker Lodge is the seat of Richard Ferguson, Esq.

Ferguson of Harker Lodge.

RICHARD FERGUSON, grandfather of the present possessor of Harker Lodge, left, by Mary his wife, a daughter, Mary, and five sons, viz.:

John, Richard, ROBERT, Joseph, and George.

Of these, the third,

ROBERT FERGUSON, of Carlisle, married 27th December, 1789, Anne, daughter of John Wood, of Maryport, and had issue,

- i. RICHARD, now of Harker Lodge.
- ii. John, died 8th December, 1829.
- iii. Joseph, married Maria Isabella, daughter of John Clarke, Esq., of Bebside, co. Northumberland, and has issue, John, Robert, Joseph Selby, Richard William, Elizabeth, and Maria Isabella.
- iv. Mary.
- v. Sarah, married to George Henry Hewit, Esq., of Burch.
- vi. Elizabeth.

Mr. FERGUSON died 14th November, 1816, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

RICHARD FERGUSON, Esq., J.P. and D.L., born 20th May, 1784; high sheriff in 1845; married 25th May, 1809, Margaret, third daughter of Captain William Giles.

Crest—A demi lion, holding in its paw a thistle, ppr.

Motto—Marte et arce.

The Hill, three miles north of Carlisle, is the seat of Sir James Robert Grant, Knt., inspector-general of army hospitals.

The principal landowners in this township are George Gill Mounsey, Esq.; Sir James Grant; Richard Ferguson, Esq.; Edmund Graham, Esq.; Rev. M. James; Mrs. Twentyman; and Mr. J. Donald.

STANWIX PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the north and north-west by the parishes of Seabely, Kirkcubbin, and Rockliffe; on the south by the river Eden; and on the east by Crosby-upon-Eden and Warwick. It is divided into the townships of Crago, Efferby, Houghton, Linstock, Rickerby, Staunton, Stanwix, and Tarraby. A survey with a map or plan has been made for the purpose of tithe commutation, and other parochial purposes; the plan is deposited in the parish church. The inhabitants, who are located in the villages, and in single houses here and there scattered over the parish, are generally employed in agriculture, and are industrious and cleanly in their habits, and comfortable. The quality of the soil is various, some of it being very good, some of middling quality, and a portion much inferior. Much of it rests upon a clay subsoil, and is well adapted for the growth of wheat and other grain; a considerable portion, especially near the river Eden, is a rich loam, naturally dry, a part of which consists of excellent permanent pasture; in other parts of the parish the soil is poor, a portion being black soil, resting upon a poor sandy or gravelly marl. The land is generally well cultivated and very productive, and along the banks of the Eden, and to some distance backward is extremely rich and beautiful, the views from different points being highly picturesque and interesting. The Caledonian railway passes through the parish. Carlisle being close at hand, the inhabitants attend that market town.

The Roman Wall and Vallum passed through this parish, entering it on the north-east at Walby, in the parish of Crosby-upon-Eden, and running in a south-west direction through the townships of Linstock, Tarraby, and Stanwix, where they cross the river Eden. In many places their site, with the ditch, can be distinctly traced: the latter passing through the farmyard of Drawlykes, while the former runs along the ridge of high ground to the north of the other. A Roman road, or trackway, can be traced running parallel to the Wall, a few hundred yards to the south. There was a Roman station at Stanwix. Several Roman monuments have been found, which have been described by different antiquaries; amongst others one built in the garden wall of Drawlykes Castle. Another has very recently been brought to light in making a doorway between the farmhouse and the castle, where, on removing the plaster from the wall, a stone with a Roman inscription was found built into the wall, but no reading of the inscription has as yet been given, it having been discovered so very lately.

STANWIX.

This township comprises an area of 425 acres, and its rateable value is £3,025. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 337; in 1811, 400; in 1821, 400; in 1831, 545; in 1841, 789; and in 1851, 882.

Stanwix is parcel of the manor of the socage of the castle of Carlisle, and the lands are all freehold. The principal landowners are the Duke of Devonshire, Captain Watts, Richard Ferguson, Esq., and George H. Head, Esq.

The village of Stanwix is delightfully situated on the north bank of the Eden, across which there is a fine stone bridge, connecting it with Carlisle, of which it may be considered as forming a large and populous suburb. It contains several well-built houses and terraces, where several of the merchants and tradespeople of the city reside. "The church and churchyard," says Collingwood Bruce, "occupy the site of the station which guarded the northern bank of the Eden. Recent explorations have displayed distinct remains of ancient edifices. In pulling down the old church, to make way for the present structure, a very fine figure of Victory, somewhat mutilated, was disclosed, which is now in the museum at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The name of the place indicates that, whilst the dwellings in the vicinity were made of clay, as many of them are yet, by reason of the plunder of the Roman station, it could boast of being a town of stones. The situation is one of great beauty. To the east, at a considerable distance, the Nine-nicks of Thirlwall rear their rugged peaks; and to the south and south-east appear the beautiful grounds of Rickerby House, the river Eden permeating a rich and well-wooded country, the ancient city of Carlisle crowned with its venerable cathedral, and the long vista of country terminating in the Cumbrian mountains. Between the station and the north bank of the Eden, the fosse of the Wall is distinctly marked, and a hollow line, formed by the excavation of the foundation of the Wall itself, shows its track to the water's edge, near to the Hyssop Holme Well. We are told by Camden 'that the Wall passed the river over against the castle, where, in the very channel, the remains of it, namely, the great stones, appear to this day.' That the Wall on the other side of the river clambered up that part of the castle bank which projects most boldly forward, is rendered probable by the appearance of masonry, resembling its foundations, beneath the grassy surface. At this point, however, we lose all sight of the great structure, until we get beyond the boundaries of the famous border city of the west.¹

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a cruciform structure, in the Early English style, consisting of nave, aisles, transept, chancel ornamented with crosses, and fine tower surmounted with pinnacles. It was erected by subscription in 1841, at a cost of £3,030, including about £300 for an organ, and occupies the site of the old parish church, which was built on the place, and partly out of the ruins of the Roman station of Congavata. On the 21st December, 1843, the church was partially burnt; and the pews, windows, and organ, were completely destroyed. It was insured for £600, which, with £100 collected by subscription, were expended on its renovation, and in the purchase of its present large and splendid organ, built by Hill, of London, which is considered one of the finest in the north of England. The eastern window is filled with stained glass, containing figures of our Saviour, St. Michael, and St. John the Evangelist. The tower contains a fine clock, with three dials, presented by Richard Ferguson, Esq., of Harker Lodge. The church will accommodate about 800 persons. The living is a vicarage, valued in the King's Book at £9, but now worth about £300 a-year, including £51 6s. 8d. from the bishop and dean and chapter, Easter dues, &c. The tithes were commuted in 1840 for a rent-charge of £200 a-year. The benefice was formerly a rectory; but being given by Walter, chaplain to Henry I., to the prior and convent of Carlisle, was soon afterwards appropriated thereto; and the corn tithes have been shared between the dean and chapter and the bishop, the latter of whom appoints the vicar. The parish register commences in 1650.

The vicarage house, erected about thirty years ago, is pleasantly situated adjoining the churchyard.

There are two schools here, one erected in 1846, the other in 1855. There are eight pupil teachers. In one school there are about 200 children in average attendance, in the other about 60.

There is a reading-room in the village, which is supported by about 70 members, and possesses a library of about 700 volumes.

Here is a Reformatory for boys convicted of petty theft, which is open to criminals from the counties of Cumberland, Westmoreland, Lancashire, and the North Riding of Yorkshire. It was established in 1854 by George H. Head, Esq., of Rickerby House, by whom it is entirely supported. The boys work eight and a half hours per day, devote three hours to school, one hour to religious instruction, and two and a half hours to meals and play. No specific time is allotted for their residence here; the object being the moral and social reformation of each boy; his thorough instruction in the habits of order, cleanliness, and industry, so that they may become as it were a portion of himself, and thus fit him for returning to society a new being, with every rational guarantee of his becoming a useful citizen. None but boys who have been in prison are eligible for admission, and they must be recommended by the magistrates, or chaplain of the gaol, and other persons interested in the reformation of juvenile offenders. The course of instruction embraces reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and grammar. Mr. Head attends regularly and takes part in the instruction of the boys. The Reformatory is under the superintendence of Mr. and Mrs. Connell.

¹ About three years ago, in cutting the main-sewer for the Carlisle sewerage works, the workmen came upon the foundation of the Roman Wall, in the low ground, between where it crosses the west of Stanwix and the high ground to the west of Carlisle castle, known by the name of Davidson's Banks, and in a straight line with the foundation of the Wall at Stanwix. As this is a considerable distance to the north of the castle, this takes away the supposition "that the Wall on the other side of the river clambered up that part of the castle bank which projects most boldly forward."

CHARITIES.

Benson's Charity.—Dr. Benson, who died about the year 1726, bequeathed £50 to the poor of this parish, to be disposed of in the same manner as a similar legacy left by him to the parish of Dalston.

Graham's Charity.—Monkhouse Graham, by will dated 17th June, 1805, directed his executors to pay £100 to the rector of Stanwix, to be placed out by him, and the interest thereof to be laid out on every 24th December, in the purchase of bread, to be distributed amongst sober, honest, and industrious poor housekeepers, or labouring individuals, without distinction of communions, residing within the said parish, in such shares as the rector should think proper. In consequence of the failure of a bank in Carlisle, some years ago, the benefactions are now reduced to £100, the interest of which is distributed in bread at Christmas.

Gowland's Bequest.—There was also another bequest made by William Gowland, in 1792, but it was never received.

Miss Patrickson's Charity.—Miss Patrickson, who died at Houghton-town-head, January 15th, 1854, bequeathed the sum of £100 to the vicar and churchwardens of Stanwix for the time being, the interest to be applied for the benefit of poor and indigent persons resident in the parish. She also bequeathed the further sum of £100 to the vicar and churchwardens of Stanwix, the interest to be applied for the purposes of the school then recently erected there.

Sowerby's Charity.—William Sowerby, who died at Stanwix in 1855, bequeathed £200, the interest to be applied for the benefit of poor persons resident in the township of Stanwix; and also a further sum of £200, for the purposes of the school at Stanwix.

CARGO.

The area of Cargo township is 1,196 statute acres, and its rateable value £1,675. Its population in 1801, was 237; in 1811, 243; in 1821, 274; in 1831, 242; in 1841, 259; and in 1851, 292. The township is intersected by the Caledonian railway. The tithes of Cargo were commuted in 1841, for £173.

The first recorded possessor of Cargo is John de Lacy, constable of Chester, who held the same immediately of the King, by cornage. This John de Lacy granted Cargo and Cringleydyke to William de Vesey and his heirs, lords of Alnwick, in Northumberland, to be held of the donor and his heirs, for a mewed hawk yearly, in lieu of all services. William de Vesey, in his turn, granted it to Sir Ewan Carlisle, but reserving to himself and his heirs similar services. In 1274,

Robert de Ross, lord of Wark, in Tyndale, died seised of this manor, having held the same of William de Carlisle the younger, rendering yearly a hawk or mark in lieu of all services. It continued in the family of de Ross for many generations, until 1338, and shortly after, when Elizabeth de Ross, the heir general, transferred the inheritance to the family of the Parrs of Kendal, with whom it remained till Ellen, Marchioness of Northampton, widow of William Law, gave it in exchange to Queen Elizabeth. It was subsequently granted by King James to the Whitmores, by whom it was possessed in 1688; it was afterwards bought by the Dacres, who sold it, in 1793, to Joseph Lamb, Esq., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; it is now the property of Charles John Lamb, Esq. The principal landowners are Messrs. Thomas James, William Robinson, Richard Ferguson, Francis Holland, John Norman, Mrs. Twentyman, William Lowry, Charles Conway, John and Thomas Bone, and the Rev. John Lowry.

The village of Cargo is about three miles north-north-west of Carlisle.

At the entrance of the village there is a substantial, commodious, and well-arranged school, with a house for the master, erected in 1856, according to plans approved of by the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education, at a cost of £258, on a site kindly given by T. James, Esq. It is under government inspection, conducted by a certificated teacher, and has an average attendance of about sixty children. During the summer months divine service is held in the school-room every Sunday afternoon.

ETTERBY.

This township comprises an area of 297 acres, and its rateable value is £1,254 14s. 4d. In 1801 it contained 49 inhabitants; in 1811, 51; in 1821, 67; in 1831, 110; in 1841, 152; and in 1851, 204. The Caledonian railway runs through the township. The soil here is strong, and incumbent upon a strong clay subsoil.

"Etterby" say Nicolson and Burn, "in old writings is called Arthuriburgum, which seems to imply that it had been a considerable village. Some affirm that it took its name from Arthur King of the Britons, who was in this country about the year 550, pursuing his victories over the Danes and Norwegians. But there are no remains of antiquity at or near this place to justify such a conjecture." Etterby is parcel of the manor of Westlinton and barony of Burgh, under the Earl of Lonsdale. The chief landowners are Messrs. John Saul, John and Thomas Allison, John Fawcett, and Henry T. White.

LINSTOCK.

This township comprises an area of 1,133 acres, and its rateable value is £1,665. In 1801 it contained 167 inhabitants; in 1811, 192; in 1821, 231; in 1831, 228; in 1841, 220; and in 1851, 220. The soil here is alluvial, on a clay subsoil, and some with a sandy bottom.

Linstock was granted by Henry I. to his chaplain Walter, and by him given to the prior and convent of Carlisle. After the creation of the see, the bishop and convent held their lands in common, till a partition was made by Gualo, the papal legate, by which, among other manors, Linstock was appropriated to the bishop, and Linstock Castle was for a long time the only seat of the bishops of Carlisle. Bishop Irton died at the castle in 1292, and the next year Bishop Halton entertained Johannes Romanus and his suite of three hundred persons. In the year 1307, Edward, with his queen and court, were at Linstock from the 6th of March till the 12th, when he removed to Carlisle. The castle was repaired and modernised about a century ago, by John Nicolson, the lessee of the estate. The ancient square tower, probably the donjon or keep, still remains. It is of red freestone, with walls of great thickness and strength; a portion of the moat with which the structure was formerly surrounded still exists. There is no record of the date of the erection of the castle, which must have been at one time much more extensive than its present remains would lead us to suppose, from its having for so long a period been the residence of the bishops, and from the many royal and other visitors who were from time to time entertained within its walls.

The Bishop of Carlisle is lord of the manor of Linstock, which includes the parish of Crosby-upon-Eden. The principal part of the estate of Linstock Castle was held by lease under the bishop, but is now held in a similar manner under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The landowners are John James Watts, Esq., Thomas Donald, Esq., James Boustead, Esq., George Bainbridge, Esq., Mrs. Saul, the Misses Coleman, William Boustead, Esq., with several small proprietors.

The village of Linstock is situated near the Eden, about two and a half miles north-east of Carlisle. Here is a small place of worship, erected by G. H. Head, Esq., in which prayers are read on Sunday evenings.

RICKERBY.

The rateable value of Rickerby township is £1,046, and its area 560 statute acres. It contained, in 1801, 85 inhabitants; in 1811, 108; in 1821, 108; in 1831, 74; in 1841, 92; and in 1851, 92.

Rickerby, or Richardby, is a mense manor under Linstock, formerly belonging to the Tilliols, afterwards to the Pickerings and Westons, from the latter of whom it was purchased by Sir Edward Musgrave. From the Musgraves it passed by sale to the Studholmes, then to the Gilpins, in which family it continued three generations; Mr. Richardson afterwards purchased what had not been sold off to the tenants. From the Richardsons it passed to the Grahams, and is now all enfranchised. The principal landowners are George H. Head, Esq., and Miss Aglionby.

The village of Rickerby is about one and a half miles east-by-north of Carlisle. It contains a school, a neat stone building, erected in 1836, by G. H. Head, Esq., and capable of accommodating about eighty children; average attendance about fifty.

Rickerby House, the residence of George H. Head, Esq., is a fine mansion, occupying an eligible situation about a mile east of Carlisle.

STANTON.

The population of Stainton in 1801 was 63; in 1811, 64; in 1821, 71; in 1831, 67; in 1841, 69; and in 1851, 55. The area of the township is 585 statute acres, and its rateable value £1,046. The soil here is rich and loamy, with a partly clayey subsoil. The Caledonian railway intersects the township.

Stainton is a mense manor, being parcel of the manor of Westlinton and the barony of Burgh. It belonged to the Musgraves of Crookdake, in this county, from whom it was transferred by sale to the Earl of Lonsdale, the greater part of it being previously enfranchised; it is now held under the barony of Burgh, as above. The principal landowners are Mrs. Allison, Thomas K. Atkinson, Esq., William James, Esq., Messrs. John Norman, Nanson, and Young; William Robinson, Miss Andrew, and Joseph Johnson. The tithes were commuted in 1839, the corn tithe for £74 11s., and the vicar's for £8 1s. 1d.; total, £82 12s. 1d.

The village of Stainton is two miles west-north-west of Carlisle.

This township comprises an area of 484 acres, and its rateable value is £895. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 110; in 1811, 134; in 1821, 153; in 1831, 138; in 1841, 135; and in 1851, 150.

The manor of Tarraby was conveyed by John Aglionby, Esq., in exchange, to Sir John Lowther, who again exchanged it with the Daltons for an estate in Westmoreland. It was sold to the tenants about the year 1764, by Sir William Dalston. The principal land-owners are Charles Fetherstonhaugh, Esq., John Ferguson, Esq., Thomas Graham, Esq., and George Robinson, Esq.

Drawdykes Castle, in this township, is a mansion of the Aglionbys, on the site of an ancient castle, which was taken down in the seventeenth century, and rebuilt in its present form by John Aglionby, Esq. This castle, which had been among the earliest possessions of the Aglionbys, in Cumberland, upon the demise of Christopher Aglionby, Esq., the last heir male in 1789, passed under a decree of chancery to John Orfeur Yates, Esq., of Skirwith Abbey, who married Mary, the youngest daughter of the coheiresses. The Drawdykes estate is free of toll of the city of Carlisle, a privilege which was confirmed to the tenants at the assizes in 1775.

Many Roman inscribed stones &c. have been found here; among others a Roman inscription "COH IIII PRO POS IVL VITALE." which Horseley read "Cohortis quartæ Pretorianæ posuit centuria Julii Vitalis."

HOUGHTON ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICT.

THE ecclesiastical district of Houghton was formed out of Stanwix parish and the extra-parochial place of Kingmoor, by an order in council, dated November 22nd, 1841, and comprised in 1851 a population of 502.

HOUGHTON.

The area of Houghton township is 1478 acres, and its rateable value is £1,795. Its population in 1801, was 226; in 1811, 243; in 1821, 288; in 1831, 384; in 1841, 372; and in 1851, 381. The soil here is good and strong.

The manor of Houghton and Tarraby came anciently by marriage to the Aglionbys, who were lords thereof for several generations, until John Aglionby, Esq., exchanged it with Sir John Lowther, Bart; who in his turn exchanged it for the manor of Melkinthorp, in Westmoreland, with Christopher Dalston, Esq., whose heir, Sir William Dalston, sold the same about the year 1764 to the tenants. The landowners are Messrs. John Dixon, Richard Ferguson, John Forster, John Ferguson, Thomas H. Hodgson, Robert Patrickson, Clement S. Sutton, John F. Anderson, with some small proprietors.

The village of Houghton, which is small and irregularly built, is about two miles north-by-east of Carlisle.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH.

Near to the village is St. John's District Church, erected chiefly by subscription in 1840, and containing accommodation for 300 persons. It is of white freestone from the Shalk quarries, near Dalston, and consists of nave, chancel, and tower. The church is endowed with land yielding £40 a year. The tithes were commuted, in 1842, for £138 8s., viz.: the corn tithe for £128 7s. 6d., and the vicar's tithe for £10 8s. 6d. John Dixon, Esq., is the patron, and the Rev. J. Buck, D.C.L., incumbent.

The parsonage house is a plain but neat building.

The school is a small stone structure, close to the church. It was rebuilt in 1841, will accommodate seventy children, and has an average attendance of forty.

CHARITY.

Miss Patrickson's Charity.—Miss Patrickson, who died at Houghton-town-head in 1854, bequeathed the sum of £200 to the resident clergyman and churchwardens of Houghton, to apply the interest for the benefit of poor and indigent persons resident in the township of Houghton; and also a further sum of £200, to be applied for the purposes of the school at Houghton, so long as such school shall be under the superintendence of the National School Society.

The Knells is a beautiful mansion, the seat of John Dixon, Esq.

UPPERBY PARISH.

THIS parish, comprising the several townships of Upperby, Haraby, Botcherby, Blackwell High, Blackwell Low, Brisco, Carleton, and a small portion of Botchergate, was formed into a legal district for ecclesiastical purposes in the year 1846, the cure of souls in these townships being assigned to the church of St. John at Upperby, and the incumbent thereof for ever, according to the provisions of an act passed in the second and third years of the reign of Queen Victoria, entitled "An act to make better provisions for the assignment of ecclesiastical districts to churches or chapels augmented by the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, and for other purposes." Again, by the 18th Victoria, 1855, better known by the name of "Lord Blandford's Act," the ecclesiastical district thus formed became a new and independent parish, free from all claims, rates, payments, or dues of any kind or degree to the mother church of St. Cuthbert, Carlisle.

UPPERBY.

Upperby township comprises an area of 449 acres. The population in 1801 was 119; in 1811, 228; in 1821, 340; in 1831, 393; in 1841, 471; and in 1851, 551. The land here is generally leasehold, under the dean and chapter's manor of Botchergate. The land-owners are John Fawcett, Esq., William Lamb, Esq., Samuel Waldie, Esq., John Harrison, Esq., John

Slater, Esq., the executors of Jackson Pears, Esq., and several small proprietors. The soil is a rich loam on a clay and partly gravel subsoil. The Lancaster and Carlisle railway intersects the township.

The village of Upperby is situated on the west side of the Petterill, two miles south-east of Carlisle, and consists of poor-built cottages, inhabited chiefly by weavers, with two or three good farm houses, and two inns.

THE CHURCH.

Upperby church, dedicated to St. John, stands a little east of the village. It was erected by subscription in 1840, on a site given by John Fawcett, Esq., and was consecrated in 1846. The living is only partially endowed with £40 per annum, assigned to it by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in the year 1849, and the interest of £625 13s. 8d. reduced Bank Annuities, in the hands of the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, with a small payment from the pewholders of two-thirds of the pews in the church, the remaining one-third being free sittings. The dean and chapter of Carlisle are patrons; incumbent, the Rev. William Cockett, M.A., who was instituted in the year 1846; and it is to his great and untiring exertions that the neighbourhood is indebted for the formation of the ecclesiastical district, the obtaining of the small endowment possessed by the church, the purchase of two acres of glebe land, and the building thereupon in the year 1848 of a suitable and commodious parsonage, and the erection and formation of large and elegant national schools.

Up to the year 1828 there was no school at Upperby. At that period several of the inhabitants solicited subscriptions, with which they built a small one, with two rooms over the same for a residence. The funds were inadequate for the completion of the work, and there was left a mortgage upon the building; the interest of this sum was paid by the schoolmaster or schoolmistress, as such happened to be. In the year 1847 this debt was paid by the National Society, on condition that the rooms were conveyed by deed to the minister and churchwardens as trustees for the parochial schools. During the year 1854, the schoolroom becoming too small for the increasing number of scholars, and the residences of the teachers being found inconvenient and prejudicial to health, the incumbent of the parish and the churchwardens resolved to build upon the village green a new school in two parts, one for the boys, and the other for the girls; and to add the room then used as a school to those immediately over it to form a permanent and suitable residence for the master. For this purpose a grant of £147 was obtained from the Committee of Privy Council on Education, another of £45 from the National Society; and the late Miss Losh, of Woodside, left a legacy of £180. The cost of the erection of the school was £434 8s. 7d., the residue of which was made up from smaller private subscriptions. The schools are under government inspection, and have already conferred great benefits upon the neighbourhood.

Here is a skinnery, the property of Mr. S. Waldie, and carried on by Mr. Brown. Joseph Robinson and Co., of Carlisle, have a place here for the manufactory of plaster of Paris.

BLACKWELL, HIGH.

The township of High Blackwell contains 2,459 acres, and its rateable value is £1,565 10s. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 265; in 1811, 253; in 1821, 283; in 1831, 268; in 1841, 315; and in 1851, 370.

The manor of Blackwell, or Blackhall, formed anciently a parcel of Inglewood Forest, and was granted by Henry I. to Odard de Logis, lord of Wigton, in whose family it continued till the reign of Edward III., when Margaret de Wigton, heiress of this baronial house, gave it to Sir Robert Parvinge, the king's serjeant-at-law, as a recompense for the ability he displayed in defending her title to the barony of Wigton, which title had been called in question by the heir-at-law, Sir Robert de Kirkbride, on the ground of her mother's incontinency. From the Charter Rolls of the 13th Edward III., we learn that Sir Robert Parvinge, who had attained the dignity of lord chancellor, and lord high treasurer, obtained a license to enclose his woods at this place in 1339. His representatives sold Blackhall to Sir William Stapleton, who in his turn sold it to Lord Dacre, from whom it subsequently passed to the Earl of Sussex, by whose co-heiresses it was conveyed, in 1716, to Sir Christopher Musgrave, the ancestor of Sir George Musgrave, Bart., of Eden Hall, the present possessor of the manorial rights and privileges. The landowners are Colonel Sowerby, Messrs. Joseph Robinson, W. Ostell, Richard Standish, Joseph Scott, and others. The township is intersected by the Maryport and Carlisle railway, and possesses a strong clayey soil. The tithes were commuted in April, 1840, for £65 11s. 3d.

There is a school near to Blackwell High village, and another at Stoneraise in this township, both of which are closed.

Here are two stone quarries, worked by Mr. John Pearson, which yield white and red freestone of a good quality for building purposes and grindstones.

The following hamlets are in this township:—High and Low Burnthwaite, consisting of a few farm houses and cottages, four miles south of Carlisle; Durdar, three miles south of Carlisle; Ratten Raw, three and a half miles south of the same place; and Stoneraise.

CHARITIES.

Lowry's Charities.—Thomas Lowry, by will dated November 22nd, 1779, bequeathed £200 to his executors, to be placed out, and the interest of £100, to be paid to the master of the school at Blackhall (if one should be built within two years after his death), he teaching gratis seven or eight poor children belonging to Blackhall quarter, if so many; and if fewer, or none, to be nevertheless paid; and the interest of the remaining £100 to be paid to the poor widows within the said quarter who should not get parochial relief. A school was built at Blackhall within the time appointed, and since that period the charity has been distributed as directed.

Pattinson's Charity.—Thomas Pattinson, in 1785, left the interest of £10 to the schoolmaster of Blackhall. (See Bowness parish). The sum of 7s. 8½d. is paid to the schoolmaster of Blackhall on account of this donation. This donation and the one preceding, are not paid to the master of the school at Durdar, but to another school in Blackwell township.

Durdar School.—Mrs. Grace Graham, by will dated 17th March, 1798, gave £100 in trust, the interest of which was to be applied to the schoolmaster of Durdar, for which he should teach gratis, in reading, writing, and accounts, not fewer than eight children, residing within the "division of Blackhall High."

BLACKWELL, LOW.

Low Blackwell township comprises an area of 941 acres. In 1801 the number of its inhabitants was 105; in 1811, 149; in 1821, 124; in 1831, 150; in 1841, 181; and in 1851, 182. This township is included in the manor of Blackhall. The principal landowners are Sir George Musgrave, Bart; the Misses Lowry, F. L. B. Dykes, Esq., Edward Rowlands, Esq., Mr. W. Martendale, Mrs. Wilson, and Mr. Jonathan S. Bell. The soil of the township is partly a heavy loam, with some good land near the river, and a portion of heavy wet land. The Maryport and Carlisle railway intersects the township.

The village of Low Blackwell is two and a half miles south of Carlisle.

Floshes and Scugger Houses are hamlets in this township.

BOTCHERY.

The township of Botcherby, or Botchardby, contains 495 acres, and its rateable value is £1,058. Its population in 1801 was 94; in 1811, 118; in 1821, 125; in 1831, 144; in 1841, 125; and in 1851, 155. The soil here is generally a strong loam, on a sandy bottom. The principal proprietors are Major Spedding, John Norman, Esq., Mathews Hodgson, Esq., Rev. John Norman, Miss E. Lowry, and John Hodgson, Esq.

The village of Botcherby is pleasantly situated one mile east of Carlisle. On the north side of the village is a small school for children of both sexes, which will accommodate about fifty pupils; average attendance about forty. It is supported by the quarter-pence of the scholars.

BRISCO.

The population of this township in 1801 was 224; in 1811, 306; in 1821, 308; in 1831, 305; in 1841, 303; and in 1851, 292. The area of the township is 1,904 statute acres, and its rateable value £2,195 2s. 10d. The soil is generally good, incumbent on a strong clay. The Lancaster and Carlisle railway runs through the township.

Brisco is included in the manor of Botchergate, the rights and privileges of which are vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but about £3 a-year are paid to Sir Wastel Brisco, of Crofton Hall, whose ancestors held this place, and took their names from the township. The landowners are the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, James Losh, Esq., Messrs. Joseph Snell, William Lamb, Thomas Lowthian, Jonathan Fallowfield, General Martin, Dr. Hutchinson, Joseph Nixon, and Messrs. Howe and Backhouse.

The village of Brisco occupies a pleasant and airy situation about three miles south of Carlisle.

Woodbank is a hamlet in this township, where are the extensive iron works of Messrs. Cowan, Sheddon, and Co., who carry on the business of engineers, founders, and iron manufacturers. And at Quarry Gate is a red sandstone quarry.

Brisco Hill and Newbiggin Hall are two neat mansions in this township; the latter appears to have been an occasional residence of the Prior of Carlisle, who fortified it against the incursions of the Scots; its walls are about nine feet thick, and the whole of the first floor has a plain vaulted roof.

Woodside, the seat and property of the Losh family, is a large handsome structure, surrounded by beautiful and well-wooded grounds. The Woodside estate has been long in the possession of the family of the present proprietor.

CARLETON.

The number of inhabitants in Carleton township in 1801 was 185; in 1811, 173; in 1821, 201; in 1831, 189; in 1841, 175; and in 1851, 188. The area is returned with that of English-street township, Carlisle; its rateable value is £1,611. This township is also in the manor of Botchergate. The principal landowners here are Messrs. Joseph Raiton, David Nelson, William James, Richard Fergusson, Charles Rivaz, Miss Sewell, Thomas Little, Rev. John S. Mulcaster, Mrs.

Cooper, Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Calvert, John Lowthian, Esq., Samuel James, Esq., the Cumberland and Westmoreland Asylum, John Robinson, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Cumberland and Westmoreland Lunatic Asylum is in this township.

The village of Carleton is situated on the Penrith road, three miles south-by-east of Carlisle. Here is a beautiful willow tree, raised from a cutting taken from a tree which overhung the grave of Napoleon at St. Helena. There are several neat houses in the village.

Near to the Roman road is a farmstead called Scalescough, upon the land attached to which Roman coins have been found. There is a flour-mill close to the river Petteril.

CHARITY.

Pattinson's Charity.—Thomas Pattinson, by will dated 16th March, 1785, left £50, the interest to be paid to the schoolmasters teaching school in the townships of Harraby, Carleton, and Brisco, share and share alike, if more than one. The interest of this money,

£1 18s. 6d., is now paid to a schoolmaster at Carleton, there being no school in Harraby or Brisco.¹

Harraby contains an area of 604 acres. Its population in 1801 was 47; in 1811, 58; in 1821, 46; in 1831, 66; in 1841, 55; and in 1851, 82. The township is included in the manor of Botchergate, and the landowners are Messrs. George Blamire, William Hodgson, John Fawcett, the executors of Admiral Taylor, Mrs. Fairbairn, and Miss Lowry. The Newcastle and Carlisle railway runs through the township. Here is a corn-mill.

The village of Harraby is situated on the Penrith road, one and a half miles south-by-east of Carlisle.

Harraby Grange was formerly known as the manor of Henderbye, but it is now included in the same manor as the rest of the township, and is held under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners by leasehold tenure.

WARWICK PARISH.

THE parish of Warwick is bounded on the north and east by the river Eden, on the west and south by the parish of Wetheral, and includes the townships of Aglionby and Warwick. Its soil is rich and fertile, consisting principally of sand or loam.

WARWICK.

The area of this township is 1,286 acres, and its rateable value £2,373 7s. 7d. The population in 1801 was 241; in 1811, 214; in 1821, 257; in 1831, 266; in 1841, 225; and in 1851, 216.

The manor of Warwick was given by Hubert de Vallibus and Robert his son to Odard, first lord of Corkeby, or Corby, to be held of his barony of Gilsland. At the visitation made by Sir William Dugdale, in 1665, Thomas Warwick, Esq., certified a pedigree, in which this Odard is stated to be Odard de Logis, first baron of Wigton, but the pedigree does not agree with that of the family of the lords of Wigton, hence we may reasonably conclude that there must have been another Odard, of whom and of his descendants we have the following account:—

ODARD, first lord of Corby and of Warwick, had issue Osbert and William, to the former of whom he gave Corby, to the latter Warwick. Osbert, the elder son, dying without issue, both manors became the property of his brother William.

WILLIAM, with other children, had issue John and Robert: Warwick was given to John, the eldest, and Corby to Robert.

JOHN appears to have lived in the reign of Richard I.

WILLIAM DE WARTHWYKE occurs in 17th Henry III. (1252-3). He was knighted in 44th year of the same reign (1259-60).

ROBERT DE WARTHWYKE is mentioned in 1304.

WILLIAM DE WARTHWYKE in temp. Edward II.

JOHN DE WARTHWYKE, Knt., son of William, died without issue, and was succeeded by his nephew and heir.

JOHN DE WARTHWYKE, son of Edmund de Warthwick deceased. He lived temp. Edward III.

GEORGE DE WARTHWYKE occurs in the reign of Richard II.

JOHN DE WARTHWYKE in the same reign.

JOHN DE WARTHWYKE temp. Edward IV.

LANCELOT WARWICK in the reign of Henry VII.

RICHARD WARWICK is next mentioned. He, in 35th Henry VIII. (1543-4) held the manor and vill of Warwike of the King, in capite, by knight's services and cornage. He was succeeded by his son, CHRISTOPHER WARWICK, who married Frances, daughter of Salkeld, of Corby. His son, RICHARD WARWICK, married twice. His first wife was Frances, daughter of Salkeld, of Whitehall, by whom he had issue, Thomas, and a younger son, George, who died without issue. His second wife, whose name is not known, bore him a son, John Warwike, of Lockwait, near Hartley Castle, co. Westmoreland. This Richard died about 1634.

THOMAS WARWICK married a daughter of Gawin Bradwaite, of Ambleside, and died in his father's lifetime.

THOMAS WARWICK, of Warwike, married Frances, daughter of John Skelton, Esq., of Armathwaite, and had issue, John, who died unmarried; Thomas; Mary, married to Rowland Nichols, rector of Aikton; and Catherine. He died in 1654.

THOMAS WARWICK, aged 22 at the time of Dugdale's visitation, married Frances, daughter of John Dalton, Esq., of Acorn Bank, co. Westmoreland, and had issue, JOHN WARWICK, who married Mary, daughter of Francis Howard, Esq., of Corby, and by her had issue.

FRANCIS WARWICK, Esq., who married Jane, daughter of Thomas Howard, Esq., of Corby, by Barbara, daughter of John, Viscount Lonsdale, who died without issue in 1772, and was succeeded by his only surviving sister and heir, Mrs. Anne Warwick, after whose decease the estate became the property of Ralph Maddison, Esq., of Gateshead, Newcastle-on-Tyne, in pursuance of the will of Francis Warwick, Esq. On the death of Mr. Maddison the property passed to his brother John, who dying without issue, it devolved on the next heir of the testator, Robert Bonner, Esq., son of Sarah Maddison (sister of Ralph and John just mentioned) by Thomas Bonner. This Thomas took the surname of Warwick in 1792.

The present landowners are the executors of the late William Parker, Esq., James Heald, Esq., and William Richardson, Esq.

The village of Warwick is pleasantly situated four miles east of Carlisle, on the west bank of the Eden, which is here crossed by a fine stone bridge of three arches. Near this bridge is an eminence, upon which are the remains of a breastwork, supposed to have been raised to guard the river, during the days of the moss-troopers.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, is an ancient structure, in the Norman style, the date of its erection is very uncertain. It possesses an apsis, or semi-circular recess at the east end, a form comparatively rare in England. On the exterior, this semicircular termination of the chancel of the church has thirteen narrow niches, measuring ten feet eight inches high, and one foot five inches wide, reaching almost to the ground; three of them have small windows inserted. This edifice is at present 70 feet long, but once extended twenty-one feet more to the west; there being still at that end a good rounded arch, now filled up. The benefice was a rectory, and was given by Ranulph de Meschines to the abbey of St. Mary, at York, but was granted, after the dissolution of the religious houses, to the dean and chapter of Carlisle, who united the living to that of Wetheral, and have since continued to appoint a curate to the joint livings.

There is here a substantial stone building, erected for a Sunday-school, by the late Thomas Parker, Esq., who endowed it at his death with £500. The late William Parker left £250 for the support of a day-school. The building is now used as a chapel by the Wesleyan body, and is attended by the Carlisle ministers and local preachers.

Warwick Hall, erected in 1828, the seat of the Parker family, is an elegant structure, of red freestone, situated four miles east of Carlisle. The grounds are beautifully disposed, and neatly laid out.

AGLIONBY.

Aglionby township comprises an area of 559 acres. Its population in 1801 was 92; in 1811, 73; in 1821, 91; in 1831, 107; in 1841, 137; and in 1851, 147.

The manor of Aglionby was the ancient inheritance of the family of that name, who are said to have been settled here from the time of the Conquest. The last heir male of the family, Christopher Aglionby, Esq., died in 1763. P. H. Howard, Esq. of Corby, claims the manorial rights of a portion of this township. The principal landowners are Messrs. James Todhunter, John Jackson, John Bond, John Bouch, Christopher T. Dawson, George Rayson, Joseph Robson, William Robson, Messrs. Atkinson, Mrs. Ruth Jackson, Joseph Hope, and John Nixon.

WETHERAL PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the north by Warwick, on the west by Upperry and St. Mary's, on the south by Wreay and Hesket, and on the east by Hayton and Cumwhitton. It includes the four townships of Great Corby and Warwick Bridge, Cumwhitton and Coathill, Scotby, and Wetheral. The soil here is in general fertile. In Scotby and Wetheral there is a mixture of clay and sand, suitable for any kind of grain; in Coathill there is a strong loamy soil; Cumwhitton is more sandy; and in Great Corby and Warwick Bridge township the soil is a mixture of sand and loam, except part of the enclosed common, which is cold and wet.

WETHERAL.

This township contains 4,458 acres, and its rateable value is £4,376 7s. 2d. The population in 1801 was 376; in 1811, 349; in 1821, 451; in 1831, 607; in 1841, 586; and in 1851, 635. The Newcastle and Carlisle railway intersects the township.

The manor of Wetheral was granted by Ranulph de Meschines to the abbey of St. Mary, at York, in 1086, when the priory of Wetheral was founded, and continued to be held by that house till the time of the dissolution of the monasteries by Henry VIII., at which period it was granted to the dean and chapter of Carlisle, in whose possession it continued till 1650, when it was sold by the commissioners of Oliver Cromwell to Richard Banks, of Cockermouth; but on the restoration of the regal power the dean and chapter recovered their property. One of the customs of the manor seems to have been, that each of the tenants of Wetheral should carry the abbot's corn one day in autumn, and one reaper, plough one day for the abbot yearly, carry wood for the fishguard and mill, repair the wear and the mill, and grinding corn there, pay a thirteenth portion for muleture. The manorial rights are now vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in addition to whom Messrs. George Graham, William Robinson, Thomas Wannop, Isaac Lawson, George Elliot, John Nicolson, Joseph Slack, Dr. Graham, Rev. John Graham, Miss Collins, Mrs. Graham, Rev. J. French, and Miss Graham, are the principal landowners.

The village of Wetheral occupies a picturesque situation on the west bank of the Eden, four and a half miles east south east of Carlisle, in the neighbourhood of a splendid bridge, on the Newcastle and Carlisle railway.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is a neat Gothic structure in the Early English style, consisting of nave, aisles, chancel, tower, and gallery at west end, and calculated to seat about 600 people. The columns of the nave are circular and octagonal. In the windows of the clerestory some portions of ancient stained glass may still be seen. In the first window on the right is a representation of the Blessed Virgin, with the Divine Infant, and two other figures, with the badges of some guild. The first window on the left contains two figures, and some heraldic devices. The east window is of three-lights, and contains some small portions of painted glass, as does also the small window on the right of the chancel. Round the arch of the door leading to the vestry, is an inscription to the following effect:—ORA PRO ANIMA RICHARDI WEDDERHALL. Over a window in the vestry is this inscription:—ORA PRO ANIMA WILL'HE THORNTON, ABBATIS. On the north side of the chancel is an altar tomb sculptured with armorial bearings, on which are the mutilated effigies of Sir Richard Salkeld and his lady, the possessors of Corby Castle, in the reign of Henry VII. On the opposite wall is a neat marble tablet to the memory of the Misses Waugh, of Carlisle, granddaughters of Bishop Waugh. The Howard mausoleum is entered from the chancel, on the north side of which it is situated. It was erected in 1791, by Henry Howard, Esq., on the foundation of his family place of sepulture, and here are interred the mortal remains of Sir Francis Howard, second son of Lord William Howard, of Naworth, and all his successors and their wives, down to the late Henry Howard, Esq. The mausoleum contains an east window of four lights, and has a fine groined and vaulted ceiling springing from slender pillars. It contains several monuments, among which we may mention a cast by Westmacott, to the memory of Adeliza Maria Howard, the wife of Henry Petre, Esq.; behind which there is a mural tablet to the memory of Philip, second son of Philip and Anne Howard of Corby. The next arch contains two more mural monuments; and at the end of the mausoleum there is a fine group in marble, to the memory of the Hon. Maria, daughter of Andrew Lord Archer, first wife of the late Henry Howard, whom it represents supported by Religion, and sustaining in her arms the infant to which she has just given birth. This exquisite work of art, executed by the celebrated sculptor, Nollekens, excites the admiration of every visitor, and has been declared by competent judges to be the finest piece of modern sculpture in England. There is also a splendid monumental brass, erected in 1856 to the memory of the late Henry Howard, and Catherine Mary his wife, a daughter of Sir Richard Neave, Bart.

As stated in our account of Warwick parish, this living and that of Warwick are united in the same patronage and incumbency. The tithes were commuted in 1844, for a yearly rent-charge of £1,062, and the united curacy is worth about £150 per annum, arising out of land purchased with £1,300 parliamentary grant, £52 given out of the tithes, and £48 given by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The parish register commences in 1674.

Incumbents.—George Gillman, 1711; Edmund Stanger, 1788; Charles Vansittart, 1849; Joseph L. Hodgson, 1881.

The parsonage is a modern red stone building, in the vicinity of the church: the original building was erected in 1714, by the Rev. Edward Tong, the patrons and impropiator contributing only £25 towards its erection. The present building was commenced by the Rev. Charles Vansittart in 1847, and completed by the present incumbent, the Rev. J. L. Hodgson, in 1848-9, at an expense of about £800, towards which the patrons and impropiator contributed nothing!

The school is a handsome stone structure, built by subscriptions obtained by the incumbent, and by the help of a bazaar held in Carlisle in 1854, at a cost of £300. It will accommodate about seventy pupils, and has an average attendance of fifty.

SCHOOL.

School.—Thomas Graham, who died in 1700, left £60 for educating poor children of Wetheral township. The interest of the sum is given to the schoolmaster, for which he instructs three or four poor children.

A little to the south of the village stands a solitary tower, which is all that now remains of the ancient priory of Wetheral; the other portions being demolished many years ago, by the dean and chapter of Carlisle, who erected a prebendal house with the materials, although the late Thomas Howard, Esq., generously offered sufficient compensation if they would allow the venerable ruins to remain as they stood. "The priory of Wetheral," says Dr. Todd, "was first founded at the instance of Stephen, first abbot of St. Mary's, at York, the first year of William Rufus, anno Domini 1086, by the Earl Randolph de Meschines, who gave his manor of Wetheral to this Stephen, with other lands thereunto belonging, in pure alms to the said abbey of York. Stephen dedicated the same to God, under the invocation of St. Mary and St. Constantine, and gave all such things as the said abbey held in Westmoreland and Cumberland to the said cell or priory of Wetheral, as the fishing in the Eden, and the mill there; the two churches of St. Lawrence and St. Michael in Appleby, all of the gift of the Earl Randolph Meschines: with the church of Wetheral, and the chapel of Warwick, and the cell of St. Constantine, and two oxgangs of land in Coleby, of the gift of Adnan the son of Swen, a great baron; the hermitage of St. Andrew on the east side of Eden, of the gift of Uchtred, the son of Lylph; the third part of Croglin lands, in Elston and Cumwhinton, the tithe of Sowerby, by demesne, and Scotby Mill, of the gift of Emant, the son of Walter; a carucate of land in Coleby, the church of Morland, and three carucates of land there, which Ketel, the son of Eldred, gave them. The church of Bromfield, the manor of Salkeld, and the tithes of that demesne, which Waltheof the son of Gospatric, gave with his body to be buried." William Rufus confirmed to St. Mary's Abbey the gift of Randolph de Meschines, and added thereto the whole pasture between Eden and the highway, which leads from Carlisle to Appleby, and from Wetheral to Drybeck. Henry I. confirmed all former grants, and gave to the priory pannage for swine in his forest, without paying the usual forest dues for the same. William, son of Osard, lord of Corby, with the assent of his lord Robert de Vallibus and Osanna his wife, and John his son, by charter gave to God and the church of St. Mary at York, and St. Constantine of Wetheral, all the land between Wetheral and Warwick, called the cell of Constantine, and two bovates of land in Corby, and granted that neither he nor his heirs should hinder the monks from fortifying their fish-pool, stank, or wear, upon the river bank at Corby; and Richard de Salkeld, lord of Corby, by charter granted and confirmed to the monks of Wetheral their fishgarth or wear, with liberty to construct, fortify, and repair the same, upon the bank as far as a place called Monkwith, towards Brigend, and to make sluices and trunks in the same, and freely to dispose of the salmon and other fish taken therein, and also to take stone and branches of trees for making the said wears; he also granted to them the whole water of Eden, and the whole fishery, from the upper part of the said wear towards Corby unto the place called Monkwith. Richard I. added many privileges and immunities; among others, he ordained that all the possession of this house should be exempt from "pleas and complaints, murder, robbery, scutagegeld, danegeld, hideage, assizes, works of castles, bridges, and parks, serdrite and hengewite, and flomensfrith, averpeni, bloodwite, flitwite, hundredpeni, tethingspeni, legerwite, toll, passage, pontage, lastage, stallage, gridelbreke, and ham-soken." He also granted to them fridstall, soke and sack and theam, and infangthief and outfangthief.⁷⁴

⁷⁴ The following persons occur among the benefactors to the house: Lawrence de Agallbury gave four acres of land at Vghenly. Adam, son of Stanne, gave the hermitage of St. Andrew, which grant was confirmed by David, king of Scotland. Randolph de Meschines gave the churches of St. Michael and St. Lawrence of his castle of Appleby; Walter, son of Robert, land at Appleby. Michael de Alunspelt gave nine acres and a half of land at Ainstale; John Muslie, seven acres; and Henry de Terrily, seven acres. Robert, son of Bue, gave four acres, with pasture for three hundred sheep at Bewcastle; and Mabel, daughter of Adam, son of Richard of Buncroft, fourteen acres, with two tuns. Richard, son of Richard, son of Truie, gave a toft without Botchederga, in Botchardly. Walter de Botchardly gave the lands called Little Flax, between Sowerbykeld and the river, adjoining from St. Helen's well; and Adam, brother of the said Walter, gave a parcel of ground at the head of his croft, adjoining to the said rivulet. Waltheof, son of Gospatric, gave the church of Bromfield, and the crops of the manor there. Walter Bavin, for the health of his soul and of the souls of his lords, Ranulph de Vallibus and Robert his son, gave twenty acres in the fields called Hailthwaite, in Burdowald. Ranulph Eugeyne and William his son, gave two salt pits at Burgh, which grant was confirmed by Joan de Morville, Richard de Lucy, and Thomas de Multon, and others. Henry I. gave them dead wood in his forest of Carlisle, for their houses and fuel. Eufant, son of Walter, gave a carucate of land at Coleby. Osbert, son of Osard, gave the tithe of the mill of Corby, and of all the bogs depastured in the woods there; Robert, son of William, son of Osard, gave four acres of land at the same place; and William, son of Roger and Osanna his wife, gave for their buildings and fuel dead wood, standing and dry, throughout the whole wood of Corby; also green oaks standing and deficient in cropping, and others. Alice and Mabel, sisters and heirs of R. de Beauchamp, gave the lands at Cringleyke, called Gildeshill or Gildhouse-hill, with an enclosure called Ox Close, which grant was confirmed by their brother, who ordered his body to be buried in the church of Wetheral. The lady Herra d'Estreviers, gave half a ploughland at Croglin, which grant was confirmed by Simon de Morville. William de Croglin (i.e. of Little Croglin) gave two ox-gangs and two acres of land at Croglin, and also his bondmen, Ralph and his son; and also Alan and his wife Alice, with all their families and chattels—confirmed by Robert de Vallibus. Alexander de Creaguer gave part of Kirkendrews wood, with half the mill, and pasture throughout the fields and woods of Culpeith; Alexander, son of Swen, gave the other half of the mill; and both the grants were confirmed by David, king of Scotland. Uchtred, son of Lylph, gave half a carucate of land at Cumwhinton, confirmed by William de Heris, with common of pasture; Eudo de Carlisle gave the dead wood and liberty of cutting oaks which were dry in the cropping at the

In the compromise of a dispute between the bishop of the diocese and the abbot of St. Mary's, it was determined that the abbot should present the prior, and the bishop should institute, and the abbot should have the guardianship of the house upon a vacancy, upon condition that the abbot and convent should make over to the bishop and his successors two marks and a half-yearly, which was payable to them out of the church of Denton. In the year 1539 Ralph Hartley, then prior, surrendered this house to Henry VIII. It was rated, 26th Henry VIII., at £117 11s. 10d. according to Dugdale, or £128 5s. 3d. according to Speed, and was granted in the 33rd year of the reign of the same king to the dean and chapter of Carlisle. The possessions were ample, and consisted of all the site of the priory or cell of Wetheral, with the church-steeple, church-yard, and all other lands and possessions in and about the same; and also the manor of Wetheral, and sundry parcels of land there. St. Anthony's Chapel, with two enclosures, the water-mill and the fishery at the bay of Wetheral; and also all those manors, messuages, lands, and tenements, in the several parishes or hamlets of Corby, Cumwhintun, Botcherby, Morehouse, Holmehouse, Frodelcrooke, Penreithcottys, Bridgend, Cryngledyke, Ainstable, Armathwaite, Brodwall in Gilsland, Newby, Farlam, Kaybridge, Gallowfield, Ruke, Skallmeck, St. Mary's and St. Cuthbert's, Carlisle; also, the rectories and advowsons of the churches of Morland, St. Michael's, and St. Lawrence's, in Appleby; also the tithes of corn and hay in the villis of Bolton, Mykelstry, Reland, Thorneby, Thurneby Grainge, Morland, Slegill, Newby in the Stones, King's Meaburn, Little Strickland, Skytergate, Laughton, Crackenthorpe, Hilton, Bondgate, Moreton, Drybeck, Fallowfield, Barwis, Rutter, and Coleby; and a pension of 15s. out of the rectory of Great Salkeld. By another charter of the same king, the advowsons of the churches of Wetheral and Warwick, and the chapels of St. Anthony and St. Severn thereto annexed, were granted to the dean and chapter.

At a short distance from the ruins of the priory, further up the vale, are the caves of St. Constantine, or Wetheral Safeguards. They are three in number, deeply excavated in the face of the perpendicular same place, continued by Robert de Laverdore: Adam, son of Roger de Carlisle, gave 8s. yearly rent out of certain lands there, and also the heath where his shields stood, under a rent of 6d. to him and to his heirs, which rent, Eudo, his grandson (son of William), changed to a rose on midsummer-day; John, son of Gamel, venter of Cumwhintun, gave four roods of land and a toft there. Adam de Cumrew, son of William de Ravenwick, gave two oxgangs of land at Cumrew, with pasture for sixty sheep, eight cows, and four oxen; and also gave Roger, son of Uchtreth, with all his goods and chattels. Robert de Buet gave the church of Denton with the glebe land thereto belonging, and eight acres more of his own — this grant was equally between the priories of Wetheral and Lanercost. Uchtreth, son of Lyulph, gave two bovates of land at Easton. Solomon de Farlam gave sixteen acres of land in several places within the territories of Farlam: Donatus, his son, gave the tithes of all the tithes of the church; Richard, son of Bernard de Farlam. Robert de Vaux confirmed to them all the lands that had been given to them in Gilsland. Gervase de Lasells gave twenty-one acres and one rood of land, in Huddesford, with pasture for 300 wethers, three hundred ewes, nine oxen, and four horses, and the use of his mill at Longton, Lancashire. John de Ermine, son of William, gave two oxgangs of land at Kaberth, to which Henry de Liverdwaite added the meadow of Smalwatts, lying between Kaberth and Croglin. Ralph de Hoff, for the health of the soul of his lord Hugh Morville, gave certain lands in Huddesford, in the parish of Kirkoswald. William, son of Gilbert, gave a toft at Kirkbythore. Maurice de Man gave license to erect a salt-pan on Man island, with the like conveniences as had been formerly given to the monks of St. Bees. Ranulph de Meschines gave two parts of the tithes of his demesne at Meaburn; and John, son of Walter de Ravensby, gave a small parcel of ground to build on, in King's Meaburn. Gervase de Melmerby gave one oxgang in the town-fields of Melmerby, and one acre and a half in another part of the territories; and Adam de Mora gave two oxgangs there. Ketel, son of Eldred, gave the church of Morland and three carucates of land there. Henry de Legat (in the time of Walter, bishop of Carlisle), gave all his lands at Moreland, reserving a yearly rent of half a pound of cummin payable to the bishop, at Carlisle fair; and Peter de Legat, (brother of the said Henry) gave other lands. Walter, porter of the priory, gave with his body two oxgangs of land with a toft and croft at Newby; and Ausetia de Newby gave fifteen and a half acres (being two oxgangs) in the same vill — confirmed by others of his name and family. Adam, son of Alan, gave half a ploughland in Ormesby field, at Ormesby; and Adam, son of Robert, gave another half, called Milnland, to which Eudo de Carlisle added other lands. Robert de Roberty gave three acres and a half in the town fields of Ousby, with right of common and other appurtenances, saving the nature of the 20th dish due to the mill there. Ranulph de Meschines gave two parts of the tithes of the demesne lands of Salkeld, and, with William, son of A. a carucate of land in the whole. David, king of Scots, gave one mark of silver yearly out of the rent of his mill at Scotby, and also the tithes of the vill of Scotby; and Uchtreth, son of Lyulph, afterwards gave the mill. David, earl of Dunbar, gave the town and church of Karkarell in Scotland. Gilbert de Slegill gave one messuage with the appurtenances at Slegill. Uchtreth, son of Lyulph, gave the whole tithes of the demesne lands at Sourby, and half a carucate of land. Alice and Mabel, sisters and heirs of R. Beuchamp, gave right of common at Stafelle, and other privileges. Walter de Strickland, Kn., gave four acres in Strickland fields at Strickland, whose grant was confirmed by Sir William de Strickland. John, son of William de Thyrnby, gave four perches and a half of land at Thyrnby. William, son of Odard, gave three oxgangs of land, and the title of his mill at Warwick; John, son of the said William, gave a toft and croft; Alan de Langway gave all his lands there, and fireboot in his woods at Langway, with pasture for their horses or other cattle in carrying wood, lime, or stone; and Henry Birkenheved and Beatrice his wife gave three acres in the Holme, near the bridge. Besides the grants at Wetheral above specified, Robert, son of William, son of Odard, remitted the eighth fish, which he and his ancestors had out of the cop of the monks; and John Spendlove and Margaret his wife, gave a house and four acres of land, and granted a lease for sixty years to the prior and convent of an oxgang more, in consideration of three marks of silver given them in their great need; which said Margaret and her children soon after quitted claim for ever to the said oxgang. Ketel, son of Eldred, gave the church of Workington. John de Veteripon, for the good of his soul and of the soul of his wife, gave twenty carloads of firewood yearly, out of his forest of Wynfell. The whole of these grants were confirmed by the kings, bishops, and popes, and continued to be possessed by the convent till the period of the Dissolution.

rock, forty feet above the water of the Eden, and are said to have been formed by Constantine III., King of Scots, who for a time retired here, and afterwards became a monk, and died at Melros Abbey. They are protected by a breastwork of masonry, in which is a fireplace and three small lights. Subsequently they acquired the name of "safeguard," from the neighbouring monks and other inhabitants, who frequently fled to them as a place of refuge, during the forays of the moss-troopers. These cells are divided into three apartments, each of which has a separate window. A stratum of rock, about eight feet below the floor of the cells, serves as a foundation for the wall which is built before them, and which makes the gallery, and reaches a little above, with the door at one end through which in former times the cells are supposed to have been approached by a ladder or plank drawn up after them by the refugees for greater security. It is even now difficult of access, though a flight of steps has been made to communicate with the narrow path beneath leading to the cells. The following inscription is still on the same rock, a little higher up the river:—MAXIMVS SCRIPTISIT . . . LEXX. V. V. COND. CASSIVS. Opposite to the cells, on the Corby side of the river, is a full-length figure, carved in stone, of St. Constantine, standing on a pedestal, and looking towards the caves. This figure was placed here by Mr. Howard, in 1843. A little up the river stands Wetheral Tower, built in the Gothic style, with turrets, by the late Misses Waugh, of Carlisle, as a summer house.

GREAT CORBY AND WARWICK BRIDGE.

Great Corby and Warwick Eridge form a joint township, comprising an area of 2,747 acres, and its rateable value is £4,250 6s. 4d. The population of Great Corby in 1801 was 314; in 1811, 326; in 1821, 203; in 1831, inclusive of Warwick Bridge, 1,285; in 1841, 316; and in 1851, 297.

The manor of Corby, on the east side of the Eden, was granted by Henry II. to Hubert de Vaux, who gave it to Odard, whose posterity assumed the name of De Corby, or Corby. Odard was succeeded by his son Osbert, who, dying without issue, was succeeded by his brother William. The latter had issue by his wife Oswinx two sons, John and Robert. John, the elder, seated himself at Warwick, and Robert, the younger, at Corby. After Robert, Adam de Corby occurs, as, also, a William de Corby, son of Roger and Osanna his wife, who granted to Wetheral priory the dead wood in the wood of Corby, in the reign of Edward I. In the same reign it came into the family of Richmond, who conveyed it to Andrew de Hercla, Earl of Carlisle. After his attainder it was granted in 1335, to Richard Salkeld, "for his good services in taking Andrew de Hercla, earl of Carlisle, prisoner."¹ His descendant, of the same name, who died in the reign of Henry VII., left two daughters, co-heiresses, one married to Salkeld of Whitehall, and the other to one of the Blenkinsop family. The immediate descendants of these families sold their moieties of Corby to Lord William Howard; Blenkinsop in 1606, Salkeld in 1624. Lord William gave Corby to his second son, Sir Francis, the immediate ancestor of Philip Henry Howard, the present proprietor. The principal landowners are Philip Henry Howard, Esq., Peter Dixon, Esq., Mr. Bowman, Messrs. Jeremiah Lawson, the trustees of the late J. E. Hall, Robert Peasecod, George Hodgson, George Howe, Thomas Wannop, and Fergus Watson.

The village of Corby is pleasantly situated, on the east side of the Eden, about five miles eastward of Carlisle.

Here is a school which was endowed in 1720 with twenty-five acres of land, now let for £27 2s. 6d. a-year, besides which the master has a house and garden, the former being erected by the trustees in 1845. The late Henry Howard Esq., endowed this school with two £100 shares in the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, now yielding about five per cent; so that the endowment of the school at present amounts to about £98 a year, for which the children are instructed at a small quarterage.

Corby Castle, the beautiful seat of Philip Henry Howard, Esq., is situated on the summit of a precipitous cliff, overhanging the river Eden, near the village of Great Corby, and is

" — bosom'd high
In nature's sylvan majesty."

The present elegant mansion occupies the site of a more ancient castle, and, in part, consists of the very walls of a large square tower of one of the border fortresses. The surrounding country is very beautiful. The lofty hills which descend precipitately on every side, clothed with stately trees, the thousand beauties which here adorn the Eden, where, amidst the hanging shades and groves of oak, bold rocks put forth their shades of rugged fronts and lift up their prominent brows with imposing dignity, and where every turn and avenue affords a rich sylvan scene, are the delight and admiration of every visitor to this part of the kingdom. The beautiful scenery of the grounds has been most admirably kept up by plantations and other improvements, while fresh charms have been elicited by the taste and judgment of its successive proprietors, who have greatly enriched the beauties of this delightful spot, where, at almost every step the visitor is struck with some new object, particularly in the walks on the margin of the Eden, which retain as much of their originality as could be preserved, and are shaded with lofty trees, where a number of caves, &c., have been excavated with considerable labour and great taste. The walks extend for a considerable distance along the Eden, and afford a great variety of rich prospects and pleasing solitudes. To the north-west of the house a terrace is stretched along the summit of the cliff, overlooking the thick groves which adorn the declivities and brink of the river, and commanding a fine view of its course. Among the sylvan ornaments of this romantic spot are many venerable oaks, with a variety of foreign trees and shrubs. The public are admitted to the grounds during the summer months, and strangers at all times.¹ Part of the old mansion was taken down in 1812, and a fine Doric front, with a superb suit of rooms, rebuilt by the late Henry Howard, Esq. The parapet in two of the fronts, has in the centre a pedestal surmounted by a lion statant guardant, the crest of the Howards. All the old walls of the castle are upwards of six feet thick. The apartments are elegantly furnished, and contain many fine paintings and relics of bygone days; amongst the former, we may enumerate the following:—St. Catharine, with two angels, by Luini (one of the most admired paintings at the recent Manchester exhibition); St. Agnes, by Carlo Dolce, which was also there; Madonna and Child, by Sasso Ferrato; Holy Family, with St. Catharine, by Correggio; Portrait of Canova; curious Portrait of a Spanish Princess, unknown; Emperor Charles V. and his Empress Isabella of Portugal, by Titian; David triumphing over Goliath, by Nicholas Poussin; Thomas, second Duke of Norfolk, the victor at Flodden Field, by Holbein; Lady Anne Vere, wife of Henry, Earl of Surrey, the accomplished poet; Thomas, the fourth Duke, his son, in miniature, by Sir Antonio More; Philip Howard, author of Theory of the Earth and other works, by Clarke; Ann, wife of Philip Howard, by Gainsborough; another by Ramsay; Henry Howard, the late possessor of Corby, by Hoppner; Catherine Mary, daughter of Sir Richard Neave, the wife of the late Mr. Howard, by Hoppner; Philip Henry Howard, the present possessor of Corby, and his sister Catherine, when children, by Northcote; Lady Emma Agnes Petre and Miss Adela Howard, by Jackson; Lady Petre and her sister Adela, by Enders; Lady Petre's eldest son and daughter, copied by her ladyship from Hurlston's; Passage at Isella on the Simplon, by the Hon. Mrs. Philip Stourton; a full-length portrait of Lord William Howard when about sixty years of age; Sir Francis Howard, the second son of Sir William, to whom he gave Corby; Colonel Thomas Howard, second son of Sir Francis; William Howard, of Corby; Sir Francis Howard, and his wife Jane Dalston, of Acorn Bank; Thomas Howard his son, and Barbara Musgrave his wife; Charles, Duke of Norfolk, by Hoppner; Charles II., given at the Restoration by himself; James II. as High Admiral; James, son of the above, and Prince Charles Edward and his sister. There are also portraits of Sir Richard and Lady Neave; of Henry Howard, by Clark; and of a lady of the House of Colonna, by Maria de Tiori. The ornaments, relics, &c., consist of the Grace Cup of St. Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, bequeathed by will by the high admiral, Sir Edward Howard, to Henry VIII.'s queen, Catherine of Arragon, who, dying first, it came by descent to Bernard, Duke of Norfolk, who gave it to the late Henry Howard—it is of ivory, mounted in silver gilt, and set with precious stones; the celebrated group of the Lion and Horse, in bronze, inscribed ANTONIO SOSSINO FLORENTINI OPUS; a very curious Cup, formed of a Nautilus Shell, mounted in silver, and set with stones and pearls of very ancient workmanship, certainly as old as Edward III.'s time; a massive gold Rosary and Cross, said to have been worn by Mary, Queen of Scots, when brought to the scaffold, and bequeathed by her, through Melville, to the Earl of Arundel; a square Tablet, dug out of the ruins of Hyde Abbey, near Winchester, inscribed ALFREDUS REX, DCCCLXXXI; and the Claymore of Major MacDonald, the Fergus MacIvor of Waverley. There is also a Roman Altar, which was

¹ We subjoin the following extract from a letter written by Sir Walter Scott to Mr. Morritt, of Kewbury, 2nd October, 1840, in which Sir Walter refers to Corby:—"We visited Corby Castle on our return from Scotland, which remains, in point of situation, as beautiful as when its walks were celebrated by David Hume in the only rhymes he was ever known to be guilty of. Here they are, from a pane of glass in an innermost Chamber:—

'Here chicks in cages for breakfast sprawl,
Here golden boys in red robes scold;
Here heads of Scotland guard the wall;
But Corbie's walks alone are small.'

Would it not be a good quiz to advertise the poetical works of David Hume, with notes, critical, historical, and so forth; with an historical enquiry into the modus vivendi breakfast—on physical dissipation on their being added—a history of the English church music, and of the choir of Carlisle in particular—a full account of the affair of 1745, with the trials, last speeches, and so forth, of the poor Plaidis who were lashed up at Carlisle—and lastly, a full and particular description of Corby, with the genealogy of every family who ever possessed it. I think, even without more than the usual waste of margin, the poems of David would make a decent twelve shilling touch. I shall think about it when I have exhausted mine own century of inventions." The pane of glass on which the lines alluded to above are written, is now in possession of Mr. Bell, solicitor, of Brampton.

found at Barlowswald, and bears the following decayed inscription:—

PRO SALUTE
REGE. HANNOVER
FORT. IMP. CAES
M. AUREL. . . .
..... O. H.
V. . . . A. S. T.
GABRIEL

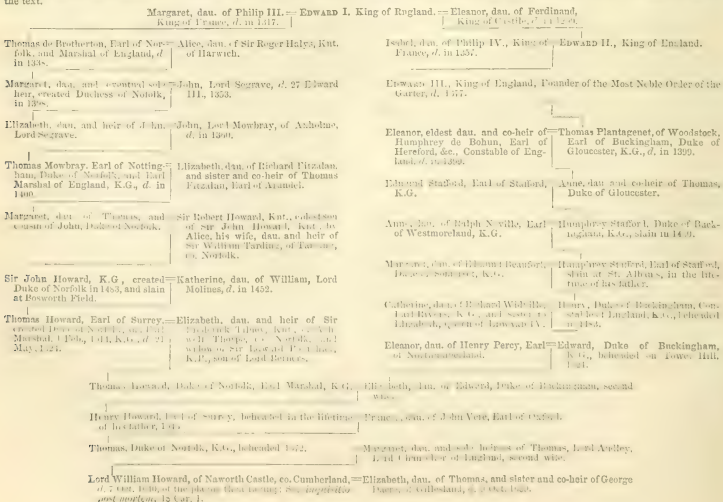

It appears to have been more perfect when it was seen by Horsley, who read it thus, "Pro Salute Domini Nostri Maximi ac fortissimi Imperatoris Caesaris Marci Aurelii [Maximiani] edificatum," and suggests the words which filled the hiatus to have been "templum erectum a solo."

Howard of Corby.¹

THIS is a distinguished branch of the illustrious house of Norfolk.

SIR FRANCIS HOWARD, Knt. of Corby Castle, Cumberland, born 20th August, 1588, second son of Lord William Howard, "Belted Will," (second son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk) by Elizabeth his wife, sister and coheir of George, Lord Dacre, of Gilsland, was next brother of Sir Philip Howard, ancestor of the Earls of Carlisle. He was colonel in the service of Charles I. and in the royal cause raised a regiment of horse, and sold two estates (Newsham, Co. Durham, and Bereton near York) for its support. He married first Margaret, daughter of John Preston, Esq., of the manor of Furness, of Lancaster, and by her (who died in 1625) had issue,

1. Thomas, colonel of his father's regiment, who fell at Atherton Moor, in 1645.
2. Elizabeth, married to Edward Standish, Esq., of Standish, co. Lancaster.

Sir Francis married, secondly, Mary, daughter of Sir Henry Widdrington, Knt., of Widdrington Castle, co. Northumberland, by Mary his wife, daughter of Sir Richard Curwen, Knt., and by her had issue,

1. Francis his heir.
2. William.
3. Margaret, married to Thomas Haggerston, Esq., of Haggerston.
4. Aledia, died unmarried; believed to have been a nun at Antwerp.
5. Catherine, died unmarried.
6. Anne, died unmarried in 1687.

Sir Francis died 11th April, 1659, and was succeeded by his eldest son, FRANCIS HOWARD Esq., of Corby Castle, born 29th June, 1635, captain in the army, and governor of the city of Carlisle; who married first Anna, daughter of William Gerard, Esq., of Bryn, and had by her (who died in 1670), Elizabeth, married first to William Errington, Esq., of Walwick Grange; and secondly, to Michael Ann, Esq., of Bramanbigin; and Mary married to Francis Warwick, Esq., of Warwick, county of Cumberland.

GUILLIAM HOWARD, married secondly, Mary Ann Doreilly, daughter of Richard Topandey, and by her had two daughters: Ann, married to Maria Antiochos Lonsdale, Esq., of Boston; and Frances, who died unmarried. Captain Howard died in 1794, having devised his estate to his brother,

WILLIAM HOWARD, Esq., of Little Corby Hall, married Jane, daughter of John Dalston, Esq., of Acornbank, county of Westmoreland. Mr. Howard, in his youth, served in the navy under the Duke of York, afterwards James II., and lost a leg in action with the Dutch fleet. He died in 1708, and was succeeded by his son,

THOMAS HOWARD, Esq., of Corby Castle, who married, first, Barbara, daughter of John, Viscount Lonsdale, by whom he had, (with a son Thomas who died in youth) three daughters,

1. Elizabeth, died unmarried in 1799.
2. Ann, married to Francis Whorsey, Esq., of Warwick Hall, and died without issue in 1778.
3. Mary, died young.

He married secondly, in 1720, Barbara, sister of Sir Christopher Musgrave, of Eden Hall, by whom he had, inter alios, a son and heir, PHILIP. He married thirdly, in 1734, Mary, sister of Francis Carrington Smith, Esq., but by her (who died in 1735) had no child. He died 20 Aug., 1740, and was succeeded by his son,

PHILIP HOWARD, Esq., of Corby Castle, born in 1730, who married, in 1754, Ann, eldest daughter of Henry Witham, Esq., of Cliff, county of York, and by her (who died at Bath in July, 1794) had issue,

1. HENRY, his heir.
2. Philip, age in 1750; in the Sardinian service; died unmarried in Piedmont, in 1786.
3. Catherine, married in 1776, to John Garside, Esq., of Crumpsall, co. Lancaster.
4. Maria, married first, in 1786, to the Hon. George Petre, and secondly, to Colonel Henry Espinasse.

Mr. Howard died 8th Jan., 1810, and was succeeded by his son, HENRY HOWARD, Esq., of Corby Castle, born 2nd July, 1757; high sheriff of Cumberland in 1832; married first, 4th November, 1788, Maria, third daughter and coheir of Andrew, Lord Archer, of Umberdale, but by her (who died 9th November, 1789) had no issue. He married secondly, 18th March, 1793, Catherine Mary, second daughter of Sir Richard Neave, Bart., of Dagenham Park, Essex, and had by her two sons and three daughters, viz.,

1. PHILIP HENRY, his heir.
2. Henry Francis, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Lisbon, born 3rd November, 1809, married first, 23rd December, 1830, Sevilla, fourth daughter of David, Lord Leveson, and by her (who died 12th March, 1852) has two daughters, Isabella and Adela. He married secondly, 30th August, 1841, Maria Ernestine, Baroness Vonder Schulenberg, daughter of the late Baron Wilhelm Leopold Vonder Schulenberg, of Priemern, in the Kingdom of Prussia, and has by her, Henry, born 11th August, 1843, Francis, born 26th March, 1848; Sevilla Catherine, died 1846; Catherine Mary, and Maria Louisa.
3. Catherine, married in 1829, to the Hon. Philip Stourton.
4. Emma Agnes, married in 1834, to William Francis, late Lord Petre.
5. Adeliza Maria, married in 1830, to her cousin, Henry Petre, of Dunkenhugh, county of Lancaster, who died 20th November, 1852.

Mr. Howard died 1st March, 1842, in the enjoyment of the highest reputation for piety, patriotism, and virtue, and was not less distinguished by his courtesy and kindness than by his literary attainments and correct taste. He was succeeded by his eldest son,

PHILIP HENRY HOWARD, Esq., of Corby Castle, born 22nd April, 1801; succeeded his father 1st March, 1842; married

Eliza Minto Canning, of Foxcote, county of Warwick, eldest daughter of the late Major John Canning, E. I. Co.'s service, by Marianne Matilda, his wife, daughter of Sir John Mordaunt, Bart., and niece of the late Francis Canning, Esq., of Foxcote, whose estates she inherits, and has issue,

1. Philip John Canning, born 11th March, 1840.
2. Miss Frances. 3. Miss Matilda. 4. Miss Eliza.

Mr. Howard was for some time M.P. for Carlisle.

CUMWHINTON AND COATHILL.

The population of this township in 1811, was 3555; in 1811, 429; in 1821, 472; in 1831, 575; in 1841, of Cumwhinton, 339, of Coathill, 253; in 1851, Cumwhinton, 316, Coathill, 362. The area of the township is 2,549 acres; the rateable value of Cumwhinton is £1,128 1s. 10d., of Coathill, £1,371 19s. 8d.; total of the township, £2,500 18s. 5d.

The manors of Cumwhinton and Coathill belonged, soon after the Conquest, to Hildred de Carlisle, in whose posterity they continued for many generations. Having been divided between two brothers of this family, they have ever since been in moieties, one of which has long been attached to the Armathwaite Castle, the other to the Aglionby estate, under which the lands are held; some, however, being under the Duke of Devonshire, and some customary under the Dean and Chapter. The principal landowners are Messrs. John Coulson, Thomas Henderson, James Holme, William James, John and Robert Story, John Pattinson, Trustees of late Robert Richardson, John Bell, John Watson, John Pigg, William and Joseph Richardson, Joseph Bell, John Howe, William Peascod, John Milburn, Joseph Robinson, Mrs. Peascod, Mrs. Armstrong, and Mr. Slack.

There are two alabaster quarries at Coathill, one carried on by Messrs. Howe and Pigg, and the other by John Glasson, who also works another at Cumwhinton.

The village of Cumwhinton is situated about three and a half miles south-east of Carlisle, and contains a small school, which was erected by subscription in 1839, at a cost of £75. There is also a chapel belonging to the Wesleyan Association, built in 1816.

Coathill village is about six miles south-east of Carlisle. It also contains a school, which was built by public subscription raised by the incumbent of Wetheral in 1852, at an expense of £250, and will accommodate about sixty children.

HOLME EDEN ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICT.

THE Ecclesiastical District of Holme Eden was formed by an order in council, dated 18th October, 1845, and is bounded on the northeast by the parish of Hayton, on the south by the parish of Cumwhinton, and on the west by the township of Wetheral and parish of Warwick. It comprises Warwick Bridge (part of the township of Great Corby, and Warwick Bridge in Wetheral parish, which includes the hamlets of Burnriggs, Broadwalk, and Allenwood; and the township of Little Corby in Hayton parish.

The population of Warwick Bridge in 1801 was 217; in 1811, 204; in 1821, 648; in 1831, it was returned with Corby; in 1841, 929; and in 1851, 883. The Newcastle and Carlisle railway runs through the township. At Allen Wood there is a paper manufactory, established in 1853, by Mr. John Cockburn, formerly at Haughton Mill, near Hexham. It affords employment to about sixty men, and makes paper for printing purposes exclusively. The village of Warwick Bridge is situated on the east side of the Eden, four and a half miles east of Carlisle. Here are the extensive cotton mill and dye-works of Peter Dixon and Sons, which afford employment to upwards of 300 persons. There is also the Warwick works school established by the firm just named, for the education of the children of their workpeople and others. It is a fine commodious structure, and will accommodate about 150 pupils; the average attendance is 90.

Near this village, on the south bank of the river, is situated Holme Eden, the splendid seat of Peter Dixon, Esq. It is in the Tudor style, and has a very imposing appearance, its porch tower, and numerous turrets, adding considerably to the general effect. The surrounding grounds are laid out with great taste and elegance, the natural beauties being enhanced by the numerous appliances with which modern skill has surrounded it.

THE CHURCH.

The District church of Holme Eden, is a very neat structure, in the Norman style, consisting of nave and chancel, with tower 110 feet high. The east window of the church is of stained glass by Scott of Carlisle, and contains a representation of the Last Supper; the west window contains a full-length figure of St. Paul, to whom the church is dedicated. The living is in the patronage of Peter Dixon, Esq., and incumbency of the Rev. S. A. Shepherd, who succeeded, in 1849, the Rev. Henry Nembherd, the first incumbent.

The Catholic Church, dedicated to St. Mary, was erected in 1841, from a design furnished by the celebrated architect, the late A. W. Pugin, Esq. It is in the first pointed style of architecture, and consists of a nave, chancel, south porch, sacristy, and open bell turret. The chancel, which is separated from the nave by a finely carved rood screen, surmounted with the Rood, and the figures of the Blessed Virgin and St. John, is chastely and beautifully diapered in gold and colours: all the windows are of stained glass, by Harrington, of London, and were given to the church by P. H. Howard, Esq., who also presented the organ, a fine instrument, by Hill, of London. The pulpit is of cut stone. By many this church is considered a good specimen of a small parish church of the thirteenth century. In the adjoining garden is a neat presbytery. The church was erected chiefly out of an endowment left for this mission, by the last of the Warwick family. The Rev. William Ryan is the resident priest.

Little Corby, the other township in this ecclesiastical district, will be found described in our account of Hayton parish, Eskdale Ward, at a subsequent page.

SCOTBY ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICT.

THE Ecclesiastical District of Scotby was formed from Wetheral parish a few years ago, and comprises the township of Scotby. It is bounded on the north by the river Eden, on the west by Botcherby township, on the south by Cumwhinton, and on the east by Wetheral, from which it is separated by a small stream called Pow Maughan Beck.

SCOTBY.

The area of Scotby township is 1,672 acres, and its rateable value £2,751 0s. 4d. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 275; in 1811, 293; in 1821, 318; in 1831, 397; in 1841, 383; and in 1851, 475. The land here is principally strong on a clayey subsoil.

Scotby is intersected by the Newcastle and Carlisle railway.

The manor of Scotby was one of those granted to the King of Scots. After the resumption of the grant, it continued to be held by the crown, and was annexed to the honour of Penrith, granted in the reign of Edward III. to the Duke of Portland, and now belongs to the Duke of Devonshire. The principal land-owners are Miss Lowry, David Hodgson, Esq., Messrs. William Sutton, John Wilkinson, Dr. Lonsdale, Robert Dendle, W. Routledge, Robert Donaldson, — Braithwaite, and William Jackson.

The village of Scotby is pleasantly situated two and a-half miles east by south of Carlisle, and commands extensive views of the surrounding district. The neighbourhood is very healthy, and the village has been much improved during the last few years by David Hodgson, Esq., and Mr. William Sutton.

THE CHURCH.

Scotby church is a handsome structure in the Early English style, consisting of nave, chancel, and square tower, and contains 212 sittings, one-half of which are free and unappropriated. It was erected at the expense of G. H. Head, Esq., upon ground given by David Hodgson, Esq., who, with other friends, endowed the church with £70 a-year, the latter gentleman having since increased it to £100; it was consecrated by the late Bishop of Carlisle, on 11th October, 1855. G. H. Head, and David Hodgson, Esqrs., are the patrons.

Rectors.—Rev. Joseph MacGartie, 1855; Rev. John McMillan, 1857.

The house occupied by the incumbent is a neat substantial building, situate at the Grove, the property of David Hodgson, Esq.

Scotby Endowed School is a neat building, in the Early English style of architecture, erected by subscription in 1853 and 1854, at a cost of about £250.

It will accommodate about one hundred scholars, and has an average attendance of fifty. This school is endowed with nine acres of land, now let for £17 10s. per annum, for which sum the master teaches a small number at a low quarterage.

Efforts are now being made towards the erection of a girls' school, and of affording every opportunity to the inhabitants of the village of educating their children more effectually.

The Society of Friends have a meeting-house in the village, which was erected in 1718. It is a small stone building, with burial-ground attached, capable of seating 120 persons. This body was formed about the time the chapel was built; but previous to that date there were a few members interred in what is called the Sepulchre,—a corner of a field called White Hill, situated near the village.

Here are situated the tanning and currying establishments of Mr. William Sutton, which afford employment to about sixty persons. It is one of the largest establishments of the kind in the north of England. The leather manufactured here, particularly a kind called Cordovan, commands a good and ready sale in all parts of the kingdom. From this establishment the village is now partially lighted with gas. In connection with his works Mr. Sutton has built and established a reading-room, which is well supplied with newspapers: there is also a good library, containing about 300 volumes. This was one of the first reading-rooms established for working men in the north of England.

Allerdale - Below - Derwent Ward.

THE WARD OF ALLERDALE-BELOW-DERWENT is bounded on the north by Cumberland Ward and by the estuary of the rivers Waver and Wampool, on the west by the Irish sea, on the south by Derwent Ward, and on the south-east and east by Leath Ward. It is about sixteen miles in length from east to west, by eleven miles in breadth from north to south, and is intersected by the Maryport and Carlisle railway. The Waver and Ellen are the principal rivers, besides which there are numerous smaller streams. The eastern part of the ward is mountainous, comprising the Brocklebank and Caldbeck Fells, with other elevations, while its western portion contains rich and highly cultivated plains and fertile valleys. Lime and freestone are the principal mineral productions, with lead and copper found in the Caldbeck Fells. Allerdale-below-Derwent Ward includes the parishes of Aikton, Allhallows, Aspatiria,¹ Bolton, Bromfield, Caldbeck, Holme Cultram, Holme St. Cuthbert's, St. Paul's Newton Arlosh, Holme Low, Ireby, Kirkbride, Sebergham, Thursby, Torpenhow,² Uldale, Westward, and Wigton.

AIKTON PARISH.

THE parish of Aikton is bounded on the north by those of Bowness and Kirkhampton, on the west by the river Wampool and the parish of Kirkbride, on the south by Thursby, and on the east by Orton and Kirkhampton. It extends about five miles in length from north to south, and two in breadth from east to west, and comprises the townships of Aikton, Biglands and Gamblesby, Wampool, and Wiggonby, whose united area is 6,157 acres. The soil varies from a strong clay to a mixture of loam and gravel, but in the north-west parts it is marshy, where the lands are low and level.

AIKTON.

The population of Aikton township in 1801 was 185; in 1811, 201; in 1821, 249; in 1831, 261; in 1841, 318; and in 1851, 312. The rateable value is £1,099 15s. 9d. Wigton is the market usually attended by the inhabitants.

The manor of Aikton is comprised in the barony of Burgh, and was the principal seat of Johan de Morville, second daughter and one of the two coheirs of Sir Hugh de Morville, lord of Burgh, one of the assassins of Sir Thomas à Beckett, whose sword is now in the possession of Sir Wilfred Lawson, of Brayton Hall. The manorial seat was at Downhall, a small hamlet in Wiggonby township, where Joan de Morville and her husband, Sir Richard Gernon, resided. Joan died in 1247, leaving two daughters, Helwise and Ada, the latter of whom was married to Randolph

Boyvill, of Levington, and afterwards to William Furniville. She died in 1271, when Helwise, her daughter and heir, succeeded to the inheritance of Ada and Randolph Boyvill, of Levington. Helwise died without issue soon after her mother, and the lands of Randolph Boyvill of Levington fell to his six sisters coheirs; and her fourth part, viz., the half of her grandmother's moiety of the lands of the Morville family, came to Roger, son of Walter Colvill, and of Margaret his wife, in right of the latter, who was daughter and heir of Helwise, elder daughter of Joan de Morville, and wife of Eustace Balioll. The said Helwise died in 1250, and her daughter Margaret in 1281. Roger Colvill, son of the said Margaret, and in her right lord of Aikton, was succeeded by his son Edward Colvill, and after him Robert Colvill was found heir. In 1295 Thomas Daniel died lord of Aikton, in right of his wife Isabel, heir of the Colvill family, and left Margaret his daughter, a child three years old, his heir, who in 1330 entailed the land to her husband John Ratcliffe and herself for life, with remainder to Richard their son for life; and then to Robert, Thomas, Richard, and John, sons of the said Richard, and their heirs successively in tail male; then to the heirs male of Henry, son of Catherine Chiffley; then to the heirs male of John, son of William Ratcliffe of Longfield; after, to the heirs male of Robert, son of William, son of Richard Ratcliffe; afterwards, to the right heirs of Margaret Daniel (the grandmother) for ever. She died in 1370. The manor was subsequently purchased by the Dacres, in the reign of Henry VI., from Sir John Savage, Knight, and again united to the barony of Burgh. It is now the property of the Earl of Lonsdale. The principal landowners are the Earl of Lonsdale, the Misses Bragg, the trustees of the late Joseph Barnes, Edward Barnes, and Mrs. Brown.

The village of Aikton is pleasantly situated on a gentle acclivity, three and a half miles north-by-east of Wigton, and ten miles west-by-south of Carlisle.

THE CHURCH.

Aikton parish church, dedicated to St. Andrew, stands about a mile east of the village. It is a very ancient structure, the original architectural features of which are almost entirely gone, in consequence of the numerous alterations which succeeding ages have rendered necessary; but there are still remaining some traces of Norman architecture about the chancel. About a century ago the church was considerably enlarged, by the addition of a south aisle in the Perpendicular style. The living, a rectory, valued in the King's Book at £14 3s. 1½d., was returned by the commissioners as of the annual value of £546, but is now worth upwards of £650 per annum. The tithes were commuted in 1833 for a yearly rent-charge of £493 12s. 10d., of which £5 12s. 1d. belong to certain landowners; and the remainder, together with upwards of ninety-five acres of glebe, let for £140 a-year, belongs to the rector. The church in ancient times was presented to by moieties, which probably arose from the partition of the Morville estates between the two daughters of Sir Hugh Morville; Ada married into the Multon family, and Joan into the Gernons. In 1340, Thomas de Multon of Gilsland presented William Somerset to one moiety, whereupon an inquisition de jure patronatus was held, and Richard de Ayketon protested that there was no vacancy, for that he himself was sole rector; and towards consolidating the said rectory, Richard de Ayketon resigned his title. Nevertheless, in the register this immediately follows an institution and mandate for induction to the rectory of the William Somerset above-mentioned. Two years later Thomas de Multon again presents to a moiety. In 1339 Margaret de Dacre presented William de Salkeld to a moiety of the rectory of Aikton; and upon an inquisition of the right of patronage, the jurors found that such a right was vested in her. In 1362, Ralph, Lord Dacre, presents to a moiety, and again in 1373. Hugh de Dacre, lord of Gilsland, presents to a moiety in 1378. In 1465, a writ of quare impedit was brought by Sir John Savage, Knight, claiming the right of presentation against the bishop and Richard Morland, rector of Aikton; but the latter continued possessor, as it seems, of the whole rectory, for after this we hear no more of moieties. In 1563, William Lord Dacre presents; in 1572, Queen Elizabeth, who also presents in 1583, and again in 1591; in 1642, Thomas Dennis, a mercer in Oxford; in 1694, Sir John Lowther; since which time the patronage has been vested in his successors, and is now enjoyed by the Earl of Lonsdale. The parish register commences in 1694.

CHARITIES.

Wiggonby School.—By indenture, dated 19th October, 1792, Margaret Hodgson conveyed to Robert Hodgson and others certain premises at Wiggonby, containing about 140 acres, and all her other lands and tenements in Wiggonby, or within the parish of Aikton, upon trust, out of the rents thereof, in the first place to build a school-house, upon some part of the said lands; and as soon as the same should be erected, that they should pay to the schoolmaster thereof £40 per annum, for teaching and instructing all persons of the name of Hodgson, wherever they should come from, during such time as they should think fit to continue at the said school; and also to teach and instruct all poor persons' children within the parish of Aikton, whose parents should not be possessed of a real estate of £20 per annum; and all poor persons' children within the parishes of Burgh-on-Sands and Beaumont, whose parents should not be possessed of a real estate of £12 per annum, in the principles of the Church of England, and to read, write, and cast accounts, to learn the catechism, and other proper and useful learning, without receiving any money or any gratuity whatsoever. And upon further trust, that they should pay to such of the said poor boys and girls as they should think fit, the sum of 20s. a year each, towards finding their necessary and comfortable apparel, and more in case of real necessity; and also that they should provide necessary books for the education of the said children and scholars; and she directed that the said trustees should have the full management of the school, and that the schoolmaster should be elected by them; that 'no scholar should be admitted before the age of eight years, or continue after the age of twenty-one, except those of the name of Hodgson, who should continue at the said school as long as they should think fit; and she directed that the said trustees should twice in every year meet in the said school-house, or some other place in the said parish, to examine into any neglect, miscarriages, or irregularities that might be committed by the schoolmaster or any of the scholars, and to make such orders as to them should seem fit for the good of the charity; and she empowered the said trustees to displace the schoolmaster for any offence or neglect, or to remove the scholars: and as to the remainder of the said rents and profits, that her trustees should dispose of the same for the benefit of the said school, schoolmaster, and scholars, as they should think fit. The said Margaret Hodgson, by will, dated the 3rd April, 1797, reciting the above indenture, and further reciting that the school-house had been erected and built upon part of the said lands and premises, bequeathed to trustees all the residue of her personal estate (over and above certain legacies before bequeathed) upon trust, that they should invest of a part thereof, and apply the interest of the same, after paying an annuity of £20 per annum, and some minor expenses, for the use and benefit of the said school, schoolmaster, and scholars, as they should think fit; and she directed that no minister of any church or chapel should be master of her school; and that no person holding lands in Wiggonby should ever be chosen one of her trustees. The property taken by the trustees, under the indenture of 1792, amounts to about £100 a-year, and that under her will to £75 15s., together £175 15s. For several years after the foundation, the children of small farmers and persons of some property, received the sum of 20s. yearly; but the trustees subsequently confined those payments to children of the poorer class. All the scholars are supplied with stationery and with such books as the master thinks requisite, in whatever class they may be. The master takes all the children of the name of Hodgson, wherever their parents reside; and all the children of farmers who have not real estates in Aikton, of above the value of £20; and would take any children of Burgh or Beaumont, if they apply and are properly qualified. The children are nominated by the trustees, and no applications are refused, provided they are eligible, according to the terms of the foundation deed. They are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, and the classics, without any charge whatever.

Watson's Charity.—It appears by an entry in one of the parish books, dated September 24th, 1775, that Joseph Watson, of the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, by will, dated 11th September, 1764, bequeathed to the minister and churchwardens of Aikton £30 upon trust, that they and their successors should from time to time pay the interest thereof unto the schoolmaster of the charity school of Aikton, in the same manner as the charities and donations to the said school were then paid and applied. Speaking of this charity, the Charity Commissioners say:—"We have not been able to discover what other charities or donations the testator alluded to, except that of Holmes' Charity."

Holmes' Charity.—The Charity Commissioners inform us that "It is stated in a terrier, dated 1777, that the schoolmaster of Aikton was entitled to 40s. per annum, payable by the overseers. We have not been able to obtain any authentic information as to the origin of this charity. It is said that £40 was left by the Rev. Marmaduke Holmes, and it is supposed that the parish took this money into their hands." They allowed 40s. yearly, as interest thereof, to the schoolmaster, which was regularly paid to him out of the poor-rate for some years, but is now discontinued.

Both Watson's Charity and Holmes' Charity have been entirely lost by misappropriation and neglect.

Barwise's Bequest.—By an entry in the parish book above-mentioned, it appears, that Peter Barwise died in 1773, having deposited in the hands of Jeremiah Smith, of Micklethwaite, the sum of £50 upon trust, that the yearly interest thereof should be applied every year to charitable uses in the parish of Aikton. There is no recollection in the parish of any money having been given away in respect of this charity. It is generally understood that Jeremiah Smith died many years ago in a state of insolvency.

BIGLANDS AND GAMBLESBY.

The rateable value of this township is £713 16s. 3d. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 151; in 1811, 156; in 1821, 191; in 1831, 192; in 1841, 187; and in 1851, 214. In 1855 about 170 acres were enclosed belonging to this township, when four acres, in which there is a mineral spring, were allotted for the recreation of the inhabitants.

The manor of Biglands and Gamblesby was in ancient times held under the barony of Burgh by one William Brewer who held it as a part of that barony, as the baron held the same of the king. The next lord we meet with is Adam de Crookdake, who had it by fine of William Brewer. The coheireses of the Crookdakes married into the families of Roughton and Boyvills of Westlinton. Roughton's moiety descended to a daughter named Catherine, wife of John Aspilon, a native of Buckinghamshire, who sold the same to the Warcocks, and they to the Crackenthorps or Southaiks, who exchanged the same with the Dentons of Cardew for their land in Skelton. One of the Dentons sold this moiety to the several tenants. Boyvill's moiety descended long in the male line, till by a daughter it was transferred in marriage to Alexander Highmore, Esq., of Harbybrow, whose heir sold the same to lord Dacre, becoming again, in this manner, parcel of Burgh barony, now vested in the Earl of Lonsdale. The principal landowners are Messrs. Joseph Addison, Jonathan Edgar, Rev. Ismay Barnes, and others; Joseph Atkinson, Jeremiah Smith, John Stoddart, jun., and others; Joseph Gill, Robert Matthews, and others.

The hamlet of Biglands is situated on the banks of the Wampool, three and a half miles north of Wigton.

Gamblesby hamlet is also on the Wampool, three miles north of Wigton. The ancient manor-house formerly stood here, and is said to have derived its name from one Gamel, who built it for a residence, the place previous to his time being a woody waste much frequented by deer. Here is a flour-mill.

Drunleaning is another small hamlet in this township, about one mile south of Aikton.

In 1801 this township contained a population of 119; in 1811, 115; in 1821, 97; in 1831, 127; in 1841, 107; and in 1851, 111. The rateable value is £673 7s. 3d. The Silloth Bay railway runs through a portion of the township. The manor of Wampool, or Wathinpool, derives its name from the river upon which the township is situated. Its first recorded possessor is Robert Brun, or Bruce, son of Radulph, who was called Robert de Wathinpool. He married Margaret, daughter and heir of Richard de Trute, lord of Newby, near Carlisle. This family assumed the local name, and were called de Wathingpools. Wampool came afterwards to the Warwicks, whose heir Richard Warwick sold the manor to the several tenants. The principal landowners in the township are Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; John Lawson; Joseph Hodgson; Miss Frances Barnes; Hugh Stanger Laythes, Esq.; and Jane Skelton.

The hamlet of Wampool is two and a half miles west-north-west of Aikton, on the east bank of the river from which its name is derived.

Leathes is another manor in this township, which gave name to its possessors, who held the manor from the period of the Conquest to the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when Adam de Leathes sold it to the inhabitants. Leathes was part of the demeane of Whittrigg, which belonged to the ancient family of Brun. The hamlet of Leathes is three miles north-north-west of Aikton.

Whittrigg Lees is also a hamlet in this township, three and a half miles north-west of Aikton.

The township of Wiggonby comprises an area of about 2,330 acres, and its rateable value is £1,331 18s. 8d. Its population in 1801 was 127; in 1811, 142; in 1821, 169; in 1831, 175; in 1841, 190; and in 1851, 219.

This township is included in the manor of Aikton, the principal messuage or manor-house of which was situated at Downhall. The landowners are Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; Messrs. John Jennings, John Pearson, Jonathan Pearson, Thomas Ismay, John Brown, Thomas Twentyman, the trustees of the Grammar School, Daniel Sibson, and Jeremiah Reed; Rev. John Lowry, Isabella Robinson, Mrs. Addison, Sarah Hodgson, and Mary Scott, with a few other smaller owners.

The village of Wiggonby is two miles east-by-south of Aikton. For an account of the school see page 198.

At Downhall, a small hamlet, about a mile south-east from Aikton, is the moated site of the ancient manor-house of Joan de Morville, daughter of Hugh de Morville, and wife of Sir Richard Gernon. It was subsequently held for many generations by the Hodgson family, and, with the estate, is now the property of Mr. Bowstead, of London. When the present buildings were being erected, in 1826, a portion of the old drawbridge was found. This place has borne the name of Downhall ever since that old mansion was burnt by the Scots.

Thornby is another hamlet in this township, one and a half miles south-east of Aikton.

ALLHALLOWS PARISH.

THIS parish, which was anciently a chapelry in that of Aspatia, is bounded on the north by Bromfield, on the west by Aspatia, on the south by Torpenhow, and on the east by Bolton; and though divided into the four districts of Ukmaby, Whitehall, Harby, and Raggway, yet contains only one township. Agriculture is the principal employment, though some of the inhabitants are engaged in the coal mine of Mr. Drewry, the shaft of which is eighty-five fathoms in perpendicular depth, and the vein now working six feet broad: the number of persons employed is about fifty. Wigton and Cockermouth are the markets usually attended.

The area of the township of Allhallows is 1,860 statute acres, and its rateable value £1,567 18s. 8d. The population in 1801 was 173; in 1811, 179; in 1821, 219; in 1831, 205; in 1841, 235; and in 1851, 255. The Roman road from Old Carlisle to Ellenborough is said to have passed through a portion of this township.

The manor of Ukmaby or Upmanby, was, with Blennerhasset, granted by Alan, second lord of Allerdale, to Randolphus or Ranulphus de Lyndsay, in marriage with his sister Ethelreda, granddaughter of the illustrious Saxon refugee Cospatrick, and sister of Gunhilda, wife of Uchtred, the Pictish prince of Galloway. This Randolphus witnesses charters of King David of Scotland, Henry Prince of Scotland, and of his uncle by marriage, Earl Cospatrick the second; and is otherwise known by his gifts to the Priory of St. Bees, a cell of St. Mary's, York,¹ and to the Priory of Carlisle, whose representatives, the dean and chapter, still hold the manor of Lorton in virtue of his donation.² It afterwards came in marriage to the Tilliols, which family failing in issue male, the manor came to co-heiresses, and was divided into moieties, one of which was sold by the representative of one of the co-heiresses to the Salkelds, the other passed to the Highmores. The Blencows purchased of the latter, and Mr. T. Denton describes the manor of Ukmaby as being, in 1688, the jointure of Mrs. Mary Blencow, mother of Christopher Blencow, Esq.

We have no information respecting the original owners of the manor of Whitehall. It appears to have been restored in the reign of Henry IV. to Sir Henry Percy. It was afterwards the property and seat of a younger branch of the Salkelds of Corby, the first of whom that settled here was

THOMAS SALKELD, who married Mary, daughter of William Vaux of Catterlen, and had issue,

LANCELOT SALKELD, who married Elizabeth, daughter and co-heir of Nicholas Berdesey, of Berdesey, in Lancashire, and had issue three sons,

I. FRANCIS, who married Dorothy, daughter of Thomas Brathwaite, Esq. of Burneshead, and died without issue.

II. Nicholas, who also died without issue.

III. Thomas, who succeeded his father.

THOMAS SALKELD, Esq. of Whitehall, married Mary Copeland, and by her had issue,

LANCELOT SALKELD, Esq. of Whitehall, who married Dorothy, daughter of Alan Askeugh, of Skeughby, in the county of York, and by her he had issue,

FRANCIS SALKELD, Esq. of Whitehall, who married Anne, daughter of Walter Strickland, third son of Sir Thomas Strickland, of Sizergh, Westmoreland, and had issue, THOMAS SALKELD, Esq. of Whitehall, who lived in the reign of Charles II., and had issue, Thomas, Lancelot, Roger, and eight daughters.

THOMAS SALKELD, Esq. of Whitehall, son and heir of the last Thomas, had issue, Thomas and Henry. Thomas, the elder brother, died without issue, and then the estate descended to HENRY SALKELD, Esq., who also dying without issue, he devised the estate to his widow during life, and afterwards to trustees for payment of debts.

After the death of Henry Salkeld, Esq., the last heir male, this estate became the subject of a long suit in chancery, by which it was at length adjudged to the Charltons of Northumberland, descended from Margaret, daughter of Sir Francis Salkeld, and is now the property of William Henry Charlton, Esq.

The manor of Harby, or Harby Brow, anciently called Lecegrigg, was for many generations the seat and property of the Highmore family. Nicholas Highmore sold it to the Blencows, who possessed it for several descents. It was afterwards held by the family of Steel, but is now the property of William Henry Charlton, Esq.

The principal landowners are Sir Wilfrid Lawson, William H. Charlton, Esq., Mrs. Clarke, and Mr. John Drewry.

¹He gave them the church or chapel of Loweswater and two boates of land, early in the twelfth century. The precise date is not known, but it was fifty years before the Charter of Confirmation granted to them by Alicia, Countess of Albemarle, as heir of her brother William, the son of William, the son of Duncan, eldest son of Malcolm Canmore—commonly called the boy of Egremont—and in which charter it is stated that the monks have possessed the “capellum, cum duabus boatis terre eadem capelle pertinentibus” by the gift of Randolphus de Lyndsay, “jam quinquaginta annis transactis.” Regist. fol. 12.

²A Charter of Confirmation by Henry II. enumerates “ex dono Randolphi de Lincolnia totam terram quam habuit predictus Randolphus in Arthureth, et totam terram suam de Lortunne, cum molendino et cum omnibus pertinentiis ejusdem terre.” Dugd. Monast. tom. vi., p. 144. Besides, according to Nicolson and Burns, “the miller, his wife, and children.”

This parish has been enclosed under an act of parliament passed in 1812, by which lands were given in lieu of tithes to the Bishop of Carlisle, as appropriator, or his lessee.¹

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a small structure situated about six miles south-west of Wigton. It contains two stained glass windows; on the south side of the chancel is the burial-place of the Salkelds. The living is a perpetual curacy, and was certified to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty at £9 per annum, but it has since received two augmentations from that fund, with which land was purchased, so that it is now worth about £80 a year. The impropriation is at present in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The parish register commences in 1666. The following have been incumbents during the last century:—

William Taylor, 1743; Robert Robinson, 1754; William Tearson, 1756; John Cheambers, 1757; Thomas Singleton, 1801; W. Monkhouse and W. Gaskell, from 1807 to 1812; Thomas Thompson, 1812.

The parsonage was erected in 1812, at a cost of £300.

The parish school is a neat stone building, situate at Leesrigg, where it was erected in 1855, at an expense of £300; it is under government inspection, supported by quarter pence and subscriptions, has a master's house attached, and is attended by about forty children.

¹ The lease has passed with the Lawson estates to the present Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.

CHARITY.

Ritson's Charity.—It appears by an entry in the parish books, dated Oct. 1st, 1793, that the sum of £10, which had been deposited in the hands of different persons, in the year 1740, was, in 1793, called in and laid out with other money, amounting in the whole to £20, in the purchase of a house at Blennerhasset, for the use of the poor of Allhallows. It is understood that the sum of £10 was a legacy left by Joseph Ritson, the interest thereof to be distributed amongst the poor of Allhallows not receiving parish relief; and that previous to the principal sum being laid out, as above mentioned, the interest had been so applied. This charity now produces £1 per annum, which is distributed amongst poor persons of the parish not receiving parochial relief.

Whitehall, the ancient seat of the Salkelds, is now occupied as a farm-house. It bears the date 1589; and a little to the north of it is a circular mound nearly sixty yards in diameter, with the ruined remains of some ancient building; and about two hundred yards to the south is an entrenchment, twenty-eight yards square, surrounded with a ditch, and having near it the ruins of extensive buildings.

Harby Brow, also a farm-house, is a very quaint looking building, with a square tower; and in an adjoining building are the letters and date F. 1594. H.

Baggery, Baggray, or Bagraw, is a small village on the river Ehen, seven miles south-west of Wigton, opposite to Blennerhasset.

ASPATRIA PARISH.

ASPATRIA parish is bounded on the north by Bromfield and West Newton, on the west by Gilcrux and Cross Cannonby, on the south by Plumbland and Torpenhow, and on the east by Bromfield and Allhallows. It comprises the townships of Aspatria and Brayton. Hayton and Melay, and Oughterside and Allerby. The soil about Aspatria is light and red, in some parts sandy, in others loamy, producing in general good crops of wheat and other grain; Oughterside is more wet and heavy, and around Hayton a reddish clay and deep loam prevail. Fine red freestone is found in the parish. Agriculture is the principal employment of the inhabitants, some of whom are, however, engaged in coal-mining. Cockermouth, Maryport, and Wigton, are the markets usually attended.

ASPATRIA AND BRAYTON.

The area of this township is 4,611 acres, and its rateable value £4,155 15s. Its population in 1801 was 327; in 1811, 478; in 1821, 632; in 1831, 761; in 1841, 988; and in 1851, 1,123. Surveys of this township are deposited with the overseers and vicar. A Roman road leading from Old Carlisle to Ellenborough passed through this township.

The manor of Aspatria, as parcel of the barony of Allerdale-below-Derwent, was given by Ranulph de Meschines to Waltheof, son of Gospatric, Earl of Dunbar, from whom the name of Aspatria is said to have been derived. On the division of the estates of William Fitz Duncan and Alice de Romley, his wife, among their three daughters and co-heirs, this manor was allotted to Alice, the youngest, who dying without issue, her share came to her two sisters, or their representatives. The line of the eldest sister having failed, the entire manor descended to the Lucys, who inherited from the second sister. This latter family terminated in a female heir, Maud de Lucy, who, upon her marriage with her second husband, Henry Percy, first earl of Northumberland, granted to him the whole of her estates, and, in this manner, Aspatria became the property of the Percys, earls of Northumberland. In 1578 an inquisition was held in which we find it stated that

"The manor of Aspatria, otherwise called Aspatrick, is an ancient manor situate in Allerdale, and in the partitions of the possessions of Allerdale, Cockermouth, and Copeland, hath been allotted as a principal manor, and is now holden of the Queen's majesty by like tenure as the residue of the earldom is.

"The manor includes the town of Aspatria, and within and adjoining are the following townships, viz., Ukmaby, Blennerhasset, Crooklake, Langrigg, Bromfield, Newton, Ormesby, Hayton, Brayton, and divers other hamlets.

"The commons, or waste, within the said manor, are very great and large; the soil thereof appertaineth only to the said earl, and, for the better preservation thereof, it is yearly used that the bailiffs and officers then do perambulate the said bounder, and all manner of chattels, especially horses, found within the said bounder (being foreigner's goods, and not having right of common there), are for their trespasses punished by way of amerancement, which is answered to the lord for that purpose; and if any man do encroach or improve any of the said waste, or commons (the same being found by presentment), the said grounds so improved are either pulled down or laid open (if it be found noisome), or else rented to the lord, and, in the meantime, till reformation thereof can be had, is amerced as is aforesaid.

"The said earl hath, in the said manor, a court baron, and all liberties, privileges, and rights belonging to the same, in which court certain freeholders are called and make their appearance there, and by reason of that appearance are in divers court-rolls discharged of their appearance in the court holden for the barony of Allerdale.

"There is no advowson of benefice there, by reason the same hath been of ancient time granted away, and now inappropriate to the, &c.

"There are no woods or underwoods of any value within the said manor or lordship, nor any parks, chases, or waters of pleasure, &c."

Among the freeholders we find that "William Orpewer holdeth in Aspatria two messuages and two carucates of land, sometime the lands of Christopher Sands by homage, fealty, and suit of court, from three weeks to three weeks, and payeth his portion for cornage, seawake, and other services, according to the quantity of his fee, and for fee-farm.

"The Bishop of Carlisle holdeth in Aspatria divers lands and tenements in pure alms.

"Anthony Barwise holdeth in Aspatria certain lands and tenements by fealty only, sometime the lands of the Prior of St. Bees, then holden in pure alms.

"The same Anthony holdeth there certain lands by fealty only, sometime the lands of the Abbot of Holme Cultram, and then held in pure alms.

"The tenants of Aspatria pay yearly amongst themselves,—de parte alani, 6s. 8d.; de parte coms., 3s. 6d.; turnsilver, 4d.; in toto, per annum, 17s. 4d.

"John Beeby holdeth a tenement at Aspatria, with the appurtenances, late the lands of . . . by like services, as is aforesaid."

From the time that it came into the possession of the Percys, the manor of Aspatria has descended along with the barony, and belongs now to General Wyndham, who holds manorial courts here twice a year, at which many of the inferior lords of manors perform suit and service, this being one of the principal manors of the barony.

The landowners of the township are Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.; Sir James Musgrave, Bart.; Dr. Wilkinson, Mrs. Clark, the Misses Langcake, Grace Pattinson, Mrs. Ritson, Mrs. Lomas, Messrs. Peter Fisher, John Langcake, Joseph Luccock, John Jameson, Edward Kirkhaugh, John Pattinson, Joseph Hayton, Joseph Aldersey, John Asbridge, Peter Atkinson, George Elliot, Thomas Rigg, Richard Penketh, Martin Peart, and others. The commons were enclosed in 1814.

The village of Aspatria, which is long and irregularly built, and contains several good houses, is situated on the ridge of an eminence, at the foot of which passes the Maryport and Carlisle railway, eight miles east-north-east of Maryport, and nine miles north of Cockermouth. Aspatria is one of the polling-places for the county.

THE CHURCH.

Aspatria church, dedicated to St. Kentigern, stands upon the site of the old church, which being found too small for the rapidly increasing population of the parish was taken down and the present beautiful structure erected in its stead. The foundation stone was laid on the 23rd July, 1846, a large body of clergy, the Free-masons of the province, and a vast concourse of spectators attending to take part in and witness the ceremony. The following inscription, written on parchment, and enclosed in a bottle, was deposited in a lead box prepared for the purpose, together with coins of Queen Victoria's reign, and two of the county newspapers:—

"ECCLESIE SANCTI KENTIGERNE JAM NUNC TERTIO MULTORUM SUMPTIBUS CONSTRUENDÆ.
FUNDAMENTA POSUIT HUGO PERCY, S.T.P. CARLEOLANENSIS EPISCOPUS.
DIE X KAL. AUG. ANNO SALUTIS M.DCCCXVI.
ASTANTIBUS JOSEPHO TREDALE, D.P.G.M ET SODALIBUS SUIB EDUARDO SALKELD, A.M., VICARIO.
JOHANNES P. JOHNSON,
THOMAS SEABLY,
ROBERTO JEFFERSON, } SACRORUM CUSTODIBUS.
JOHANNES HETHERINGTON,
TRAVIS ET MANGNALL, ARCHITECTIS.
MCKAY ET BLACKSTOCK, CONSTITORIBUS.
LAUS DEO."

The church is in the Early English style, temp. Edward I., and consists of nave, side aisles, chapel, chancel, south porch, north vestry, and fine western tower, surmounted with parapets and pinnacles. The material is the red sandstone of the county. Dimensions—nave 71 feet 10 inches by 40 feet, chancel 30 feet by 15 feet 9 inches. Piers circular and multangular alternately. The pulpit, of stone, is on the north side of the chancel arch, and the reading-desk on the south side. The seats are open and uniform, with finials at the end. There are fine, well-executed windows, containing the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, the Ascension, with sacred devices and monograms. These were erected by special subscription. The window in the Musgrave chapel contains the arms of the Musgrave family and others. It was given by Sir George Musgrave, Bart., of Eden Hall, and Sir James Musgrave, Bart., of Barnsley Park, Gloucestershire. The windows are by Scott, of Carlisle, upon whom they reflect the highest credit, for the great skill and exquisite taste displayed in their execution. Mr. Scott has recently executed a handsome window in the south side of the chancel, to the memory of the Rev. E. Thompson, formerly vicar of the parish. It is the gift of his only son, Lieut. Edward Thompson, of the 7th Hussars. Over the communion-table is the inscription "Do this in remembrance of me." The tables of the Decalogue are in harmony with the other arrangements, which are in all respects complete. In the rebuilding of the church, the architectural features of the old structure which it has replaced have been preserved as far as possible, amongst which are a fine Norman doorway and a beautiful Norman arch between the nave and chancel, a view of which appears in Sir Walter Scott's, "Border Antiquities." The old Norman font has also been preserved, and the ancient dormitory of the house of Hayton and afterwards of the Musgrave family has been restored. The monumental tablets and other memorials of the departed have likewise been piously preserved, and placed upon the walls in situations corresponding with the old arrangements, so that with the exception of the organ and a peal of bells (there is one of great sweetness of tone), the church is complete. The architects were Messrs. Travis and Mangnall, and the builders Messrs. Mc Kay and Blackstock. The expense of rebuilding and restoration amounted to about £3,000, nearly £1,000 more than the original estimate. About £1,950 of this sum was collected by private subscription; the Church Building Society, gave £250; and £600 was raised by a parish rate, by the unanimous consent of the vestry. The church was consecrated on the 6th June, 1848.

The church of Aspatria was given by the first lord of Allerdale to the prior and convent of Carlisle, which grant was confirmed by Henry II. and Edward III. It was formerly rectorial, but is now a vicarage, the advowson of which has always belonged to the bishop of Carlisle, to whom the great tithes were appropriated till the year 1812, when, under the Enclosure Act, allotments of land were given in lieu of them to the appropriator and vicar. The benefice is valued in the King's Book at £10 4s. 3d., and was certified to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as of the annual value of £100; it is now worth about £250 per annum. The parish register commences in 1660.

The vicarage was erected in 1714.

There is an Independent chapel here, a small stone building erected by subscription in 1827, and possessing accommodation for about 300 persons.

The National School occupies a neat stone building erected by subscription in 1825, at a cost of about £160. It is under government inspection, supported by quarter pence and donations, and has an average attendance of upwards of 100 children. It is conducted by a master, two pupil teachers, and a paid monitor.

There is also a girls' school, erected in 1837, by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, which is attended by about 40 children.

CHARITIES.

Sir Thomas Musgrave's Charity.—"Sir Thomas Musgrave, by a codicil to his will, dated 16th November, 1811, directed his executors to transfer to the minister and churchwardens of Aspatria for the time being £333 6s. 8d. three-per-cent. reduced, upon such minister and churchwardens becoming bound by a proper deed of covenant, that they and their successors should for ever after, out of the dividends, keep the dormitory of the testator's family and the monuments therein in good repair and condition, and well painted and cleansed; and that if from time to time there should be any surplus, it should be laid out in the purchase of bread, or other useful food, to be distributed among the industrious poor of the said parish, at their discretion, and that a memorial thereof should be hung up in a conspicuous part of the church." This sum of £333 6s. 8d. is now standing in the name of the trustees, and the dividends, amounting to £10 a year, are applied as directed by the testator.

Thomas Donald's Charity.—Mr. Thomas Donald, in 1845, left £450, the interest of which is distributed in coals and flour to the poor, under the direction of the trustees, the vicar, and churchwardens for the time being.

In this township there are a saw mill, a brewery, and several stone quarries.

Brayton is another manor in this township. It was given by Alan, second lord of Allerdale, to Ughtred, whose posterity assumed the name of Brayton, and resided here. From the inquiry above quoted we learn that, in 1578, William Bewly held Brayton by fealty only, sometime the lands of the Bishop of Carlisle, in free alms. It afterwards came into the possession of a younger branch of the Salkeld family, from whose co-heiresses it was purchased in the early part of the last century by an ancestor of its present possessor, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.

Brayton, the seat of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., is a fine mansion, occupying a pleasant situation, one and a half miles east-by-north of Aspatria, and seven miles south-west-by-south of Wigton.

Lawsons of Brayton.

This family deduces its descent from

JOHN LAWSON, who, in the first year of Henry III., was lord of Fawkesgrave, in Yorkshire; and from him, through a long line of eminent ancestors, descended

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, Knight, who married the widow of Thomas Lee, Esq., of Isell, in Cumberland, and thus acquired that estate. Sir Wilfrid died without children, and bequeathed his property to his nephew,

WILLIAM LAWSON, Esq., whose son and successor, WILFRID LAWSON, Esq., of Isell, was created a baronet by James II. Sir Wilfrid married Jane, daughter of Sir Edward Musgrave, Bart., of Hayton Castle, and had issue,

1. William, who married Milcha, daughter of Sir William Suckland, Bart., of Barton, in Yorkshire; and dying before his father, left (with two daughters):

WILFRID, successor to the baronetcy.

II. Wilfrid, of Brayton, married Sarah, daughter and coheir of — James, Esq., of Washington, in Durham; and left

1. GILFRID, 16th and 7th barones.

2. ALFRED,)

The baronet represented the county of Cumberland in the Restoration Parliament. He died in 1688, and was succeeded by his grandson,

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, 2nd baronet, M.P. for Cockermouth. This gentleman married Elizabeth, only daughter and heir of George Preston, Esq., of Holker, in Lancashire; and dying in 1704, was succeeded by his eldest son,

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, 3rd baronet, M.P. for Cockermouth, one of the groom of the bedchamber to George I. He married Elizabeth Lucy, daughter of the Hon. Henry Mordaunt, and niece of the Earl of Peterborough; and dying in 1737, was succeeded by his elder son,

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, 4th baronet, who died in infancy, and was succeeded by his brother,

SIR MORDAUNT LAWSON, 5th baronet, at whose decease, in minority (1743), the title and estate devolved upon his cousin, (reter to issue of Wilfrid, second son of 1st baronet)

SIR GILFRID LAWSON, 6th baronet, who was succeeded in 1749 by his brother,

SIR ALFRED LAWSON, 7th baronet. This gentleman died in 1752, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, 8th baronet, who was sheriff of Cumberland in 1756, and M.P. for the same county in 1761. He died without issue, the next year, and was succeeded by his brother,

SIR GILFRID LAWSON, 9th baronet. This gentleman married Amelia, daughter of John Lovett, Esq.; and dying about the year 1794, was succeeded by his son,

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, 10th baronet, who married Anne, daughter of John Hartley, Esq., of Whitehaven; but having no issue, the baronetcy expired at his decease in 1805, when the Lawson estates passed, by Sir Wilfrid's will, to the nephew of his wife,

THOMAS WYBERGH, Esq., second son of Thomas Wybergh Esq., of Clifton Hall, Westmoreland, by Isabella, daughter of John Hartley, Esq., and sister of Lady Lawson. Mr. Wybergh, upon inheriting those estates, assumed the surname and arms of Lawson. He died without issue, in 1812, and was succeeded by his brother, WILFRID WYBERGH, Esq., who thereupon likewise assumed the names and arms of Lawson. This gentleman, born 5th October, 1795, married 20th June, 1831, Caroline, third daughter of the late Sir James Graham, Bart., of Netherby, and has issue,

1. WILFRID, born 4th September, 1829.

II. Alfred, died 1834.

III. Gilfrid, born 26th December, 1833.

IV. William, born 24th August, 1836.

1. Caroline. II. Maria. III. Elizabeth. IV. Catherine.

Sir Wilfrid was created a baronet 15th September, 1831.

HAYTON AND MELAY.

This township contains 1,971 acres, and its rateable value is £1,865 14s. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 174; in 1811, 192; in 1821, 241; in 1831, 233; in 1841, 378; and in 1851, 461.

The manor of Hayton was granted by Alan, lord of Allerdale to his huntsman Seliff, whose posterity took the name of De Hayton. From the Haytons the manor was brought by marriage to the Mulcasters, one of whom, Robert de Mulcaster, married the daughter and heir of John de Hayton, the last of the name. It came into the possession of the Tilliol family in a similar manner, and having been held by them for eight descents, came to two sisters, coheirs, Isabel and Margaret, the former of whom becoming the wife of John Colville, had Hayton as her share; the latter married a Moresby. Isabel, wife of John Colville, had two sons, William and Robert. William Colville, the elder, succeeded his mother in her part of the Tilliol's lands, and died in 1480, without issue male, leaving two daughters coheirs, who, marrying two of the Musgraves, brought Hayton to that family. An inquisition taken in 1578 informs us that "William Musgrave, Esq., holdeth the manor of Hayton, sometimes the land of Peter Tilliol, and late the land of Anthony Colwel, by homage, fealtie, and suit of court from three weeks to three weeks, serjeants' food, and payeth for cornage, 4s. 6d.; seawake, 1s.; turnsilver, 3s. 10d.; and for fee-farm, astank, and turbarie, 20s.: in toto, 29s. 4d." Hayton continued to be held by the Musgraves till the death of Sir Richard Musgrave, the fifth baronet when it became the property of his daughter Eleanor, who married William Jolliffe, Esq., M.P., and from whom it has descended to its present possessor, Charles Jolliffe, Esq., the present lord of the manor.

The ancient mansion of Hayton Castle is now occupied as a farmhouse. It is said to have stood a long siege by the parliamentarians, and to have been rebuilt by Sir Richard Musgrave, after the restoration. Formerly there was a chapel of ease adjacent to the castle, which continued in use till the beginning of the present century, when it was suffered to fall into decay, and no trace of it can now be found. It appears from an Act 6th Edward I., that the Mulcaster family had in ancient times a market at Hayton on Tuesdays, and a fair for three days at the festival of St. Mary Magdalene. The principal landowners are Charles Jolliffe, Esq.; Sir James Musgrave, Bart.; Mrs. Dykes, William Paisley, William Thornburn, John Waite, John Atkinson, Thomas Beeby, Ann Blackburn, Joseph Hetherington, Joseph Wilson, John Dalzell, Michael Foster, Joseph Donald, Robert Beatty, Robert Nicholson, J. Jackson, and Mrs. Fearon. The tithes of the township were commuted in 1846. The great tithes for £260; the vicar's for £25; £16 a year was set aside for hay tithes.

The village of Hayton is about one and a half miles west of Aspatria. Here is an Independent Chapel, a small stone building, erected by subscription in 1844, and attended by the Aspatria minister. There is also a day and Sunday-school, which was built by subscription in 1849. It is supported by the quarter pence of the pupils, and has an average attendance of 25 children.

Melay, is a small hamlet in this township, near the sea.

Musgrave of Hayton.

This is a branch of the Musgraves of Eden Hall, springing from

NICHOLAS MUSGRAVE, Esq., third son of Sir John Musgrave, Knt, and his wife Joan, daughter and co-heir of Sir William de Stapleton, of Edenhall; which Nicholas married, in or about the time of Henry VI., Margaret, daughter and heiress of William Colville, Esq., of Hayton Castle, co. Cumberland, and thereby acquired that estate. He died in 1491, and was succeeded by his son,

THOMAS MUSGRAVE, Esq., of Hayton Castle, who married Elizabeth, daughter of Lord Daere, of Gilsland; and, dying in 1506, was succeeded by his son,

WILLIAM MUSGRAVE, Esq., of Hayton Castle. This gentleman married Isabel, daughter and co-heiress of James Marindale, Esq., of Newton in Cumberland, in whose right the manor of Newton came into the family. He died in 1532, and was succeeded by his son,

SIR EDWARD MUSGRAVE, knight, who married Catherine, daughter of Sir Thomas Penruddock of Exeter, and had a son, William. Sir Edward was lord-lieutenant and custos rotulorum of the county of Cumberland. He was also justice of oyer and terminer, and sat as judge at Carlisle. He died in 1597, and was succeeded by his son,

WILLIAM MUSGRAVE, Esq., of Hayton Castle, who married Catherine Sherburne, a co-heiress of the family of Sir Nicholas Sherburne, and was succeeded by his son,

EDWARD MUSGRAVE, Esq., of Hayton Castle, who was created a Baronet of Nova Scotia in 1638. Sir Edward married Mary, daughter of Sir Richard Graham, Bart., of Netherby, by whom he had three sons and four daughters. The baronet was a distinguished supporter of the royal cause, and was made colonel, by Charles I., of a regiment which he had raised and maintained at his own expense. To sustain, however, the heavy charge, he was necessitated to alienate estates of more than £2,000 a year. Sir Edward attended Charles II. at the Battle of Worcester, and when the prince's horse was shot under him, dismounted and supplied him with his own. After the defeat he fled into Scotland, and was protected by the Duke of Gordon, until Cromwell, finding him out, despatched a message to the duke, "That if he did not forthwith deliver up Ned Musgrave, that arch rebel, he would send a troop of horse and storm the castle." Sir Edward was then forced to fly to the Isle of Man, where he soon after died, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

SIR RICHARD, who married Dorothy, daughter of William James, Esq., of Washington, co. Durham, through whom the manor of Washington came into the family, and by whom he had (with daughters),

1. RICHARD, his successor.

11. William, a Hamburg merchant at Newcastle-on-Tyne, who died without issue.

111. James, in holy orders, rector of Grimsden, in Cambridgeshire; married Catherine, daughter of James Perrott, of Barnsley, and had a son,

The Rev. JAMES MUSGRAVE, of Chinnor, co. Oxford, who married Miss Huggins, and was father of JAMES, who inherited as eighth baronet, at the death of his kinsman, Sir Thomas, in 1812.

Sir Richard rebuilt from the ground Hayton Castle, which had suffered so much during the civil wars. He died in 1710, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

Sir RICHARD, M.P. for the county of Cumberland, temp. William III. and Queen Anne. He died in 1711, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

Sir RICHARD. This gentleman married Anne, sister of John Hylton, Esq., of Hylton Castle, co. Durham, and dying in 1739, left three sons, successive baronets. He was succeeded by the eldest,

Sir RICHARD, who assumed the surname of Hylton (his only daughter, Eleanor, married William Jolliffe, Esq., M.P.), and was succeeded in the baronetcy by his next brother,

Sir WILLIAM, who married Isabel, Countess Dowager of Carlisle, and daughter of William, Lord Byron, but had no issue. The title devolved upon his only surviving brother,

Sir THOMAS, who died without issue, December 31, 1812, when the baronetcy devolved upon his kinsman,

Sir JAMES (refer to the Rev. James Musgrave, son of the second baronet). This gentleman married, in 1781, Clarissa, daughter of — Blackall, Esq., and, dying April 27, 1814, left issue,

- i. JAMES, the present baronet.
- ii. William Augustus, in holy orders.
- iii. Thomas Henry, deceased.
- iv. Richard Adolphus, married Miss Lowther, and died leaving three daughters.
- v. John Knightley, deceased.

1. Georgiana, married in June, 1836, to Aubrey Wenham Wykeham, Esq., of Tythrop House, Oxon.

Sir James was succeeded by his son,

Sir JAMES MUSGRAVE, Bart., of Hayton; born May 24, 1785.

OUGHTEHSIDE AND ALLERBY.

The area of this township is 2,466 acres. It contained in 1801, 269 inhabitants; in 1811, 249; in 1821, 347; in 1831, 381; in 1841, 555; and in 1851, 662. The soil here is brown and gravelly, chiefly resting on red sandstone. The township is intersected by the Maryport and Carlisle railway. The commons were enclosed in 1816. There is only one coal-mine in this township in operation at present (1858); it is worked by J. Harris, Esq., of Greysouthen. The depth of the shaft is about seventy fathoms. The population is much scattered over the township—the farm buildings being at the extreme ends and centre—and the mining part of the population generally live in a few cottages built near the different coal pits, with part in the village.

The manor of Oughterside, Outerby, or Uchtreddy, took its name from Uchtreht, to whom it was granted by Alan, second lord of Allerdale. From the inquisition taken in 1578, we learn the following particulars of Oughterside:—Anthony Barwis, Esq., holdeth certain lands and tenements in Ulterside, late the lands of Edward Musgrave, and sometime the lands of William Stapleton, by homage, fealty and suit of court, cornage, seawake, and serjeant's food, and payeth yearly 4d. William Orphewre holdeth certain lands and tenements at Ulterside, late the lands of William English, by like services, and renders 2d. William Osmotherley holdeth, at Ulterside aforesaid, certain lands and tenements, late the lands of William Coulterd, by like service, and renders per annum 2d. The tenants of Ulterside pay yearly amongst themselves, for cornage, 4s. 6d.; for seawake, 7d.; for turnsilver, 1s. 3d.; in toto, 6s. 4d. It was for several generations in the Orfeur family, from whom it was purchased by the Lawsons, and is now held by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.

There is an old building at Oughterside called the Old Hall, which is supposed to have been a place of consequence, and upwards of seventy years ago a road four yards broad, supposed to be Roman, was discovered leading from Oughterside to Allerby. In a letter on the old church of Aspatria, published in the Cumberland Packet, June 24th, 1844, Dr. Wilkinson, of Aspatria, says, "It is stated that Alan de Hornecastle was the first incumbent of Aspatria, in 1309; that upwards of a century ago, at the east end of the church, a stone coffin was found, on the lid of which, composed of solid stone, was inscribed "Hic Jacet Bartholomeus de Uchtersat." This tomb is supposed to have appertained to an ecclesiastic, and, by the character, appears to have been of much greater antiquity than 1309. It is believed that the said Bartholomeus de Uchtersat resided at the Old Hall in Oughterside. The stone lid of the coffin is now placed in the east wall of the churchyard, near the vicarage house." Some traces of a Roman road leading towards Ellenborough have been found in this township.

The manor of Allerby, or Alwardby, so called from Alward, the first recorded proprietor, gave name to the family of Allerby, whose heiress brought it in marriage to the family of Porter, one of whom, William Porter, in 1543, held it of the king in capite, rendering for the same, yearly, 3d. cornage, and 8d. seawake, with other services due and accustomed. In 1578, Thomas Porter and Elizabeth, his wife, held the manor of Crosby and Allerby, "sometime the lands of John Derwentwater, and late the lands of William Porter, father of the said Thomas, by homage, cornage, serjeant's food, seawake, and turnsilver, rendering per annum 11s. 8d." The last of the Porters having no child, made his wife joint tenant with himself, and she, surviving, afterwards married a younger brother of the Eaglesfields, in whose family it continued for several generations. It was purchased of their descendant, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, by Richard Lamplugh, Esq., of Dovenby, but is now the property of several freeholders.

The principal landowners of the township are F. L. B. Dykes, Esq.; Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Messrs. John Todd, Joseph Hayton, Wilfrid Hind, Joseph Simm, Matthew Wilson, James Elliott, John Shaw, William Thompson; Mrs. Sealy, Mrs. Nicholson, the Earl of Lonsdale, and General Wyndham. The commons were enclosed about the year 1824.

The village of Oughterside is situated on the north side of the river Ellen, one and a half miles west-south-west of Aspatia. Here is a school erected by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., which serves as a Sunday-school and place of worship for the Independents.

The village of Allerby is about four miles east-north-east of Maryport, and is said to have been the birth-place of Robert Eaglesfield, founder of Queen's College, Oxford.

BOLTON PARISH.

THIS parish is bounded by Thornthwaite Close Beck, from its source to where it falls into the Waver, up the Waver to Little Gill above Blatwaite on the west side of the Waver, and to the head of the gill, then north-west to the Crummock, up the Crummock southwards to Priestcroft, thence south-west to Mealsgate, thence along Dowbeck to Whitehall Park Wall, thence along the Cockermouth road to Cockbridge, thence up the Ellen to Ireby Bridge End, up Birkby Beck by Aughtertree to its source, turning east thence to Thorny Stone, and so to the top of Sandale, running north on the tops of the hills to Thornthwaite. The parish award, and the maps made on the commutation of tithes, are kept at the rectory. The parish comprises the townships of Bolton Highside and Bolton Lowside, the inhabitants of which are principally located in the several hamlets of Bolton-gate, Mealsgate, Sandale, Bolton Lowhouses, Bolton Newhouses, and Bolton Wood Lane, with a few scattered houses. The occupation of the inhabitants is principally agriculture and mining—there is at present only one coal-mine working. Wigton, Keswick, and Cockermouth are the markets attended. The old Roman road, from Ellenborough to Old Carlisle, must have gone through one corner of the parish.

BOLTON HIGHSIDE.

The area of this township is 3,875 acres, and its rateable value £2,477. The population in 1801 was 232; in 1811, 307; in 1821, 321; in 1831, 352; in 1841, 312; and in 1851, 365.

The manor of Bolton was given by Alan, lord of Allerdale, to Gospatrick, his bastard brother, whose posterity assumed the name of Bassanthwaite, from whose family it passed to the Lascelles, one of whom, Thomas de Lascelles, was lord of Bolton in the reign of Henry III. He married Christian, daughter of William de Ireby, and confirmed to the abbot and monks of Holme Cultram, the hermitage of St. Hilda, and granted them commons in Bolton. His widow, Christian de Ireby, afterwards married Robert Bruce, and died in 1305, seised of Heselspring in Westward, Gamelsby and Unthank-beyond-Eden, and of Market Ireby, which latter place she held of John Boyvill, lord of Thursby. It subsequently became the property of the Moubays, by one of whom, Geoffrey de Moubray, it was forfeited, in consequence of his taking part with the Scots, 28 Edward I., but was restored three years later to his son John, who had returned to his allegiance, and done fealty to the king. From the Moubays it passed to the Nevilles, from whom it descended through the Percys to the Earl of Egremont, and is now held by General Wyndham, whose tenants here are mostly customary, paying rents, heriots, and a tenpenny fine; but a few of the farms have been enfranchised. The principal landowners, in addition to the lord of the manor, are Miss Scott; G. Moore, Esq.; N. Tardiff, Esq.; John Watson, Esq.; W. Addison, Esq.; Dr. James Cowan; J. Harris, Esq.; Messrs. Thomas Robinson, Isaac Scott, Thomas Cape, and Joseph Barnes.

Bolton Gate village is about six miles south-by-west of Wigton, where the church is situated.

THE CHURCH.

The church is an ancient cruciform structure, dedicated to All Saints, with a stone arched roof, and is traditionally said to have been built in one night by the imps at the command of the wizard Michael Scott. The benefice is a rectory, valued in the King's Book at £19 18s. 4d., and now worth about £450. The advowson of the rectory was annexed to the manor till about the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when it came into the possession of the Porters, of Weary Hall, to whom it belonged for many years. It was afterwards in the Thomsons, of Kellam, in Yorkshire, and is now vested in the Earl of Lonsdale. The tithes were commuted in 1844 for £337 11s. 4d., viz. £220 4s. 4d.

for Highside, and £217 7s. for Lowside township. The parish register extends from 1611 to the present time, but is much defaced, &c.

There is a parsonage house.

The Quakers and Methodists have meeting houses in the parish, both situated at Low Houses.

The National School was erected in 1854, at a cost of about £600. It is under government inspection, and is supported by voluntary subscriptions; average attendance, about fifty. The schoolroom is licensed for worship on Sunday afternoons.

CHARITY.

Scott's Charity.—By a terrier of this parish, dated 18th November, 1749, it is stated that "there is the sum of 12s. a year paid out of a close, containing by computation an acre, and called the Great Paddock, in the hands of the heirs of John Scott, which sum is paid to the churchwardens and then given to the poor." To this statement is added, apparently in the writing of the rector, "This benefaction is said to have been left by one of the Porters of Weary Hall." An old inhabitant stated to the charity commissioners, that he heard this charity was left by one Thomas Scott, for twelve poor widows. The sum of 12s. is paid every Easter for a field in the possession of Dr. Cowan, to the churchwardens, and is by them distributed to poor widows.

BOLTON LOWSIDE.

The population of this township in 1801 was 463; in 1811, 668; in 1821, 802; in 1831, 893; in 1841, 899; and in 1851, 766. The area is 4,570 acres, and rateable value £3,818. This township includes the hamlets of Bolton Wood, Newland, Thornthwaite Close, Low Houses, and Mealsgate; and a colliery, distant from three to four miles south of Wigton. The principal landowners are John Watson, Esq.; John Harris, Esq.; John Stead, Esq.; John Cowan, Esq.; Sir H. F. Vane, Bart.; Messrs. George Moore, Thomas Moore, John Goutch, John Wilson, Nathan Tordiff, John Dixon, William Addison, the trustees of the late Joseph Todd, William H. Charlton, Esq., Joseph Hodgson, and Jonathan Welsh.

Weary Hall, the ancient seat of the Porters, is in this township, and was the birth-place of George Porter, an eminent civilian, and thirty years doctor and professor of civil law, at Queen's College, Cambridge. He died about the year 1630. The hall is now a farm house, the property of John Harris, Esq., of Greysouthen.

Bolton park, the seat of John Watson, Esq., is a beautiful mansion erected about eighteen years ago, and commands varied and extensive prospects of the surrounding country.

Mr. Denton speaks of Newbiggin, in Bolton, as the seat of Mr. John Relfe, deputy-clerk of the House of Lords. The manor of Newbiggin, which belonged to the prior and convent of Carlisle, is now vested in the dean and chapter. There was formerly a manor of Newland in this parish, belonging to the Mulcaster family, by whom it was conveyed to the Herclas; it was forfeited to the crown on the attainder of Andrew de Hercla, earl of Carlisle, in 1322.

Bolton colliery was opened in 1855, is the property of General Wyndham, and worked by Mr. William Addison, of Bolton Wood. It possesses one engine-shaft whose perpendicular depth is thirty-four fathoms. The seam worked is about nine feet thick, and affords employment to about fifty persons.

BROMFIELD PARISH.

THE parish of Bromfield is bounded on the north by the parish of Holme Cultram, on the west by the new district parish of West Newton, on the south by the parishes of Allhallowes and Aspatria, and on the east by Wigton. It comprises the townships of Bromfield, Crookdale and Seales, Blencogo, Dundraw and Kelswick, and Langrigg, part of the township of Langrigg and Medrigg. The inhabitants are cleanly and orderly in their habits of life, and are chiefly engaged in agriculture—they attend the markets held at Wigton. The Maryport and Carlisle railway intersects the southern portion of the parish. The soil here is varied but fruitful, and the pasturage is very rich. An act for the enclosure of the parish was passed in 1812.

BROMFIELD.

The area of Bromfield township, inclusive of that of Langrigg and Mearlrigg, is 8,270 acres, and its rateable value is £2,237 3s. 4d. The population in 1801 was 297; in 1811, 297; in 1821, 363; in 1831, 405; in 1841, 364; and in 1851, 359.

The manor of Bromfield was granted by Waltheof, first lord of Allerdale, to Melbeth, his physician, whose posterity assumed the name of De Bromfield. But the patronage of the church was not given at the same time, being reserved out of the grant and given to the abbey of St. Mary at York. "The said abbey," say Nicolson and Burn, "had also lands at Bromfield, as likewise had the abbey of Holme Cultram; and by the general term manor being applied to them both, it is difficult to ascertain their separate possessions. Soon after the foundation of the abbey of Holme Cultram, Adam, son of Thomas de Brunfeld granted to the same abbey, the manor of Brunfield, by the boundaries in the grant specified. After this grant, Thomas de Brunfeld, the said Adam's father, grants to the monks of Holme Cultram the cultivated lands in Brunfield called Northrig, with the marsh on the east part thereof; and Henry, son of the said Thomas, granted to the said monks two acres of land lying within one of their enclosures, for one mark of silver, which they gave unto him for the same; and Walter, son of Benedict, the priest, quit claim to the monks of all his right and claim of common of pasture in the marsh which Adam and Thomas de Brunfeld gave to the said monks. Agnes, daughter of William White, of Brunfeld, carpenter, gave to the said monks five acres of arable land, and one acre of meadow in the territory of Brunfeld, which grant Thomas de Brunfeld confirmed; and Alan, son of Henry de Brunfeld, quitted claim of all his right therein. In the 20th Edward I. (1291-2) Hugh, son of Alan de Brunfeld, having a controversy with the said monks concerning common of pasture upon the aforesaid marsh, an agreement was made and a limitation prescribed within what places and at what times each of them respectively might depasture their cattle without the interruption of the other. And there was a like agreement in the same year, between the said monks and Ralph de Osmunderlaw, and Agnes, his wife, and Thomas de Laithes, and Alice, his wife, concerning the said marsh." After the suppression of the religious houses by Henry VIII. we find that in 1543, William Hutton held Bromfield of the king as his manor of Papcastle, rendering for the same 18s. 4d. cornage, 10d. seawake, 6d. free rent, puture of the sergeants, and witnessman. On the 15th July in the same year, Henry granted to Thomas

Dalston, Esq., amongst other particulars, one tenement in Bromfield with the appurtenances in the tenure of John Scurre, and another tenement, with its appurtenances, in the tenure of William Scurre, late parcel of the possessions of the abbey of Holme Cultram, paying for the same to the king yearly at the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, the sum of 3s. 3½d. Edward VI., by letters patent dated 25th August, 1547, "in consideration that Henry Thompson had surrendered into the hands of Henry VIII. all the right and interest which he had in the late hospital, commonly called Maison Dieu of Dover, in the county of Kent, grants to the said Henry Thompson, in et alia, the whole manor of Bromfield, and the rectory and church of Bromfield, with the appurtenances in the county of Cumberland, late belonging to the monastery of the Blessed Mary, nigh the walls of York; and all, and singular granges, mills, messuages, houses, buildings, tofts, cottages, lands, tenements, meadows, pastures, feedings, commons, wastes, moors, mosses, turbary, woods, underwoods, waters, fisheries, pensions, procurations, tithes, oblations and obventions, rents, reversions, services, knights' fees, wardships, marriages, escheats, reliefs, fines, amerciements, heriots, courts leet, view of frank pledge, waifs, estrays, goods of felons and fugitives, freewarrens, and all other rights, jurisdictions, liberties, franchises, privileges, profits, commodities, emoluments, possessions, and hereditaments, whatsoever, with the appurtenances, situate, lying and being in Brumfield aforesaid, to the said manor of Brumfield and to the said rectory of Brumfield, or to either of them in everywise belonging or appertaining; and all other messuages, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, services, and other possessions and hereditaments, whatsoever in Brumfield aforesaid, to the said late monastery belonging; which premises are extended at the clear yearly value of £34. To hold of the king in capite by the fortieth part of one knight's fee, and rendering for the same yearly to the king, his heirs, and successors, £3 8s." From an inquisition taken in 1578, we learn that Thomas Hutton de Forrest, Esq., held the manor of Bromfield, "late the lands of Ambrose Crackenthorp, and sometimes the land of Fewler by homage, fealty and suit of court, paying for homage 18s., seawake 10d., turnsilver 2s. 6d. with sergeants' food, and witnessman, and for free rent 9d., in toto 22s. 2d." The above possessions came afterwards into many hands, but the greater part appears to have been held by the Porters of Weary Hall, who enfranchised most of the lands. The manor and demesne of Bromfield passed by successive sales to the families of Osmotherley and Barwis, and are now the property of William Barwis, Esq., of Langrigg Hall, who has also the manor of Lower Scales. The demesne of Scales was sold by the Porters, to Sir John Ballantine, whose heiress brought it to the Dykes family; it is now the property of Mrs. Dykes of Doverby. General Wyndham has also some manorial rights in the township. The landowners are General Wyndham; John Reay, Esq.; F. L. B. Dykes, Esq.; Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.; John Todd, Esq.; Mrs. Clark, John Ritson, William Mawson, John Beatty, John Longcake, John Asbridge, Joseph Smallwood, William Barnes, Robert Peat, Mrs. Hewitson, Robert Bragg, and Wilson Briggs.

Some curious old coins were found on Gill Moor Common, at the time of its enclosure, in 1815. Watill Moor on this common, as well as many other places in this parish, having a good view towards Scotland, served formerly as stations from which a look-out might be kept during the times of border warfare, and many estates in this, and the adjoining parishes, paid for blowing the horn, to give alarm, in case of the approach of an enemy. The levy of this "Out Horn Money" as it was called, ceased to be collected soon after the union of England and Scotland; an attempt was however made within the last half century to renew it, which, of course, proved unsuccessful.

The village of Bromfield is situated about the centre of the parish, five and a half miles west-by-south of Wigton.

THE CHURCH.

Bromfield church is dedicated to St. Mungo, or Kentigern. It is an ancient edifice, consisting of nave, chancel, and north aisles. On the south side of the chancel, forming a kind of transept, is a small chapel, the burial place of the Jolliffes and Pearsons. There was a similar chapel on the north side belonging to Crookdake Hall, but it has been removed. In 1751 the chancel was somewhat restored, when an east window was given by the late Joshua Watson, Esq., of Hapton, a native of the parish. At the same time Oliver Thomlinson Windowe, Esq., then lord of the manor of Blencogo, placed a memorial window in the south of the chancel to a member of the Thomlinson family. The window has two compartments, containing representations of the Adoration of the Shepherds, and the Ascension. John Reay, Esq., of the Gill, also caused a small window to be inserted in the north of the chancel. There is a very ancient cross in the churchyard, near to which is a famous spring called St. Mungo's well. The church of Bromfield was appropriated, as we have seen above, at a very early period, to the abbey of St. Mary at York; the patronage of the vicarage was at the same time vested in the Bishop of Carlisle. Before the Reformation, there was a chantry of St. George at Bromfield, endowed with lands of considerable value. The living is valued in the King's Book at £22, and was certified to the commissioners as of the annual value of £270, but it is now worth about £800 per annum. The great tithes of the parish, except those of Blencogo, are merged in the land,—part of them being purchased by the landowners about ninety years ago, and the remainder exonerated at the enclosure of the commons. The rectorial tithes of Blencogo belonging to the vicar, who keeps the chancel in repair, were commuted about fifteen years for a rent-charge of £139 per annum. The parish register commences in 1654.

CHARITY.

Bromfield School was endowed by Richard Osmotherly, who, by his will, dated 7th May, 1612, gave to the minister and churchwardens of the parish church of Bromfield, £10 yearly, issuing out of his freehold lands and tenements being in or near Aldersgate, in the parish of St. Botolph, in the city of London, after the decease of his wife, upon condition that they should find and provide a sufficient schoolmaster to teach fifteen poor men's children inhabiting within the towns of Langrigg and Bromfield, two to be nominated by the inhabitants of Langrigg Hall, whosoever they should be, seven more out of Langrigg, and six out of Bromfield; the schoolmaster to be chosen and appointed by the mutual consent of the inhabitants of Langrigg and Bromfield. The testator afterwards devised all the rents and profits issuing out of his freehold lands and tenements in the parish of St. Botolph, unto the master, wardens, and assistants of the Company of Merchant Tailors, London, to hold the same after the decease of his wife, upon condition that they should justly pay the annuities in the will mentioned. In a terrier of this parish, dated 8th October, 1749, it is stated that the school was "endowed by a dwelling-house built by the Rev. Dr. Thomlinson, prebendary of St. Paul's, London, about the year 1741;" and that it was also possessed of £64, then in the hands of the sidesmen of Bromfield, for which they paid interest yearly. It is not known how the school stock of £64 arose; but it was afterwards laid out in land, as appears by a deed dated 23rd November, 1750, whereby certain premises in Blencogo were conveyed to Thomas Robinson in fee, who, by indenture of the same date, reciting the above deed, declared that £64, part of the consideration, was the proper money belonging to the school stock, and that £10 belonged to the poor stock of Bromfield; and that the schoolmaster should enjoy the premises on condition that he paid five shillings yearly to the poor of the parish of Bromfield as interest for the said ten pounds, to be distributed by the discretion of the vestry and churchwardens. This land consists of about four acres and a half, which is let at about £7 a year. By indenture dated 31st May, 1751, about two acres and a half of land in the township of Bromfield, were purchased for the sum of £45 7s., which premises by indenture of the same date was declared to have been purchased by money belonging to the school stock of the free school of Bromfield, and for the use of the master of the said free school, and his successors for ever. It is not known from what source this money arose. The land in Bromfield is occupied by the schoolmaster, and is worth about four pounds a year. On the enclosure of Aspatia East Common, an allotment of not quite two roods was given to the school and to the land belonging to the school in Bromfield. The allotment is a mile and a half from the school. Mr. Thomas Thomlinson, by will dated 16th April, 1798, left a share of the residue of his personal property to this school. The money received from this bequest was £354, with which land was purchased. The endowment amounts now to about £43 a year, besides a house for the master; a schoolmistress to teach sewing, &c., is paid for by subscription. The building in which the school business is transacted is a poor one, being very old, and far from adequate to the purposes to which it is devoted, although enlarged a few years ago by John Reay, Esq., of The Gill. There are about eighty scholars.

There is a very good parochial library, established in 1853. It comprises about 1,000 volumes, and is open to all the parishioners at an annual subscription of one shilling.

Crookdake is a hamlet in Bromfield township, about five and a half miles west-south-west of Wigton. The manorial rights of the ancient land belong to Mrs. Dykes, and those of the pasture and common to General Wyndham. The manor of Crookdake was, at an early period, held by the Lowther family, of whom it was purchased, in the reign of Edward IV., by the Musgraves, a younger branch of whom had their seat here at Crookdake Hall, now a farmhouse, bearing marks of great antiquity. One of the co-heiresses of the Musgraves brought it to Sir John Ballantine. This family, after two or three generations, ended in daughters, one of whom married Lawson Dykes, from whom it has descended to Mrs. Dykes, the present proprietor. In Bromfield Church there is an inscription to the memory of Adam de Crookdake. It is in black letter, evidently modern, but most probably copied from one of older date:—

"Here lieth entomb'd, I dare undertake,
The worthy warrior, Adam of Crookdake,
Knight, 1511."¹

Mr. Boucher, who drew up the account of this parish for Hutchinson's History of Cumberland, supposes this person to have been the grandfather of Cuthbert Musgrave, who held the manor of Crookdake in the reign of Henry VIII., but there is no mention of Sir Adam Musgrave in the pedigrees of that family. There is a corn-mill at Crookdake, and another (new mill) near Leegate station.

Scales is another hamlet of dispersed houses, called High and Low Scales, in this township, on the west side of Crummock Beck, one mile south of Bromfield, and four and a half miles west-by-south of Wigton. It is the property of John Reay, Esq., of The Gill, who possesses the manorial rights of his own property. The estate of The Gill has been upwards of 600 years in the family of Ray, or Reay, and tradition says that it has been handed down from father to son, and confirmed by old papers dating from the year 1210. These lands, then very extensive, were bestowed by the celebrated monarch William the Lion, king of Scotland (who died in 1214, after an eventful reign of nearly half a century, during which time Cumberland remained attached to the Scottish crown), upon his friend and companion, both in the wars and in the chase, the ancestor of the Reay family, as a reward for his fidelity to his sovereign, for unparalleled swiftness of foot in hunting the deer in those days, whence the name appears to have been derived, for in the old Saxon vulgar tongue ra, or raa, signifies a roe; the crest of the family, a stag, and the motto, "in omnia promptus," appear to be derived from the same source. The conditions of the grant were the payment of a peppercorn annually, as an acknowledgment; and also that the name of William (after the king) should be perpetuated through the eldest son, in memory of the royal donor. These conditions were duly observed up to the three last generations, when, after due consultation with eminent lawyers, the eldest son was called John. Up to the present time some of the family have always resided upon the estate. William Rea, or Reay, great-grandson of the ancestor above-mentioned, was papal legate and bishop of Glasgow; he built, at his own cost, the bridge over the Clyde at Glasgow, in 1315. He appears, by various documents in the Scots' College at Paris, and the Writers' Library in Glasgow, to have obtained from King David II. of Scotland, the royal charter by which Glasgow was created a borough, and to have acted as royal commissioner in a treaty of peace with England, as appears by his name being attached thereto. John Reay, or Ray, the celebrated naturalist, was another member of this family; he was the author of several works on the Creation, and during his rambles over Alston Moor and the romantic parts of the county, imbibed that knowledge of natural history for which he was so eminently distinguished. John Reay, who was high-sheriff of London and Middlesex in the eventful years 1814 and 1815, was also of this family.

BLENCOGO.

The township of Blencogo comprises an area of 1,697 acres, and its rateable value is £1,514 10s. 9d. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 167; in 1811, 185; in 1821, 216; in 1831, 226; in 1841, 211; and in 1851, 220. This township has been surveyed, and the map deposited with the clergyman of the parish; it was enclosed by agreement signed 1826. The great tithes of Blencogo are received by the vicar of Bromfield, who keeps the chancel of the parish church in repair.

The manor of Blencogo was given by Waltheof, first lord of Allerdale, to Odard de Logis, together with Wigton, Kirkbride, Ulton, Waverton, and Dundraw, and continued to be held by the posterity of Odard for several generations. We have no further account of this manor till the reign of Henry VII., who, by letters patent, dated 1st of May, 1508, granted to Richard Cholmley, Knt., the manor of Blencogo, "with the appurtenances, and all lands and tenements called Blencogo, within the parish of Bromfield, with all and all manner of commons, courts leet, and view of frankpledge, free warren, and other liberties whatsoever to the said manor and other the premises belonging or in anywise appertaining, to hold of him and his heirs by fealty only, without other account to be made thereof." In the account of knights' fees in Cumberland, in 1543, we find that Richard Cholmley, Knt., then held the manor and town of Blencogo of the king, as of his manor of Wigton, by the service of one knight's fee, 13s. cornage, 7s. 6d. for puture of the bailiff, 2s. sea-wake, and witnessman, and suit of court at Wigton from three weeks to three weeks, and 50s. relief when it shall happen. From an inquisition taken in 1578, we learn that Anthony Barwis held of the Earl of Northumberland, of the barony of Wigton, the town or manor of Blencogo, by knights' service, cornage, puture, suits, and witnessman; rendering per annum for cornage, 13s. 4d.; for puture, suit of court, &c., 6s. 8d.; and seawake, 2s. These charges appear to have been paid by the tenants, for the same inquisition informs us that "the tenants of the town of Blencogo pay yearly to the lord for cornage 13s. 4d., seawake 1s. 6d., and for turn-silver 7s. 6d.; in toto, per annum, 22s. 4d." Queen Elizabeth, by letters patent dated March 22nd, 1589, granted to Walter Copinger and Thomas Butler, of London, gentlemen, inter alia, the manor of Blencogo, with its appurtenances, and all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, called or known by the name of Blencogo, heretofore in the tenure of Richard Cholmley, Knt., to hold to them and their heirs for ever, as of the manor of East Greenwich, by fealty only, and not in capite. The Messrs. Lysons think it probable that these gentlemen were trustees for the Barwis family, to whom it was conveyed by them. On the 26th June, 1634, Richard Barwis, Esq., of Isle Kirk, lord of the manor of Blencogo, granted to the tenants, eighteen in number, for forty years ancient rent, "that they shall hold to them, and their heirs and assigns, customary estates of inheritance, paying the ancient yearly rent, and two years' ancient rent (and no other fine) after change of lord by death, and change of tenant by death and alienation, doing suit of court as before. Every alienation to be entered at the next court, paying for the entry 12d., and no more. He grants to them also all trees, woods, and underwoods, on their respective tenements, with power to get freestone and limestone in their several grounds, or in any waste ground within the town fields or commons, for their own use, but not to give or sell the same to any other." The Thomlinsons purchased this manor about the latter end of the seventeenth century. It is now the property of Mrs. George Reay and her sister, Miss Windowe, whose mother was one of the Thomlinsons of Blencogo. The principal landowners are George Dixon, Esq.; the trustees of the late Oliver T. Windowe; Messrs. Thomas Tuttle, Jeremiah Skelton, W. W. Parkinson, Thomas H. Jackson, John Barnes, William Parkin, George Wilkinson, John Foster, Thomas Wood, John Rickerby; Mrs. Jackson, and Mrs. Parrot.

Nicolson and Burn, quoting the register of Holme Cultram, inform us that "Galiene, daughter of Richard de Hervi, gave to the abbey of Holme Cultram three acres of arable land in the territory of Blencoggon, and pasture for one hundred sheep, twenty-eight cows, one bull, and two horses, for the maintenance of the infirm poor; and Marjoria, daughter of Galiene, gave to the said abbey of Holme Cultram two bovates of land in Blencoggon, unto which her son Robert quitted claim. And Adam, son of Dolphin de Langrigg, gave half an acre of arable land to the said abbey, in the territory of Blencoggon. And Henry VIII., by letters patent bearing date July the 9th, in the 37th year of his reign (1545), granted to Thomas Dalston, Esq., and Eleanor, his wife, inter alia, the messuages and tenements, and all the lands, meadows, pastures, and other hereditaments whatsoever, with the appurtenances, in the several tenures of Christopher Martindale, Richard Howe, and John Messenger, in Blencogo, late parcel of the possessions of the abbot and convent of Holme Cultram."

The village of Blencogo is four miles west-by-south of Wigton.

An excellent school, in the Early English style, was built at Blencogo in the year 1854, at a cost of about £600, by George Dixon, Esq., of Carlisle, who has a country residence here. The school, which is under government inspection, is carried on at the sole expense of Mr. Dixon. It is conducted by a certificated master, with an assistant mistress, and is attended by about seventy children. There will probably be a pupil-teacher in the course of the present year (1858).

Blencogo Hall, formerly the residence of the Thomlinsons, now a farmhouse, is the property of Mrs. George Reay. There is a good residence here belonging to George Dixon, Esq., above-mentioned; it was erected by the Rev. Jonathan Boucher, whose daughter is now Mrs. Dixon.

The Rev. Jonathan Boucher, a divine, a political writer, a general scholar, an English philologist of the last century, and the writer of the best portions of Hutchinson's History of Cumberland, was a native of Blencogo, being born here in 1737. He died at Epsom in 1804. A biographical notice of him will be found in the English Cyclopædia, vol. i., p. 851.

DUNDRAW.

Dundraw township contains 2,883 statute acres, and its rateable value is £2,542 5s. 6d. In 1801 it contained 198 inhabitants; in 1811, 236; in 1821, 316; in 1831, 337; in 1841, 329; and in 1851, 332. The soil in this township is a deep strong loam, in a high state of cultivation. Dundraw has been surveyed, and the map deposited with the clergyman of the parish.

As we have seen, when speaking of Blencogo, Dundraw manor was given by Waltheof to Odard de Logis.

who in his turn gave it to Gilbert his son, who, assuming the local name, styled himself Gilbert de Dundraw. This Gilbert was succeeded by his son, also of the same name; and after him, according to Denton, there was a Simon de Dundraw, who lived in 1233 or 1233; but we have no evidence that the latter held the manor, for the four daughters and co-heirs of the second Gilbert de Dundraw inherited his lands in Dundraw, Crofton, Thackthwaite, and Distington. These daughters were Ciceley, the wife of Jordan Clopell, who gave her part by fine to William Cundall, in whose right succeeded Ralph Cundall; Matilda, the wife of William Multon, who gave her part of Distington to Thomas, son of Lambert de Multon, lord of Egremont, and her part of Thackthwaite to Thomas Lucy, the son of Alice and of Alan Multon; Isold, the wife of Adam de Timmouth, who sold her part of Thackthwaite to Thomas Lucy, and of Distington to Thomas, son of Lambert de Multon; and Ada, the wife of Stephen de Crofton, whose part descended by the Croftons till the time of Henry IV., when it came to the Briscos, who still enjoy the same in Dundraw and Crofton; and she gave her part in Distington to Thomas Moresby and Margaret his wife and to the heirs of Thomas; and her part of Thackthwaite to Margaret, sister of Thomas Lucy, and wife of Thomas Stanley. In 1543, Robert Lamplugh held a moiety of the town of Dundraw of the king as of his manor of Wigton, by knights' service, rendering for the same 6s. 8d. cornage, 10d. seawake, puture of the sergeants, witnessman, and suit of court from three weeks to three weeks; and Robert Brisco held the other half by like services. In April, 1578, "John Brisco, Francis Lamplugh, and Anthony Barwis, Esqs., held the town and manor of Dundraw, saving certain of the lord's land there, and certain lands holden there by William Osmotherley and John Blennerhasset, as after appeareth, by knights' service, cornage, seawake, puture, suit of court, rendering per annum for cornage 6s. 8d., seawake 6d. ut supra. William Osmotherley holdeth a tenement there called Whayrigg Hall, by knights' service, the part of a knight's fee, homage, fealty, and suit of court, and rendereth per annum. John Blennerhasset holdeth a hamlet there called Kell Sike, sometime the land of William Martindale, by knights' service, homage, fealty, suit of court, seawake, and witnessman, and renders per annum two geese and 3d." The same MS. further informs us that "the tenants of the town of Dundraw pay yearly to the lord for cornage, 13s. 4d., seawake, 2s., and turnsilver, 7s. 6d.; in toto per annum 22s. 10d." According to the register of the abbey of Holme Cultram, quoted by Nicolson and Burn, in their account of this manor, Roger de Lyndey gave with his body seven acres of arable land in the territory of Dundraw to the abbey of Holme Cultram, under the yearly rent of 2s. 4d. to the lord of Dundraw for all services. Dundraw and the two neighbouring hamlets of Wheyrigg and Moor-row are now the property of Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart. When this township was enclosed by act of parliament in 1813, the Earl of Egremont claimed the royalties of this manor as parcel of his barony of Wigton. The principal landowners are Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; Messrs. John Barnes, John Watson, Rev. Thomas Dand, William Lightfoot, John Jefferson, John Barnes, John Timperon, John Wood, William Ross, William Messenger, Joseph Nelson, Thomas Messenger, George Rigg, George Wilkinson, John Collinson; Mrs. Ross, Mrs. Ritson, Mrs. Wood, and the Misses Pearson.

The village of Dundraw is situated about three miles west of Wigton. Besides Dundraw, the township comprises the hamlets of Kelswick, or Kelsick, formerly Kelsyke, four miles west-by-north; Moor-row, three miles west; Wayrigg, or Wheyrigg, four miles west; and Waverbridge, two miles west of Wigton. Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart., holds his manor courts at Wayrigg.

LANGRIGG AND MEALRIGG.

The area of this township is returned with that of Bromfield; its rateable value is £1,951 4s. 3½d. The population in 1801 was 198; in 1811, 212; in 1821, 194; in 1831, 269; in 1841, 262; and in 1851, 281. The township was enclosed by the act for enclosing Aspatia Common, 53 George III.

The manor of Langrigg, which was anciently demesne of Allerdale, was given by Waltheof, lord of the barony, to Dolphin, son of Aylward, with Applethwaite and Brigham, whose posterity possessed it for some descents, but the family became extinct in the time of Henry III. It was afterwards held by a family bearing the local name. In 1281, Agnes, wife of Gilbert de Langrigg, demanded against John Crookdake, twenty-five acres of land, fifteen acres of meadow, and 2s. 5d. rent there; and against Thomas de Langrigg, thirty acres of land and fourteen acres of meadow. From the registers of the abbey of Holme Cultram, we find Agnes, wife of Ralph de Osmunderley, and Alice, wife of Thomas de Laithes, daughters and heirs of Thomas de Langrigg. In the year 1365, John de Bromfield and Thomas de Lowther held lands in Langrigg, rendering for the same 6s. 8d. cornage, and 7d. seawake, being of the yearly value of £5. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the Porters were possessed of the manor, and the Osmunderleys, or Osmotherleys, of the demesne. It appears that the latter had then been a considerable time in possession. William Osmunderley, of Langrigg, was sheriff of Cumberland in the reign of Henry IV., and in the preceding reign the same person, or a person of the same name, was one of the knights of the shire. From an inquisition taken in 1578, we learn that the freeholders at that period were as follow:—"Thomas Hulton, Esq., in the right of his wife holdeth certain lands in Langrigg, late Christopher Martindale, by homage, fealty, suit of court, from three weeks to three weeks, and rendereth. William Osmotherley, gent., holdeth certain lands at Langrigg aforesaid, late the lands of Richard Osmotherley, by like services, and rendereth. The same William holdeth there a tenement, called Langrigg Hall, by like services, and rendereth per annum. Robert Barwis, gent., holdeth there the third part of the lands of the said Clement Skelton, and rendereth per annum. Anthony Brisco, gent., holdeth there another third part of the lands of the said Clement Skelton, and rendereth per annum. Adam Lathes holdeth there another third part of the said Clement's lands, and rendereth per annum. The whole town of Langrigg aforesaid paiaeth yearly to the lord at the feasts of St. Martin and Pentecost, for cornage 6s. 6d., seawake, 8d., for turnsilver, 3s. 10d. in toto 11s. 6d. Adam Lathes holdeth at Langrigg aforesaid, two tenements by like services, and rendereth per annum, 1d." By an inquisition, post mortem, of Cuthbert Osmunderley, 4th Oct. 41 Elizabeth (1599), it appears that at that date the Porters held the manor and old rent, and the Osmunderleys the demesne and six tenements. This Cuthbert Osmunderley, first mentioned, in addition to his other possessions, died seised of six tenements in Wheyrigg, one in Moor-row, one in Blencogo, two in Bewaldeth, one in Armathwaite, six in Oughterside, four in Meldrigg, seven in Waverton, and four in Southwaite. At a subsequent period the Porters sold the manor to the Osmunderleys, the last of which family, the Rev. Salkeld Osmunderley, sold the manor and demesne, in 1735, to Thomas Barwis, Esq., in whose family they still continue; William Barwis, Esq., of Langrigg Hall, being the present lord. The abbey of Holme Cultram had possessions in Langrigg, which, after the suppression of the monastic institutions, were granted (amongst others), to Thomas Dalston, Esq. The present landowners of the township are Hugh J. Percy, Esq.; Messrs. John Younghusband, John Wilkinson, Benjamin Barwis, the trustees of the late Joseph Miller, the trustees of the late W. Rudd, John Barnes, John Stamper, John Barnes, John Carruthers, John Pearson, Isaac Glaister; Mrs. Barwis, Mrs. Pearson, and Mrs. Clarke.

The village of Langrigg consists of several good houses, pleasantly situated on a long ridge of land, pointing eastward from Bromfield, six and a half miles west-by-south of Wigton. Here is a tile manufactory, earned on by Mr. J. Laseock. On Langrigg Bank is a flour mill, worked alternately by water and steam.

Langrigg Hall, a commodious mansion, occupying a delightful situation, a little north of the village, is the residence of Mrs. Barwis, widow of the late John Barwis, Esq.

Barwis of Langrigg Hall.

This family was originally of Dearham, which estate they acquired at an early period, by marriage with the heiress. The senior line merged into the family of Lamplugh. A branch, settled at Isle Kirk, in Westward, became extinct about the latter end of the seventeenth century, the co-heiresses marrying into the Cottons, the Leazes, and Kibbles families.

THOMAS BARWIS, Esq., married Elizabeth Osmotherley, a descendant of a family which had settled in the parish of Bromfield, temp. Edward I., and had purchased Langrigg in the reign of Richard II., and by her, with three daughters, and another son, a son of JOHN BARWIS, Esq., of Langrigg, who married Elizabeth Brierley, and had Thomas, John, William, and Elizabeth. The third son, WILLIAM BARWIS, M.A., of Durham, born 16th June, 1744, married Sarah, daughter of the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., of Brynton, and by her (who died 18th October, 1802, left one daughter, November 29th, 1791, a son,

JOHN BARWIS, Esq., J.P., of Langrigg Hall, born 18th August, 1775, married, 31st August, 1818, Frances, youngest daughter of the Rev. John Gutch, M.A., registrar of the University of Oxford, and had issue,

WILLIAM CUTHBERT, passed 14th September,

Thomas Osmotherley, born 6th April, 1808,

Sarah Jane, married, 7th November, 1850, to the Rev. Charles Frederick Booker.

Elizabeth Fanny, died unmarried, 1845.

On the demise of Mr. Barwis, he was succeeded by his son,

The Rev. WILLIAM CUTHBERT BARWIS, M.A., incumbent of Christ Church, Leeds, born 15th July, 1821; married 3rd January, 1850, Mary, youngest daughter of the late Benjamin Houghton, Esq., of Waltham Abbey, Essex, and has a daughter, Amy.

WEST NEWTON ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICT.

THE Ecclesiastical District of West Newton is bounded on the north by St. Cuthbert's parish, Holme Cultram; on the west by Allonby; on the south by Aspatiria; and on the east by Langrigg. It comprises the township of West Newton, and Mealrigg, part of Langrigg and Mealrigg township; as the parish of Bromfield is now to be divided into three, West Newton will shortly be constituted a separate and distinct parish, under Lord Blandford's Act.

WEST NEWTON.

The area of this township is returned with that of Allonby; its rateable value is £2,066 12s. 10d. Its population in 1801 was returned with that of Allonby; in 1811, it was 223; in 1821, 309; in 1831, 322; in 1841, 335; and in 1851, 347. The inhabitants, who are entirely engaged in agricultural pursuits, reside principally in the village of West Newton, some of them however reside in the hamlets of Howrigg and Yearn Gill, or Urn Gill, and a few scattered houses. Although the houses generally are very clean, yet the people have not been remarkable either for good morals or for keeping their village in commendable order. This was owing, in a great measure, to the want of religious and secular education. Within the past year, however, this want has been supplied, and there is already a marked improvement. The soil here is generally fertile. Cockermouth, Wigton, and Maryport, are the markets usually attended.

The manor of West Newton was given by Alan, second Lord of Allerdale, to Odard de Wigton, who gave it to Ketel, his fourth son, father of Adam de Newton, who first took that name. This Adam was succeeded by his brother Richard, who gave lands at Newton to the abbey of Holme Cultram, which grant was confirmed by Adam de Newton, his son. This Adam had a son, Richard, who also confirmed the grant of his grandfather. Richard had a son, Thomas, who in his turn had a son, Thomas, whose daughter and heir became the wife of Roger Martindale, and brought West Newton to that family, who continued to possess it for four or five generations, until the family ended in daughters. Amongst the knights' fees in Cumberland, in 1543, it appears that Cuthbert Radcliffe, John Blennerhasset, Anthony Barker, Richard Dacre, and Humphrey Dacre, in the right of their wives, daughters, and heirs of James Martindale, co-parceners, held jointly and undivided the manor of Newton-upon-the-Sea, with the appurtenances and the vill of Newton, of the king, in capite, by knights' service, cornage 13s. 4d., seawake, and suit of court. They also held the manor of Ormesby; with lands and tenements in Langrigg, Bromfield, Mealrigg, Crook-dake, Kelsyke, and Lounthwaite, by like services. After the partition of the estates, Newton came to the Musgraves, by the marriage (as it appears) of one of the co-heirs of Martindale, after the death of her first husband; for Denton, who was contemporary, says,—“Newton in Allerdale is now the inheritance of Edward Musgrave, second son to William and his wife, one of the co-heirs of Martindale, last of that name, lord of Newton.” Eleanor, daughter and heiress of Sir Richard Musgrave Hylton, Bart., brought West Newton in marriage to William Joliffe, Esq., M.P., from whom it has descended to its present owner, Charles Joliffe, Esq., who succeeded Hylton Joliffe, Esq. The landowners, besides the lord of the manor, who owns above 1,000 acres, are, John Richmond, John Todd, John Richardson, Mrs. Worsley, William Cape, J. Wilson, Miss Aglionby, and the trustees of the late Joseph Wise. The lands are held here by customary tenure, subject to a fine of two years' rent on the death of the lord, or change of tenant; the remainder is freehold. The lord holds a court annually. The castle stood at the west end of the village, but the ruins have now entirely disappeared, and a little hillock in the centre of a grazing field alone marks the site.

Aspatia common was divided by act of parliament in 1821, and a portion of it assigned to West Newton. The landowners of the township purchased their tithes more than 100 years ago.

The village of West Newton is pleasantly situated at the junction of two small rivulets, three and a half miles east-by-north of Allonby, and eight miles north-east of Maryport, and west-by-south of Wigton. The small streams just mentioned run through the village, and though useful are certainly not ornamental, though they might easily be made so.

THE CHURCH.

The want of church accommodation had long been felt in the parish of Bromfield, and Mrs. Barwis, of Langrigg Hall, undertook some time ago to raise subscriptions towards building and endowing a church, and great praise is due to that lady for the strenuous efforts she made for that purpose. There seemed, however, little likelihood of raising the sum required until John Todd, Esq., of Manchester, a native of West Newton, came nobly forward and offered to build, at his own cost, a church, parsonage, school, and teacher's house. Such an offer was not to be refused, and Mrs. Barwis readily consented to invest for an endowment the sum she had collected, which amounted to £2,300. Besides building the above, which cost £9,000, Mr. Todd also gave £500 towards the endowment. He is also a large contributor towards the stipend of the incumbent and the schoolmaster, and at his death intends endowing both church and school. This is an example worthy the imitation of our merchant princes, and is a substantial proof that Mr. Todd has not forgotten his native village, which he left more than thirty years ago.

West Newton Church, dedicated to St. Matthew, was erected in 1857. It is a neat structure, in the Early English style, consisting of nave and chancel, and possesses four beautifully-stained windows, by Wailes, of Newcastle. That in the east end of the chancel contains a representation of the Crucifixion, Resurrection, and Ascension, with the symbols of the four Evangelists; the west window, erected by Mrs. Barwis, in memory of her daughter, has for its subject, St. Matthew and St. Barnabas; the third, on the north side of the chancel, The Woman Anointing the Feet of Jesus; the fourth, on the south side of the chancel, Mary sitting at the feet of Jesus. With regard to the internal fittings of the church, there is no country church in the county that can be compared with it,—everything is good, useful, and beautiful. The cost of erection was about £1,000. All the rites of the English Church are performed here. The church is endowed with £2,800; the value of the living is about £100 a-year. With the joint consent of the Rev. C. H. Wybergh, vicar of Bromfield, John Todd, Esq., and Mrs. Barwis, of Langrigg Hall, the right of nominating the incumbent was conveyed to the Bishop of Carlisle. The Rev. John Bone is the first and present incumbent.

The Parsonage, a neat building in the Early English style, is situated at the west end of the village. It was erected in 1858, at a cost of about £1,000.

A good school and master's house were erected in 1858. They are situated near the church, and are in the same style of architecture. The school is under government inspection, and supported by the children's pence and John Todd, Esq., by whom it was built, at a cost of £1,000.

Howrigg and Yearn Gill, or Urn Gill, are two hamlets in this township, both within a short distance of West Newton, and may almost be considered a part of it.

Warwick Hall is situated a little to the south-west of the village; it is occupied by Mr. Richard Jackson, the principal tenant of the lord of the manor.

John Todd, Esq., son of Joseph Todd, Esq., left his native village more than thirty years ago, and went to Manchester, where he became a very influential merchant, and to his honour has now become a liberal benefactor to his native place.

ALLONBY CHAPELRY.

ALLONBY CHAPELRY, which is now (October, 1868,) about to be constituted a separate and distinct parish, is bounded on the north by the parish of Holme St. Cuthbert and the Ecclesiastical District of West Newton, on the west by the Solway Frith, and on the south and east by the townships of Hayton and Melay in Aspatia parish. This chapelry comprises the township of Allonby, which is united with that of West Newton for the support of the poor, &c.

ALLONBY.

The area of the township of Allonby, inclusive of that of West Newton, is 1,704 acres, and its rateable value £4,020. Its population in 1801, with that of West Newton, was 726; in 1811, Allonby alone, 655; in 1821, 709; in 1831, 783; in 1841, 811; and in 1851, 749; who are all collected in the village of Allonby. The principal employment of the people is agriculture; a few are engaged as fishermen or boatmen; and there are also a few handloom weavers, working principally for a firm at Wigton. The inhabitants chiefly attend Maryport market; a few, however, go to Wigton. The soil here is sandy, some loamy, and in parts there is a mixed quality, resting chiefly on a clayey subsoil. There are two red freestone quarries, one on the property of Charles Jolliffe, Esq., and the other on that of General Wyndham; both of which are worked by Mr. Henry Graves, of Aspatia.

The manor of Allonby, or Alanby, is said to have received its name from Alan, second lord of Allendale, "who being a melancholic man, was pleased with the lovely situation of the place, and the rather as it was near the abbey of Holme, which he had undertaken to rebuild." This Alan is stated by Nicolson and Burn to have given Allonby "to some of his kindred, who took their name therefrom, and were called De Alanby." There appears to have been a John de Alanby, and an Edward de Alanby, and these are the only members of the family with whose names we are acquainted. In the reign of Edward III. a De Lacy occurs as proprietor. Soon after this the male line of the Alanbys appears to have failed, and a female heir brought it in marriage to William de Flimby. From the Flimbys the manor passed in a similar manner to the Blennerhassetts. John Blennerhasset, Esq., of Carlisle, lord of Allonby, having married Janet, one of the five daughters of James Martindale, lord of Newton, the latter family continued to hold Allonby till the year 1700, when they sold it to William Thomlinson of Blencogo Hall, who in 1701 or 1702 sold the lands in Allonby to the tenants, reserving a small quit-rent. This gentleman was succeeded by his son William Thomlinson, and the male line failed in John Thomlinson, Esq., of Brisco Hill, Carlisle, who, dying without issue, the manor and other possessions were left in trust for the two daughters of his brother William, who lived in Ireland. The eldest daughter married Captain Samuel Wyndowe, and the younger Robert Swann, Esq. On a partition of their possessions, Samuel Wyndowe, Esq., became lord of the manor. He was succeeded by his son, Oliver Thomlinson Wyndowe, Esq., who died in London; and the manor is now held by Mrs. George Reay and her sister.

Ormesby, in this parish, was anciently a small manor held by the lords of Dearham, who gave lands out of Ormesby to the abbey of Holme Cultram. The manor passed from the lords of Dearham to the Martindales, lords of West Newton, with whom it continued till the demise of James Martindale, when it was divided among his daughters. One part, containing Melay, Crookhurst, and other lands, called Ormesby lands, became joined to the manor of Allonby, being the jointure of Janet Martindale, wife of John Blennerhasset. The other part, containing Melay Hill and Bowscale, with other lands, became the property of William Musgrave, Esq., of Hayton Castle, who married Isabella, one of the five daughters of James Martindale above-mentioned. An inquisition taken in the 20th year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth (1578), informs us that "William Musgrave, Esq., holdeth three parts of five parts of the manor of Ormesby, late the lands of George Martindale, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, from three weeks to three weeks, and payeth yearly for cornage, seawake, and fee-farm, at 5^s feasts of St. Martin and Pentecoste, 2s. 5d. John Blennerhasset holdeth one part of five parts of the manor aforesaid by like services, and payeth for cornage, seawake, and fee-farm, 9^d. John Radcliff holdeth another part of the said five parts of the manor aforesaid, by like service, and payeth for cornage, seawake, and fee-farm, 9^d." Ormesby manor has since passed with the manors of Allonby and Hayton.

The principal landowners are Messrs. William Williamson, Thomas Williamson, William Beeby, John Saul, John Osborne, Peter Nicholson, Thomas Bouch; Mrs. Bragg, and Mrs. Dickinson.

The village or town of Allonby is situated on the coast, five miles north-north-east of Maryport, and commands a fine view of the Solway and the Scottish coast and mountains, among which Criffel stands conspicuous. The town, which contains some good houses, has a neat appearance, is much resorted to for sea-bathing, for which it is well adapted, the sands being smooth and firm, and the inclination of the beach to the sea so gradual that bathing may be easily enjoyed at all times of the tide. The herring-fishery here, at some seasons, is very productive; but, at others, the shoals of this fish, after remaining in the channel ten years, are said to leave the coast, and after an absence for the same length of time, to return again. Allonby contains a hotel, several good inns, besides capacious boarding and lodging-houses. Baths were erected in 1835, and in the same building are news and assembly rooms. A meat and vegetable market is held here every Saturday.

THE CHURCH.

Allonby Church or Chapel, called "Christ Church," was erected and originally endowed by Dr. Thomlinson, vicar of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and canon of St. Paul's, London,¹ in 1744, but was rebuilt by subscription about eleven years ago. It is a cruciform structure, and probably one of the worst specimens of churchwardens' architecture to be found in the county. It will accommodate about 400 persons. There is a splendid mural tablet to the late Captain Joseph Huddart, F.R.S.,

¹ The following letter of Dr. Thomlinson, gives an account of the foundation of Allonby Church, and is interesting from the account which the writer gives of himself and his various charitable works:—

MY GOOD LORD,—Your judicious and learned labours are so serviceable to all impartial and unbiased readers, and your advice upon emergent difficulties are so useful to your friends, that I, who have tasted of both, cannot but earnestly wish that this may find you in as perfect health, as I enjoy, who am advanced within a few months of 70. I have been eight years blind, and by the blessing of God, am not only easy and contented, but cheerful and as well disposed as ever to works of piety and charity, in which, for five years past, I have bestowed more than the neat produce of my living, prebend, &c. I go nowhere but to the house of God, which, when I entered in 1712, was in a sorry condition, covered over with green mould, but is now beautiful and adorned, with three galleries, two of my erection, for the benefit of my charity school; a handsome chancel, with elegant wainscot, and sash windows; and the communion table and pulpit enriched with such ornaments as no country church I know of can excel or equal these. I delight to be present on grave days, and especially on Sundays, when we have constantly full congregations; and at monthly sacraments, when I always consecrate the elements, and give the bread. When I drew near to the common term of man's life, my mind was frequently filled with uncommon apprehensions of the uncertainty of life, the first importance of charity, of laying up treasure in heaven, and the awful and enduring speech of the Great Judge to the sheep on his right hand, and the day of judgment, which then inspired me with a resolution to devote the income of my spiritual preferments, to the finishing such charities as I had then in view, and to act the wise merchant, who, before he removes to a foreign country, sends his effects before him. That wise resolution, which moved me as a divine impulse, produced the building of two charity schools, one here, and the other, for fifty children, at Bellingham, in the parish of Simonsburn, which is computed twenty-four miles in length, and twenty in breadth, besides one of the Elder brethren of the Trinity House, and a distinguished navigator, who was born in the village. It is of white marble, and was executed by Fontano, of Carrara, and cost £500. The incumbent is a perpetual curate or vicar, presented by the vicar of Bromfield, in right of his vicarage. Allonby will shortly be made a distinct parish, under the provisions of Lord Blandford's act. The tithes are at present paid to the mother church of Bromfield. The founder of the chapel, Dr. Thomlinson above-mentioned, endowed it with £200, which, with £200 obtained from Queen Anne's Bounty, were vested in a rent-charge to be paid out of an estate in Abbey Holme. The living subsequently received another augmentation, which was expended in purchase of land at Carlisle; it is now worth about £90 a year.

INCUMBENTS.—Thomas Wilson, —; John Cowen, —; William Graham, M.A., —; Gifford Hartley, M.A., 1822, —; James Carter, 1850; John Risson, M.A., 1851; J. Ponsonby Steel, M.A., 1858.

There is a parsonage house.

The Society of Friends and the Independents have each a place of worship in this village.

Allonby School is a plain stone building, rebuilt in 1837, on the site of the old school, adjacent to the church. It is endowed with some land purchased with £100 left in 1753 by Mrs. Thomlinson, relict of Dr.

the library at Newcastle, of which your Lordship had a particular account in 1841. I mention these, my Lord, not by way of vanity, for I disclaim all merit, and do know that in me there is nothing I can call my own, but the abuse of mercies, my follies, failings, and imperfections: if there be anything in me that is good, it is from God, to which I owe all my good thoughts and dispositions, and my very abilities to do good, for I was the youngest of ten children, and God's providence was mine inheritance. This, my Lord, I presume to offer as the best apology I can make, for my neglect in your Lordship's cathedral, where for many years I have been an unworthy member, and I hope you will be so favourable as to conclude that, though I cannot labour in the vineyard, as I did now fifty years, before the loss of sight, yet I am now not altogether useless and unprofitable. A half a year ago, when I had erected three small monuments and memorials of my gratitude to the Divine bounty, and had intended to put an end to my public charities, I met with such a melancholy account of the want of a chapel at Allonby, in Cumberland, as engaged me in building one there, with a school annexed, which will be finished this week, of which I will give a full account to your Lordship. Allonby is situated on the banks of the Solway Frith, ten miles west of Wigton, where, in 1721, I put six clergyman's widows into a college of matrons, whose statutes your Lordship was pleased to revise. There, a year or two after, I built a school, with a dwelling-house for the master, one fabric of ashlar work, with hewn door-case, windows, and rustic coigns, twelve yards long; that is accounted a handsome building; but this which I have built here, two years ago, exceeds it in size and beauty. I beg your Lordship's pardon for trespassing so long upon your patience, and remain, my good Lord,

Your most obedient and obliged

Humble Servant,

ROBERT THOMLINSON,

Rector of Whickham.

To the Right Rev. Edmund Lord Bishop of London.

Thomlinson, and now producing about £7 10s. per annum, for which ten free scholars are taught by the master. The number of children in attendance is about forty.

The British School was erected by subscription in 1810. It possesses an endowment of £50 a year, arising from the proceeds of a sum of money invested in the Darlington railway, by Thomas Richardson, Esq., of Stamford Hill, near London, who transferred it to the use of this school, the master and mistress of which receive £25 each, or an equal share of the profits.

CALDBECK PARISH.

THE parish of Caldbeck is bounded on the north by the parishes of Westward, Bolton, and Skergham; on the west by Bassenthwaite, Uldale, and Ireby; on the south by Bassenthwaite and Skiddaw; and on the east by Castle Sowerby and Greystoke parishes.¹ Its area is 24,280 statute acres, of which about 12,000 are commons and fells, which afford good pasture to numerous flocks of sheep, and abound with various kinds of game. The lands seem to rise by a gentle ascent from the vale of the Caldew up to the mountains. The soil near Caldbeck and Hesket is fertile, but the western part of the enclosed land is cold and heavy. The minerals found in this parish are lead, copper, coal, and limestone—there is an almost boundless variety of the former; and while the surrounding rocks attract the eye of the geologist, few districts of a similar extent contribute more to the pleasure and curiosity of the tourist, and the cabinet of the mineralogist. The parish is divided into the townships of Low Caldbeck, High Caldbeck, Caldbeck Half-till, Meschede, and Swineside. The inhabitants attend the Wigton, Carlisle, and Penrith markets. They reside in several small villages, but the majority are dispersed in single houses for agricultural purposes, and are engaged in agriculture and mining. The rateable value of the whole parish is £6,073 per annum. It is evident a Roman road has passed through the parish from the station near Papestone to another near Plumpton. Entering the parish at the boundary near Uldale, it proceeded over the common to Pikeless Gate, thence by Wath to Hesket Newmarket, along the road now called Street, and from Hesket to Millhouse, in the parish of Castle Sowerby, in the direction of the station Petriana. The commons belonging to the various townships in this parish are not enclosed, and contain by admeasurement 12,633 acres.

LOW CALDBECK.

The population of Low Caldbeck township in 1801 was 505; in 1811, 635; in 1821, 720; in 1831, 738; in 1841, 646; and in 1851, 683. Its rateable value is £2,014 11s. 8d.

The manor of Caldbeck is divided into two divisions, called Caldbeck Upperton, or Uppertown, being that part which lies near the church; and Caldbeck-under-Fell, the part near the mountains. The whole lordship or manor was held by the lords of Allerdale, till the sixth Earl of Northumberland gave it to Henry VIII., who granted Caldbeck Upperton to Thomas Dalston, Esq., and Caldbeck-under-Fell to Thomas, Lord Wharton, the latter of whom soon became possessed of the whole, having purchased Mr. Dalston's moiety. From a survey taken in 1587 we learn the following particulars relating to Caldbeck:—"The heirs of Henry

Denton hold four messuages of the barony of Allerdale, and other lands and tenements in Caldbeck Upton and Caldbeck-under-Fell, by cornage, homage, &c., rendering per annum 7s. 6d. Philip, Lord Wharton, holdeth Caldbeck-under-Fell, being of the ancient possessions of the said earl, and of the yearly value of £20, granted amongst other things by Henry, late Earl of Northumberland, uncle of the earl that now is, to one Thomas Wharton, controller of his household, to him and to his heirs male, paying therefore yearly £20. The same Lord Wharton holdeth Caldbeck Upton, being of ancient possessions of the said earl, and of the yearly value of £8 10s. 4d., purchased of the said late King Henry VIII., by one Thomas Dalston, to be holden of the king by knight's service, viz., the — part of a knight's fee, and by the yearly rent of 36s. 8½d., of which lands and tenements the said Thomas Dalston infeoffed Thomas, Lord Wharton, grandfather to the said Philip, Lord Wharton, by the rents and services to the said Earl of Northumberland due, 36s. 8½d." The following are the free tenants in Caldbeck Uppertown and Caldbeck-under-Fell at the period of the survey:—"The heirs of Edward Blennerhasset holdeth there two messuages, twenty acres of land, with appurtenances, by knight's service, viz., for cornage, homage, fealitic, and suit of court of Allerdale, and render 2s. 2d. The heirs of John Sleawright hold there one tenement and eight acres of land, by like services, and render 6d. The heirs of Robert Wareop hold certain lands there by like services, and render 1s. The dean and chapter of Carlisle hold there certain lands called Sharelands, by like services, and render per annum 1s. The heirs of Robert Vaux hold there certain lands, by like services, and render 1s. The heirs of Robert Priestman hold there certain lands called Wardflat, by like service, and render 6d. The heirs of William Eaglesfield hold there certain lands, late the lands of John Caldbeck, by like services, and render 1s. The tenants and inhabitants of the said town of Caldbeck pay to the lord yearly, for cornage, 20s.; for seawake, 2s. 1d.; in toto, 22s. 1d." The entire manor continued to be held by the Wharton family till the famous Duke Philip, whom Pope calls "the scorn and wonder of our days," and who was the last of the family, was obliged to alienate this and other estates to four trustees, for the payment of his debts. Being sold by the trustees to Charles, Duke of Somerset, it became again united to the barony of Allerdale, and has descended with that barony to General Wyndham, who is now lord of the soil; but the minerals, which had been reserved to the crown, now belong to the Earl of Pomfret; Sir George William Deuys, Bart.; and Sir Francis Shuckburgh, Bart. The landowners in this township are Jackson Gillbanks, Esq.; William Jennings, Esq.; John Jennings, Esq.; Lieut.-col. Wilson; George G. Mounsey, Esq.; Messrs. Richard Harrison, Joseph Scott, John Smith, and Thomas James, with several small owners and resident yeomen.

The village of Caldbeck is situated in this township, at the north-eastern extremity of the parish, near the confluence of the Caldew and the Caldbeck, one and a half miles north-west of Hesket Newmarket, and seven miles south-south-east of Wigton. Weaving, bobbin-making, fulling, and other manufactures, are carried on here. The origin of this village is said to have been as follows:—"Long after the Conquest this parish was a wild forest and desolate waste, and, being crossed by a high-road which extended from Westmoreland to the western coast of Cumberland, it lay under the imputation of being the resort of dangerous outlaws, who frequently assailed travellers. To prevent this as much as possible, Ranulph Engayne, chief forester of Inglewood, granted a license to the Prior of Carlisle to build an hospital here, for the purpose of entertaining travellers and protecting such as were benighted from the hands of prowling freebooters. On this grant the prior enclosed some portions in the environs of the hospital, when soon afterwards a church was erected, around which a village quickly rose, and the parish of Caldbeck was called into existence. The hospital was dissolved about the time of King John, and the church endowed with its lands, which have since been designated the manor of Kirkland." King John was at Caldbeck on the 20th June, 1218.

THE CHURCH.

Caldbeck Church is a very ancient fabric, dedicated to St. Mungo, or St. Kentigern, the tutelar saint of the north, and is supposed to have been erected in the year 1112. It consists of a nave, two side aisles, and chancel. Gospatric, son of Orme, granted the patronage of the rectory to the priors of Carlisle, which grant was confirmed by William de Vesey, and Burga his wife, and dame Alice Romley, lady of Allerdale, and also by the kings Henry I. and Edward II. About the year 1223 Prior Bartholomew granted the advowson to the bishop of Carlisle, and his successors have since enjoyed the same, but not without question, for in 1267, Cicceley, Countess of Albermarle, eldest daughter of William Fitz Duncan, is said to have claimed it, but we are not informed upon what her claim was grounded. It is added, however, that upon a quare impedit, the bishop recovered the right of collation to the church of Caldbeck. The benefice is a rectory, valued in the King's Book at £45 3s. 6d., and returned in 1845 as of the annual value of £436; it is now worth £480 per annum. The Bishop of Carlisle is patron. The tithes have been commuted for £345, and there are nearly 200 acres of glebe. The church has this year (1858) been lighted and heated with gas. The parish register commences for baptisms, April 10th, 1640; marriages, April 17th, 1631; burials, June 2nd, 1628.

There is an excellent rectory house, of large dimensions. The entrance hall, which is sixteen feet wide by thirty two feet long, is supposed to be the old hall of the ancient hospital of Caldbeck.

The places of worship in the parish, in addition to the church, are a Methodist chapel at Hesket; a Friends' meeting-house at Caldbeck High, another near Hesket, and another at Mosedale. The Quakers do not now meet in these chapels, having become absorbed by the church.

The school is a neat stone building, in the Elizabethan style, erected in 1851, by John Jennings, Esq., of Fell Side, at a cost of £300. It is supported by quarter-pence and private subscriptions. About 100 children are educated here.

CHARITY STOCKS.

School.—In a terrier of this parish, dated November 10th, 1749, it is stated that there is belonging to the parish of Caldbeck a school stock, which was raised by voluntary contribution in the year 1647, as (it is stated) would further appear by an ancient book kept for that purpose. The principal stock at that time is stated to be £103, then lodged in the hands of the most substantial inhabitants of the parish, for which they paid the schoolmaster interest at 10d. in the pound. It is also added that by one of the articles agreed upon at the first endowment, the contributors to the said stock, and their lineal descendants enjoying the estates of the first contributors, should be free to the school; but that, for the encouragement of the school, in case any of the estates should be sold, neither the seller nor buyer should thereafter be free. The Charity Commissioners state that "A great part of the sum of £103 above-mentioned is said to have been lost long ago, by the failure of a family of the name of Scott; and all that is now known to remain is the sum of £47 16s. This money was in the hands of six different persons, all of whom, for several years, paid interest for their several proportions, at 10d. in the pound, to the Rev. Joseph Rogerson, who was schoolmaster for twenty-five years. Mr. Rogerson has now left Caldbeck five or six years, since which time no interest has been paid." They go on to state that they "suggested to the persons in whose hands the money remains, the propriety of paying in the principal with arrears of interest, in order that the object of the original subscription may, as far as possible, be fulfilled." The following inscription was over the door of the school:—"Ex dono Roberti Vaux de Brownrigge, A.D. 1688;" but nothing more could be learnt of its foundation.

Poor Stock.—By a terrier dated in 1749, it appears there was a poor stock of £30 (of which £15 had been left by Cuthbert Brown in 1665), which was placed out by the overseers, and the interest divided amongst the poor with the money collected at the sacrament. On examining the overseer's book, it was found that in 1771 the sum of £1 2s. 6d. was received as the interest of £30 poor stock, but no interest has been received for a great number of years. It appears probable that the principal sum was expended in building a poor-house; and it is stated to have been so disposed of in returns made to parliament in 1786. The rector has a book containing an account of the distribution of the sacrament money for upwards of a century, by reference to which it appears that the principal money of several legacies left to the poor have been from time to time disposed of. A legacy of £40 left by John Lamb is stated in the returns of 1786 to have been distributed by the overseers in 1754. On examining the churchwardens' accounts, it appears that 6d. a year has been paid by the family of Nicholson of Hesket, for at least a century, for a property called Marshall Lands. These lands are held by the Nicholsons of the dean and chapter of Carlisle at a small rent, and 6d. is paid also yearly to the churchwardens of Caldbeck, when called for, but it has not been demanded since 1803. In the return of 1786 this was stated to be for the poor, but we could not discover the origin or object of the payment.

Rev. Arthur Savage's Charity.—By will, dated 1st November, 1696, the Rev. Arthur Savage gave to the parish of Caldbeck £50, for the binding out poor men's children apprentices, which £50 he directed to be paid by £5 yearly for ten years; and that the £5 so paid should be disposed yearly, with the advice of the rector and the churchwardens, to that use only and no other. This sum of £50 was paid by the executor to some of the principal inhabitants, and is now secured upon the tolls of the turnpike road between Penrith and Carlisle, the sum of 40s. being paid as interest. This charity is not disposed of in apprentice fees, but is distributed in sums of 4s. or 5s. to poor children when bound out by the parish. An account of the distribution has been regularly entered from 1725 to 1818; but since that period the interest has not been paid, no application having been made for it. It seems by the terms of the testator's will that he intended this legacy of £50 should be disposed of in ten apprentice fees, within ten years after his death; the principal, however, has not been disposed of, but still remains as a permanent fund.

Lord Wharton's Bible Charity.—The parish of Caldbeck is entitled to twenty Bibles from Lord Wharton's charity. The Bibles are regularly received and distributed by the clergyman amongst the poor of the parish.

Simpson's Charity.—By will, dated 25th August, 1781, Robert Simpson left the sum of 45s. yearly to purchase eight Common Prayer Books at 2s. 6d. each, to be given yearly to eight poor children of Caldbeck parish, and the remaining part of the money for buying religious books, or small tracts distributed by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, for the use of the children of the poor of Caldbeck; all which said books should not exceed the value of 40s.; and the remaining 5s. he directed should be spent in a collation for the trustees when they should meet yearly. This sum of 45s. is regularly paid by the owner of the Fauld's estate, which is subject to this payment. A regular account is kept of the distribution, by which it appears that eight Prayer Books annually, and other books, to the amount in the whole of 40s., are given away in the manner directed by the testator.

Bell's Gift.—John Bell, by will, left £40, the interest to be distributed to the poor widows of Caldbeck who do not receive parochial relief. The first distribution was made in January, 1810. The interest, amounting to £1 13s. 4d., is distributed in the church by the rector, yearly, about midsummer, amongst the poor widows properly qualified to receive it.

Brownrigg, long the seat of a family of the name of Vaux, is a hamlet in this township, as is also Ratten Row, at the latter of which the rector of the parish has a small manor, called the manor of Kirkland, the tenants of which pay £7 17s. 4d. customary fines, and, on alienation, an arbitrary fine, but on the change of a tenant by death, only a God's penny, and on the death of a lord nothing. At Ratten Row there is a chapel, a small stone building erected in 1832 by the Independents. At Whelpo is a Friends' meeting-house, erected in 1698, attached to which is a burial ground.

A library was established in the parish in 1849, which contains about 300 volumes, and is supported by annual subscriptions of two shillings per member.

HIGH LANDRIVEN.

The rateable value of this township is £1,617 4s. 11d. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 239; in 1811, 267; in 1821, 272; in 1831, 267; in 1841, 282; and in 1851, 308. The making is carried on here. The landowners are Thomas Jennings, Esq.; John Jennings, Esq.; Colonel Benson; Samuel Merryweather, Esq.; Messrs. John Scott, Thomas Hudson, and Joseph Jackson, with several small owners and resident yeomen.

This township contains the hamlets of Branthwaite, Fell-Side, Hudscals, Greenrigg, and Nether Row, with some scattered dwellings extending from one to three miles west and west-by-south of Hesketh Newmarket, being bounded on the south by Caldbeck Fells.

Greenrigg is a small village, or hamlet, about three and a half miles west-by-south of Hesketh Newmarket. It formerly belonged to the Musgraves of Crookdale, who were long a considerable family, holding several offices of great trust under the Earl of Northumberland, from whom, it seems, they obtained several grants of sundry parcels of waste ground, all of which they converted into tenancies. Sir John Ballantine, who married Anne, the eldest daughter and co-heir of William Musgrave, Esq., sold these tenancies also to Lord Wharton, from whose trustees they passed by purchase to the Duke of Somerset, and are now held by General Wyndham.

CALDBECK HALTCIFF.

The rateable value of this township is £2,093 16s. 8d. In 1801 it contained 427 inhabitants; in 1811, 534; in 1821, 593; in 1831, 573; in 1841, 567; and in 1851, 617. The landowners are Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.; Jackson Gillbanks, Esq.; John Jennings, Esq.; William Irving, Esq.; Rev. J. Hudson; Messrs Robert Priestman, Isaac Harper, Joseph Nicholson, J. Young-husband, William Robinson, William Hamilton, John Greenup, Thomas Oldman, C. Hudson, Thomas Richardson, John Williamson, Joseph Scott, and others. In this township is a field called Fell Lodge, near Carrock Fell, which is said to be the first enclosure made in Caldbeck parish for the purpose of catching the deer before the general use of guns.

Haltcliff Hall, in this township, is a very ancient structure, several inscriptions about which denote that it was for a long period the residence of the Bewleys, some of whom were knights of the shire, temp. Richard II., Henry IV., and Henry V.¹ The elder branch of this family became extinct in the reign of Charles I., when the heiress married one of the Lawson family. The Messrs. Lysons state that they were not able to ascertain the arms of the Bewleys of Hesketh; but a year or two since the present owner of Haltcliff Hall, in pulling down a dry wall, found different armorial bearings, which formed a perfect shield, many of the quarterings being identical with those borne by the titled family of Boileau² (in the south of England); so there can be no doubt that these families have had the

The manor of Heskett, containing 150 acres, in the township of Halciliff, is a manse manor, within that of General Wyndham. The heiress of William Beaulieu, or Bewley, Esq., whose ancestors possessed it for many generations, brought it, in the reign of Charles I., to the Lawsons, and it is now held by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart. Heskett Hall, the manor-house, built by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the first baronet, is a singular structure, with twelve angles so contrived that the shadows give the hour of the day; the roof is circular, the chimneys running up in the centre. It is now occupied as a farm-house.

Heskett Newmarket is a small but neat market-town in this township, situated in a quiet spot among the mountains, near Caldbeck Fell, and upon the banks of the Caldew, thirteen miles south-west from Carlisle, and fourteen north-north-west of Penrith. Its name is supposed to be a corruption arising out of the rapid pronunciation of East Cote or East Gate; both this town and that of Heskett-in-the-Forest having, perhaps, formerly been the eastern inlets into the forest, on which they are respectively joined. The market, which was held on Friday, is nearly obsolete, or at least of little consequence; but cattle-fairs are held here on the first Friday in May, and every alternate Friday till Whitsuntide; and for sheep and cattle, on the last Thursday in August, and the second Thursday in October.

Howbeck forms the southern suburb of Heskett, and possesses a school, which has an endowment of £3 a year left by the late Mr. Richardson, to be paid out of his estate at Wham, for the education of the poor children of the parish. The school was erected by subscription, and it has an average attendance of fifty children.

Halciliff village is about half a mile south of Heskett. There is another school here, a plain stone building, with master's house attached, erected by subscription in 1831. It is supported by quarter-pence, and has an average attendance of twenty.

In a freehold estate at Gillfoot, about three-quarters of a mile south of Heskett Newmarket, there seems to have been a Druid's grove, consisting of two parallel rows of large oak trees, extending 150 yards in length, and the rows twelve yards distant. In a level field, at the middle of the two rows, was a barrow of stones. The trees were cut down and the barrow removed in the year 1794, when, beneath the barrow, several places where human bones had been burnt and deposited, were discovered, as also numerous pieces of flint and stone beads, and a stone battle-axe.

Here is a Wesleyan chapel, a small stone building, erected by subscription in 1839, at a cost of £134. At Gillfoot is a Friends' meeting-house, erected in 1729. At one period this body had a place of worship at Woodhall, in this township, the remains of which are yet visible. Woodhall, the property of John Jennings, Esq., was formerly the seat of the Bewley family.

There is a corn-mill in this township.

MOSDALE AND SWINESIDE.

The hamlets of Mosedale and Swineside, and Stone End pay tithes to the rector of Caldbeck, but support their own poor, who are sent to the Penrith Union Workhouse. Mosedale is looked upon by the inhabitants as an independent township and is said to belong to Leath Ward; but the Census Commissioners, though they return it as a separate township since 1841, return it with Allerdale-below-Derwent Ward. Its estimated area is about 301 acres, and its rateable value £189 1s. The population in 1841, was 58; and in 1851, 59.

The manor of Mosedale and Swineside, containing about 350 acres of enclosed land, belonged anciently to the baronial family of Daere, and passed by female heirs, with the title, to the families of Fiennes and Lennard; it was sold by the co-heiress of Thomas, Earl of Sussex, to Sir Christopher Musgrave, Bart., of Eden Hall, and by him to Edward Hassell of Dalemain, ancestor of E. M. Hassell, Esq., the present proprietor. This manor is stated to have been the place where the Daeres, barons of Greystock, kept their deer and wild swine; but it was afterwards divided into tenancies. The landowners are John Jennings, Esq., Messrs. Joseph Wilson, Isaac Hunter, John Wilkinson, Thomas Martin, the trustees of Mungisdale School, Mrs. Heskett, John Nicholson, and Jane Mitchell.

The village of Mosedale is situated near the Caldew, four miles south of Heskett. Here is a meeting-house belonging to the Society of Friends, with burial ground attached, erected, or, as some say, rebuilt and enlarged, in 1702. The meeting-house is now used but seldom, as the Friends meet at Mr. Pearson's house in Bow-scales village, a short distance from Mosedale. Swineside lies about a mile to the west. About a mile from the latter place, is a mine in which several kinds of minerals have been found. It was worked in 1854 and 1855, but is now (1858) standing.

Carrock Fell, High Pike, Brne Fell, Cald Fell, Noon Fell, and several smaller eminences, form an extensive Alpine region, comprising the greater part of the parish. At the meeting of the British Association in Dublin, a paper on the geology of Caldbeck Fells, and the lower sedimentary rocks of Cumberland, was read by Professor Harkness. The district alluded to in this communication forms the northern portion of the mountainous area of the lake district of Cumberland. Caldbeck Fells, including the eastern extremity of Carrock Fell, consist of masses of a plutonic and an igneous nature. On the southern slopes of these hills there is seen Skiddaw slate, which generally has a south dip; and this Skiddaw slate, as it approximates the granite of Skiddaw Forest, passes into chialstolite slate, chialstolite rock, and a pseudo-gneiss. On the south side of the granite area the same phenomena occur, but on this side hornblende rock and actinolite rock also appear. In the metamorphic rocks, and likewise in the ordinary Skiddaw slates which succeed them in position, the strike of the strata is nearly east and west; and the general arrangement of the strata seems rather to indicate that the Plutonic masses of Caldbeck Fells form the axis of the group, rather than the granite of Skiddaw Forest. With respect to the unaltered rocks of the Skiddaw district, these have been referred by Professor Sedgwick to three groups—black Skiddaw slate, grits seen in the masses of Grassmoor, and grey Skiddaw slate containing fossils described in the Palaeozoic fossils of the Woodwardian Museum. The upper grey slates are the deposits which have litherto afforded organic remains. Last year the author obtained traces of worms from the black Skiddaw slate, the lowest member of the unaltered series, at Bralkeld, and from a communication which the author had recently from Professor Sedgwick, it would appear that in these low strata graptolites have been lately obtained by Mr. J. Ruthven. With regard to the lithological nature of these Skiddaw rocks, it would seem that there is a considerable change according to locality. Westward grey slates, with intercalated grits, obtain on the line of the strike of the black Skiddaw slates, leading to the inference that the coarser beds supply the place of the finer black slates on the eastern margin of the area.

The lofty mountains of Caldbeck Fells are traversed with numerous veins of lead and copper ore, producing mineral specimens in great variety. It is on record that Lord Wharton was the first mining adventurer in this locality (being lord of the manor), at or near Brandy Gill, in the sixteenth century, and it is supposed that Roughtengill and Silvergill mines were opened about the same time. Driggeth mine was opened by Mr. Row in 1790, who wrought it by shallow shafts and day levels, and a kind of water engine, to the depth of twenty-five fathoms. He also erected, on the old principle, small smelting works, near Carrock Beck, the buildings of which still remain. After he left the mine it stood idle for some time, but was again opened in 1810, and worked until 1822, by Messrs. Richardson, Lowrey, and others, who erected a crushing mill to reduce the ore to a proper size for washing and smelting. During the time this company leased the mine, they employed from thirty to forty pickmen, and it is said they raised 500 bings, or 200 tons, of ore, for a period of five years successively, and that every ton of ore made twelve hundredweight of lead, or sixty per cent., and that every ton of lead, when refined, produced from forty-five to fifty, and even as high as sixty-two, ounces of silver to the ton of lead. But the experience of late years shows these figures to be incorrect for the same vein is producing now the same kind of ore, and, by the improved mode of washing and refining, the ore is brought to seventy-five and seventy-eight per cent. of lead, and from twenty-five to thirty ounces of silver, to the ton of lead, a pretty good proof that the lead was burnt away in smelting, thus causing a serious loss to lessees and lessors, whilst the silver, being less fusible than the lead, remained in the lead that was left. T. R. G. Braddyll, Esq., of Conishead Priory, bought the mine in 1822, and drove up the present sandbed level, working the mine at a considerable loss till about 1834, when John Barrett, Esq., took and worked it four years, after which Messrs. Dickinson and Co. worked it till 1849, when Messrs. Brocklebank and Jeffrey, the present owners, took and commenced to work it in July of the same year, under the management of William Jeffrey, Esq. A more efficient mode of working was now introduced, and by great perseverance both under and above ground (for the machinery is all now erected and of a different kind to any in the country before), the mine has got its name raised, if not to a good dividend paying mine, to one that pays as it goes. It was at this mine that Zenner's rotating bridle was first erected, and it was found to be so efficient for washing stamped ores that there has since been two more erected by the same company. During eight years ending December, 1857, there were raised 1,950 tons of lead and copper ore, which is close upon an average of 250 per annum, duty at one-tenth included. Employment has been given to thirty-five men and fifteen boys, on an average. The mine is worked by day levels to the depth of sixty fathoms, and a new level now in course of driving will come up thirty fathoms deeper still, and to extend these levels under the summit of the hill, it would be at least 200 fathoms deep. Driggeth mine is situated on the east side of High Pike, which here is composed of a light coloured clay slate. It is singular that all over the hill is a great number of large blocks of granite, some of which are at least a hundred tons in weight. The nearest granite being Carrock, which is two miles to the south-east, and between which and High Pike there is a deep valley.

Roughtengill mine, as above-mentioned, is supposed to have been opened in the sixteenth century, and is now held under lease from Earl Pomfret. About the time that Mr. Braddyll commenced the working of the Driggeth mine, a company of working miners and others took up Roughtengill and Silvergill mines, which had been unnoticed for some time, and after a struggle of eight years a deeper level becoming necessary to win the mines, many members of the company were obliged to sell their shares to others who possessed more capital. The late Thomas Dickinson, Esq., of Alston, who purchased one-fourth of the mine, having taken an active part in forwarding the work, a level thirty fathoms deeper was effected, to the extent of 300 fathoms, and a crushing-mill and other apparatus for washing the ores were erected. During the ten years ending 1845, Roughtengill mine produced 4,000 tons of lead and copper ore, and the company divided upwards of £9,000 profit, after paying all expenses, with dues at one-seventh included. Their successors have driven up a deeper level still, half a mile in length, and at a depth of 200 yards from the surface, and have erected smeltworks with de-silverising and refining apparatus complete, and are now raising large quantities of lead and copper ores. This mine affords employment to about seventy men and boys, and produces annually from 500 to 600 tons of ore. It is worked by levels driven into the mountain more than half a mile in length, and upwards of 100 fathoms deep. The lodes or veins, which run nearly east and west, are of great strength and width, and produce a greater variety of ores than most mines of the same description. The greatest produce is silver lead, but the copper found is very rich, assaying sometimes as much as forty per cent. The average earnings of the men is about three shillings a day—farm-labourers, two shillings and sixpence.

There are several other mines that have raised lead and copper ores, which have only been worked to a very limited extent, the dues then being one-seventh; now the dues are one-tenth only, nearly one-third less.¹ The mines here are generally let upon lease, at a stipulated duty (at present one-tenth) paid in ore in the raw state, in money, or in smelted lead. It is the opinion of practical men that these dues are too high, and that if more liberal encouragement were given to the enterprising spirit of the present day, so that the various improvements which the science of modern times has introduced into mining operations could be made use of, this manor would yield an increase of royalty hitherto unattained, together with greater remunerating profits to the adventurer, and abundance of work to the mining population.

Carrock Fell lies wholly in this parish. It is one of the flanks of that mountain group of which Skiddaw forms the crown, and is upwards of 2,000 feet in height, showing a double-pointed summit, on which a space appears to have been once enclosed by a wall. The front of the mountain is strewn with immense masses of rock, and "rivers of debris," which encroach on the way below.

About half a mile west from the parish church, in a wild and romantic situation, is that striking curiosity the Howk—a deep waterfall in the bed of the river, over which is a natural bridge of limestone rock. Under this bridge the stream rushes with great impetuosity, and dashing along over rugged rocks, it empties itself into a basin boiling in whirling eddies, covered with foam. The intertwining branches of oak, ash, and hazel, intercepting the sun's rays, throw a dense gloom over the recess, even at noonday; whilst the long dark weeds and matted grass hang over the wave-worn rock in rich festoons, interlaced with bright green ferns. On one side is a deep excavation called the Fairy's Kettle, the receptacle, in time of floods, of another cascade that falls about twenty yards down perpendicular rocks; a little to the right of which is a cavern eighteen yards long, called the Fairy Kirk, in which the noise of the cataract has an imposing effect. This and the Kettle, which is then filled, are inaccessible at high floods. Not far from Carrock, at Halteliff Bridge, the river takes a subterranean passage, which it keeps for a space of about four miles, when it emerges opposite to Warnell Hall estate, near Sebergham Bridge, at a place called Spouts Dub. The subterraneous course is formed almost entirely of limestone rock, and, in dry summers, when the water is low, takes in nearly the whole stream.

HOLME CULTRAM PARISH.

The parish of Holme Cultram, which, since the passing of Lord Blandford's Act in 1856, comprises only the township of Holme Abbey, is bounded on the north-east by East Waver township, on the north-west by Holme Low township, on the south-west by St. Cuthbert's township, and on the south and south-east by the parish of Bromfield. The best survey that has been made of the parish is that of the tithe commission, the plans, &c., of which are under the care of the incumbent.

The manor of Holme Cultram, comprising the whole of the ancient parish of Holme Cultram, was demesne of Allerdale, but King Stephen having given Cumberland and the earldom of Huntingdon to Prince Henry, eldest son and heir apparent of David, king of Scotland, Henry, in the year 1150, gave two parts in three of the Holme to the abbey, and the remaining third to Alan, son of Waltheof, for his hunting there, but Alan at once gave his portion to the abbey, and Waltheof, his son, consented to the grant, which was confirmed by Prince Henry of Scotland, as well as by David and Malcolm, kings of Scotland. On the death of Stephen, Henry II. succeeded to the English throne, and resuming the grant of the county of Cumberland made by his predecessor to the Scots, the community of Holme Abbey acknowledged him as their founder, receiving from him a grant of the whole island of Holme and Raby, with timber and pasture in the forest of Ingleswood, which grant was confirmed by the charters of his sons and successors, Richard I. and John. The greater portion of the lands with which the abbey became thus endowed consisted of forest, but the monks soon brought some of it into cultivation, and erected granges for husbandry at Raby, Mawbergh, Skinburn, Culsaw, and Newton Arlosh, and turned all into tillage, meadow, and pasture. They also had several privileges and exemptions granted to them by the kings of this realm, together with a confirmation of all former grants, as particularly freedom from shires, and hundreds, and wapentakes, and toll and theam, and infangthief, and assart, and waste (except in the king's forests), and from regard of the forest, and escape, and amerciements and geld, and danegeld, and assizes, and seaward and castlework, and tallage and cornage, and passage and stallage, and scutage, and aids of sheriffs, and in general all secular exaction. The charters, grants, and privileges of the monastery were confirmed by the bulls of several popes, Alexander III., Clement III., Innocent III., Gregory IV., Innocent V., and Honourius IV. The manor continued to be possessed by the abbot and convent of Holme Cultram till the time of the dissolution of the religious houses. From the year 1540 until 1693 it remained in the crown. In 1572-3 there were no freeholders in the lordship. The tenants were to serve in peace and war on the borders with horse and armour, and to uphold the sea-dykes. Wedholm

Wood was granted to the tenants for maintenance of the sea-dykes. There were salt-pans under demise by indenture. The sea banks had been broken down, and sixty acres of land wasted and covered with sand. Newton Tower, a defence against the enemy in war, was in decay, as were also four bridges. Wulstey Castle mentioned below was also in decay. The inquiry which reported these things (and a return made thereto by jurors) stated that if that fortress was not maintained and upheld for the defence of the eastern part of the lordship in time of war, fourteen townships of the yearly rent to the crown of £120 17s. would be spoiled and destroyed by the enemy. The service on the border was to be one hundred with horse and armour, eighty serviceable men furnished with meener horses or nags, and footmen furnished with bows or spears, besides men's sons and servants. The salt-pans were washed away by the sea, and many workmen drowned. Those that performed boon service had for every plough for three days' work seventeen white herrings and six red herrings, a quarter of a killin, a quarter of a salmon, three wheat loaves, three loaves of yeoman's bread, and three gallons of ale; for every sheerbond in harvest, to every person for three days, three loaves of bread, six white herrings and three pints of ale; besides, at Christmas, every tenant and his wife dined at the abbey. The manor continued in the crown, and was granted as a jointure to Henrietta Maria, on her marriage with Charles I. in 1625; it was also granted as a jointure to Catherine of Portugal on her marriage in 1663, with Charles II. In 1693 the manor was conveyed by grant of the crown to Frances Villiers, of Middlesex, spinster, to be held in free and common socage by fealty at the rate 13s. 4d. per annum, under the royal manor of Greenwich. In 1695 the said Frances Villiers sold the manor to Bartholomew Burton, Esq., of the county of Suffolk, in whose family it continued till 1732, when William Burton, representative of the said Bartholomew Burton, sold it for £11,100 to Edward Stephenson, Esq., of Barfield, in the county of Essex. In 1768 John Stephenson succeeded by inheritance. In 1770 Rowland Stephenson, of the city of London, succeeded by will, and, in 1788, purchased from the crown the reserved annual rent of 13s. 4d. In 1790 Edward Stephenson succeeded by inheritance, and seven years afterwards Rowland Stephenson succeeded in a similar manner. In 1807 Edward Stephenson inherited the manor, which he held till 1833, when Roland Stephenson succeeded by inheritance, and in the following year assumed, by royal license, the name of Standish. In 1813 Edward Ferris Standish succeeded by inheritance; and in 1845 was succeeded by Rowland Edmund Walter Pery Standish, Esq., of Farley Hill House, Berks, the present lord of the manor. The copyhold lands are held by the payment of a yearly fixed rent, and by attendance at the manorial courts. Military service was in former times required of the tenants. It is the custom of the manor that if, on the demise of a tenant, his heir-at-law neglects to claim his title within twelve months, the next person in the line of inheritance may be called and declared tenant. If a tenant wishes to sell or alienate a portion of the land which he holds, the lord can on such severance claim five per cent on the value of the land so severed. The custom of the manor is that there shall be three courts baron and two courts leet held within the manor each year.

There is not, and it does not appear that there ever has been, a manorial seat within the township since the dissolution of the abbey. One part of the ancient conventual buildings was called the mansion or manorial place, where all the rents and revenues due to the monastery were formerly paid: of this, however, there are now no certain remains. It may be stated that there are in different localities of the parish lands of very considerable extent called Accursed Lands. The tenants who held them in former times had, for irregularities, been thus branded by the conventual house, in consequence of which these lands were deprived of the privilege of paying tithe, but were mulcted in having to pay what was at the time a larger proportional share of lord's rent. They have ever since been free from the payment of tithe.¹ All the lands of the township are now enclosed, in accordance with the provisions of an act of parliament passed in the year 1808. The fields throughout the township are enclosed with hedges of thorn, this parish not possessing the stone fences so common in the other portions of the northern counties. From the period of the dissolution of the abbey of Holme Cultram, the crown kept up the embankment along the sea coast until the year 1572, when the parish took charge of these embankments on receiving from the crown a grant, as already stated, of the woods of Wedholme, in East Waver.

HOLME ABBEY.

The township of Holme Abbey comprises an area of 5,330 acres, and its rateable value is £4,957 10s. 6d. About one-seventh part of the land, or 787 acres, is in demesne. The landowners, beside the lord of the manor, are the Earl of Lonsdale, Messrs. George Harrison, James Losh, J. Rooke, W. Ritson, Richard Jackson, and M. Grayson, all non-resident. The resident landowners who cultivate their own estates are Messrs. John Tordiff, John Grainger, John Steel, John Jackson, John Steel, William Tordiff, John Steel, John Younghusband, Alfred Jefferson, William Roper, Amos Hayton, Mungo Glaister, John Farlam, Joseph Backhouse, and S. Johnstone. The estates of the resident proprietors are generally of small extent.

The population of the township in 1801 was 590; in 1811, 600; in 1821, 758; in 1831, 861; in 1841, 868; and in 1851, 972: the greater portion of whom reside in the village of Abbey Town and the immediate neighbourhood; about 250 reside in the various hamlets of the township, and the remainder in dispersed farm-houses and cottages. The employment of the people is almost entirely agricultural, and the agriculture within the township is generally arable. There has not been much inducement hitherto to direct the people to other pursuits. The streams are few and small, and having little fall are not adapted for application as a motive power. There are no woods nor quarries, nor mines of any kind, to employ labour. The coal-field in the neighbouring parishes of Cross Canonby, Aspatria, and Bolton, does undoubtedly extend into this parish, but this coal, from the natural inclination of the seam, is probably at a considerable depth, and no attempt has ever been made to reach it. The fisheries also on the coast are not productive, in consequence of the large accumulation of sand in the higher part of the Frith, and do not employ more than a few families. The Port of Silloth, now in course of formation, may induce enterprising men to open out the coal-field. The people are remarkable for plain, blunt manners, and grave deportment: the first may arise from there never having been a gentleman's family resident among them, and the second may in part be the result of their living and working much alone. There is in general among them a desire to raise themselves in the social scale, and so to have their children educated. The yeomen are in easy circumstances, and the labouring families enjoy a considerable degree of comfort, inasmuch as the population being small for the extent and fruitfulness of the land, agricultural work, at all seasons of the year, at remunerative wages, is easily obtained by them. The effect of which is that there is in general among them domestic cleanliness, although too many of the houses are small and poor, in consequence of the distance and expensiveness, in times past, of all building materials; this, however, may be materially rectified, in future years, from the facility of carriage by the Silloth and Carlisle railway, which runs through the township and has a station at Abbey Town. Within the memory of persons now living, when the country to the east was unenclosed and without roads, the people here were obliged to go to the distant market of Workington, which is upwards of twenty miles from Abbey Town. In later years, Wigton, six miles distant, has been their market-town, on each Tuesday. Since the opening of the above-named railway, many of the farmers attend the market in Carlisle on each Saturday.

The village of Abbey Town is situated on the east bank of the Waver, six miles west-by-north of Wigton, and seventeen west of Carlisle. It had anciently a market on Saturday. Two fairs are held here in the year, for the sale of cattle and the hiring of servants; one of these is held on the Tuesday before Whitsuntide, and the other on the 29th of October.

In the year 1150, Henry, son of David, king of Scotland, being at that time Prince of Cumberland, founded at Holme Cultram an abbey for monks of the Cistercian Order, endowing it with two-thirds of the manor of Holme Cultram, having given the other third to Alan, son of Waltheof, as a chase for hunting; this third part Alan soon afterwards gave to the abbey. Some writers assert that Alan himself was the founder of the abbey; but from the crown rolls of the time of Edward I. the inference is drawn by other writers that it was founded by Henry I., and that Alan merely restored it from some injuries and increased its revenues. Henry II. becoming possessed of the county of Cumberland, by the cession of Malcolm of Scotland, took the abbey into his special protection, and having confirmed the grant of Holme Cultram and other lands, was recognised by the community as its chief patron and benefactor. Ample revenues were afterwards given to this abbey by various persons.¹ That the abbots were regarded with the greatest consideration by the kings of England seems pretty certain, for in the reigns of Edward I., and his son, Edward II., they enjoyed the rare privilege of being summoned to parliament, and, though not mired, they received from the crown many exemptions that were not enjoyed by others of their rank. It was in this abbey, in the month of October, 1300, that King Edward I., in person, released the Bishop of Glasgow from his imprisonment, and received his allegiance with much solemnity, in the presence of the Bishop of Carlisle, the abbot, and the French envoys.² We learn from the Chronicle of Mailros that this abbey was pillaged by the army of Alexander, the Scottish king, in 1216, and again, in 1322, by Robert Bruce, notwithstanding, as Harrison, the Scottish historian, observes, his father's body was there interred. According to the rolls of parliament in or about the year 1383, during an inroad not mentioned by any of our historians, the abbot and convent of Holme Cultram were obliged to pay £200 to the Earl of Douglas to save their monastery from being burnt. Nothing further of importance is recorded of the abbey till the year 1538, when Abbot Borrowdale surrendered it to Henry VIII.; its revenues being then valued at £427 19s. 3d. clear yearly income. Abbot Borrowdale was made rector of the rectory that followed, instead of receiving a pension. Browne Willis informs us that "the abbey was surrendered by Gavin Borrowdale, the last abbot, and twenty-five monks, on the 6th March, 1538, soon after which a pension of £100 per annum was assigned to the said abbot, which it is presumed was . . . ante an. 1553, when there remained only £1 16s. 8d. in charge for annuities, and these following pensions, viz.:—To A. Richards and William Simonson, £3 each; John Idol, £4; Robert Clement, £5; John . . . £5; John Wise, £3 6s. 8d.; Thomas Browne, £4 13s. 4d.; Richard Patison, £3 6s. 8d.; Nicholas Pigney, £4; Thomas Ireby, Richard Adamson, and William Morton, £2 each; Robert Banks, £3 6s. 8d.; William Marshall, £1 13s. 4d.; Richard Wade, £5; Robert Langton, £6." After the dissolution the monastic buildings were allowed to go to ruin, and a portion of the nave of the abbey church, with some other remains, are all that is now left of the ancient structure which the piety of kings, and princes, and nobles endowed, and in which many of the noblest of the land found their last resting-place. There is an ancient building very near

¹ Among the benefactors of the community of Holme Cultram appear the names of Anthony de Lucy, who gave them dead wood in his woods of Allerdale, for fuel for the abbey, and coal wood for their forges within Holme Cultram, but not to have coal wood for their iron mines without special license of him or his heirs. Richard de Alneburgh, and William, son of Simon Sheffling, lords of Alneburgh, gave them a fishing at the mouth of the river Alne, and William de Holderness gave them a doft and croft in Alneburgh. Alice de Romeley gave three acres of land and a quarry at Aspatry, with common of pasture for ten oxen, ten cows, one bull, and their produce the parish church, now belonging to the Earl of Lonsdale, and understood to have been part of the residence of the abbots. This building contains some architectural details worthy of notice, but it is much injured by partial demolitions, alterations, or neglect,—or, perhaps, all three combined. There are also other houses at some distance from the church towards the south, which distinctly show in the windows, and archways, and general masonry, that they constituted part of the conventual buildings. Long parallel walls of dormitories, of which the foundations were removed within the present century to be used as building materials for farm-houses, indicated, moreover, the great extent of the conventual buildings. These buildings were fortified against the incursions of the Scots, and there is still remaining, at a short distance on the north side of the site of the monastery, a portion of a mound, and at its foot a broad wet ditch. The present incumbent has found, within the last few years, on the site of the ancient abbey, several ancient monumental stones, with beautiful and elaborate crosses in basso relievo, which are carefully preserved.

LOCAL HISTORY.

The parish church of Holme Cultram, like all other churches of the Cistercian Order, is dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. This fine specimen of the architecture of bygone ages has passed through many vicissitudes. After the destruction of the monastic buildings, the church, in common with the other ecclesiastical structures of the kingdom, suffered at the Reformation; and the parish register records that, in the year 1600, the tower suddenly fell, bringing down with it the greater part of the chancel. Two years later the University of Oxford issued a commission for the re-building of the chancel, and the work was completed by the Rev. Edward Mandeville. The register also records another misfortune of singular origin. In April, 1604, a man named Harden went into the church with a live coal and a candle, to search for a chisel which his brother had left: the wind was high, and "it chanced that the coal blew out of his hand into a daw's nest," which set the roof on fire, and in three hours the whole edifice, with the exception of the south side, was burnt to the ground. Mandeville again voluntarily re-built the chancel, and the parishioners, at the command of the bishop, repaired the body of the church. It now consists of about the half of the middle portion of the nave of the abbey church; the rest of the ancient building having been gradually and effectually destroyed. The church in its original state was a large and lofty cruci-and Henry, son of William, gave them a messuage near St. Mary's Churchyard, towards the castle, in the same city, wherein he had built two houses, to find a light at the altar for private masses. Lambert de Multon gave them liberty to dig for, get, and carry away iron ore in Copeland, they paying for the same half a mark of silver yearly. Richard de Hervez gave them the meadow grounds between Cromboe and Waver, just before the meeting of those two rivers. Gilbert, son of Gilbert de Dundraw, gave twenty-four acres of land at Distington, and pasture there for 800 sheep, seven cows, one bull, two horses, and eight oxen; and Hugh de Moresby gave six acres of arable land there, and four of meadow. Roger de Lyndely gave, with his body, seven acres of land at Dundrake, under a yearly rent of £2 4s., payable to the Lord of Dundrake. Robert Turp gave fourteen acres of land at Edenhall, part of his demesne there. William, Earl of Albemarle, gave an iron mine at Egremont. Thomas, son of Gospatric, son of Orme, with the assent of Alan, his brother, gave the grange of Flimby, and common of pasture at Seton, Camberton, and Kernerast; and Alice de Romely gave common of pasture on Brehton Moor for the cattle of their grange of Flimby; and Edward I. granted them free warren at the same place. William, son of Orme de Ireby, gave his dwelling-house at Gilerux, with the garden, orchard, and other appurtenances; and the grange thereunto belonging, and twenty-one acres of land; and the Abbot of Calder paid to them yearly half a mark for certain lands in Gilerux. Agnes, daughter of Adam de Harrais, gave one acre and half of a perch in Harrais. Robert de Brus gave a capital messuage at Hartlepool; and Peter le Graunt gave houses and lands there, for which Robert le Graunt bound himself and his heirs by oath to pay 20s. yearly. King John granted to them the hermitage of St. Hilde, with liberty for forty cows in the forest of Inglewood and their young till two years old, and for as many horses and oxen as would be sufficient to cultivate their lands there. Richard, Earl Strongbow, John de Courey, and others, gave divers possessions in Ireland. Gospatric, son of Orme, gave a moiety of the vill of Kelton. William de la Ferte released to them all his right in certain waste ground nigh Kirkbride. Waltheof, son of Gamel, son of Welp, gave the

for two years; and for two houses and forty sheep. Gilbert, daughter of Richard de Hove, gave three acres of arable land at Plemoeg, and pasture for one hundred sheep, twenty-eight cows, and their produce for two years, one bull, and two horses, for maintenance of the infirm poor; and Morphey, daughter of Gilbert, gave two bovates of land there; and Adam, son of Dolphin de Lenrigg, half an acre. Thomas de Lassels gave pasture for their swine in the woods of Bolton, except in the time of pannage. Adam de Harrais gave them lands in Brunstibet. Thomas de Brunfeld gave lands at Bromfield; Adam, son of Thomas de Brunfeld, gave the manor of Bromfield; Henry, son of Thomas de Brunfeld, gave two acres of land there; and Agnes, daughter of Adam White, gave five acres of arable and one of meadow. Hugh de Morville gave the church of Burgh, out of the profits of which were to be found lights, wine, and all necessities for the ornament of the church of Holme Cultram, and for the service of the altar there. He also gave to the community of Holme Cultram a net at Solleburgh and in all other places upon Eden in common with the inhabitants of Burgh, with room to dry their nets. Richard de Lucy (husband of Ada, elder daughter of Hugh de Morville) confirmed the grant of the church of Burgh, as did also his younger daughter Joan, wife of Richard Gernon, who also granted to them common of pasture at Burgh. After them Thomas de Multon confirmed the said grant, and granted them two nets in the fishery of Eden for every carucate of land which they had at Burgh; he also granted them a toft and croft at the same place. These gifts at Burgh were confirmed by Pope Innocent V., who in his bull allows the abbot and monks of Holme Cultram to retain the whole profits thereof to their own use for the purposes of hospitality and maintenance of the poor, saving thereout a sufficiency to maintain a chaplain. John Fraunceys, parson of Caldbeck, with the consent of the Bishop of Carlisle, and of the prior and convent of the same city, granted to the abbey of Holme Cultram a moiety of an inclosure called Warnel Bank, in Caldbeck, which grant was confirmed by Henry III.; and William, son of Patrick de Caldbeck, granted ten acres and a half at Eskbend, in Caldbeck. Guido, a merchant and burgher of Carlisle, granted them a house in Ricardgate in that city; form structure, consisting of nave, chancel, transepts, side aisles, clerestory, and central tower, 180 feet high, at the intersection of nave and transepts. The lateral clustered pillars and the arches, which are six in number, on each side of the present church, are very chaste and graceful, and belong to the Early English period of Gothic architecture; the large east window is an elaborate specimen of the Transition period, and the west doorway is perhaps one of the purest specimens of Norman architecture in the county. Around the door of the porch of the west entrance is the inscription, "Robertus Chamber hoc opus fecit fieri, A.D., MDVII;" on the capital of the north pillar of the same doorway are sculptured the words, "Exultemus Domino Rego summo qui hoc sanctificavit tabernaculum;" and round the capital of the south pillar of the same are the words, "Non est aliud nisi Donus Dei et porta celi;" on the north portion of the wall of the said west entrance are sculptured a lion rampant and cross, the arms of the monastery; and above this the arms of England as they lands called Tofs and Hale at Kirkby Thore, also a marsh there with two acres of the land at the head thereof. Lawrence, son of Robert, steward of Newbigin, gave all the lands called Sperstanrig, and all his part of the marsh between Newbigin and them, and common of pasture in Newbigin field for 500 sheep, twenty cows, one bull, and thirty oxen. John de Veteripont gave a farm called Castle Rigg, containing twenty-five and a half acres, with pasture for 400 sheep, 20 weathers, and as many oxen, cows, and horses, as they shall need to till their ground in Hale, six cows, and one boar, with furze, peats, and turbarry. Arnold de Kirkby Thore gave two acres in Sandalsbath. Adam, son of Lyulph, gave all the land which was his father's, in the field called Morland, at Kirkby Thore, towards Sowerby, with three acres of arable land of his own, and the meadows adjoining thereto in the territory of Kirkby Thore. Fulk, and Anasia, his wife, gave two acres of land toward Warthebirch. Robert de Broy, and Amabil, his wife, gave sixteen acres in the territory of Kirkby Thore, with a marsh at the head thereof. Adam, son of Waltheof de Kirkby Thore, gave five acres of arable lands in the territory of Kirkby Thore. Adam, son of Waltheof, gave one toft and one croft in the vill of Kirkby Thore, and eight acres in the territory thereof. Gilbert, son of Adam de Kirkby Thore, gave ten acres upon Warthebirch. Amabil, daughter of Robert de Berford, and widow of Robert de Broy, gave all her land in Meidengate, and two acres of the land of the land. Hugh de Mervill gave pasture at Lazony for 500 sheep, ten oxen, ten cows, and their young for one year, one bull, two horses, four acres of arable land, and nine acres of meadow, with common of pasture in all his demesne lands there. He also, afterwards, with his body, gave other lands there. Renald de Carlisle gave Newby, near Carlisle, with a reservation of 10s. yearly rent to him and his heirs. Adam, son of Ketel de Newton, gave common of pasture for all their cattle of their grange of Mairburgh, over all his land at Newton, except corn and meadow ground, and liberty to make a water course over his land from Folestone to Mairburgh. Richard, son of Ketel de Newton, gave eight acres of land at Newton; and Adam, son of Edward de Newton, gave two oxgangs of land at the same place. Henry de Derham, with consent of his wife, Mand, gave half an acre in Ormesby; and Christian de Derham, widow of Michael de Clifton, gave all her lands there. Alice, daughter of Roger, son of Gerard, gave divers parcels of land in the territory of Sacmridagh, with common of pasture for eight oxen, two horses, sixty ewes, and as many goats, with their young for three years. Walter de Berkele, chamberlain were emblazoned in the time of Henry VII. (France and England quarterly); and on the south portion of the wall of the same west entrance, is sculptured a bear chained to a pastoral staff and mitre, the device of Robert Chamber, one of the abbots. On the north part of the west wall of the church itself is a highly ornamented niche, in which formerly stood an image of the Blessed Virgin, and on the south part of the same is a beautiful small Gothic window. In the churchyard there are the remains of a monument to the abbot, Robert Chamber above-mentioned, consisting of several blocks of red freestone, with vigorous and strong sculpture in alto relievo, of an abbot surrounded by monks, and which originally supported a large blue marble slab now lying much broken in the midst of them, and to which there must have formerly been affixed brass or silver plates of the mitre and pastoral staff, &c. In the church porch there are among others one large monumental recumbent stone, with a beautiful and elaborate cross sculptured upon it, which is said to have been of Scotland, granted to them lands in Galloway, which grant was confirmed by William, king of Scotland. Christian, bishop of Glasgow, becoming professed of the Cistercian order, and of the house of Holme Cultram, gave his body to be buried there, and therewith the grange of Kirkwinny, and charges all men to protect and defend the same grange, as they tender the blessing of God and of himself, and threatens, if they do otherwise, they shall incur the papal excommunication, the curses of Almighty God and of himself, and the pains of eternal fire; and Jocelin, bishop of Glasgow, granted to them the chapel of Kirkwinny, which grant was confirmed by Pope Innocent V. Robert, king of Scots, for the health of his soul, and the souls of his ancestors and successors, and especially of his father, whose body was interred in the church of St. Mary, of Holme Cultram, quits claim to them of an annual rent of £10, which they paid out of their lands in Galloway. The community of Holme Cultram had several other possessions in Scotland, given by private persons. Edward, king of England, gave them 300 marks yearly out of forfeited estates in Scotland, by his charter dated September 25th in the 30th year of his reign (1342). Guuld, daughter of Henry, son of Arthur, Lord Milloun, in her widowhood, granted to them all the lands in Lekely or Seaton, which her father had given her in marriage, and that they may have shields for their cattle in Crocherk, and common of pasture within the forest, so far as the cattle may go and return home at night. Thomas, son of Gospatric, gave eight acres of land in Seton, adjoining to thirty-two acres of their own there, and one net in Derwent, and one toft nigh the bank, where they might abide and manage the fishery; and John, son of Alan de Camberton, re-leased to them a pool which they had made, or should make, to turn the water of Derwent, or so much thereof as should be prejudicial to their fishery of Seton. Brice de Penrith gave St. Swinthin's Holme, adjoining to the river Eamont, near Penrith. The lands on the west side of Waverton Magna were given by Adam, son of Gamel; and other lands there by Roger, son of Gillestephen. John Gernon, and Margaret, his wife, gave the church of Wigton, with some lands, on condition that the abbots and monks should establish a chantry there, which being done, the church was soon after appropriated; Adam, son of Lambert, gave another parcel of land at Wigton; and Udar, son of Adam, another parcel, and pasture for ten cows, and their young, for two years, two horses, and ten sheep, with their young for one year. William, Earl of Albemarle gave a forge at Whinfield, with wood for charcoal.

placed over the grave of Bruce, Earl of Carrick, the father of Robert Bruce, king of Scotland. Sir Walter Scott, in his Lay of the Last Minstrel, canto v., sta. 30, alludes to the abbey of Holme Cultram as a place of sepulture for the northern barons.¹ The church has been much injured by injudicious alterations within the last hundred years, and by dilapidation and destruction during the two preceding centuries; still it is very venerable, and remarkable for its good architectural remains, and is quite capable of being to a certain extent restored.

No other township now properly pertains to the parish church, as the original parish of Holme Cultram has come under the operation of the act of 1856, for the formation of new parishes, by force of which the three other townships of East Waver, St. Cuthbert's, and Holme Low have been constituted three separate parishes for ecclesiastical purposes. The incumbent is vicar of Holme Cultram. His predecessors were, in former times, vicars of, and officiated at, Newton Arlosh, in East Waver township. On the donation of the conventual church and the tithes by Queen Mary to the University of Oxford, as mentioned hereafter, the parochial services began to be celebrated in the conventual church at Abbey Town, as being more central, and the incumbents then began to be designated vicars of St. Mary's, Holme Cultram. The old parish church of Newton Arlosh was built in the year 1303, before which period there was no proper and parochial church in Holme Cultram,—there only existed in different places small oratories or buildings for private prayer and confession; one of them existed at Mawbray, dedicated to St. Cuthbert; another near the Tarns, dedicated to St. Roque; one at Newton Arlosh, dedicated to St. John; one near Skinburness; and one near the present National School at Aldoth. The monastery was, moreover, accustomed at certain intervals to send one of the community through the district to hear confessions and administer the sacraments. From the time of the transfer of the parochial services to the conventual church, that at Newton Arlosh was neglected, and subsequently fell into decay.

The University of Oxford is in place of rector, and possesses the impropriation, having been impropricators since the death of Abbot Borrowdale, the first and only rector in the first year of Queen Mary (1553), by grant from the crown. The impropricators name the vicar, who must be a graduate of Oxford. He takes no specific portion of the profits, the chief part of his stipend being paid by grant from the university. The value of the living is about £170 a year. The value of the great tithes which have been commuted is about £900 a year; the small tithes, which on an average may be worth about £50 a year have not been commuted. The value of the living in the King's Book is £6 13s. 4d.; it was certified to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty at £45. There is no charge upon this vicarage of first fruits, tenths, synodals, or procurations. The parish registers have been carefully kept from 1581 to 1597, then there is a blank in them to 1606, from which year till 1667 they are not regularly kept; but from that time to the present they seem to be perfect. From a close examination and comparison of the registers it appears that the population of Holme Cultram must have been larger at the close of the seventeenth century than it was at the close of the eighteenth, due probably to the uniting of many small holdings into larger farms during the intervening period. There are in the register books entries of excommunication issued by the incumbent for the immorality of individuals so late as the year 1750.

VICARS.—William Robinson, —; George Stubbs, 1664; William Aboock, 1576; Henry Symson, 1577; Christopher Symson, 1578; Edward Mandeville, A.M., 1581; Robert Mandeville, A.M., 1606; Thomas Jefferson, A.M., —; Charles Robson, S.T.B., 1632; William Head, A.M., 1638; John Hewitt, A.M., 1684; John Holmes, A.M., 1687; John Ogle, A.B., 1694; Thomas Jefferson, A.M., 1715; Thomas Book, A.M., 1730; Matthew Kay, D.D., 1736; William Pattinson, A.M., 1782; John Thompson, A.M., 1809; John S. Jackson, A.M., 1814; Robert Collinson, A.M., 1822; Joseph Simpson, A.M., 1842. All the incumbents for the last hundred years have been resident except William Pattinson, who being absent during the whole of his incumbency, had for his curate William Barker.

A few years since there was but one church in the large parish of Holme Cultram, which church accommodates 840 persons. The present vicar, the Rev. Joseph Simpson, on his appointment, was induced, through the known liberality of the impropricators, the University of Oxford, to endeavour to meet the spiritual and educational wants of the district. Subscriptions were immediately raised for the erection of churches, schools, &c., and on the completion of the work, the University of Oxford and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England conjointly endowed three new churches in East Waver, St. Cuthbert's, and Holme Low, the particulars of which will be found in an account of these parishes at a subsequent page.

¹ Two inscriptions mentioned by Bishop Nicolson, in 1763, as sculptured on the walls of the church, and from him quoted by Hutchinson—the one, "Orate pro anima Roberti Chamber," the other, "Lady deyr, save Robert Chambers"—are not now remaining. The inscriptions mentioned in the text—one beginning, "Exultemus Domino," the other, "Non est aliud," have been to a certain extent very carelessly injured by cutting away some of the last letters of each, to fit a modern door into the beautiful old entrance of the porch.

The vicarage, a large, substantial residence, but without pretensions to any particular style of architecture, was erected in 1817, at a cost of £1,000, towards which the University of Oxford liberally contributed.

At Abbey Town the Wesleyans have a small place of worship, a neat stone building, erected in 1858.

There are national schools for boys and girls, at Abbey Town, erected in 1853, at a cost of £450. They are in the Gothic style, and are attended by about sixty-five boys and forty girls. The hamlet of Aldoth also possesses a national school for children of both sexes, erected in 1851, at an expense of £150, and attended by about forty pupils. All these schools are under government inspection, and have been hitherto supported by the children's pence, and a few local subscriptions. The University of Oxford has now made to the vicar an annual grant of £30 towards the support of the schools of his parish. There are two assistant teachers in the schools at Abbey Town.

This parish possesses no endowed school. Probably there are few parishes so large as Holme Cultram totally devoid of all endowments for education, and yet there are few places in which the people are more desirous of securing some education for their children. They have been cast upon their own resources; this has stimulated them and made them more self-relying. There is no endowed hospital or charity of any kind in the parish. In former times the abbey discharged the office of an alms-house to the neighbouring poor, and served as an hospitium to travellers, who, if they were men, were admitted for entertainment within the precincts of the abbey; if women, they were received into a private and separate building without the walls, which for a considerable period after the Dissolution was called the "Woman's House," but it is not now in existence.

A provident society was formed in Abbey Town, in 1851. It is supported by subscription, and has for its object the providing of warm clothing at a cheap rate on the approach of winter in each year for the labouring poor.

A reading room was established in 1857 at Abbey Town for the use of the labouring men. A small library has been formed in connection with the same, and is under the care of the master of the national school.

The only village in the township is that of Abbey Town. The hamlets, with their distances from Abbey Town, are as follows:—Abbey Cowper, one mile west, whose ancient name was Cowbyer, from the circumstance, no doubt, that here the monks kept their cows. Akeshaw is situated on the north bank of the Crummock Beck, five miles south-by-west; Aldoth, three miles west-by-south; Brownrigg, occupying a pleasant situation on the west bank of the Waver, near its entrance into Morecambe Bay, two miles north; High Laws, two miles south-west; Kingside Hill, one mile north-west; Southerfield, extending from two to three miles south; and Swinsty, a short distance south, where the monks are supposed to have kept their swine. The names of these places, and of most others through the whole of Holme Cultram, are indicative either of the locality, or the nature, or past history (however unimportant generally) of each of them.

The single houses in the parish having particular names are—Red Flat, Sanden House, Apple Garth, Coney Garth, Stank End, White Lea, the Hill, the Bog, the Moss, Hards, Akeshaw, Park House, King Moor, &c. It may be here observed that many of the houses, and more especially of the separate yeoman's dwellings throughout the whole parish of Holme Cultram, have been built from the materials of the ancient abbey; and it is very melancholy to notice beautiful windows, pillars, and in some cases admirable sculptures, which have been allowed to be taken away and placed in the most incongruous situations. This is especially the case at Raby Cote, in East Waver, which, with a large extent of land, according to a parchment document still in existence, seems to have been unceremoniously conveyed by Abbot Chambers, in 1503, to his brother, Robert Chambers, a layman, and to his family—one evidence among others, that, in all times, ecclesiastical property has been more or less subject to spoliation.

Kingside Hill, in this township, is so called from a tradition that Edward I., in one of his expeditions, probably the last into Scotland, had a portion of his force encamped upon it. The river Crummock, after bounding in part the township on its south-eastern border from the parish of Bromfield, joins the river Waver, in its course from the east, at the east angle of the township. From this point the united streams forming its eastern boundary, run in a waving line, and north-westerly direction, into the bay of Morecambe—there are only eels and flounders in these rivers. The bridges in the parish are—one over the Crummock, on the way from Abbey Town towards Wigton, another over the Waver, on the road from Abbey Town towards Newton Arlosh, and a third over a rivulet on the road from Abbey Town to Brownrigg. The public and ancient bridges of Holme Cultram are erected and kept in repair not by the county, but by the parish. There is no water mill in the township; there is one steam corn-mill in Abbey Town. There are several new bridges built along the Carlisle and Silloth railway.

There is no noticeable old mansion within the township, and it does not appear that there ever was any family within Holme Cultram which held rank with the gentry of the county. The reason of this may be that before the dissolution of the abbey, the whole district belonged to the community, and that on the Dissolution, the greatest portion of the land was divided among a multitude of tenants, with small holdings: of which class of men probably more exist even to this time within this district than in any other part of England of the same extent.

No stated feasts or wakes are observed among the people. The only revelry in which the careless and irregular among them are wont to indulge is the revelry of the village alehouse. The people are not remarkable for the indulgence of innocent amusements. This may arise in part from their laborious pursuits and industrious habits, and in part from their not having the means of harmless gratification supplied to them. It appears that in former years they were much given to football contests on the extensive commons of the district, but from this they have been excluded ever since the time of the enclosure. The inhabitants are generally marked for strong, shrewd intellect, and are not given to superstitious notions. The district is very salubrious, the cause of which may be that the land is chiefly on a level, with no narrow valleys, not much wood, and few rivers, exposed to the gentle sea breezes, and having improved drainage since the enclosure of the commons—much also may be due to the cleanly habits of the people. A secondary cause, or rather an evidence of the salubrity of the district is this, that the range of temperature is very moderate throughout the year—snow seldom falls, and when it does soon disappears. The productiveness of the land may be in part owing to this. The births exceed the deaths in more than the usual proportion, so that the population, at one time on the decrease, as before stated, is now gradually increasing. In respect to marriages, the fact that all parties, with very few exceptions, can subscribe their names, proves that a certain portion of education has been given to the people generally. We do not know of any superstitions in connection with deaths, funerals, or marriage; the inhabitants are in general plain, matter-of-fact people. They are not much interested about the past or the distant, and have a very small share of enthusiasm, or poetic imagination among them. The tame features of the place may have stamped, to a certain extent, its character upon their minds.

HOLME ST. CUTHBERT'S PARISH.

HOLME ST. CUTHBERT'S PARISH is bounded on the north and west by the Solway Frith; on the south by a stream called the Dub, which divides it from Bromfield parish; and on the east by an ancient boundary line having Holme Low on the north-east, Abbey Holme on the east, and Bromfield on the south-east. It comprises the township of Holme St. Cuthbert.

St. Cuthbert's township comprises an area of 5,884 acres, and its rateable value is £4,542 16s. 3d. Its population in 1801 was 589; in 1811, 678; in 1821, 701; in 1831, 740; in 1841, 766; and in 1851, 822; who reside in the villages of Mawbray, Beckfoot, Edderside, Cooper, and Pelutho, and in several detached farmhouses. Of the villages, Mawbray is the most populous. Foulisike and Gilbank are small hamlets adjoining Pelutho. There is also to the east of the church a few scattered houses, called the Tarns, from a neighbouring mere or small lake. Agriculture is the chief employment of the inhabitants; there are also a few fishermen. The people are generally simple in manners, stationary in habits, and in easy circumstances. The soil in general is not particularly good. Maryport and Wigton are the markets usually attended. This township forms part of the manor of Holme Cultram, of which R. E. W. P. Standish, Esq., is lord, whose courts leet and courts baron are held at Abbey Town. The chief landowners are Messrs. Thomas Barnes, Thomas Chambers, John Longcake, William Holliday, Joseph Holliday, John Grainger, John Asbridge, Joseph Wise, John Robinson, Rev. John Parkin, William Pape, Daniel Waite, Henry Spark, Henry Fletcher, Joseph Hayton, John Holliday, Richard Barwise, Joseph MacFarrow, M. Fearow, Joshua Simm, Joseph Pearson, Joseph Miller, John Ostell, Daniel Ostell, John Ostell, William Simm, Ostell Mordaunt, Joseph Bell, Daniel Glaister, Robert Biglands, William Wilson, Thomas Brown, Joseph Brown, William Brown, Thomas Chambers, John Younghusband, Thomas Green, John Dawson, Joseph Hayton, Daniel Mc.Mullen, the trustees of the late John Barwise, Joseph Messenger, William Tension, Robert Ball, Caleb Ostell; Ann Asbridge, Mrs. Miller, and Mary Atkinson.

THE CHURCH.

The parish church, dedicated to St. Cathbert, and of the first period of Gothic architecture, was built in the year 1845, at a cost of £800, and will accommodate 350 persons. It contains a mural tablet to the memory of John Wyse Longcake, erected by his father, Mr. John Longcake, of Pelutho. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the incumbent of Holme Cultram, and is worth about £100 per annum, arising from an endowment of £50 a year from the University of Oxford, augmented by £50 annually from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. All the rites and services of an independent parish are performed here. The tithes of the original parish of Holme Cultram have been commuted for the average sum of £900, payable to the University of Oxford. The parish register commences with the consecration of the church in 1849.

INCUMBENTS.—Isaac Cowman, 1849; John Short, 1852.

The parsonage house was erected in 1851, at a cost of £700.

The National School is a neat Gothic building, with master's house attached, erected in 1845, at a cost of £320. It is under government inspection, and is partly supported by the children's quarter penny.

Beckfoot is a village in this township about six miles west of Abbey Town. From the many ancient foundation stones found in its vicinity it is supposed to have been formerly much larger. Here is a place called Castlefields, said to have been the site of an ancient fortress, which is generally understood to have been one of the partially fortified farm-houses of the monastery. The Society of Friends have a small meeting-house here.

Mawbray, or Malbrey, is situated near the sea-shore, two miles above Allonby, and is supposed to have been the site of a small Roman encampment. Hutchinson says that "the vallum has been defaced, and corn now grows upon the site of it, though some of the inhabitants remember part of the wall standing." On a stone said to have been taken from the wall, was this inscription: L. TA. PRÆF. COH. II. PANNON. FECIT. This indicates that some portion of a Pannonian legion may have been stationed in the neighbourhood during the Roman occupation of the country. The Wesleyans have a chapel here, a small stone building, erected in 1843.

New Mawbray is a pleasant village near Beckfoot.

Pelutho stands on the brow of an eminence, commanding good views of the Solway Frith and Scottish hills, and here are a few neat houses, occupied by their owners. The lake, or tarn, near the Tarns hamlet, covers about thirty acres.

The village of Cowper, is five and a half miles south-west of Abbey; and Edderside is seven miles south-west from the same place. The land of the district parish is somewhat elevated, and in a great measure consists of a range of sandhills extending from its eastern bound to the sea coast.

ST. JOHN'S, NEWTON ARLOSH, PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the east by a gutter called Mang Dyke, on the north by the river Wampool, on the west by the river Waver, and on the south by the extensive peat range of Wedholme, or Wedholme Flow, which separates it from the parish of Wigton, and by the river Waver, which bounds it from the parish of Bromfield. It consists of the township of East Waver, which, by the provisions of Lord Blandford's Act (passed in 1856), was separated from the mother church of Holme Cultram, and formed into a distinct parish.

HOLME EAST WAVER.

The township of East Waver contains about 5,716 acres, and its rateable value is £9,800. Its population in 1801 was 371; in 1811, 393; in 1821, 502; in 1831, 481; in 1841, 470; and in 1851, 473. The inhabitants reside in the villages and hamlets of Newton Arlosh, Moss Side, Saltcoats, Angerton, and Raby, as well as in several detached farm-houses. The population consists of farmers (proprietary and tenant) and farm labourers, with a few artisans, such as blacksmiths, wheelwrights, tailors, and shoemakers. The people are very cleanly in their habits; the houses, however, of some of the farmers, and the cottages generally are bad; but improvements in this respect are beginning to take place since the opening of the Silloth railway, which runs through the parish. Wigton is the market usually attended. This township forms part of the manor of Holme Cultram; the lauds are held by lords' rent, and ancient freehold rent, payable twice a year. The manor courts were formerly held five times in each year. The chief landowners are the Earl of Lonsdale, — Backhouse, Esq.; Messrs. John and Silas Saul, John Clark, Henry Huddart, Joseph Donald, Thomas Chambers, Ismay Stubbs, William Huddart, William Donald, Henry Nelson, George Dunn, Henry Hope, Robert Glaister, John Rooke, R. Jackson, Samuel Hallifax, Joseph Cockton, Richard Jackson, — Norman, Daniel Dowson, J. Rigg, Jonathan Peat, W. Barwise, and William Elliott; Mrs. Deau, Misses Glaister, Miss Blackburn, Mrs. Peat, Mrs. Reed, Mrs. Chambers.

Newton Arlosh, or Long Newton, where the church is situated, is a village four miles north-east of Abbey Town, and seven miles north-west of Wigton.

THE CHURCH.

The church, which is dedicated to St. John, is of the Anglo-Norman style of architecture; it was restored and enlarged in 1844, at a cost of £800, and will accommodate about 300 persons. The original church is said to have been erected by St. Ninian, out of gratitude to God on his safe return from Rome, where he was educated; but it must have become decayed at a very early period, for Bishop Halton, by his charter, dated at Linstock, April 11th, 1303, granted a license to the abbot and convent of Holme Cultram to build a chapel or church within their territory of Arlosh, to which he annexed every parochial right and privilege, and all the tithes within their territory, with power to them to present a priest, for institution upon a vacancy, allowing him £4 a year, and room for a house, and who, in token of his obedience, was to pay out of the said £4, half a mark per annum to the bishop in the name of a cathedratium, and forty pence to the archdeacon for procurations. Many of the incumbents of Holme Cultram were inducted to the living in the parish church of Newton Arlosh, several having "read themselves in" amid the ruins of the ancient edifice. Arlosh, on the removal of the inhabitants thither from Skinburness, which had suffered severely in consequence of the inroads of the sea, acquired the name of Newton Arlosh, and in 1304 the abbot petitioned parliament that they might have at this place the market and fair, which had been originally granted at Skinburness. This petition, as we learn from the rolls of parliament, was allowed. The church then built, in consequence of the frequent incursions of the Scots, which the bishop mentions in his charter, was constructed so as to answer the purpose of a fortress. The strong old tower of this ancient church is still standing, and constitutes part of the present edifice. On the ground floor of the tower is a vaulted chamber, thirteen feet square, with a small aperture, eighteen inches high and nine inches wide, on the west side: over this is a chamber of nearly the same dimensions, with three narrow windows, or rather slits for arrows, on the north, south, and west sides; it has a fireplace on the south-west side, and a passage in the wall at the north-west corner leading to a small recess intended for observation; as also an opening on the south side, by way of view from above into the body of the church. The chamber on the upper story is of the same dimensions, nearly resembling that on the first floor, except that it has a fourth window on the east side, and no fireplace. There is a stone staircase in the south-west angle of the tower, leading to the upper chambers. So great was the attention paid to security in the construction of the church, that the principal window at the east end, over the altar, was only eleven inches in width. The University of Oxford is impropiator. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the incumbent of Holme Cultram, and worth about £107 per annum. The registers commence in 1849.

INCUMBENTS.—Robert Wightman, 1849; William Rothery stipendiary curate, was appointed sole minister of the parish, in 1847, by the Bishop of Carlisle.

The parish school is a poor building, without any endowments; the master is supported by quarter-pence; the average attendance is about twenty. There is also a school for girls, as well as a Sunday school.

The following are the names of the hamlets in the parish, with their bearings and distances from Abbey Town:—Angerton, six miles east; Moss side, two and a half miles north-east; Raby, one mile east; Saltcoates, two and a half miles north-east; and Slightholm, two and a half miles east-by-north; Raby Cote, two miles north-east, was for some time held by collateral relations of Robert Chambers, abbot of the monastery. This house was erected entirely from the spoils of the conventual buildings, and it is lamentable to see some most chaste and elegant sculptured monuments and inscriptions placed most incongruously in its walls. The forest of Wedholme, in this township, was granted by Queen Elizabeth to the copyhold tenants of Holme Cultram, for maintaining the sea-dyke bank, near Skinburness. At the village of Angerton there are some ancient houses, one of which belongs to a family bearing the name of "Charles," who have had an estate here for some generations, the owners, and now the only remaining representatives of the family being the two daughters of the late George Charles, who married the eldest daughter of John and Julia Reay, of the Gill. A tablet is erected in Bromfield Church to the memory of the family.

In order to improve the parish, the people require a better education; a heartfelt and enlightened Christianity, pervading all the duties of life; good cottages, sufficiently commodious for the requirements of domestic comfort. The land requires to be properly drained, and might be much embellished and improved by plantations of forest trees. It would be well if the people had harmless and healthful recreations, instead of that degrading intemperance which is so prevalent in many country places. Through the exertions of the Rev. William Rothery the privilege of regular postal communication has been recently obtained for this parish.

This parish is most remarkable for the longevity of its inhabitants, several of whom are upwards of seventy, and others upwards of eighty, years of age, and yet are in the enjoyment of excellent health, are quite able to manage their own business, and actually to walk with the spring of youth. The following, which is a copy of the inscriptions upon one headstone in Newton Arlosh churchyard, cannot be easily exceeded as a testimony of long life:—"Sacred in memory of William Donald, who died 16 August, 1800, aged 81 years; also, Jane, his wife, who died 1 May, 1809, aged 89 years; also, Joseph, their son, who died 11 August, 1833, aged 85 years; also, Mary, his wife, who died 13 December, 1827, aged 81 years; also, William, son of Joseph and Mary Donald, who died 13 June, 1855, aged 81 years."

ST. PAUL'S PARISH, HOLME LOW; OR HOLME ST. PAULS.

THIS parish is bounded on the east and north-east by the estuary of the rivers Waver and Wampool (Morecambe Bay), on the west by the sea or Solway Frith, and by the township of Holme Abbey, and Holme St. Cuthbert's on the south and east. It comprises the township of Holme Low, which includes several villages and hamlets, the principal of which are, in addition to the new town and port of Silloth, Skinburness, Blitterlees, Calvo, Seaville, Blackdyke, Wolsly, Causeway Head, Green Row, and Wath. There are also many excellent single houses dispersed over the parish, inhabited by respectable yeomen.

HOLME LOW.

The area of this township is 7,040 acres, and its rateable value (exclusive of the town of Silloth) is £5,932. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 637; in 1811, 767; in 1821, 811; in 1831, 974; in 1841, 933; and in 1851, 922; who reside in the villages and hamlets above-named. The population of Silloth is estimated at 850 or 900, and is rapidly increasing. Agriculture is the principal employment, but there are a few fishermen, who reside in the villages near the sea-shore. The inhabitants are generally remarkable for their primitive simplicity of habit and manners, and sterling honesty and uprightness of character. The soil is most excellent for cereal crops. The Carlisle and Silloth railway intersects the parish, and since its opening the inhabitants have been enabled to attend the Carlisle markets, having previously gone to those of Wigton and Maryport.

A sea-dyke, thrown up in the reign of Elizabeth, is the only earth work in the parish; its length is about one mile and a quarter, and it effectually excludes the sea, which would otherwise, at high tides, do much injury. If, as many persons imagine, there was in the time of the Romans a direct communication between the stations at Bowness (Tunnocellum) and Maryport (Volantium) it would pass through this parish; and may be identical with a road which even now bears the name of Causeway Head. This opinion is in some measure confirmed by the discovery of some remains of the Roman camp or fort at Mawbray, which would be a midway station between the two places.

Holme Low is a portion of the manor of Holme Cultram, of which Rowland Edmond Walter Pery Standish is lord, who holds courts leet and baron regularly. The township, with the exception of about 1,000 acres of common, at the east end of the parish, called Skinburness and Calvo Marsh, was inclosed in 1807. The principal landowners are the Earl of Lonsdale, Messrs. Charles Jolliffe, Richard Barnes, Robert Peat, Robert Glaister, Joseph Barnes, William Messenger, Richard W. Glaister, John Wilkinson, John Holliday, John Wise, John Tordiff, John Skelton, Joseph Backhouse, Wm. Hodgson, Joseph M. Sim, John Stamper, Robert Lawson, Jonah Pape, Jeremiah Holliday, Joseph Holliday, Wilson Jefferson, R. Miller, Joseph Saul, — Batty, John Hayton, — Asbridge, — Timperin, James Barwise, Daniel Waite, Fletcher Gash, Thomas Williamson, Mrs. Luna Saul, Ann Ostell, and the Carlisle and Silloth Railway Co.

THE CHURCH.

The parish church, dedicated to St. Paul, is situated at Causeway Head. It is a neat edifice, in the Early English style of architecture, consisting of nave, chancel, porch, and vestry, erected in 1845, at a cost of £350.

It will accommodate 350 persons. The windows are lancet-shaped, and six of them are of stained glass. The east window is a triplet, consisting of a large central light, and a smaller one on each side; in the central compartment is a full-length figure of St. Paul, in a richly floriated niche and canopy, below which is an illuminated cross with the sacred monogram. The side lights contain medallions of the emblems of the four Evangelists, surmounted by the Greek capitals Alpha and Omega. Over the window is a scroll bearing an inscription, to the effect that the window is inserted "In memory of John Messenger of East Cote, a zealous promoter of the building of the church." The other three windows in the chancel are also filled with stained glass. In the north of the nave is another beautiful window, in the centre of which is an oval medallion representing Christ receiving and blessing little children; this is surrounded by the text in black letter—"Suffer little children to come unto me," &c. An inscription in Latin states that the window is erected "to the memory of John Hayton, the son of John and Esther Holliday." Another memorial window has been inserted in the centre of the west end, the colours of which are very rich. It bears two large medallions representing the Adoration of our Lord by the Shepherds and the Presentation in the Temple, subjects peculiarly appropriate, the window being immediately over the font. In the upper part of the window is a cross, surrounded by the motto, "In hoc signo vinces." At the foot is a Latin inscription. The churchyard is neatly planted with trees and flowering shrubs. The proprietors are the chancellor, masters, and scholars of the University of Oxford. The incumbent of the mother church of Holme Cultram is patron. The income of the living is a fixed stipend of £100 a year, exclusive of the glebe and fees. The tithes have been commuted. The parish register commences in 1850. The Rev. Francis Redford, appointed in 1849, is the first and present incumbent.

The parsonage house is a neat Elizabethan structure of stone, rock faced, erected in 1851-2, at a cost of nearly £1,000.

Large parochial schools are now (1858) in course of erection and nearly completed. They occupy a prominent site in the town of Silloth, and are designed for 150 children. The style of architecture is a combination of Elizabethan and Early English. The roofs are high pitched and surmounted by ornamental ridges. At the south end is a neat bell turret, above which stands a well-proportioned stone cross. Over the external door of the porch is a neatly executed scroll in stone, bearing the inscription, "St. Paul's Parochial Schools," in Old English characters, below which is another stone with the date 1857. In the front of each of the chimneys is inserted a carved shield in stone, one of them bearing the inscription, "Disce Vivere," and the other, "Laus Deo." At the north end, adjoining a capacious class-room, is an excellent house for the master, containing six rooms, built in a corresponding style of architecture. The schools will be in connection with the National Society, and under government inspection. The cost of erection is about £960. Until the erection of a church at Silloth, divine service will be performed in these schools.

THE TOWN AND PORT OF SILLOTH.

The need of a safe port on the north-west coast of England had long been felt. The existing ports, as Whitehaven, Workington, Maryport, and Port Carlisle, being only dry harbours, accessible for a short period at or near high water, were inadequate to accommodate the increasing traffic between Newcastle and other ports on the east coast of England, with the west coast of Ireland. Silloth Bay had from time immemorial been remarkable for the depth, and comparative tranquillity of the water; having the advantage of a natural breakwater to the westward of Silloth bank. This bay has always been much frequented by mariners as a harbour of refuge; the invaluable roadstead having easy access and ample space, and being accessible at all times of the tide. It was to turn these natural advantages to good account that the Carlisle and Silloth Bay Railway and Dock Company was formed in 1854, which consists of the leading persons of the trading community of Carlisle. The capital of the company is £165,000, and its chairman Peter J. Dixon, Esq. Application was made to parliament for powers to make a railway from Drumburgh, on the Port Carlisle line, to Silloth, a distance of thirteen miles, and also for the construction of a floating dock of four acres area, and pier, or jetty. The dock is designed to serve as an entrance basin to docks of a larger area to be formed, should the increase of trade render them necessary. J. Abernethy, Esq., M.L.C.E., was entrusted with the works as engineer-in-chief. The act of parliament authorising the undertaking was obtained, after a fierce opposition from persons interested in the other ports on the coast, in July, 1855; and the first sod of the railway was cut by the Rt. Hon. Sir J. R. G. Graham, Bart., on the 30th of the following month. The railway was opened for traffic on the 28th of August, 1856. In the meantime the dock excavations were going on, and the foundation stone was laid, by the same right hon. baronet that commenced the railway, on the 18th of August, 1857. The works are so far advanced that the dock is expected to be opened before the month of March, 1859. The entrance gates, which are sixty feet in width, will be opened and closed by hydraulic pressure.¹ Extensive wharves, comprising upwards of eight acres, are in course of formation. The pier has been completed nearly twelve months, and is greatly admired for its strength and excellent construction. A neat lighthouse is erected at the extreme end, near which passengers may embark or land from the steamers or other vessels at all times of the tide. There is a considerable amount of traffic, although the dock is not yet completed; and first-class screw steamers ply regularly twice or thrice a week, between Liverpool, Ireland, and various parts of the Scottish coast. The traffic on the railway also exceeds the anticipations of the promoters, and promises well for the success of the undertaking.

Intimately connected with the railway and dock is the new town of Silloth, which is rapidly rising into importance. The company having secured an ample quantity of land, entrusted the formation of the town to Messrs. J. W. and J. Hay, the eminent architects of Liverpool, and their design is strictly adhered to in the erection of houses, width, and direction of streets, &c. Several streets have already been laid out, flagged, and paved; gasworks erected, excellent parochial schools, and about 100 houses are built or in progress. The situation of the town is most commanding; the view of Skiddaw and the whole range of Cumberland mountains on the land side; and of Criffel and other Scotch mountains across the Solway cannot be surpassed. The whole site of the town is sand or gravel, ensuring excellent spring water and a dry surface. The facilities afforded for sea-bathing are good, the shore being free from holes or rocks. Commodious boarding and lodging houses have been erected, and a large private family hotel (the Queen's), under excellent management, has been opened. But that which constitutes one of the chief advantages of Silloth as a watering place, or place of resort for the invalid, is the salubrity of its climate, and equability of temperature. The inhabitants of the old hamlet of Silloth, which adjoins the new Town, have been proverbial for longevity.

From a long series of observations made by the Rev. Francis Redford, a member of the British Meteorological Society, incumbent of the parish, it appears that there are few places, even in the extreme south of England, that have a higher mean temperature, or less range of temperature. This is doubtless owing to the prevalence of west and south-west winds, and to the influx of a portion of the waters of the Gulf Stream into the Solway Frith. Snow rarely falls to any great amount, and never remains long upon the ground.

It is proposed to erect a marine hospital, or sea-bathing institution, at Silloth, for the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, which shall be capable of affording accommodation to twenty persons. Towards the carrying out of this object, £250 has been given by Richard Carruthers, Esq., of Eden Grove, and as support is promised by various other persons, its realisation at no distant day may be looked upon as certain.

The following comparative statement gives a better idea of the climate of Silloth than a more lengthened description:—

We subjoin the report of Commander Calver, R.N., of the marine surveying cutter 'Seaflower,' on Silloth Bay and the approaches thereto, read at the meeting on the occasion of laying the foundation stone of the Silloth Dock, on the 18th of August, 1857:—

"I shall confine the brief observations I have to offer to three points—the seaward approach to the Solway Frith—the channel leading up to Silloth—and the roadstead near it. First, as regards the approach to the Solway, I may characterise it as free and unincumbered. It is an axiom with seamen, that to constitute a good position for a land-fall the point of arrival must be free from outlying danger; its outline must be well marked so that it may be readily distinguished; and, above all, it must have regularity of depth in front of it. All these you have in perfection at St. Bees Head, which I term the inner beacon of the Solway. This promontory is more remarkable than any other portion of the coast between the Solway and the Mersey; it is distinguished by a first-class light; it is fronted by a gradually decreasing depth, while there is not a single obstruction lying out from the main for several miles on either side of it. The outer beacon of the Solway is the Isle of Man, situated in the offing of the entrance to the Frith at the distance of only twenty-five miles, for being nearly in the direct track of vessels bound to the Solway from Ireland, the west coast of Scotland, and the western coasts of England and Wales, it serves as an invaluable point of departure from whence a course may be shaped to St. Bees Head with certainty. But the point, however, which by comparison, places the Solway in a far more favourable position is this: a N.W. gale causes the greatest loss in the deep bight formed between the north coast of Wales and the coasts of Lancashire and Cumberland. When this finds a vessel deeply embayed at or about the time of low water, when there is no entry into the bar-harbours under her lee, there is scarcely a chance left of escape from wreckage; and to this cause, as well as to that of thick weather and the consequent difficulty in distinguishing the floating objects marking the outlying sands, is principally due the loss of life and property which annually takes place at the head of the bight in Morecambe Bay, and at the mouths of the Dee and Mersey. With the Solway, on the contrary, there can be no embaying wind. A N.W. gale is comparatively harmless after the Frith has been fairly entered; one from the northward is of little consequence, as there is no space for the formation of a sea; while gales more westerly and southerly are fair, and blow into the Frith. In short, the simple effect of the configuration of the coast is this, that as a vessel's danger on the occurrence of an on-shore gale, is in proportion to her advance up the head of the bight towards Liverpool and the ports in its vicinity, so in like proportion is her safety insured under the same circumstances of wind by her approach to St. Bees Head. Another not unimportant feature as regards the safety of navigation is, that the whole of the sands of the Solway are recessed within a line joining the horns of the Frith—Abbey Head and St. Bees head. The second point for remark is the channel leading to Silloth. This is both simple and safe; it first skirts the Cumberland shore, and it is quite direct for nine miles, when it turns, and continues direct to Silloth. It will be satisfactory to the present meeting to hear, that a few days since, I took a longitudinal line of depths through this channel, and I found its main features to be the same as those delineated on the Admiralty survey of 1837; also instead of the two bars, so often referred to in evidence, I found only one, and the depth over it to be thirteen feet at low water spring tides, sufficient for vessels to cross it with safety at the first quarter flood. Assuming that springs and neaps flow 28 feet and 10 feet, it follows that the high water depth over the bar is 34 feet in neap tides, and 40 feet in spring tides. The bar at present is at the turn of the channel above alluded to, two miles within the light vessel, from whence the depths inward increase considerably, and so continue through St. Catherine's Hole up to Silloth. As a whole, the channel with the present lightage and buoyage is of comparative easy use by night and by day, and it would be rendered perfectly so by the addition I have suggested to those interested in the port. The last point to be referred to, is the anchorage in front of, and below Silloth. This invaluable roadstead has easy access and ample space. Captain Frazer calls it seven miles long, and a quarter to a third of a mile wide, with a depth varying from fourteen to thirty-nine feet. Captain Robinson assigns two-thirds of a mile as its general breadth— but admitting it to be only four miles long and a quarter of a mile wide, this represents a space of 840 acres, and allowing two acres to each vessel for a swinging berth, it consequently follows that the roadstead affords berthage for upwards of 400 sail of vessels, with ample protection in all weathers. The value of this striking feature of your port speaks for itself. I may further remark in connection with this, that I have taken some testing sections across the deep water in the upper part of the roadstead, and beginning abreast Lee Scar Lighthouse. I find the depths in feet, at low water and spring tides, are in progression as follow—34, 46, 40, 36, 31, the last depth is abreast the dock. Then in continuation towards the north side of Skinbiness spit are 26, 23, 22. The last being a quarter of a mile above the jetty. It will be perceived that these depths are rather greater than those in the cartoon exhibited on the wall. I am aware that considerable apprehension has been felt about the maintenance of depth in Silloth road and the channel leading to it, but when it is considered that their main features have continued as they now are for upwards of a century at least, any material loss of depth from natural causes must be regarded as a remote contingency; and fears will be further diminished if due consideration be given to the active agents causing the features of the channel and roadstead. These are evident: the principal stream of flood for the supply of the Solway Frith winds round the Mull of Galloway, and being directed by the trend of the Scottish coast, it naturally has a tendency to bite hard upon and to keep along the Cumberland strand in its progress upwards, while the ebb or onset from the Frith, meeting the vast mass of high-lying sands in the triangular space between the courses of the Eden and the Nith, is also deflected to the southward along the same shore, and to these combined causes the deep-water channel, the valuable feature of your port, is due. Allowing this to be correct, it follows clearly that the channel will always retain its capacity while the tidal economy and the relative positions of the rivers Eden and Nith remain as they are. The occasional prolongation of the Skinburness spit should not be a cause of anxiety; the surface features of all masses of sand, like those in the estuary of the Solway, are constantly changing. A succession of freshes, for instance, often cause considerable derangement; but after an interval the sands return to their mean state again: the effect, in short, ceasing with the cause. But even admitting a tendency to decrease to follow, your engineer, whose successful works in other parts of the kingdom I am well acquainted with, will no doubt tell you that, by the aid of a low and inexpensive rubble-work, curved along the edge of Silloth Bank, presenting a converging and accumulative line with respect to the flood and ebb streams, the four-fold result would be obtained of deepening the roadstead, making the tidal currents bite hard upon and keep clear the frontage of your works, render the extension of Skinburness spit all but impossible, and permanently fix the position of the channel across the flats towards Annan Foot. Such, in conclusion, are a few of the advantages possessed by Silloth. The view I have taken is a favourable one, but I can conscientiously state, that after carefully studying the whole case, I know of nothing of an opposite character calculated to lessen the estimate I have given, and I make the statement with the more confidence, because the subject is one of an order I am daily familiar with, and with which my experience for upwards of twenty years has been connected. I am not aware of the special reasons which induced the promoters to establish this port on the Solway, but I think I can perceive clearly that it possesses the elements of future prosperity. Unlike the case of a purely artificial harbour, where an increase of structure is too often followed by a corresponding increase of obstruction, Silloth possesses ample facilities for the extension of works to which natural agents alone will always maintain a highway; the character of its seaward approach and the depth over the bar, place it, as we have seen, in a superior position to Liverpool; whilst its situation at the narrowest part of the island at the back of all the coal-ports of the north-east coast of England, and in the line of the shortest track between the Baltic and Ireland, marks it out as likely to possess, eventually, an extensive transit trade. I may mention, lastly, for the encouragement of the promoters of this undertaking, that in 1838 I made an Admiralty survey of a spot where stood in their solitariness the ruin of an old mill and one or two indifferent houses. On this same spot, in an interval of less than twenty years, a flourishing town has been called into existence, possessing, I believe, a population of upwards of 10,000 souls—a chain of three wet docks—two extensive tide harbours, and a foreign and coasting trade but little inferior to some of the old established ports in the neighbourhood. I allude to West Hartlepool. The natural advantages of Silloth are superior to those of West Hartlepool, and you have my best wishes, gentlemen, that Silloth may more than rival it in the rate of its progress."

We have been favoured with the following communication from the Rev. J. Simpson, vicar of Holme Cultram, to whom we are much indebted for valuable information relating to this part of the county.

"Some notice may very appropriately be taken in a topographical history of Cumberland of the roadstead of the bay of Silloth, which is situated towards the north-west point of the ancient parish of Holme Cultram and on the south shore of the Solway Frith. Its natural features are uncommon and peculiar. It is in that part of the Frith which is in general shallow in depth and much encumbered with sand banks; it is opposite and immediately adjoining a portion of the coast line which for many miles on each side of it is very slightly elevated above the general range of the ocean tides; and yet it is a roadstead of considerable depth and great security. It appears to have been known as such during the whole period of local historical record. Its deep waters approach the shore opposite the hamlet of Silloth, where there is a long range of sand hills, which are in a state of continual accumulation. These hills are the effects of the tidal currents sweeping along the bed of the bay, which consists of hard and perfectly smooth clay, and depositing on the shore a portion of the sand which is brought up on each return of the tides; while the rest of the sand drifted up is through the action of the waves, deposited in the middle of the Frith, and forms the numerous banks with which it is in its upper and landward recess encumbered. There is indirect evidence that these hills may have existed for many ages in much the same state they are in at present, as there have been discovered at different times Roman coins and medals in the sand at no great depth below the present elevated surface. These may have been lost by legionary soldiers, as there is reason to believe, from the discovery of one or two inscriptions on stone, that the Romans had a watch station in the neighbourhood. The Romans left the island about the year 426; therefore the portion of the sand hills on which have been found such indications of their presence must have been raised at or before that period; consequently, the deep bay, of which these sand hills are the product, may have existed as it is for many centuries; and, as a legitimate inference, the roadstead itself must be the result of powerful and permanent agencies; and hence arises the hope that it will continue open in future years, and so render successful the present endeavour to form a port and floating dock at Silloth where the railway from Carlisle terminates. The question, then, which is presented to every considerate mind is this—what are the great natural causes that have been silently and effectually producing the results which human skill and enterprise are now endeavouring to turn to good account. The effects wrought out seem to be solely due to the unchanging course of the strong tidal currents, directed as they are by the configuration of the Cumberland and the opposite Scotch coasts. These currents, one from the south by the St. George's Channel, and another from the north by the strait between Port Patrick and the north-east of Ireland meet in the middle of the Solway to the north of the Isle of Man; the united stream sweeps along the coast of Kirkcudbright and Dumfriesshire to the head-land of Southerness Point. Here the sea channel is contracted to less than half its width by the said head-land and the extensive natural barrier or break-water of the Beck Foot Flats on the English coast. The tides, therefore, come up between these two projecting points with more than two-fold force and volume directly into the bay of Silloth, and meeting there with no obstruction along its hard and smooth bed form a natural roadstead, which is said by nautical men to be safer and better than any other along the whole extent of the coast of Cumberland."

Skinburness, situated near Grune Point, about five miles north-east-by-north from Abbey Holme, is a pleasant village, commanding extensive views of the Scottish hills and the Solway Firth, and appears formerly to have been a town and harbour of some importance. In the year 1300 Edward I. undertook a campaign against the Scots in Dumfries, Galloway, and the west of Scotland. With this view he visited the abbey of Holme Cultram, and inspected the shores of the Solway in that neighbourhood. The result was satisfactory. He found deep water in Silloth Bay, directly opposite his proposed field of operation, and accordingly fixed his dépôt there, and issued orders to most of the sheriffs of the northern counties to carry supplies to Skinburness. He next collected there a fleet of nineteen vessels, some of them of considerable size,—two being manned by crews of about fifty men each,—which he employed in conveying military stores and engines to Earl Warwick on the opposite coast. Skinburness had formerly a market and fair, for which a fine of 100 marks was paid by the abbot of Holme Cultram to the king. In 1301 the abbot procured a grant from the bishop for building a church there and making it a separate parish, but the project does not seem to have been carried out, for the town appears to have been washed away or submerged by the inroads of the sea, and in consequence of this calamity the abbot petitioned to have the market removed to Kirkby Joan or Newton Arlosh, which he desired might be created a borough. The request was acceded to; and in the charter it is stated that Skinburness had been wasted by storm and invasion, and that the inlets of the sea there became so deep that people could not resort thither. This event is supposed to have occurred before 1303. Whatever may have been the effect of the devastation thus caused, the place was not entirely abandoned by the government, for it continued to be the point whence supplies were conveyed over to the Scotch coast as long as the Edwards kept up their incursions against the Scots. The village of Skinburness is much resorted to in the summer season for the purpose of sea-bathing, &c.

The following are the names of the other villages and hamlets in this parish, with their distances and bearings from Abbey Town:—Black Dyke, hamlet, two and a half miles west-by-north; Blitterlees, village, five miles west-by-north; Calvo, hamlet, three miles north-north-west; East Cote, four and a half miles north-west; Causeway Head, where the parish church is situated, four and a half miles west-by-north; Green Row, a small hamlet, which possesses an academy, first established by Mr. John Drape, from whom it passed into the hands of Mr. Joseph Saul, who succeeded on the death of the founder. Mr. Saul died in 1842, and his old pupils and other friends erected a marble monument to his memory in the Abbey Church. Mr. John Saul, his son, soon afterwards became master, and the academy is now conducted by Mr. Isaac Drape. The school has been attended by pupils from every part of Britain, and also from different parts of Europe and the West Indies. Hayrigg, hamlet, is four miles west; Seaville is a small but pleasant village on the west bank of the Waver, two miles north-by-west; Wath, four miles north-by-west; Wolsty, hamlet, is situated near the coast, about five miles west; here are the ruins of Wolsty Castle, once a fortress of great strength, surrounded by a moat, and erected by the abbots of Holme Cultram as a place of safety for their books, charters, treasures, &c., in the sudden invasions of the Scottish marauders. Here Camden says, "the secret works of Michael the Scot lie in conflict with mothes." This celebrated man received the honour of knighthood from Alexander III., king of Scotland. He devoted himself to the study of philosophy, mathematics, and the abstract sciences, and is said to have spent the last years of his life as a monk in the abbey of Holme Cultram. It is pleasant, in retracing the past, to find that the rich monasteries of our land were often, during the middle ages, the sole refuge of the pious, and the quiet abode of the learned.

IREBY PARISH.

THE parish of Ireby is bounded on the north by Bolton, on the west by Torpenhow, on the south by Bassenthwaite, and on the east by Caldbeck and Uldale. The south-east side of the parish is high, and the soil a light red loam; on the other side the soil is also loamy, rising of a strong clay, and well adapted for the growth of wheat, barley, oats, &c. The parish contains plenty of limestone, some grey freestone, and coal, and is watered by the river Ellen. It comprises the townships of Low Ireby and High Ireby. The commons have been enclosed in accordance with the provisions of an act of parliament passed in 1811. The inhabitants attend the Wigton markets, and some go to those at Cockermouth and Keswick.

LOW IREBY.

The area of this township is 831 acres, and its rateable value £1,244. Its population in 1801 was 262; in 1811, 269; in 1821, 293; in 1831, 314; in 1841, 314; and in 1851, 331. In this township there are a corn-mill and two saw-mills.

The manor of Low Ireby was anciently held by the family of Thursby, whose ancestor, Herbert de Thursby, held it as an assart in the forest of Westward, and rented it of the king. Clerota, the heiress of the Thursbys, on her marriage with Guido Boyvil, brought the manor to that family. It was acquired of the Boyvils by William de Ireby, whose daughter and heir, Christian, married Thomas, the son of Duncan Lascelles, and afterwards Robert Bruce. This lady conveyed Ireby to Thomas Middleton, from whom it passed to the Tilliols. On the death of Robert Tilliol, the last of the family, in 1433, it was allotted to Isabel, his sister and co-heiress; one of the co-heiresses of her son, William Colvil, brought this estate to the Musgraves. A survey was made of the barony of Allerdale in 1578, when it was found that "Cuthbert Musgrave holdeth Base Ireby by homage, fealtie, and suit of court, and payeth yearly for cornage 4s. 6d., seawake 6d., serjeant's food and free rent 1s., in toto 6s." Sir John Ballantine married Anne, one of the daughters and co-heirs of William Musgrave, the last of the Crookdake family, from whom it descended to the family of Ballantine, coming ultimately to the Dykes of Dovenby, the present possessors, Mrs. Dykes being lady of the manor. The principal landowners are Henry Raiton, Esq., F. L. B. Dykes, Esq., Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., and some resident yeomen.

The ancient market town of Ireby is still a considerable village, situated on the west side of the river Ellen, in the township of Low Ireby, seven miles south of Wigton, the same distance west of Hesket Newmarket, and sixteen miles south-south-west from Carlisle. Camden considers it to be the site of the Roman Arbeia, occupied by a detachment of the Barcarii Tigrisenses, which others have placed at Papcastle and Moresby. On the map of Britannia Romana, in the Monumenta Historica Britannica, it is marked as the site of a castrum, or camp. The market here was granted, in 1237, to William de Ireby, to be held on Thursday, together with a fair for three days at the festival of St. Matthew (September 21st).¹ From an inquisition taken in 1578, we learn that "Cuthbert Musgrave, Esq., hath in like manner erected a market at Ireby, with two fairs in the year, taking toll and stallage, and other like duties there, the which, if it should continue, is very like greatly to decay his lordship's said market at Cockermouth, and utterly impoverish the inhabitants of the said town, which thing is to be reformed, for as much as the said town of Ireby is within his lordship's barony or seignior of Allerdale." Ireby was a great corn market in 1688. Mr. T. Denton tells us that "in this market all sorts of graine (big and oates especially), and also salt are sold at far cheaper rates, and by a larger measure, than in any market in the north; the reason is because of the great plenty of good corn that grows every where round that neighbourhood." The market has long been obsolete, but two fairs are held annually; the first on February 21st, for horses and cattle; the second on October 18th, for sheep. The ancient market cross, after lying in ruins for nearly a century, was restored some years ago by Henry Grainger, Esq., who is the owner of the old building once the Moot Hall of the town.

THE CHURCH.

Ireby church, dedicated to St. James, was erected at the suggestion of Henry Grainger, Esq., of High Ireby Grange, who subscribed £100 for the purpose, on a site given by the late Mr. W. Railton, of Low Ireby. The foundation stone was laid on the 13th August, 1845, by Henry Grainger, Esq., assisted by the Rev. Chancellor Fletcher and others; and the church was opened on the 6th December, 1846, by license from the Bishop of Carlisle, the Rev. J. Heysham, of Sebergham, preaching on the occasion. It was consecrated on the 10th of the following May, by the Hon. and Rev. Hugh Percy, late bishop of Carlisle, who also preached the consecration sermon. It is a neat Gothic structure, and contains a beautiful stained glass window, of upwards of 8,000 pieces, by Wailles of Newcastle-on-Tyne, the gift of Mr. Grainger, Mrs. Grainger giving the communion service, and furnishing the chancel. The church contains 260 sittings, the whole of which are free, with the exception of one reserved for the late Mr. W. Railton. The font of the old church, and a curious stone, commemorating John de Ireby and his wife, found in its walls, are preserved here. The total cost of the edifice amounted to £490. The church, which was formerly rectorial, was given by Alan, second lord of Allerdale, to the prior and convent of Carlisle, which grant was confirmed by Henry II. and Edward III.; it is now in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Carlisle as successors to the prior and convent, and receives £25 a year from the lessees. The benefice was augmented by Queen Anne's Bounty in 1809, 1811, 1813, and 1822, with four sums of £200 each, with which twenty-seven acres of land and a parsonage house were purchased. The living, a perpetual curacy, is now worth about £64 per annum.

INCUMBENTS.—Benjamin Lazonby, 1752; Jacob Jefferson, 1776; James Marshall, 1778; Joshua Clarke, 1842.

The parsonage house is situated contiguous to the church.

Ireby School is a plain stone building, rebuilt and enlarged in 1850, by Henry Granger, Esq. It is under government inspection, supported by quarter pence, and has an average attendance of forty-five pupils.

CHARITY.

School.—Previous to the year 1740, the sum of £100 was given by Matthew Caldbeck, Esq., for the establishment of a school in this parish. The intent of this establishment, as expressed in a deed dated 2nd February, 1749, was, that there should be a schoolmaster in the said parish, who should teach the children of such poor persons as the original subscribers should think truly entitled to this charity, in the rudiments of grammar and other learning, and in the principles of the Christian religion according to the Church of England; and trustees were appointed for the management of the said intended school. By indenture dated 19th July, 1770, certain buildings in Ireby were purchased by the trustees for a school-house, in consideration of £14, part of the said sum of £100, other part thereof had been previously laid out in the purchase of two closes at Birkmire, in the parish of Uldale. These closes consist of about seven acres, and are let at a rent of about £8 per annum, which is paid to the master of Ireby school above mentioned, who in consideration thereof instructs gratuitously eight poor children of the parish—four from each township.

Ellenside House, in this township, occupies a pleasant situation near the bank of the river, from which it derives its name.

HIGH IREBY.

High Ireby comprises 2,701 acres, and its rateable value is £1,042. In 1801 it contained 96 inhabitants; in 1811, 130; in 1821, 164; in 1831, 185; in 1841, 158; and in 1851, 174. The population here is entirely agricultural. There is a curious barrow on the top of Binsey, a large isolated hill in this township, belonging to Sir Henry R. Vane, Bart.

The manor of High Ireby was given by Alan, son of Waltheof, lord of Allerdale, to Gospatric, son of Orme, lord of Seaton and Workington, who gave it to a younger son, Orme, who thereupon assumed the name of Orme de Ireby, and was ancestor of two families of that name. Robert de Courtney and Alice, his wife, gave to this Orme de Ireby his manor of Embleton, in the reign of Richard I.; and he had also lands in Waverton. He had issue Adam, his heir, and William, a priest, who gave lands in Gilerux to the abbot, and convent of Holme Cultram. Adam had Thomas, his heir, and William, lord of Gamselby and Glassonby, and Alan, father of Isaac, who gave his dwelling-house in Ireby, called Isaacby, to the prior and convent of Carlisle. Thomas had issue John; and he, Thomas, father of William, who by Christian, his wife, had issue two daughters, co-heirs, Christian and Eva. Eva had a rent charge out of the lands, and was married to Robert d'Esteville, and afterwards to Alan de Charters. She released her share to her sister Christian, wife of Thomas Lascelles of Bolton, who had issue Armina Lascelles, married to John Seaton, whose son, Christopher Seaton, was attainted in the reign of Edward I., for taking part with Robert Bruce and the Scots. After this we find at Ireby one John de Ireby, who was sheriff of Cumberland in 1389, and also in 1392 and 1396. He was knight of the shire in the parliaments held in 1384, 1387, and 1396. This is the last representative of the name that we find at Ireby. At a later period this manor became the property of the Barwis family; one of whom, Anthony Barwis, Esq., held it in 1578, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, and paid for it yearly, for cornage and seawake 4d. It was purchased of the Barwis family by an ancestor of Sir Henry R. Vane, Bart, the present proprietor.

Ruthwate, another manor in this township, was granted by Alan, lord of Allerdale, to the Brans, from whom it passed at an early period to the Dentons. In 1676, Thomas Denton, Esq., sold it to Mr. Peter Norman, of Carlisle. It is now the property of Sir Henry R. Vane, Bart., besides whom Jackson Gillbanks, Esq., Henry Grainger, Esq., Sir Henry R. Vane, Bart., Henry Raiton, Esq., Mr. Daniel Birkett, and a few yeomen, are the landowners.

The principal mansion in Ireby parish is Whitefield House, the seat of Jackson Gillbanks, Esq., J.P. It is situated on the north side of Skiddaw, about two miles from its base, near the centre of a beautiful and extensive estate, comprising a fruitful valley, reaching from Binsey to the Skiddaw range of mountains, and stretching towards Uldale. The river Eilen, which empties itself into the sea at Maryport, rises here. In the front of the house is the small lake of Overwater, well-stocked with pike, trout, and perch. Wild fowl being well protected breed here in great numbers, and in winter it is visited by many rare aquatic birds. The father of the present owner improved the property by planting extensively,—when it came into his possession being entirely devoid of beauty in consequence of the absence of timber. The present owner is daily adding some improvement. The house is in the castellated style, and has a noble appearance. In the neighbourhood of Whitefield House is Little Tarn, a small lake, the depth of which is unknown. It is well-stocked with pike of an extraordinary size. This tarn divides the parish of Ireby from that of Uldale, and is connected with Overwater by a small stream—the latter also lies between Ireby and Uldale.

Gillbanks of Whitefield House.

This family derives its origin from the mountain district in the neighbourhood of Keswick, and several generations ago held considerable property about the vale of St. John and Threlkeld, where the ancient hamlet of Gillbank still exists, and where they are said to have resided, but the bulk of the property having devolved upon an heiress who married, it passed into other hands, and the family were much dispersed. One branch then settled in the east of Cumberland, where there have been a succession of clergymen of the name (under the patronage of the Howards) for many generations. The late Rev. G. Gillbanks held the living of Lamercoot for nearly sixty years. A distant branch is also represented by Thomas Gillbanks, Esq., of Culgaith; another branch, of which we now treat, settled at Southwaite Close, near Ireby, which has now been in their possession for about two centuries.

JOSEPH GILLBANKS, Esq., the younger son of Joseph Gillbanks of the above place, who married Miss Elizabeth Sheffield, was born 28th January, 1780. He went to Jamaica in 1800, and having amassed a large fortune as a merchant there, returned, in 1814, to England, when he purchased Whitefield House, Orithwaite Hall, Haltcliffe Hall, and other estates in the county of Cumberland, which the present owner has since much improved and beautified. He married 7th January, 1819, Mary, eldest daughter of Ralph Jackson, Esq., of Normanby, in Cleveland, Yorkshire, and niece of Col. Jackson, of St. Dorothy, Jamaica, and of the Hon. R. Jackson, lord chief justice of that island, which family has held large possessions there for many generations. This lady, by the sudden death of her cousin, W. Thomas Jackson (son of Col. Jackson, of Jamaica), has succeeded to the great bulk of that gentleman's property; and by this lady, who survives him, Mr. Gillbanks had issue, one son and two daughters, viz. :—

JACKSON, now of Whitefield House.

Mary Elizabeth married, June 1846, to R. M. Lawrance, M.D., and has issue.

Maria Josephine, married, 24th January, 1856, to Henry Gough, M.A., fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and rector of Charlton, Oxfordshire.

Mr. Gillbanks was for forty years a most active magistrate, and deputy-lieutenant for the county. He died suddenly on the 3rd February, 1853, and was succeeded by his only son, JACKSON GILLBANKS, Esq., of Whitefield House, J.P., born 5th November, 1819; B.A., and LL.B. of St. John's College, Cambridge, a barrister-at-law, patron of the living of Uldale.

Arms—Az, five hearts, in saltire, or, on a chief, arg., a rose, gu., between two trefoils, slipped, vert.

Crest—A stag's head, or. Motto—Honore et virtute.

The Grange is another seat in High Ireby township. It is a handsome building in the Italian style, and serves as a summer residence to Henry Grainger, Esq., a gentleman engaged in commercial pursuits in Liverpool, and who has a considerable estate here.

KIRKBRIDE PARISH.

Kirkbride parish is bounded on the east and north by the river Wampool, on the west by the Monk's Dyke, and on the south by Wigton parish. It has no dependent townships, but contains the hamlets of Powhall and Longland's Head. The inhabitants are principally engaged in agriculture.

This parish consists of one township, comprising 1,654 acres. Its population in 1801 was 249; in 1811, 256; in 1821, 308; in 1831, 383; in 1841, 372; and in 1851, 346. The Carlisle and Silloth railway runs through the township. The soil of the ancient land is good, resting on sound clay; the common is inferior land, and some of it peaty. The rateable value of the township is £965. The inhabitants are principally located in the village of Kirkbride and the hamlets above-mentioned; and generally attend the Carlisle and Wigton markets.

The manor of Kirkbride is parcel of the barony of Wigton, from which it was granted in the reign of King John, by Adam, son of Olard, second baron of Wigton, to his second son Adam, who took the name of Kirkbride. It continued in this family for several generations, till a co-heiress of George Kirkbride, the last heir male, brought a moiety to the Dalstons of Dalston Hall. The other moiety was afterwards sold by another co-heir to the Barou of Wigton, in whose possession it remained till the sixth Earl of Northumberland gave it to Henry VIII., who granted the same to Thomas Dalston, Esq. After this the whole manor continued in the Dalston family, who held it of the king in capite by knight's service, and the payment of 13s. 4d. for cornage, 22d. for puture of the sergeants, and 16d. for seawake, &c. An inquisition taken in 1578, informs us that "John Dalston, Esq., holdeth half the manor or town of Kirkbride by homage, fealtie, and suit of court at Wigton, and payeth for cornage, 8s. 4d.; seawake, 6d.; puture, 1s. 10½d.; and for free rent, 2s.; the rest paid by his tenants." A note to this entry further informs us that "The said John Dalston holdeth the other moiety of Kirkbride together with Ulton now in question as after appeareth." From this document we also learn that "John Briscoe, Esq., holdeth a tenement, or capital messuage, called Whinnow Hall, by homage, fealtie, and renders per annum 1s. The tenants of the town of Kirkbride pay yearly to the lord for cornage 13s. 4d.; seawake, 1s. 4d.; and for turn-silver, 7s. 6d.; in toto per annum, 22s. 2d. John Dalston, for the reserved upon the moiety of Kirkbride, paith yearly at the feasts of St. Martin and Pentecost, 7s. 10½d. John Dalston, Esq., above-named, holdeth the other moiety of the manor or town of Kirkbride, and the hamlet called Ulton (as is afore noted) which were parcel of the said barony or demesne, and sold by King Henry VIII. to Thomas Dalston, father of the said John Dalston, and were of the yearly rent of — over and besides the free rents of certain freeholders in Ulton aforesaid, amounting to the sum of 33s. 4d. per annum, holden of the said barony, which rents and services of the said freeholders the said John Dalston claimeth and detaineth by colour of his said letters patent (quo jure ignor.) the rents and services of which freeholders hereafter followeth:—Robert Dalston holdeth there a tenement and two oxgangs of land, late William Morpith's, by fealtie and suit of court, &c., and renders per annum 10s. John Kay holdeth a tenement called Garmsey Land, by the same services, and renders 9s. 2d. Robert Vause holdeth certain tenements and lands by like services, and renders 4s. 6d. John Thompson holdeth two tenements and certain land with other appurtenances by like services, and renders 5s. Robert Dalston holdeth there a parcel of meadow, sometime John Sparrow's, by the like services, and renders 9d. The same Robert holdeth another parcel of meadow, late Thomas Pattinson's, by like services, and renders 9d. John Thompson holdeth there three acres of land, late the lands of John Thompson, by like service, rendering 1s. 4d. Cuthbert Grainger and Nicholas Allison holdeth there one parcel of meadow, late Nicholas Brown's, by like services, and renders 6d. The heirs of Robert or Thomas Leche holdeth there three acres of meadow by like services, and render per annum 1s. 4d." The Dalstons remained the possessors of the manor of Kirkbride till 1764, when Sir George Dalston, Bart., the last of the family, sold it to Joseph Wilson, Esq., of Pontefract, by whom it was conveyed to William Matthews, Esq., of Dykesfield, and of him purchased by the Earl of Lonsdale, in whose family it still continues, the present earl being the possessor of the manorial rights and privileges. The landowners are the Rev. Joseph Hallifax; Robert H. Wills, Esq.; S. and J. Saul, Esqs., of Carlisle; Rev. Joshua Clarke; John Clarke, Esq.; Mrs. Hodgson; John Wills; Robert Ritson; Charles Lightfoot; Mathew Hodgson, Esq.; John Clarke; A. P. T. C. Somerset; with some small proprietors. The township was enclosed in the year 1810.

The village of Kirkbride is situated on the south side of the estuary of the Wampool, six miles north-by-west of Wigton. The river is here crossed by a wooden bridge leading from Kirkbride to Whitrigg for general traffic, which was erected in 1856-7, at a cost of about £600, defrayed by subscription.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Bride or Bridget, stands on an acclivity a little east of the village, and is said to have been erected previous to the Norman Conquest, on the site, and there is little doubt with the materials of the Roman fort or station, which formerly stood here. It consists of nave and chancel, and contains an ancient and beautiful font. The church contains several monuments to the Metcalfe and Hallifax families. From an inquisition de jure patronatus, taken in 1341, we learn that Sir John de Weston, Knt., was the patron of the rectory of Kirkbride, in right of his wife, the Lady Joan de Wigton. In 1580 the patronage was vested in the Dalstons, and continued in that family till the Sir George above-mentioned sold the advowson to the Rev. T. Metcalfe, vicar of St. Margaret's, Leicester. It was subsequently purchased from the trustees of the late Rev. Francis Metcalfe by the Rev. Joseph Hallifax, and is now the property of the present rector. The parish registers extend from 1662 to the present time. Kirkbride is a rectory valued in the King's Book at £5, and certified to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty at £44. It is now worth £250 per annum. The tithes have been commuted for £145.

RECTORS.—Robert de Bromfield, 1341; John de Westerton, 1342; Cathbert Fisher, —; Robert Allaby, M.A., 1580; Giles Hemmerford, 1586; Nicholas Dean, 1586; Mr. Hudson, 1643; Thomas Lumley, 1660; Henry Hall, 1678; John Walker, A.B., 1717; John Cowper, A.B., 1743; George Gillbanks, 1750; Francis Metcalfe, the elder, 1797; Francis Metcalfe, the younger, 1822; William Flowers, 1835; Joseph Hallifax, the elder, 1847; Joseph Hallifax, the younger, 1855.

The rectory is a large and commodious edifice, in the Tuscan style of architecture, erected between the years 1790 and 1800, at a cost of £1,600, and commands beautiful and extensive views of the surrounding scenery. In its garden wall is a portable Roman altar, with the inscription, DEO BELATVCADRO FEISIVS. M. SOLVIT VOTV M. L. M.

The village school is small and poor, but on the whole well attended.

There is a meeting house belonging to the Society of Friends. There seems to have been a family or two resident here soon after the formation of that body, but there are none now.

Beside the Roman altar just mentioned, and the ancient font constructed in the church, few remains of antiquity are visible in this parish. The church, as above stated, is supposed to occupy the site of a Roman fort or station, the upper and lower moats of which may still be traced on the western side of the sacred edifice. There are, however, no less than three ancient roads, at some depth from the present surface, one of sand, one of gravel, and one paved. This last is about three feet below the surface; and as far as can be traced they all run from south to north. The paved one goes up to the site of the present church, and was first discovered while removing some soil from the churchyard. Roman pottery, in the shape of urns, lamps, vases, and vessels of domestic use, have frequently been found in parts of the churchyard, and in the adjoining land. Some ancient British pottery has also been discovered, though less frequently than Roman, and many Saxon beads of glass, and other ornaments, which may be seen at the rectory.

Powhill and Langland's Head are two hamlets in this parish.

SEBERGHAM PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the north and north-west by Dalston and Westward, on the south and west by Caldbeck, and on the east by Castle Sowerby. Agriculture is the principal employment of the inhabitants—there is a small tile work on the common. The people are very industrious and clean, and as a general rule in easy circumstances. The soil varies much in quality, some land being let as low as ten shillings an acre, and some as high as £2 10s. Carlisle and Wigton are the markets usually attended. Sebergham parish comprises the townships of High Bound and Low Bound, whose united area is 5,890 acres, and rateable value, £3,668 19s. The commons were enclosed in 1765. The parish is intersected by the river Caldw, whose picturesque banks are clothed with wood; and the small stream, the Shalkbeck, is its boundary for a considerable distance towards the west and north-west.

SEBERGHAM HIGH BOUND.

The population of this township in 1810 was 434; in 1811, 474; in 1821, 565; in 1831, 494; in 1841, 195; and in 1851, 506. "Sebergham," says Nicholson and Burn, "was so called from the place where it stands, which is a hill or rising ground in the forest of Ingleswood, whereof the east and south-east parts were woodland and dry ground; but the south, west, and north-west parts were wet springy ground, covered with rushes, which the country people call siercs; and thereupon the place was called Sievy-burgh, or Sievy Hill. At the time of the Conquest, it was a great waste and wilderness. Afterwards, in the latter end of King Henry II.'s time, one William Wastall, or de Wastedale, began to enclose some part of it. He was an hermit, and lived there to an extreme old age, by the labour of his hands, and the fruits of trees. He came hither in Henry I.'s time, and died about the end of King John's reign, or in the beginning of Henry III.'s. King John granted him the hill Sebergham, and he left it to the priory of Carlisle, who also possessed the manor of Langholme, in this parish, by the gift of John de Sebergham. These estates are now vested in the dean and chapter as the successors of the prior and convent. The manor of Sebergham belongs to the Duke of Devonshire, as parcel of the forest of Inglewood.

The manor of Warnell, in this parish, was given by Henry II. to Andrew de Hercla, after whose attainder it was granted to Ralph Lord Dacre. William Lord Dacre gave it in exchange to John Denton, Esq., of Denton Hall, in Exchange for Denton, in the year 1496. His immediate descendant of the same name sold it in the year 1774, to the ancestor of the present Earl of Lonsdale. The old mansion of Warnell Hall, an Elizabethan structure, much dilapidated, now serves as a farm-house. It had formerly one of the large square towers common to many of the Cumberland mansions, and intended for defence against the inroads of the Scots. The family of Denton of Warnell sprung from Denton in Gilsland—their pedigree was certified at Dugdale's visitation in 1665, as follows:—

Denton of Warnell.

THOMAS DE DENTON lived in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II.

ALAN DE DENTON died in Henry IV.

THOMAS DENTON, Esq., married Alice, daughter of Thomas Moore.

RICHARD DENTON, Esq., of Gilsland, married Jane, natural daughter of Sir Humphrey Dacre, Knt., Lord Dacre of Gilsland, and died in 2 Richard III.

JOHN DENTON, Esq., of Denton Hall, married Agnes Sithe, and died in 27 Henry VII.

THOMAS DENTON, Esq., of Warnell, died in 6 Elizabeth.

THOMAS DENTON, Esq., of Warnell, died in 6 James, without issue, and was succeeded by his brother's son,

THOMAS DENTON, son of George, by his wife, a daughter of the Lascelles family, in co. York. This Thomas died unmarried, and was succeeded by his brother, HENRY DENTON, who married Elizabeth Oglethorp, and died about 1630.

THOMAS DENTON, his successor, was a captain of foot under the Earl of Newcastle, in the service of Charles I., and died of the wounds he received at Hull in 1643. His wife was Lettice, daughter of John Lowther, Esq., co. Stafford.

THOMAS DENTON, Esq., of Warnell, barrister-at-law, and recorder of Carlisle and Appleby, married Lettice, daughter of Thomas Vachell, Esq., of Cowley, co. Berks. His successor was THOMAS DENTON, Esq., who married Margery, daughter of Mr. Crackenthorp, of Newbiggin, in Westmoreland. His son, THOMAS DENTON, Esq., married a Miss Patinson, of Penrith, and died in 1736, when JOHN DENTON, Esq., of Warnell Hall, succeeded him. The latter married Mary, daughter of Mr. Thomas Wilkin, of Brough Sowerby, in Westmoreland; and by her had issue Thomas and Barbara. Mr. Denton, in 1774, sold Warnell to Sir James Lowther, Bart., afterwards Earl of Lonsdale.

Arms—Arg., two bars gu., in chief three cinque foils, sa.

The little manor of Hartrigg, which belonged formerly to the Dalstons, is now the property of J. P. Fletcher, Esq., who also owns Sebergham Castle, a large farmhouse about two miles west of the village.

A court leet is held annually here in September.

The principal landowners are the Earl of Lonsdale; J. P. Fletcher, George Dixon, George Gill Mounsey, F. L. B. Dykes, James Heysham, and William Denton, Esqs.; and Messrs. William Helme, John Studholme, James Connell, John Steele, Hugh McAlpin, and Messrs. Lee.

The village of Sebergham, or Sebergham Church Town, occupies a pleasant situation near the river Caldew, two and a half miles north-by-east of Hesketh Newmarket, eight miles south-east of Wigton, and ten miles south-by-west of Carlisle.

THE CHURCH.

Sebergham church, which is dedicated to St. Mary the Virgin, is a plain edifice, consisting of nave, chancel, vestry at south-west corner, built by the present incumbent, and western tower. It was repaired during the incumbency of the Rev. J. Heysham, now vicar of Lazonby, Penrith. Its foundation dates from the reign of King John, and it is supposed to occupy the site of the cell of the hermit, William Wastall, above-mentioned. Bishop Nicholson, in his MS. "Account of the Present State of the Churches, Parsonages, and Vicarage Houses, Glebe Lands, &c." in 1703, says of this church, "I found the outside in good repair, and the inside pretty tolerable. The schoolmaster teaches in the west end; and none but suiters come near the communion table, which is railed in. In the quire are the seats of Mr. Denton, of Warnell; Mr. Crosby, Mr. Aglionby (for Baxter's tenement); and Mr. Hill, of Bell Bridge. Here is also, against the south wall, a freestone monument, with the following inscription (in bas relief) on the side:—'Cumbria Warnellum Thomam deplorat ademptum Denton, qui si quidem Delatato alter erat nempe pius, Sapiens, ex omni parte Quadratus qualem vix hodie secula nostra ferunt.' And a little lower: 'Molliter ossa cubant; mens aurea vivit Olympo, vivit in Æternum Chara Deo soboles.' At the end, above his coat of arms, 'Thomas Denton de Warnell, Armig^r in Artibus M^r et dignæ memoria octaginta expletis An. feliciter Obijt. 1. die Aprilis A^o Dni. 1616.' The bishop adds, "the churchyard is miserably fenceless." The living is now a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the impropiators, the dean and chapter of Carlisle, and is worth about £170 per annum, arising from tithes and glebe; the value of the former being about £110, and of the latter about £60. The tithes were commuted in 1771 for a fixed quantity of wheat, viz., 267 Winchester equal to 89 Carlisle bushels; and in the same year a modus, or prescription of £9 Os. 11½d. was settled by an act of parliament to be paid in lieu of the hay tithes and corn tithes of the ancient land, to the curate. The parish register commences in 1694.

INCUMBENTS.—Samuel Relph, 1744; Thomas Denton, 1768; William Sheepshanks, 1777; ———, 1808; John Lynn, 1818; John Heysham, 1823; Clement Moody, 1846; N. F. Y. Kemble, 1852. No incumbents resident from 1768 until John Heysham in 1823. John Stubbs was curate to Thomas Denton and William Sheepshanks from 1771 to 1805; and was succeeded by John Dodgson, in 1805; by George Harker, in 1808; C. Thompson, in 1813; J. Lowthian, 1816; J. Irving, in 1818; who remained until Mr. Heysham came into residence in 1823.

The present parsonage house was erected on the site of an old one in 1773. It is an edifice without any pretensions to architectural beauty, but has been much improved by the late and present incumbents.

There are two parish schools, but without endowment; they are supported by quarter pence. One is situated at Sebergham Church Town, and the other at High Welton. Average number of children in attendance at the two schools about ninety.

Sebergham Circulating Library and Reading Room, established by the present incumbent and others in January of the present year (1858), is in a prosperous condition. It is supported by quarterly payments of ninepence to the library, and 1s. 3d. to the reading room. It is held in the school-house in Sebergham Church Town.

Sebergham Bridge is a hamlet in this township, delightfully situated, on both sides of the bridge, which here crosses the Caldew, and which was built in 1689 by Alexander Denton, Esq., justice of common pleas. Bell Bridge, about a mile lower down the river, consists of one lofty arch, erected in 1772, on the site of a previous one, which was swept away by a flood in 1770.

Newlands and Warnell are two other hamlets in the township, the former one mile north-east of Heskett Newmarket, and the latter one and half miles west-by-north of Sebergham. At a place called Iron Gill, near Warnell, is a chalybeate spring.

Brown Top and Monkhouse Hill are also hamlets in High Bound township.

Every farm-house in the parish almost has a distinct name. There is one called Sebergham Castle, having, however, nothing worthy of the name but a modern castellated frontage. Warnell Hall was formerly the seat of the Dentons, an old Cumberland family, the representative of which is William Denton, Esq., who lives near Keswick, and is unmarried.

There are two corn mills in the parish, one at Sebergham Bridge, the other is called Crookholme Mill.

The people here seem to have no amusements. They are never seen playing at cricket, quoits, football, or any of the games so prevalent in the south of England. They are singularly devoted to the public-house. A belief in supernatural appearances, and a dread of passing the churchyard at night, still lingers: a custom also prevails of sitting at night with a corpse. The incumbent informs us that he never lived in a place so barren of traditions, or documents of local interest. No one seems to have collected any information interesting to the historian, the antiquarian, or the geologist.

The Rev. Josiah Relph, "the pastoral bard of Canda's Vale," author of a volume of miscellaneous poems in the Cumberland dialect, was born at Sebergham Church Town in 1712. He was educated at Appleby School and Glasgow University, and was for many years curate and schoolmaster in his native village. He died unmarried, in the prime of life (it is said from actual want of the necessaries of life) June 17, 1743, at the place of his nativity, and is buried in Sebergham churchyard.

The Rev. Thomas Denton, another of the celebrities of Sebergham, was born here in 1724, and was educated by Mr. Relph. Like him, he published a volume of poems, besides which he edited the supplementary volume to the last edition of the Biographical Dictionary. He died in June, 1777, aged 53 years.

SEBERGHAM LOW BOUND.

This township contained in 1801, 308 inhabitants: in 1811, 307; in 1820, 338; in 1831, 346; in 1841, 358; and in 1851, 349.¹ The hamlets in Sebergham Low are High Welton, the most considerable hamlet in the parish, eight miles south-by-west of Carlisle; and Nether Welton, portion of which is in Dalston parish. There is a parish school at High Welton. Borrans Hill, the seat of James Heysham, Esq., is in this township, two miles from the parish church. It is a handsome structure, in a pleasant situation, overlooking the banks of the Caldew.

THURSBY PARISH.

THURSBY is bounded on the north by Aikton parish, on the west and south by that of Wigton, on the south-east by Westward, and on the east by Dalston and Orton. The soil, which consists principally of gravel, with a mixture of loam, is tolerably fertile, except on the eastern side, where an cold clayey land prevails. Its situation is rather low, along the river Waupool, where quantities of reed grow, especially on the swamp called Cardew Mires. Thursby parish comprises the townships of Thursby, Crofton, and Parton-with-Micklethwaite. The rateable value of the whole parish is £3,541. Agriculture is the principal employment of the inhabitants, and Wigton and Carlisle are the markets usually attended.

THURSBY.

The township of Thursby comprises an area of 1,382 acres. Its population in 1801 was 242; in 1811, 272; in 1821, 355; in 1831, 373; in 1841, 390; and in 1851, 411 persons, resident in Thursby village, Shalk-foot hamlet, and a number of single houses scattered over the township.

The manor of Thursby was given by Alan, second lord of Allerdale, to Herbert le Brun, who thereupon assumed the local name, styling himself de Thursby. His female heir brought the inheritance to Guido Boyvill, a younger son of the Levington family. This Guido had issue William, who with his brother John, were knights and foresters in Allerdale from Shalk to Ellen, which was the west ward of Ingleswood Forest—the office of foresters descended to them from the Herbert just mentioned. In 1299, Sir William Boyvill, Knt., held the same, and seven years later Sir John de Boyvill, Knt., occurs. Soon after this we find Thursby in the possession of Robert de Ogle, whose son Thomas de Ogle, in 1364, being then under age, presented a rector to the church of Thursby. In 1469 it was found by inquisition that Sir Robert Ogle, Knt., then held the manor of Thursby, with the advowson of the church there, of the Lord Dacre or of his barony of Burgh, by knights' service. The manor came afterwards to the Dacres, who held the same united to and as parcel of their barony of Burgh; and among the knights' fees in 1543 (temp. Henry VIII.), William Lord Dacre held Thursby of the king by knights' service, and 25s. 8½d. cornage. From that period it has continued to be held by the lords paramount of Burgh barony, and is now the property of the Earl of Lonsdale. The landowners are Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; John R. Wilson, Esq., J.P.; and a few resident yeomen.

The village of Thursby is pleasantly situated on the Carlisle and Wigton road, six miles south-west from Carlisle, and five miles east-north-east from Wigton.

THE CHURCH.

Thursby church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is situated on an elevation a little west of the village. It is a beautiful edifice, in the style of architecture prevalent in the 13th century, erected in 1846, on the site of the old church, which is said to have been built by David I. of Scotland.¹ The funds for its construction were raised by a parochial rate of 3s. 6d. in the pound, aided by £500 left by the late Sir John Brisco. The cost of the bells was defrayed by a separate rate. The interior of the church is neatly fitted up for the requirements of public service, according to the rites of the Church of England. There are four marble monuments to members of the Brisco family, whose last resting place is here. The old font is preserved in the present church. The benefice was a rectory, till about the year 1469, when Sir Robert Ogle granted it to the prior and convent of Carlisle; but is now a vicarage in the patronage of the dean and chapter of the diocese. It is valued in the King's Book at £11 10s.; its present value is about £160, exclusive of upwards of twenty-one acres of glebe. The vicar, by prescription, is entitled to all the small tithes of the parish, and the great and small tithes of two townships of Parton and Micklethwaite, and Crofton and Whinnow. In 1638 the tithes were commuted for a yearly rent charge of £354, of which £150 (the rectorial tithes of Thursby township) are leased by the dean and chapter. The parish register commences in 1680.

¹ Bishop Newson, in 1760, says "I found the church in tolerable good order; well paved, and pretty well seated. Mr. Brisco's aisle in much the worse condition, upon props and ready to fall. He promises to put it into a better state immediately. One of the bells broken and the chest without a lock upon it. I complained to Mr. Waite, the vicar, that I had seen one of Mr. Oley's books (Hammond on the Psalms) at Rose; and upon enquiry had found that himself had lent it, contrary to the engagement of his predecessor and his own present obligation, to Mr. Wybergh. He confessed his fault in it; and promised that the list of books should be forthwith entered in the parish register, and the will of the donor more exactly observed hereafter. Foreseeing that I might possibly meet with the like failures in those other parishes that are concerned in this benefice, I desired my brother, and secretary, at my return, to look out the papers relative to it; which he did. And they have been traced:—Books given to ten poor vicarages (Crosby-on-Eden, Isell, Dalston, Thursby, Wigton, Askham, Ainstable, Deerham, Crosby-Ravenworth, Burgh-upon-Sands) by Mr. Barnabas Oley, 1655. Dr. Hammond's Works, 4 vols. folio; Bishop Andrews' Sermons, folio; Mr. Mede's Works, folio; Bishop Sanderson's Sermons, folio; Bishop Sanderson's Nine Cases of Conscience, 8vo; Bishop Pearson on the Creed, folio; Bishop Cusher's Body of Divinity, folio; the works of the author of the Whole Duty of Man, folio; Bishop Sparrow's Rationale, 8vo; Bishop Sparrow's Collection of Canons, 4to; Dr. Cave's Primitive Christianity; Herbert's Country Parson, 8vo; Isaac Walton's Lives, 8vo." The bishop then gives the articles of agreement by the several vicars who received these books for the use of themselves. Some of the parishes received instead of Dr. Hammond's Works, Dr. Jackson's Works, 3 vols. folio, and Dr. Towerson's Works, 1 vol. folio.

The vicarage house is a good residence contiguous to the church.

Thursby School is a handsome stone building, erected in 1740, rebuilt in 1848. The only endowment which this school has acquired is from Thomas Thomlinson, Esq., a native of this parish, who died in America, and by his will, dated 16th April, 1798, bequeathed the residue of his personal property, not otherwise disposed of, to the schools of Thursby, Bromfield, Uldale, and Wigton, to be divided equally amongst them, and to become a part of the funds of those respective schools. The sum of £354 was received as the share of the testator's personal estate, bequeathed to the school at Thursby. It is placed in the hands of Sir Wastel Brisco, one of the trustees, who pays four per cent yearly interest (£14 8s. 4d.) to the master, who, in respect thereof teaches ten poor children at a low quarterage. It is under government inspection, and has an average attendance of fifty children.

CHARITIES.

Thomlinson's Charity for the Poor.—The Thomas Thomlinson mentioned above also in the same year bequeathed to the poor of Thursby, Uldale, and Wigton—to the first-mentioned parish £160, and to the two last-mentioned parishes £60 each, to be distributed by the minister and churchwardens for the time being of the respective parishes, amongst the most industrious and deserving objects, and in such manner that their ordinary allowances from the said parishes (if any there should be) should not be lessened thereby. £155 was received for the legacy left to this parish, after the payment of expenses. The interest of this sum, amounting to £7 15s. per annum, is distributed annually amongst six or seven poor industrious parishioners, as directed by the testator.

Gibson's Charity.—Thomas Gibson, by will, dated 14th November, 1798, gave to the poor of Thursby parish £30 to be divided on the Christmas-day after his decease, as the churchwardens should think proper. He also gave to the industrious poor of the said parish £5 for ever, on the said Christmas-day. The testator died in 1800, leaving personal property insufficient for the payment of the debts and legacies which he had charged thereon, a suit in chancery was in consequence instituted against his executors, by the different persons who claimed any interest in his effects. In the course of the cause it was referred to the master to take an account of the testator's personal estate, and to apportion the assets according to the amount of the different legacies; and he was further directed to have the legacy of £5 per annum to the poor of Thursby valued at a gross sum. On the 11th July, 1803, the master reported that there was due to the parish of Thursby, for the legacy of £30, with interest £32 6s. 8d.; for their legacy of £5 with interest, according to a valuation made thereof, £125; in respect of which he approved of the following apportionment:—For the former, £17 2s. 7d.; for the latter, £66 4s. 7d.; total, £78 7s. 2d. The amount of both these legacies was directed by the court to be laid out in the purchase of stock in the three per cent consols, which was accordingly done. In the year 1817, the stock was sold out by the trustees, and the produce being £107, was placed in private hands at five per cent interest. By this measure the interest was increased from £4 12s. to £5 7s. per annum, which is given away annually by the minister and churchwardens to about fourteen or fifteen poor industrious persons residing in the parish, whether they are settled parishioners or not.

John Studholme, of Moor End, a celebrated essayist, was born in this parish.

Evening Hill is a hamlet in this township. Here is the residence of John Knubley Wilson, Esq., lieutenant of the Cumberland Militia. It is a large mansion in the Elizabethan style, erected about twenty-four years ago, by its present proprietor, and commands some beautiful views of the surrounding country.

Moor End and Meal House are also hamlets in Thursby township.

CROFTON.

Crofton township occupies the centre of the parish, and contains 975 acres. The number of inhabitants in 1801, was 69; in 1811, 58; in 1821, 65; in 1831, 106; in 1841, 80; and in 1851, 90, living dispersedly in single houses, and in the hamlet of Whinnow.

The first recorded possessor of the manor of Crofton is Sir Gilbert, son of Gilbert de Dundraw, who lived in the time of King John. He gave a parcel of Crofton to the hospital of St. Nicholas, at Carlisle, and bound that land to grind at his mill at Crofton. He had daughters, co-heirs; one of whom, Ada, was married to Stephen de Crofton; after whom there was John de Crofton, Robert de Crofton, John de Crofton, and Clement de Crofton, who died in 1360-70, and was succeeded by his son, Sir John de Crofton, whose daughter and heir was married about 1390 to Isold Brisco, of Brisco, whereupon Crofton came into the possession of the Brisco family, who have continued to hold it to our own time, Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart., being the present lord of the manor and owner of the township.

Crofton Hall, the beautiful seat of Sir Wastel Brisco, occupies a delightful situation on the north bank of the Wampool, about four miles east-by-north from Wigton, and one mile west from the parish church. It has been considerably enlarged and improved during recent years, by its present proprietor. At a little distance from the hall is a conical mound of considerable size, bearing the name of Torquin. It is clothed with wood, and is said to have been the residence of two gigantic brothers.

Whinnow, a hamlet in this township, is three and a quarter miles east-north-east of Wigton.

Many antiquities have been found in this township, amongst others, several old coins, one of which had the arms of England and France, on a shield, with the legend E. D. G. Rosa sine spina, on the obverse; on the reverse, Civitas London.

Brisco of Crofton Hall.

The surname of this family was originally De Birk-skeugh, from their abode being at Birk-skeugh, or Birkswood, near Newbiggin, in a lordship belonging to the priory of Carlisle, a large portion of which estate is still in their possession.

ISOLD BRISCO obtained the manors of Crofton, Whinnow, and Dundraw, with Margaret, his wife, daughter and heir of Sir John Crofton, Knt., of Crofton, and was succeeded by his son,

CHRISTOPHER BRISCO, of Crofton. It appears by an arbitration between the prior of Carlisle and this Christopher, concerning the manor of Brisco, that the said manor should remain to the prior and his successors, paying to the said Christopher one hundred marks; and that the capital messuage, with the woods for building, should remain to the said Christopher and his heirs. This Christopher kept fourteen soldiers at Briscothorn-upon-Esk. He was taken prisoner at the burning of Wigton; and on that and similar occasions was forced to mortgage a considerable part of his estate. He was succeeded by his son,

ROBERT BRISCO, of Crofton, who married Isabel, daughter of William Dykes, of Warthole, by whom he had issue,

1. Thomas, a priest.

2. ROBERT, who succeeded his father.

3. Isold, who served against the Saracens, and died a hermit.

4. Edward Brisco, of Westward, from whom the families of Westward and Alkingtons, Horford, are descended.

5. Alexander Brisco, from whom are descended the Briscos of Yarrow, &c. Northampton, and two daughters, 5th, married to Richard Brown, and 6th, married to Robert Ellis, of Boddil.

ROBERT BRISCO, of Crofton, second son of the last Robert, married Catharine, daughter and sole heir of Clement Skelton, of Peteril Way, and had issue.

JOHN BRISCO, of Crofton, who married Janet, daughter of Thomas Salkeld, Esq., of Corby.

RICHARD BRISCO, of Crofton, son of John, married a daughter of Leigh, of Frisington, by whom he had issue ROBERT and LEONARD; the latter of whom had a son, Robert, who married the heiress of Coldhall, in whose posterity that inheritance continued for four generations, when that branch became extinct.

ROBERT BRISCO, of Crofton, son and heir of Richard, was slain at the battle of Solway Moss; in reward of whose services, Henry VIII. remitted the wardship of his infant son for the benefit of the widow and the said infant.

JOHN BRISCO, of Crofton, son and heir of Robert, married Anne, daughter of William Musgrave, Esq., of Hayton. He purchased Leigh's part of the manor of Orton, in Cumberland, of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Maud, his wife, late wife of Thomas Leigh, of Isell; and another third part of Thomas Blennerhasset, of Carlisle. He was succeeded by his son and heir, JOHN BRISCO, of Crofton, who married Mary, daughter of Sir Thomas Braidwaite, of Burneshead, and by her had sixteen children, viz., ten sons and six daughters.

1. Thomas, who died in infancy.

2. Thomas, who also died in infancy.

3. WILLIAM, his successor.

4. John Brisco, of Wampool, who married Judith, a daughter of — Bewley.

5. Edward, a merchant in London, who married a daughter of — Tolson, Esq., of Bridekirk, and died without issue.

6. Richard, who died young.

7. Thomas, who died in infancy.

8. Christopher, who died in Ireland, unmarried.

9. Francis, a captain of horse in the civil wars, who died unmarried.

10. Nazareth, who died in his travels beyond the sea, unmarried.

11. Jane, who died unmarried.

12. Dorothy, married to Sir John Ponsonby, of Hale, colonel of a regiment in the civil wars, who went over into Ireland with Cromwell, and settled there; and was ancestor of the Earls of Besborough.

13. Grace, married to Clement Skelton, of Peltentway.

14. Mary, who died young.

15. Mary, married to the Rev. Joseph Nicolson, father (by her) of William Nicolson, Lord Bishop of Carlisle.

16. Agnes, married to William Rayson, of Dalston.

WILLIAM BRISCO, of Crofton, third son and heir of John, married twice. By his first wife, Susannah, daughter of Sir Randal Cranfield, he had issue one son, who died young. By his second wife, Susannah, daughter of Francis Brown, merchant and alderman of London, he had issue,

1. JOHN, who succeeded him.

2. William, a merchant in London, who died without issue.

3. Thomas, who married Jane, daughter of Lancelot Fletcher, Esq., of Tallantire, and widow of Major Crisp, by whom he had issue.

JOHN BRISCO, of Crofton, eldest son and heir of William, married Mercy, daughter of William Johnson, of Kibblesworth, in county Durham, alderman of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and by her had issue,

1. William, who died unmarried.

II. JOHN, his successor.

III. Thomas, who died unmarried.

VI. Nathaniel, who also died unmarried.

V. Richard. VI. Henry.

I. Margaret, who married George Longstaff, Esq.

II. Susanna, who married Rev. David Bell, rector of Orton and Asparia.

III. Abigail, married to Henry Bisco, of Backborough, in Ireland.

IV. Mary.

He was succeeded by his second son,

JOHN BRISCO, Esq., of Crofton, who married Catherine, daughter of Sir Richard Musgrave, of Hayton, and by her had issue,

I. Richard, who married a daughter of Lamplugh, of Lamplugh, and died before his father, without issue.

II. JOHN, who succeeded his father.

III. William, rector of Dissington.

IV. Musgrave, a captain in the army.

V. James, collector of customs at Beaumaris.

VI. Wastel, who went to Jamaica.

VII. Ralph, who married Dorothy, daughter of the Rev. Jonathan Rowland.

I. Dorothy, married to Richard Lamplugh, Esq., of Ribton.

II. Catherine, married to John Holme, of Carlisle, attorney-at-law.

Mr. Brisco was succeeded by his second son,

The Rev. JOHN BRISCO, of Crofton Hall, rector of Orton and vicar of Asparia, who married Catherine, daughter of John Hylton, Esq., of Hylton Castle, and had issue,

I. JOHN, his successor.

II. Richard, an officer in the army, killed in Germany.

III. Horton, colonel E. I. Co.'s service.

IV. William Musgrave, an officer in the army.

V. James, in holy orders, rector of Orton.

I. Dorothy, married to Jacob Morland, Esq.

He was succeeded, at his decease, by his eldest son,

JOHN BRISCO, Esq., of Crofton Hall, who was created a baronet, 11th July, 1782. Sir John married Caroline Alicia, daughter of Gilbert Fane Fleming, Esq., by Lady Camilla Bennet, his wife, sister of Charles, 4th Earl of Tankerville, and by her (who died 27th December, 1832) he had

I. WASTEL, his successor.

II. Fleming John, born in 1781.

I. Camilla Caroline. II. Caroline.

III. Augusta. IV. Emma.

He died 27th December, 1805, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

SIR WASTEL BRISCO, Baronet, of Crofton Hall, born in 1778, married 18th November, 1806, Miss Sarah Lester, and has had issue,

I. ROBERT, born 17th September, 1809, married 10th July, 1832, Anne, third daughter of George Kinnington, Esq., of Tynefield House, county Cumberland, and has issue, PARTON AND MICKLETHWAITE.

This township comprises an area of 627 acres. It contained in 1801, 98 inhabitants; in 1811, 110; in 1821, 95; in 1831, 85; in 1841, 104; and in 1851, 90; who principally reside in the hamlets of Parton and Micklethwaite.

The manor of Parton which, besides Parton and Micklethwaite, includes Nealhouse in Thursby township and Cardewlees in Dalston parish, was anciently held by a family who took their name from the place. From this family it was transferred by marriage to the Mansels, one of whom, Richard Mansel, married the heiress of the Partons, and by her had a son and heir, John Mansel, who sold this manor to Robert de Mulcaster, who granted the same, in the reign of Henry III., to Robert de Grinsdale. This Robert de Grinsdale had issue Gilbert, who had issue Alan and Robert. Alan had two sons, Thomas and Henry, who both died without issue, when Parton fell to their sister Margaret, who gave it to Robert de Roos, her second husband, whose nephew and heir, Richard Roos, sold it to John Carlisle, incumbent of Kirkland, and his nephew Robert, son of Robert Carlisle, sold it to William Denton, son and heir of John Denton, of Cardew, in whose family it continued till George Denton, of Cardew, sold the manor to Sir John Lowther in 1686, and it is now possessed by his descendant, the Earl of Lonsdale.¹ In 1672, the John Denton just mentioned sold to the tenants, for 61 years' ancient rent, about £336, all rents, fines, heriots, carriages, boon-days, duties, services, and demands whatsoever; reserving only one penny rent to be paid at Martinmas yearly, and suit of court, royalties, escheats, and all other matters belonging to the lordship. He also granted them liberty to cut wood for their own use, and to get stones within their own grounds, or the wastes, for their houses and fences. Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart., John Addison, Esq., Thomas Ismay, Esq., and John Hewson, Esq., are the principal landowners.

The village of Parton occupies a pleasant situation, two miles north-north-east of Wigton. Micklethwaite is a hamlet in this township, on the road between Wigton and Carlisle, two miles north by east of the former place.

TORPENHOW PARISH.

The parish of Torpenhow lies on the south side of the river Ellen, and is about six miles in length from north to south, by two and a half miles in breadth. It is bounded on the north by the river, on the west by Plumland, on the south by Isell, and on the east by Irely. The soil towards the north-west is of a sharp gravelly nature, and in the other parts a strong loam, cold clay, or limestone earth prevails, producing in general good crops of wheat, oats, barley, &c. Limestone is found here in abundance. The parish includes the four townships of Bewaldeth and Snittlegarth, Blennerhasset and Kirkland, Bothel and Threapland, and Torpenhow and Whitrigg, which united area is 9,070 acres. The inhabitants attend the Wigton and Cockermouth markets.

TORPENHOW AND WHITRIGG.

The rateable value of this township is £1,319. The population in 1801 was 210; in 1811, 262; in 1821, 256; in 1831, 317; in 1841, 315; and in 1851, 349. Torpenhow was enclosed in 1808, under the provisions of an act passed in the previous year.

The manor of Torpenhow was given by Alan, son of Waltheof, to his brother-in-law, Ughtred, son of Fergus, lord of Galloway, to be held by him and his heirs by homage, cornage, and other services. Philip de Valoniis held it in the reign of Henry II., in right of his wife, who held the same of Reginald Lucy, and Amabil, his wife, lord of the moiety of Allerdale. In the time of King John it was held by Robert Estoteville, brother to Nicholas Estoteville, lord of Liddell. In 1247, William, son of William de Ulfby, gave three carucates of land here to Robert de Mulcaster, and held five parts of the same of Richard Brun; the other sixth part, which he joined to the manor of Bothel, he held of the lord of Liddell, heir of Estoteville. The five parts, just mentioned, descended to the Mulcasters, and from them to the Tilliols, one of whose co-heirs brought the same to the Moresbys. "The heir general of the Moresbys," say Nicolson and Burn, "was married to Weston, Knevet, and Vaughan. Accordingly in the 35 Henry VIII. (1543-4) it is found that Henry Knevet and Anne his wife, in right of the said Anne, held the manor and town of Torpenhow of the king in capite, by the service of 24s. cornage, 6½d. seawake, and pature of the sergeants. Afterwards, her third husband, Vaughan, joined with her in levying a fine, and thereby conveyed the manor of Torpenhow unto James Salkeld and John Appleby." This estate has passed with Whitehall, in the parish of Allhallows, and is now the property of John W. Charlton, Esq.

The paramount manor of Whitrigg was, in 1804 or 1805, adjudged to belong to Mr. Charlton, who, at the time of the enclosure, had a composition for his manorial rights. This manor is at present held by John W. Charlton, Esq. A subordinate manor of the same name, which passed with one of the co-heiresses of the Tilliol family to that of Colville, and was afterwards held by the Skeltons, of Armathwaite, is said to have been purchased of the latter by Sir Gilfrid Lawson, in 1712, and has since passed with the Isell estate. It is now held by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart. The principal landowners in the township are Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.; Sir Henry R. Vane, Bart.; Henry Raiton, Esq.; George Moore, Esq.; William Thornburn, Esq.; John Thirlwall, Esq.; Mr. Thomas Plaskett, and Miss Moore.

The village of Torpenhow occupies a pleasant situation, a short distance from the Cockermouth road, about seven miles south-south-west of Wigton, and eight and a half miles north-by-east of Cockermouth.

THE CHURCH.

Torpenhow church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, containing some good specimens of Norman architecture,—the great arch is encircled with chevron mouldings. The capitals of the half pillars on each side are remarkably ornamented; one of the sides being formed by an assemblage of grotesque heads, the other by human figures, with interlaced arms. The church of Torpenhow was given by Sibella de Valoniis and Eustachius Estoteville to the prioress and convent of Rossdale in Yorkshire, to whom it was appropriated; but by an award made in the year 1290, by Bishop Irton, the glebe, &c., of Torpenhow, and the great tithes of Torpenhow, Threapland, Aldersceugh, Appleyray, Snittlegarth, Bellasis, and Bewaldeth, were assigned to the vicar for the maintenance of three priests and one sub-deacon, one of the said priests to assist the vicar in all parochial offices, another to celebrate, daily, the mass of the Blessed Virgin, and another to say mass for the dead, and for the prosperity of the bishop and his successors. Some of these tithes were granted by Queen Elizabeth, in 1562, to Cicely Pickrell, and the remainder in 1574 to John Sonkey and Percival Gunson. At the enclosure, which was made in 1808, about 650 acres were allotted in lieu of all tithes; those of Torpenhow and Bewaldeth townships belong entirely to the vicar, for which he has about 329 acres, viz.:—240 for the former, and about eighty for the latter. He has also forty acres for the tithes of Bothel, and twenty-five for those of Blennerhasset; the great tithes of the former belong to W. Thornburn, Esq., for which he has eighty acres; and for the tithes of Threapland 125 acres have been awarded. The living is valued in the King's Book at £33 4s. 10d.; but is now worth about £805 per annum. It is in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle.

There is a parsonage house.

In the village there is a memorial Sunday school, a small but neat building, erected in 1855, by the late Joseph Railton, Esq. It is sometimes used as a place of worship on Sunday evenings.

CHARITIES.

In addition to the school at Bothel, this parish possesses the following charities:—

Addison's Charity.—Thomas Addison, by will, dated 14th December, 1702, devised to trustees certain lands and tenements in Torpenhow, that they should lay out the rent of the said premises, for the first year after his decease, in making a convenient place for setting the bread and loaves, thereby directed to be distributed, as thereafter mentioned; and upon further trust, yearly, for ever thereafter, to divide the rent of the said premises into fifty-two equal parts, to be laid out weekly by the overseers of the poor of the said parish, with the approbation of the vicar or curate for the time being, in such quantities of bread as the said overseers should appoint, to be set in the place thereby ordered to be fitted, every Sunday during divine service, and to be distributed to such and to so many of the poor people of the said parish as the said trustees, churchwardens, and sixteen of the said parish, or any thirteen, or more of them, should judge fit, such poor people to be present in church during the service, unless hindered and kept from the church by some lawful impediment. This charity now produces £10 per annum, and bread to that amount is given away, by weekly distribution, on Sundays, at church, amongst the poor attending divine service.

Bewaldeth Quarter.—Simpson's Charity.—John Simpson, by will, dated 20th November, 1753, gave to the poor of Bewaldeth Quarter £40., the interest thereof to be paid yearly, on Good Friday.

Blennerhasset Quarter.—Bouch's Charity.—Richard Bouch, by will, dated August 20th, 1713, gave to the poor of Blennerhasset Quarter, for ever, all the rents and profits of a freehold close, called Gill Bushes, and nominated certain trustees to dispose of the rents at their discretion, to the use of the poor of the said quarter of Blennerhasset, on every 2nd day of November, at the parish church of Torpenhow; and he empowered his trustees to lease, alienate, or convey the said close at their discretion, so as the rents or interest of the money should continue to the use and purpose aforesaid; keeping to themselves a moderate allowance for their trouble. Gill Bushes was sold some years ago to the late George Dawson, Esq., and in its stead a field, about six acres in extent, at Bothel, called Thorubank, has been purchased, the rent of which is £5 a year, which is distributed to the aged poor of the township of Blennerhasset and Kirkland.

Whittrigg, or Whiterigg, said to derive its name from "the waste ground there fashioned like a cornrig," is a village and joint township with Torpenhow, from which it is distant one mile south.

BEWALDETH AND SNITTELEGARTH.

In 1801 this township contained 55 inhabitants; in 1811, 65; in 1821, 97; in 1831, 72; in 1841, 73; and in 1851, 90. The rateable value is £856 16s. 2d. The soil here is good, resting on limestone.

The manor of Bewaldeth, or Bowaldeth, was given by Waltheof, lord of Allerdale, to Gilman, whose posterity, residing at Bothel, assumed the name of Bowett. Having afterwards reverted to the lord paramount, it was granted by Adelaide Romili, daughter of William Fitz Duncan, to John de Utterfield. It subsequently became the property of the Mulcasters, in which family it remained for several descents. In the 2nd Edward I. (1273-4) Robert de Mulcaster granted by fine to his son, Walter de Mulcaster, the manors of Bewaldeth, Bolton, Torpenhow, and Blennerhasset; and in the 2nd Henry VI. (1400-1) Robert de Mulcaster granted to Robert de Highmore the vill of Bewaldeth, with the water mill, &c. It continued to be held by the Highmore family till Mr. Benson Highmore sold it to James Spedding, Esq., from a descendant of whom, John Spedding, Esq., of Mirehouse, it was purchased by Sir Frederick Fletcher Vane, Bart., grandfather of Sir H. R. Vane, Bart., the present lord of the manor. From an inquisition quod damnum taken in the 6th Edward II. (1312-13) we learn that the manor was held of the honour of Cockermouth, by the service of maintaining one of the king's servants once for every three weeks.

The principal landowners are Henry Railton, Esq.; Sir Henry R. Vane, Bart.; Robert Atkinson, John Bows, and John Birbeck.

The village of Bewaldeth is situated behind the lofty mountain called Binsey Fell, two miles north of the foot of Bassenthwaite Lake, and four miles south-south-west of Ireby.

Snittlegarth, now the seat and property of Henry Railton, Esq., is supposed to have been formerly a village of considerable magnitude.

BLANNERHASSET AND KIRKLAND.

The rateable value of this township is £1,800. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 204; in 1811, 195; in 1821, 224; in 1831, 238; in 1841, 224; and in 1851, 241. The commons of this township were enclosed by an act of parliament passed in 1807.

The manor of Blennerhasset was given by Alan, lord of Allerdale, to his brother-in-law, Ranulph de Lindsey, from whose family it passed by inheritance to the Mulcasters, one of whom, Robert de Mulcaster, held it in the reign of Henry III. Robert was succeeded in the manor by his son William, who had issue Walter, who had issue William, whose son Robert had a daughter and co-heir, who was married to Jeffery Tilliol, and brought Hayton, Torpenhow, and Blennerhasset to the Tilliols. Blennerhasset continued in this family for five generations, when Margaret, the younger sister of Robert de Tilliol, brought it in marriage to Robert Moresby, Esq., who died in the 37th Henry VI. (1458-9). The Moresbys held the manor till the demise of Sir Christopher Moresby, in 16th Henry VII. (1500-1), when it was brought by his daughter, Anne, to Sir James Pickering, Knt., of Killington, in Westmoreland. The heiress of the Pickerings sold it in the following reign to the Salkelds, as we learn from an inquisition taken 35th Henry VIII. (1543-4), when it was found that Sir Henry Knevet, and Anne, his wife, daughter of Sir Christopher Pickering, then held the manor of Torpenhow, but she had before sold the manor of Blennerhasset; for at the same time we find that Thomas Salkeld, of Whitehall, held the manor of Blennerhasset of the king in capite, by the service of the third part of one knight's fee, 12s. cornage, 6½d. seawake, and pature of the sergeants. From another inquisition taken in the 20th Elizabeth (1577-8), we learn that at that time Lancelot Salkeld held the manor of Blennerhasset, some time the land of the Earl of Warwick, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, and paid yearly for cornage 13s. 4d.; seawake, 1s.; turn-silver, 3s. 10d.; with sergeant's food; in toto, 18s. 2d. The manor of Blennerhasset has since passed with Whitehall, and is now the property of William Henry Charlton, Esq., of Hesley Side. Up to the time of the publication of Nicolson and Burn's History, the tenants of this manor paid an ancient annual rent of £23, and arbitrary fines, and also heriots as well upon the widow's death as death of the tenant, and several boons and services, viz.:—"One day mowing, shearing, ploughing, meadows dressing, and two days leading coals."

The manor of Kirkland, so called from having belonged to the church, was previous to the suppression of the religious houses, held by the prioress and convent of Rosedale. After the reformation it was given to the Salkeld family, from whom it has come to William Henry Charlton, Esq. Nicolson and Burn state that "the tenants here have an extraordinary kind of tenure, namely, by lease granted to them generally by Mr. Lancelot Salkeld, father of Sir Francis, for 999 years, paying a certain yearly rent for every tenement, amounting in the whole to £6 15s. 1d. yearly, and every twenty-one years they are to pay a fine to the lord, viz., "a twenty-penny fine, which they called a running gressem, and then take new leases, but pay no general fine upon the lord's death nor upon change of tenant, but they pay an heriot upon the death of every tenant." The principal landowners in the township are Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.; William Henry Charlton, Esq.; John Dawson, Esq.; Thomas Jennings, Esq.; Christopher Benson; Mrs. Hartness, Mrs. Hodgson, Mrs. Parkings, Miss Moore, Joseph Cape, and the Rev. Joseph Thexton.

The village of Blennerhasset is situated on the banks of the Ellen, seven miles south-west of Wigton. Here is an Independent chapel, a plain stone building, erected in 1828, at a cost of £240. There is also a school, which is supported by the quarter-pence of the children, and has an average attendance of about fifty pupils. There is a corn-mill in the township.

BOTHEL AND THREAPLAND.

The population of this township in 1801 was 313; in 1811, 302; in 1821, 384; in 1831, 405; in 1841, 455; and in 1851, 495. Bothel and Threapland form a joint township for the maintenance of the poor, but are separate for the repairs of highways, &c. The waste lands belonging to the township were enclosed many years ago. The inhabitants are principally engaged in agriculture, and are chiefly resident in the village of Bothel. The township abounds in limestone, and coal is found in various places, but no mines have as yet been opened here. The soil is principally a strong loam. Cockermouth and Wigton are the markets usually attended. On a hill south-east of the village of Bothel, called Camp Hill, are the remains of a Roman encampment, favourably situated for giving warning in times of invasion, for it commands an extensive view of the greater part of the Selway Frith from Maryport to Bowness, and from it a signal made from any of the stations near the border would be at once discovered. In the year 1854, whilst some quarrymen were at work in the limestone quarry at Bothel, they found several human skeletons about two and a half feet from the surface of the ground. Some of them were entire, but on being exposed for a short time to the influence of the atmosphere they crumbled to dust. A silver finger-ring was found among them. How these skeletons came to be in the place they were found is a mystery; the most probable supposition is that they were the remains of some of those who fell victims to the marauding Scots during the times of the border forays.

The manor of Bothel, otherwise Boald, was given in the reign of Henry I. by Walthof, lord of Allerdale, to Gamel, son of Brun, whose posterity continued its possessors until the reign of Edward III., when, male issue failing, it came to co-heiresses, by whom it was brought in marriage to the Harrington, Culwen, and Bowet families. The descendants of Harrington sold their share, with the parks and demesne to Thomas Lord Dacre, who conveyed it in exchange to the Dentons. From an inquisition taken in the 20th of Elizabeth (1577-8) we find that "Anthony Barwise, Esq., holdeth the third part of the manor of Bothel, late the land of Thomas Culwen; Thomas Ellis, son and heir of Jo. Ellis, holdeth another third part of the said manor, sometimes the lands of Thomas Bowett, Knight; and Thomas Denton, of Warnethal, holdeth another third part of the said manor, sometime the land of Michael Earington, Knight, by homage, fealty, suit of court from three weeks to three weeks, and sergeant's food, and payeth by year for cornage, 8s. 10d.; and for seawake, 2s.; in toto, 10s. 10d." In 1670 Thomas Denton, Esq., sold the park, &c., to Sir Francis Salkeld, and the manor to Captain Anthony Wilkes. Sir Henry Curwen sold the third part of Bothel, which belonged to his family, to the Darwises of Ilekirk, whose heiress brought it to the Dentons, and the Dentons sold it to the Salkelds. Bowet's share is said to have been conveyed by Sir Nicholas Bowet to William Ellis, whose grandson sold it to the tenants; but in 1807, William John Charlton, Esq., representative of the Salkelds, claimed to be sole lord of the manor, and his claim was allowed by the commissioners. The manorial rights are now claimed by William Henry Charlton, Esq.; Mr. Brown, of Tallantire Hall; and Mr. Turner, of Derwent Hall, near Keswick, have also some trifling claims. Bothel Hall is now a farm-house.

The manor of Threapland was granted by Alan, second lord of Allerdale, to his steward, Ketel, from whose descendants it passed in the reign of Edward I. to the family of Hercla, one of whom, Michael de Hercla, in the reign of Edward II. conveyed it to William de Mulcaster, whose brothers, Thomas and John de Mulcaster, held it successively, the latter granting it in the reign of Edward III., by fine, to Sir Henry Multon and Margaret his wife, whose daughter and co-heir brought it in marriage to the Skeltons. In 1578 William Skelton held Threapland by homage, fealty, suit of court, and other services, paying yearly for cornage 4s. 6d.; seawake, 8d.; free rent, 20s.; and for sergeant's food and turn-silver, 2s.; in toto, 27s. 2d. It subsequently passed by sale to the Salkeld family, and from them to the Greggs of Mirehouse, one co-heiress of whom married the Rev. John Story, and the other Roger Wilkinson, Esq. R. Jackson, Esq., is the present lord of the manor. Threapland Hall is now occupied as a farm-house.

The village of Bothel is pleasantly situated on the side of an eminence, one mile south-west of Torpenhow. At its east end is a remarkably large boulder stone, probably drifted here from Norway, or it may have been tossed over the fells from Wastdale Crag, or Shap Fells, in Westmoreland. Here are chapels belonging to the Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. That belonging to the former body was erected by subscription in 1840, and that of the latter in 1886.

THE SCHOOL.

The only account we have of the foundation of the school at Bothel is derived from an entry in one of the parish books, dated May 12th, 1686, which states that a subscription was raised amongst the parishioners towards the founding of the school at Bothel into a free school for all the parish. The school stock raised in this manner is entered in 1688 at £55, in 1706 at £44. Part of this appears afterward to have been laid out in the purchase of a freehold close, called Nicol Flatt, situated at Bothel; £10 (other part thereof) was put out at interest till about 1811, when it was laid out as hereafter mentioned. There is also the following entry in the parish book, under the date 12th of May, 1686, and immediately preceding the names of the inhabitants who subscribed to the raising of the school stock:—"Henry Salkeld, Esq., pays yearly the sum of 50s., at the two terms of May 1st and November 1st." It does not appear whether this was a charge existing before that time, or whether Mr. Salkeld then first agreed to pay 50s. annually towards the support of the school, nor have we been able to ascertain whether that payment was ever paid upon land. It has, however, been considered as a rent charge upon Mr. Salkeld's property. In the parish book, under the date of 1686, it is mentioned as "Salkeld's charge on Threapland, £2 10s.," and in a terrier dated 1777 it is described as payable out of Threapland Hall. As long as the property belonging to the Salkelds remained in the family undivided, the 50s. was regularly paid. Previous to the year 1768, the estate was divided into two parcels: Threapland Hall, with its appurtenances, came to Roger Williamson, Esq., and Bothel Hall, with its appurtenances, to Mr. Story. The payment was then apportioned between these two persons, the former paying yearly £1 18s., and the latter 12s. About 1768 Mr. Story ceased to pay his proportion, and about 1816, or 1817, Mr. Williamson became embarrassed, and since that time the payment of his share has also been discontinued. The rents of two closes, the one called Cuskeld and the other Witheridge, have also been carried to the school account from the time when the subscription was raised, in 1686, up to the present time. Before 1686 those rents had been carried to the account of the parish; but it is not known how they became possessed of this property, nor by what arrangements the rents were transferred to the school. A further endowment appears to have been left by Richard Smithson, as we find that, in 1701, John Brisco and Barbara his wife re-leased to the schoolmaster and sixteen of the parish two acres of land in Lang Flatt, described as being one moiety of the land left to the free school by Richard Smithson. And also that two acres of land lying in the same place, and also described as being a moiety of the land left by Richard Smithson to the free school, were re-leased to the same person by William and Jane Allason. There is also a close called the Low Field, or the parish close, the rents of which have been applied to the use of the school as long as can be remembered; but by whom this property was given cannot now be ascertained. The only other source of income to the school is a piece of land allotted to it about the year 1811, upon the enclosure of certain common lands in the parish. The £10 residue of the school stock above-mentioned was laid out in fencing this allotment. These lands are severally let by auction, in public, by the sixteen of the parish (every seven years), in whom the management of the school affairs is vested. The whole of the rents are regularly paid to the master. The repairs of the school, when required, are generally provided for by the parish: except when there has been no schoolmaster the rents have been retained and applied to that purpose. The schoolmaster is appointed by the sixteen at a select vestry; and he takes all the children of the parish that apply, without any charge, and teaches them English, writing, and arithmetic. A regulation has been made by the sixteen that no children shall be admitted under the age of five years. The average number of scholars is now about seventy-five.

In this township there is a small saw-mill, carried on by John and George Messenger. There is also a white freestone quarry, worked by the inhabitants, and from which the houses in Bothel have been built. There are in addition two limestone quarries.

The village of Threapland, in this township, is seven miles north-north-east of Cockermouth.

ULDALE PARISH.

The parish of Uldale is bounded on the north by Bolton, on the west by Ireby, on the south by Bassenthwaite, and on the east by Caldbeck. It is said to derive its name from the river Ellen, which has its principal source here from two small lakes, one of which, Overwater, is about a mile and a half, and the other, Little Tarn, about half a mile in circumference. About a mile and a half to the south of these lakes there is a fine cascade, called White Water Dash, where a brook is precipitated from a lofty mountain; and, after a great fall of rain, its foaming down the rocks, which may be seen at a considerable distance, is grand and imposing. The parish contains three divisions, viz., Uldale, Aughtertree, and Above Ooze, whose united area is 5600 acres, but comprises only one township and manor. Cockermouth, Wigton, and Keswick are the markets usually attended by the inhabitants.

The population of Uldale in 1801 was 284; in 1811, 279; in 1821, 343; in 1831, 344; in 1841, 330; and in 1851, 388. Its rateable value is £1,815. The soil about the village of Uldale is a clay, or strong loam, and produces excellent crops of barley, oats, turnips, &c., and the Uldale Hall estate has long been known as one of the finest grazing farms in the county. The division Above-Ouze, which is more mountainous and much colder, is not so fruitful, the crops there being generally light; but it affords good pasturage for sheep, of which between four and five thousand are kept in the parish, which, like Caldbeck and other adjoining parishes, is famed for the Herdwick breed. Large quantities of limestone are obtained here, and a small seam of coal has also been met with. There are also some veins of copper, which were wrought, but with indifferent success, about seventy years ago. On Uldale common are some ancient ruins, apparently the remains of two Roman stations, and in a field near Orthwaite Hall is a very perfect Roman camp; a tripod and other things have been lately dug up in its vicinity.

The manor of Uldale was given by Waltheof, lord of Allerdale, to Adam, son of Lyulph, brother of Phorn, son of Lyulph, baron of Greystoke, together with the manor of Gilerux. From this Adam it descended by a daughter to the Bonekills, who granted Gilerux to a younger brother, Robert Bonekill, whose sons, Thomas and Walter, gave away their inheritance in Gilerux to the abbey of Calder—this grant was confirmed by Sir Ranulph Bonekill, lord paramount of Uldale and Gilerux. Sir Ranulph had issue Alexander, whose son Adam gave Aiverthwaite, now Aughertree, parcel of his manor of Uldale, to the priory of Carlisle. The said Adam had issue another son, Alexander, whose daughter and heir was married first to John Stuart, kinsman of the King of Scotland, and afterwards to David Brigham, a Scottish knight renowned for his prowess and bravery, and by this marriage the manor of Uldale passed to the Brigham family. "This David Brigham," say Nicolson and Burn, "was a companion of William Wallace that was executed at London for treason committed against Edward I., by resisting that king's attempt for the superiority of Scotland, and the Baliol's right to the crown of Scotland, taking part with Robert Bruce. Wallace was a man of extraordinary strength, and David Brigham an exceeding good horseman, whereupon the Scots made this rhyme,—

The man was never so wild nor gentle,
But worthy Wallace durst him bide;
Nor ever horse so wild or weud,
But David Brigham durst him ride."

On the attainer of Alexander Senescall, this manor was given to Anthony Lord Lucy, in 1837, as we learn from the patent rolls of the reign of Edward III. From this time it continued attached to the barony of Allerdale until Henry, the sixth earl of Northumberland, gave it to Henry VIII., who, by letters patent bearing date 15th of July, 1543, granted to Thomas Dalston, Esq., together with other possessions, the manor of Uldale, for which he was to pay yearly 47s. 8½d. This Thomas Dalston, two years later, by fine, settled the manor upon himself and his second wife Eleanor for life, with remainder to his son Christopher Dalston (by his said second wife) and the heirs of his body, with remainder to his own right heirs. Uldale continued to be possessed by the Dalstons till the demise of Sir William Dalston, Knt., of Acorn Bank, Westmoreland, when it was sold to John Gaff, Esq., and by his son to the Earl of Egremont, from whom it has descended to General Wyndham, the present lord of the manor. The principal landowners are Jackson Gillbanks, Esq.; Henry Raiton, Esq.; Henry Grainger, Esq.; Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.; Messrs. Jonathan Cowx, James Burn, Richmond Fell, Henry Norman, Christopher Taylor, Joseph Scott, and Mrs. Parkin.

The village of Uldale is situated six miles west-by-south of Heskett Newmarket, nine miles south-by-west of Wigton, and one mile south-by-east of Ireby. A sheep fair was established here in 1791, and continues to be held annually on the 29th of August.

THE CHURCH.

Uldale church, which stands about half a mile from the village, is a small structure, being only twenty-two yards in length, by eight in breadth. It was built, at the expense of the inhabitants, in 1730, and is kept in good repair. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of Jackson Gillbanks, Esq., whose father, Joseph Gillbanks, Esq., purchased the advowson of the Rev. Jonathan Cape; he also rebuilt the chancel, and added a vestry to the church. The chancel contains a good stained glass window. The tithes were commuted in 1839 for a yearly rent charge of £130, exclusive of surplice fees and Easter dues. The glebe land consists of upwards of twenty-two acres. The living is valued in the King's Book at £17 18s. 1½d., and is now worth about £150 per annum. The parish register commences in 1642.

Rectors.—Robert de Depyng, —; Hugh de Rouestre, 1405; Adam de Egghesfield, —; Hugh, 1336; Richard de Askely, 1354; William Aykheved, —; Thomas de Etton, 1369; Robert Mairays, 1375; John Frysell, 1385; John Shayres, —; Thomas Harrison, 1576; James Carlisle, 1583; George Hudson, 1624; Henry Fallowfield, —; William Walker, 1665; Henry Guy, 1677; Thomas Nevison, 1684; Peter Gregory, 1697; Edward Backhouse, 1719; Richard

CHARITIES.

The Grammar School.—The establishment of this school originated in an agreement dated the 30th of January, 1726, between Matthew Caldbeck, Esq., of the one part, and the inhabitants of Uldale of the other part. By articles drawn up of the date above-mentioned, reciting that the said Matthew Caldbeck has paid into the hands of trustees £100 towards the maintenance of a master in the grammar school to be erected in Uldale for the teaching of the children of the parishioners of the said parish, parties to the said agreement, and the children of those who should succeed to their respective estates, and of such poor persons as the trustees for the time being should think fit, in the rudiments of grammar and other useful learning, and in the principles of the Christian religion according to the doctrine of the Church of England; and further reciting, that the parties thereto had agreed to raise, amongst themselves, the further sum of £100 for the same purpose, it was agreed that certain persons therein named should be trustees for the building and ordering the said school-house, and laying out the said monies on sufficient security for the maintenance of a schoolmaster, and that the said trustees should have the nomination and displacing of such schoolmaster; and it was further agreed, that the school-house should be repaired by the parties thereto and out of the said fund. Indorsed upon the said articles is an agreement, that certain other persons who had subscribed to the school, but were not of the parish of Uldale, should also have the benefit of the freedom thereof. The full sum of £100 appears soon afterwards to have been raised amongst the inhabitants, and to have been added to the £100 given by Matthew Caldbeck. In the year 1736 £51 10s., part of the £200, was laid out in the purchase of about six acres of land in Uldale town fields; and in 1759 a further sum of £150 was laid out, together with £41 5s. advanced by the trustees, in the purchase of about fifteen acres of land in the parish of Ireby. The sum of £41 5s. advanced by the trustees, continued as a charge upon the property in Ireby until sometime after the year 1798, when it was paid off. Thomas Thomlinson, Esq., by will, dated April 16th, 1798, as stated more fully in our account of the parish of Thursby, left part of the residue of his personal property to the trustees of this school. The share received by them was £354, of which there was expended £41 5s. in paying off the money due to the trustees on account of the purchase of the Ireby estate; about £10 10s. in erecting a marble tablet in the church to record the benefaction of the testator; and £300, being the remainder of the sum, after payment of some expenses that were incurred, was placed out at interest. The entire income of the school at present amounts to £46 19s., the whole of which is paid to a schoolmaster, who teaches free as many poor children of the parish as the trustees send to him, and the children of the representatives of the original subscribers. For other scholars he takes a quarterage. The average attendance is about seventy.

Dalston's Charity.—The Charity Commissioners were not able to ascertain the particulars of the bequest of John Dalston, but they state that "by indenture dated 3rd November, 1719, Jennett and Joseph Atkinson, in consideration of £20 which it was therein recited was bequeathed by John Dalston to the poor of the parish of Uldale, conveyed two acres of land, at Birkmoire, in the parish of Uldale, with the houses thereunto belonging, to the minister, churchwardens, and overseers of the said parish (whom they directed should be trustees for the said charity, for the poor) for the remainder of a term of 3,000 years." The property now belonging to this charity is a field of about two or three acres, without any buildings upon it. It is let at a yearly rent of £4 4s., which is distributed every Good Friday, in the church, after divine service, amongst six or eight poor persons who do not receive parish relief.

Cape's Charity.—Thomas Cape, by will dated 13th March, 1771, left £200 in trust, to be disposed of for the use and benefit of such poor persons and children of Uldale as should not receive parish relief. This legacy was paid over by the representatives of the testator to trustees, who secured it upon a mortgage of land, which produces about £8 4s. per annum, which sum is distributed annually on the 14th September amongst six or eight poor persons who do not receive parish relief. The same persons who receive the benefit of Dalston's charity above-mentioned generally receive this also.

Thomlinson's Charity.—Thomas Thomlinson, by will dated 16th April, 1798, left £60 to the poor of Uldale, as more particularly mentioned in our account of his charity to the poor of Thursby. The sum received on account of this legacy for the parish of Uldale, after the payment of expenses, was £54, which yields £2 8s. a year interest. That sum is distributed annually by the minister and churchwardens amongst such of the poor of the parish as are considered the most necessitous and deserving. It is not confined to those who do not receive parish relief.

In addition to these charities there is a free quit-rent of 4s. 6d. a year, purchased with £5 left by Mr. Cowx.

There are two corn mills in the parish, one situated near the church, and the other at Mirkholme.

Aughertree is one mile north-by-east of Uldale. It was granted to the prior of Carlisle by Adam Bonekill, as above stated, and at the Dissolution came to Thomas Dalston along with the manor of Uldale.

Longlands is one mile east-by-south of Uldale, and Orthwaite two miles south. Orthwaite Hall is a fine old building, which has been the residence of many old Cumberland families, among whom were the Simpsons, Richmonds, and Brownes of Tallantire. The last owner of the latter name was the celebrated African traveller, from whose representatives it was purchased by the late Mr. Gillbanks, of Whitefield, father of the present owner, Jackson Gillbanks, Esq. About the stable are the armorial bearings of the Salkelds of High Head Castle, and the Richmonds, who married heiresses of Vaux, of Catterlen. The old mansion is now occupied as a farm-house.

WESTWARD PARISH.

The parish of Westward is bounded on the north by Thursby, on the west by Wigton, on the south by Bolton and Caldbeck, and on the east by Sebergham and Dalston. The soil, which is in a high state of cultivation, consists chiefly of a strong fertile clay, with a portion of sand, and produces excellent crops of wheat, oats, &c., except towards the south and south-east parts, where it is rather cold and wet. The higher grounds abound with limestone; and the Shawk and How Rigg quarries have long been noted for the production of red and white freestone, slate, flags, &c., esteemed the best in Cumberland. In the parish are also several seams of cannel and other coal. Westward contains the townships of Stoneraise, Woodside, Rosley, and Brocklebank, whose united area is 13,120 acres. Wigton is the market usually attended.

At the period of the Norman Conquest of England, Westward was forest ground of Allerdale, and was conveyed by Alan, second lord of that barony, to Henry II., who annexed it to, and incorporated it with, his forest of Inglewood, and from thence it received the name of the Westward.¹ Subsequent to this, King John granted the hermitage of St. Hilda within the boundaries of Westward to the monastery of Holme Cultram, and the monks of that house erected a chapel in the neighbourhood of the hermitage, which chapel or oratory, in process of time obtained the rights and privileges of a parish church, but was then, as all forests were, extra-parochial. In the 18th Edward I. (1290), a memorable case occurred concerning the tithes of Louthwaite and Curthwaite, both of which were within the bounds of the forest. The tithes were claimed by the king as of common right, he being entitled to all those of extra-parochial places; they were also claimed by the bishop as being within the parish of Aspatria; the prior and convent of Carlisle also claimed them by grant from Henry II., as of an assart within the forest of Inglewood; and, finally, the parish priest of Thursby claimed them as being within his parish—the case was decided in favour of the monarch. The same king, in the twenty-second year of his reign (1294), by his charter setting forth the settlement of the case just mentioned, and his recovery of the tithes, granted unto the prior and convent of Carlisle not only the tithes of the places above-mentioned, but also all tithes accruing in all lands and places in the forest of Inglewood, that should be afterwards assarted, not being within the limits of any parish, without the impediment of the king or his heirs, his justices, foresters, verderers, or other officers, of the forest. Since the granting of this charter the tithes of Westward have been enjoyed by the church of Carlisle, during Catholic times by the prior and convent, and since the Dissolution by the dean and chapter. The forest having been granted to Henry II., as we have seen above, it continued to be held by the crown till the reign of Edward III., who, in the seventeenth year of his reign (1343), granted it to Thomas Lord Lucy and Agnes his wife, under the name of "Solum et herbagium de Allerdale." These possessions were afterwards increased by Robert Tilliol, who, by deed, dated 17th February 1365, gave certain lands adjoining to "Hasil Spring (in Bosco de Allerdale) to the said Thomas Lord Lucy and Agnes his wife." Their daughter and last surviving heir, Maud, conveyed this property to her husband, Henry Percy, first Earl of Northumberland,

¹ The statement in the text is given on the authority of Nicolson and Burns; but in the survey made in 1578, to which we have so often referred, we find it stated that "It appeareth that the said Westward is not within the limit of the forest of Inglewood, for that in a perambulation of the said forest made the 5th of August, in the ninth year of the reign of King Richard II., the Westward is not included."

in whose family it continued till Henry, the sixth Earl, gave it, with others, to Henry VIII. Queen Mary granted these possessions to Thomas Percy, brother to the last Henry, but they reverted to the crown, on his attainder during the reign of Elizabeth. Nicolson and Burn tell us that after this forfeiture, in the 14th Elizabeth (1571-2), a commission was issued to Richard, Bishop of Carlisle; Henry Lord Serope; Thomas Lord Wharton; Simon Musgrave, Knt.; Henry Curwen, Knt.; Francis Slingsby, Cuthbert Musgrave, John Penruddock, Anthony Barwise, Thomas Leigh, and Robt. Highmoor, Esqs., to enquire upon certain articles to the said commission annexed; and accordingly an inquisition was taken at Westward January 9th and 10th, 1572, upon the oaths of Richard Salkeld, Francis Lampugh, Roland Vaux, John Richmond, Anthony Curwen, Esqs., Alexander Highmoor, John Southake, John Ellis, Thomas Bewley, Robert Vaux, Robert Dalston, Richard Kirkbride, John Skelton, Richard Stanwix, John Pattinson, and Robert Mulcaster, gentlemen, as follows, viz:—

“Articles and interrogatives to be ministered and inquired upon, for and in behalf of the tenants and inhabitants that claim common and pasture within the forest of Westward:”

“First, how the said common and pasture hath been used before the late attainted Earl of Northumberland’s restitution to the same by the late sovereign lady, Queen Mary?”

“To this it is answered, that the tenants of the bishop of Carlisle and of the dean and chapter of the cathedral church of Carlisle, inhabitants at Great Dalston, Little Dalston, Hawkesdale, Cumdevoek, Cardew and Cardewlees, Buckhowbank, Northank, Caldevgate, and Caldewstones, Caldcoats, Newby, Great Cummersdale, Little Cummersdale, Brownelson, New Laythes, and Harrington Houses: the tenants and the manor of Crofton and Parton, Micklethwaite and Whyney; the Queen’s Majesty’s tenants, and the tenants of her Majesty’s freeholders of the barony of Wigton; the manor and townships of Waverton and Xyket, Woodside, Kirkland, Roshewen, Moorthwaite, Dockwray, Moorhouse, Ulton, Lassenhow, Kirkbride, Caldbeck and Kirkthwaite, have always used time without memory (before the restitution of the late attainted Earl of Northumberland by the late Queen Mary) to have common and pasture within the forest of Westward.

“The second article: What inclosures the said late Earl of Northumberland hath made within the said Westward; what quantity of ground the same inclosure doth contain; and how the same hath been used; and what yearly rent hath been paid, and answered since the same inclosure?—Answer: Since the restitution of the said late attainted earl, there have been made and improved six score and seven inclosures, containing twenty-seven score, five acres, half acre, one rood, one half rood; of which six score and seven inclosures there be newly inhabited, and houses builded upon thirty-two, which thirty-two contain ten score, five acres, half acre, one rood and half rood of ground; the residue of the said six score and seven inclosures, which be four score and fifteen in number, and contain seventeen score acres, are rejoined and annexed to the tenants that have ancient farmholds besides: And they find, that the rents in hand or reserved upon the said inclosures (as they learn and understand by the late receiver-general of the said late attainted Earl of Northumberland) do amount to the sum of £9 19s. 5d.

“The third article: How many of the inclosures may remain in what state they be, without annoyance and hurt to the tenants and inhabitants that claim common and pasture there within the same?—To this they find and present, that none of the said improvements and inclosures may remain in the same state they be, without annoyance to the said tenants and inhabitants specified in the first article, and that claim common and pasture within the same.

“To the several following articles, they give one general answer, as follows, viz: ‘Art. 4. What number of tenants and inhabitants there be, that claim or ought to have common there, and in what lordships, baronies, parishes, towns, and villages the tenants and inhabitants that claim to have the said common and pasture do dwell and be? Art. 5. Whether any of them that claim the said common and pasture be the Queen’s Majestys tenants; if they be, then what number is there of them, and in what lordship, barony, town, or parish they do inhabit? Art. 6. What annoyance, hurt, or hindrance would the said inclosures be to such as claim the said common and pasture, if the same should still remain; and whether may any thereof remain inclosed without their hurt? Art. 7. To what yearly rent do the said inclosures amount; and if the said inclosures should be laid open and unclosed, how should the Queen’s Majesty be answered of the same rent, or what yearly rent or money should or ought she have yearly of or by the said tenants and inhabitants that claim the said common, if they should enjoy the same, or what other service or considerations should they do, or have they heretofore done, in respect of or for the same? Art. 8. Whether have the said tenants and inhabitants that claim the said common and pasture had the same time out of mind of man before the said inclosure; or how long, and at what time have they had the same? Answer: To these articles they find and present, as before they have found and presented; and further, that they, the said tenants and inhabitants aforesaid, claiming common for the said grounds inclosed to be laid open and prostrate, will submit themselves and stand to her grace's order for the rent thereof."

From the inquisition taken in 1578, we learn the following particulars relative to Westward, which are now printed for the first time, and will no doubt be acceptable to our readers:—

"Within the bounder is contained the whole chase called the Westward, being all of th' inheritance of the said Earl, Saving one parcel of ground called Cleofield, and certain tenements called East Kirthwate, West Kirthwate, and Starthwate Lees, of the inheritance of the Queen's Majesty; and also three tenements in Starthwaiterigg and one tenement lying in Kirthwate, of the inheritance of the late Lord Dacre, and also two tenements in Starthwaiterigg of the inheritance of John Starthwaite and Edward Hewet, and one tenement at Fosterfolde of the inheritance of John Robinson.

"The said earl hath, within the said Westward, by charter dated at Westminster the 18th day of June anno tertio Richardi Secundi (1380), free chase and free warren throughout the whole grounds within the limits and bounds before specified, and also court barrons from three weeks to three weeks, with view of frank pledge and court leet two times in the year, viz., within one month next after Easter, and within one month next after the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, and also within the said chase all goods, waives, strays, goods of felones, fugitives; of men outlawed and put in exigent, the goods of felons of themselves forfeited, and also infangtheof and outfangtheof, the punishment by amerciamient and all frays and violent drawing of blood, execution of prosses, the forfeiture by amerciements of the breach of the assize of bread and ale within the whole limits of the said Westward, and also the chattels or goods of any person not the lord's tenant within the said Westward within the same do pasture or be found there, the officers of the lord do and may impose the same and present the offenders at the court there, in the which court the said offences are punished and is punishable by way of amerciamient, and in the same there hath been a great store and yet remains some part of fallow deer, for the preservation whereof the M^r. of the same, bowbearers, foresters, keepers, and rangers, are by the lord appointed and have certain fees and allowances, all which liberties, royalties, and privileges, with divers others, the said earl and his successors (whose estate he hath in the said chase) have peaceably used and enjoyed, the time whereof the memory of no man is to be had to the contrary.

"There is no adwoson of benefices appendant or belonging to the said chase, for that the whole grounds and compass thereof are of the parish of St. Marie's at Carlisle, distant from thence five miles at the least, in consideration whereof, Thomas late Earl of Northumberland (brother unto the said earl) procured the erection of a church there, now called the new Kirk in Westward, whereunto the whole inhabitants of the said chase resorte, and all the sacraments there administered unto them by a curate or stipendiary priest, found of their own charges, saving for his mansion-house and certain grounds thereto adjoining, which he hath of benevolence, and at will and pleasure of the said earl, as hereafter appeareth among the tenants at will.

"There is within the said chase one house called the New Hall, near and about the which there is certain pounds which have been inclosed, and are convenient to have been inclosed for preservation of the game and woods then not or yet rented or employed to any other use, which said grounds contain by estimation 180 acres, and in compass or circuit by measure 1,062 roods, of which compass the hedges of Rethwate, Hasilspring, and other do inclose — roods, the residue being — roods at 8d. the rood, will amount to — within which said ground, where the ancient frith hath been and now needful to be inclosed, as well for the preservation of deer, as also for th' increase of woods as is aforesaid. Cuthbert Musgrave and Anthony Barwis, Esqrs., hold a great parcel of ground, where as is now the fittest place for deer and the best growth for wood, called Tongthwate; and the said Anthony Barwis holdeth another parcel of ground adjoining to the same, called Longmire; and Richard Studholme holdeth there a close adjoining to the same called Waver Banks, or Waver Riggs; all which said parcels are now remaining in the lord's hand for the cause before declared, and not demised.

"There is at this present within the said forest or chase the number of four score and twelve fallow deer, or thereabouts, which, if the frith and grounds aforesaid, were inclosed and preserved would soon increase and plenish to a convenient number, and without the same provision there can never be any increase by reason the grounds be suffered and used as common are depastured so bare in summer that the deer, especially the fawnes and old deer, die and perish in winter (so many sometimes more) as commonly increase in the summer.

"The tenants of the Bishop of Carlisle, of Dalston, John Dalston, Henry Denton of Cardow, the tenants of Thorsby, Crofton, and certain tenements of the barony of Wigton, being all foresters or borderers of the said chase called Westward (have by suffering) had pasture there for their cattle, and have sometimes license to grave turfs, and take wood for their necessities, and paid for them certain small amerciaments, by reason of which continuance the said tenants or parties do challenge to enjoy the same of right, which is much hurtful to the inheritance of the said earl, and must be provided to be reformed, or otherwise it will be to his lordship's great disinheritation.

"The grounds aforesaid lying about the New Hall were immediately upon the taking of this present survey included in two several parks, as followeth, viz. :—

"The North Park is inclosed with a ditch and quickset hedge, and the whole compass and circuite of the same, as the ring-ditch goeth, is by measure one thousand three score and two roods, allowing seven yards to the rood, and five score to the hundred; and the lenth of the said North Park from the west part thereof, called Wysa Water, up to the east end, called Water Spring, contains by like measure 336 roods; and the breadth of the said North Park, from the foot of the Day Platts on the south side, to a place called the Prince's Gill on the north side, 192 roods; and the whole park contains by estimation — in which said North Park standeth the said New Hall, now used for the keeper lodge; and there is in the said North Park and South Park following, to the number of four score and twelve fallow deer, or thereabouts, as aforesaid.

"The South Park is, in like manner, inclosed with a ditch and quickset hedge; and the compass of the same, containing by like measure 1,071 roods by estimation, containeth in all —. In which said South Park the said game hath recourse as well as in the other."

The following is in a different hand :—

"The inhabitants and Ten^{ts}. at Westward claim a certain custom of ten^{ts}. right, which (it seemeth) they cannot prove to be any Interest for them, for that y^e ground (being a Chase or Forest) was at y^e first grant thereof (as appeareth) not much inhabited with dwellers or Ten^{ts}. and a great number of y^e Tenants that are now placed there, have built houses upon y^e grounds, improved within time of memory . . . And also in y^e 26th year of K. Hen: 6: it appeareth in a book of accounts that one Henry Fenwick, Knt., held all y^e same grounds of y^e said earl his ancestors for a certain rent, by lease for a term of years; and y^e Tenants there are in all Records and Precedents named Tenants at Will, and so remain."

The MS. then gives a list of the tenants at will, with an account of their respective tenements, &c., and concludes by giving the "Sum general and total of the rents and yearly receipts within the Westward, besides the profits of parks, and perquisites of courts now payable—£45 4s. 7d." From this sum there were several deductions made, and the residue amounted to £37 17s. 7d., besides the profits of parks and the perquisites of courts.

Westward shared the fate of the possessions of the Percy family, passing from them to the Earls of Egremont, coming ultimately to General Wyndham, the present lord of the manor.

STONERAISE.

The number of acres in Stoneraise township is 3,471, and its rateable value £4,390 15s. Its population in 1801, was 434; in 1811, 475; in 1821, 631; in 1831, 603; in 1841, 446; and in 1851, 436. This township, which has no village of its own name, is the largest and most fertile in the parish. The principal landowners are General Wyndham, Charles Featherstonehaugh, Esq.; Miss Aglionby; F. L. B. Dykes, Esq.; John Barnes, Robert Jefferson, and Mrs. Peat, with many resident yeomen.

THE CHURCH.

The parish church of Westward is situated on an elevated piece of ground, overlooking a deep ravine, in the hamlet of Churchhill, and township of Stoneraise, three miles south of Wigton. The church of Westward is supposed to have taken its origin from the hermitage of St. Hilda mentioned above. It contains monuments of the Barwis family, particularly that of Richard Barwis, Esq. (commonly called the Great Barwis, from his gigantic stature) of Ilkirk Hall, and his wife Frances, who died in 1648. The benefice is a curacy certified to the governors of Queen Anne's bounty at £23, and returned, in 1835, as of the average value of £90, but is now worth about £120 a year. There are five acres of ancient glebe, together with forty acres allotted at the enclosure of the commons in 1822 (the act for which was passed in 1811), the rent of which, with the interest of a parliamentary grant of £1,200, £22 a year from the ecclesiastical commissioners, £4 a year for performing service every Sunday afternoon at the chapel of ease, Easter dues, surplice fees, &c., make up the sum named above. At the enclosure 1,408 acres were awarded to the dean and chapter, the patrons of the living, in lieu of all tithes, viz., 893½ acres for the tithes of the common land, 360 acres in lieu of the tithes of the ancient land, 67 acres as a modus for the tithe of meal 38½ acres for the tithe of geese, and 49 acres in lieu of the tithe of wool and lamb. The parish register commences in 1605.

INCUMBENTS.—Pigney, occurs in 1578; William Hayton, died 1753; James Currie, 1752; John Pape, 1764; Samuel Halifax, 1777; J. Rogerson, 1814; Robt. Wood, licensed in 1822.

There are schools at Church Hill and the Craggs.

CHARITIES.

Barwis's Charity.—Frances Barwis, in 1657, gave to the poor of Westward and Wigton a parcel of ground near Wigton, called Stankbank, or a rent-charge of 40s. yearly therefrom, whereof 20s. to Westward on the 21st December, and 10s. each to Westward and Wigton on the 5th April, yearly. Trustees: The heirs of Ilekirk, the minister of Westward, the heirs of Mungo Dalton, of Swinsty; and of John Watson, of Stoneraise.

John Jefferson's Charity.—John Jefferson, of Brackenthwaite, left by will, in 1747, £60 for teaching six poor children belonging to the parish of Westward. With this sum a cottage and two acres of land were purchased near Dalston. Rent £6 per annum. Trustees: The perpetual curate and sidesmen of the parish.

Pape's Charity.—The Rev. Mr. Pape, perpetual curate of Westward, left by will, in 1778, £20 for teaching one poor child at the church school, when the incumbent is not master. Otherwise the interest to be given to poor persons. Deposited in Carlisle Savings Bank. Interest 12s. a year. Trustees: Minister and sidesmen of Westward.

Robert Jefferson's Charity.—Robert Jefferson, of Chalkside, left by will, in 1793, £100 for the support of poor persons in Westward not receiving parochial relief, or the education of their children. Invested in bank annuities. Interest, £8 17s. 2d. per annum. Trustees: Minister and churchwardens of Westward.

Hodge's Charity.—Joseph Hodge, of Highmoor House, left by will, in 1844, £600 for the clothing or maintenance of poor women in Westward, or the education of poor children. Interest, £21 per annum. Trustees: William Banks, Joseph Rook, William Rook, Jane Pattinson, William Henderson, and John Banks.

Hodgson's Charity.—Joseph Hodgson, of Brackenthwaite, left by will, in 1851, £50 to the poor of Westward for their maintenance, or the education of their children. Nett sum £45, deposited in Carlisle Savings Bank. Interest, £1 7s. per annum. Trustees: Perpetual curate and churchwardens of Westward.

Stoneraise township includes the hamlets of Church-hill, Foresterfold, Red Dial, and Warblebank, with several dispersed and pleasantly situated dwellings bearing different names, among which are Greenhill House, Forest Hall, Rays Lodge, Stoneraise Place, Greenrig, Cunning Garth, Westward Parks, &c. At Westward Parks referred to above as the ground lying about New Hall, is a mansion belonging to General Wyndham, M.P. for West Cumberland, where he generally resides a few weeks in each year. Greenhill House is a large mansion, re-built about fifteen years ago, two miles south of Wigton, and the others are from one and a half to two and a half miles from the same town. At Red Dial hamlet, which is about one mile and a half south of Wigton, fairs are held annually on the 1st of August, for sheep and wool, and on the 21st of September for sheep only. At the Red Dial Inn the manor courts are held, and here the magistrates meet monthly for the appointment of the surveyors of highways, overseers of the poor, the granting of licenses to publicans, and the transaction of other business.

Ilekirk, in this township, had its name from the hermitage of St. Hilda, the foundation of which is now unknown. It appears to have existed and been well known in the twelfth century, for King John granted "the hermitage of St. Hilda, which had before belonged to Roger the Hermit, to the abbey of Holme Cultram." On the suppression of the monastic institutions, Henry VIII., in 1543, granted the hermitage of Hildkirk or Ilekirk, with all the lands thereto belonging, to Thomas Dalston, Esq., who the next year transferred it to Anthony Barwis, gentleman, and it continued to be held by his descendants for some generations. One of the Barwis family, Richard Barwis, of whom we have spoken above, was famed for his gigantic stature. It is said he used to display his great strength by walking round the court yard of Ilekirk Hall, carrying, at arm's length, his wife on one hand, and a stone of prodigious size on the other. There is also a tradition that he once walked along Eden Bridge, Carlisle, with his fair spouse seated on his hand, and elevated over the battlements. There is still to be seen at Ilekirk, a large stone, which it is asserted he could throw with ease the whole length of the court yard, though there are now few men who can raise it from the ground. About the latter end of the seventeenth century, the last of the Barwis family left two daughters, co-heiresses, the elder of whom married Major Featherstonhaugh and died without issue; the younger married Mr. Kirby, of a Lancashire family, and sold Ilekirk to Lancelot Emerson, from whom or from his daughter, it came to the Postlethwaites and Sleet families, and from them by purchase to Joshua Luccock, Esq., of Cocker-mouth; and is now the property of Charles Featherstonehaugh, Esq.

Ilekirk Hall, now a farm-house, is situated in a deep valley, near a small stream, about a mile west of the church.

Old Carlisle, the ancient Olenacum, is situated in this township, nearly two miles south of Wigton. The station is a large one; the ruins of its ramparts and exterior buildings are boldly marked. A double ditch with intervening vallum seems to have surrounded the fort. The small river Wiza runs in a deep ravine immediately below the station on its west side, and at remoter distance, on its south also, thereby lending to it additional strength. The remains of suburban buildings may still be seen outside the walls, on the south, east, and west. Within the fort a street may be distinctly traced from the north to the south gate, and another from the east towards the west. Near the centre of the station is a moist spot of ground where we may conceive a well to have been. Up to a recent period, the Roman roads leading from this station on the one hand, to Carlisle, and on the other to Maryport, were distinctly visible. From this station the view is very extensive, especially towards the west, where it reaches to the sea, which is distinctly visible. Numerous remains of the Roman period of our history have been discovered here from time to time, consisting of sacrificial instruments, statues, altars, coins, inscriptions, &c., several of which are in the possession of the gentry in the neighbourhood. The Messrs. Lysons give no less than thirteen inscriptions found here. In 1845 a Roman altar was dug up here, three feet two inches high, one foot five inches broad, and five inches thick, bearing the following inscription, which records its dedication to the goddess Bellona, by Rufinus, prefect of the cavalry of the Augustan Ala (or wing) and his son Lavinianus:—

TOMEI CIVI
NVS, GRAE
EQ. ALAE AVG ET LAVINIA
NVS, FIL.

It now stands at the Red Dial Inn, in this parish. Of the many inscribed stones dug out of this station, one found in the year 1775, about 200 yards east of the camp, and now in the collection at Netherby, is probably the most interesting. It bears the inscription—

BROCKLEBANK.

This township, which forms the southern extremity of the parish, comprises an area of 2,894 acres, and its rateable value is £1,685 5s. Its population prior to 1841 was returned with that of Stonerise township; in that year it was 171, and in 1851, 148. The principal landowner is General Wyndham. Sir Henry Fletcher, Bart.; Messrs. Thomas Milton, Joseph and Robert Coulthard, George Johnstone; Miss Baty, Mary Todd, Mrs. Lumley, and some few others have also estates here. Brocklebank is a hilly district, bounded on the south by Caldbeck Parish. Clea Hall is situated in this township. This place was the seat of a younger branch of the Musgraves of Crooklake; by intermarriage with the female heir, the inheritance passed to the Fletchers of Dearham; and is now the property of Sir Henry Fletcher, Bart.

Fletchers of Clea Hall.

This family is descended from the Fletchers of Cockermouth.

HENRY FLETCHER, Esq., of Cockermouth Castle, son of William Fletcher, Esq., of Cockermouth, by his wife, a daughter of Swinburn, of Hutton, had the trust of MARY Queen of Scots, when that princess journeyed from Workington. Mr. Fletcher treated his royal charge with all deference due to her regal station, and received from her a letter of thanks for the preservation of a robe of velvet. This gentleman died in 1571, leaving, with other issue, a son,

THOMAS FLETCHER, Esq., of Cockermouth, who married Miss Jane Boleyn, and had, with other issue,

Richard, whose son, Sir Henry Fletcher, was created a baronet in 1640, and left fighting for the house of Stuart, at the skirmish of Rotton Heath, in 1645, leaving a son, George, 2d baronet, father of Henry, 3rd and last baronet, and of three daughters; the youngest of whom, Catherine, was married to Lionel Vane, Esq., of Long Newson, ancestors of Sir Francis Fletcher Vane, Bart.

PHILIP

The younger son,

PHILIP FLETCHER, Esq., was grandfather of Richard Fletcher, Esq., whose son,

MAJOR PHILIP FLETCHER, died in 1744, at a very advanced age, leaving issue,

1. JOHN, his heir.

2. Philip, surveyor-general of the province of Ulster; married Mary, daughter of the Rev. Mr. Twigg; and died in 1708, having had issue,

1. Philip, died unmarried.

2. Thomas, killed at Dettingen.

3. Richard, who married Anne Eleanor Scott, daughter of Archibald Robinson, Esq.; and died in 1782, leaving a son, Philip, M.D.; born in 1757.

4. Edward of Lisburn, in holy orders; who died in 1777, leaving by Jane Murray, his wife, three sons, Philip of Lisburn, in holy orders; born in 1754.

Edward, in the East India Company's civil service; born in 1763.

James, born in 1768.

5. Elizabeth, married to Humphrey Pearson, Esq.

The elder son,

JOHN FLETCHER, Esq., of Clea Hall, married 1st Mary, daughter of Evan Christian, Esq., by whom he had no surviving issue; and 2ndly, Isabella, daughter and co-heir of John Senhouse, Esq., of Netherhall, co. Cumberland, by whom he had,

1. Philip, capt. in the army, died in 1742.

2. John, also capt. in the army, died in 1748.

- iii. George, capt. of Grenadiers, killed at Quebec in 1759.
- iv. Lowther, lieutenant, R.A., lost at sea in 1766.
- v. HENRY, the first baronet.
- vi. Charles, capt. of Marines.
- vii. Grace, married to William Taylor, Esq.
- ii. Jane, married to Thomas Benson, Esq.

The fifth son,

HENRY FELTHER, Esq., of Clea Hall, having been engaged in the sea service of the East India Company, and subsequently chosen a member of its court of directors, was created a baronet 20th May, 1782. He married in 1768, Catherine, daughter and sole heir of Henry Lintot, Esq., of South Water, co. Sussex, by whom he had a son and daughter, HENRY and Catherine. Sir Henry represented the county of Cumberland in parliament for thirty-four years, from 1768 to 1802. He died 20th March, 1807, and was succeeded by his son,

Sir HENRY, 2nd baronet, who married 10th March, 1801, Frances Sophia, 4th daughter of Thomas Wright Vaughan, Esq., of Woodstone, by whom he had surviving issue, HENRY, late baronet.

John Philip, born in 1815.

Sir Henry died 10 Aug., 1821, and was succeeded by his son,

Sir HENRY, 3rd baronet, born 18th Sept., 1807; who married 28th June, 1834, Emily Maria, 2nd daughter of George Brown, Esq., formerly member of council, Bombay, and had issue,

i. HENRY, present baronet.

ii. George Philip, born in 1837; died in 1845.

iii. Edward, born in 1841.

iv. Lancelot, born in 1846.

v. Philip, born in 1848.

vi. John Lowther, born in 1851.

ii. Emily, died in 1845.

iii. Frances Sophia, died 1845.

iii. Edith.

iv. Adelaide Maria.

v. Alice, died 1851.

Sir Henry died 6th Sept., 1851, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir HENRY, 4th baronet, an officer in the Grenadier Guards born 24th September, 1835.

Creation.—20th May, 1782.

Arms.—Sa., a cross, engrailed, arg., between four plates, each charged with an arrow of the first.

Crest.—A horse's head, arg., charged with a trefoli, gu.

Motto.—Martis non Copiamis.

Seat.—Ashley Park, Walton-on-Thames, Surrey.

The hamlet of Brocklebank is about five miles south-east of Wigton. Clea Green and Reathwaite are also hamlets in this township. Clay Hall is now a farm-house.

ROSLEY.

The area of Rosley township is 2,947 acres, and its rateable value £2,851 10s. The united population of Rosley and Woodside in 1801 was 484; in 1811, 527; of Rosley alone in 1831, 302; of Rosley and Woodside, in 1831, 650; of Rosley alone in 1841, 279; and in Rosley alone in 1851, 295. The principal landowners here are the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, General Wyndham, and Sir Wastel Brisco; but Messrs. Joseph Jefferson, John Richardson, Joseph Rook, — Lea, Thomas Dockray, William Hodgson, Thomas Hodgson, William Rook, Thomas Hayton, William Pearson, Christopher Armstrong, John Roper, and George Wood have also estates.

The village of Rosley occupies a delightful situation on the southern acclivity of an eminence, five miles east-south-east of Wigton, and nine south-by-west of Carlisle. It has long been noted for its large horse and cattle fairs, which are held on Whit-Monday, and on every alternate Monday after till Lammas-day. Two other fairs for cattle, horses, and sheep, established here in 1845, are held on the 21st of April, and on the third Monday in October. Mr. T. Denton, writing in 1688, says, "that Rosley fair was then the best in all the north for Irish and Scotch horses, cattle, and sheep." Rosley Hill is a large piece of common.

Brockenthwaite and Craggs are two hamlets in this township, the former being two and a half and the latter three miles south-east of Wigton. There is a school at Craggs.

WOODSIDE.

Woodside township contains 2,446 acres, and its rateable value is £3,331. The number of its inhabitants was returned with Rosley till 1821, when it was 364; in 1831 it was again returned with Rosley; in 1841 it was 415; and in 1851, 404. Sir Wastel Brisco is the principal landowner; besides whom John Taylor, Esq., Rev. Mr. Hewson, Messrs. John Jefferson, John Hewit, J. T. Cowen, Thomas Lightfoot, Kelicker and Barnes, William Wood, John Gibson, Thomas Turtal, John Thompson, Robert Jefferson, Mary Todd, and Eliza Lowry, have also estates here. Here is a manor called Twenty Houses, the joint property of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Sir Wastel Brisco. A meal tithe was levied on this manor by one of the lords of Inglewood Forest, for the support of the hounds which were kept at Forester Fold, and the inhabitants were subject to its payment till the enclosure of the commons, when land was allotted in lieu thereof. They are toll free at Rosley, Wigton, and Penrith.

Westwoodside, Eastwoodside, East and West Curthwaite, Howrigg, and the Heights, are all hamlets in this township, extending from two and a half to five miles east of Wigton. At the Heights there is a chapel of ease to Westward church, erected in 1840, at a cost of about £700, raised by subscription, aided by a donation of £70 from the Incorporated Society for Building Churches. It is endowed with £100, the interest being £4 a year. The site was given by the late Mr. Hodge.

Previous to the enclosure of the common land, several trenches and other vestiges of encampments could be traced in this parish, particularly near the Heights, but most of them have been levelled, and large quantities of stone removed from their sites.

FLORA OF THE PARISH OF WESTWARD AND ITS IMMEDIATE NEIGHBOURHOOD.

There are two circumstances which materially influence the growth and number of plants in any particular district—the quality of the soil and its elevation above the level of the sea. In both these respects the parish of Westward presents a considerable variety. On the north side, the ground along the river Wampool rises little above the sea level; while on the south side, above Brocklebank, it attains the height of 800 or 900 feet. Between these extremes there is of course no little variety of surface. The quality of the soil is not less varied. Soil, we know, is but the worn-down parts of the subjacent rocks, mixed up with animal and vegetable organisms; and within the district of which we speak we have three great geological formations, the lower series of the new red sandstone, the coal measures, and the mountain limestone. There is also a small band of millstone grit crossing the higher part of the parish, but it is too small to influence the nature of the soil; and at one or two places, as at Low-ling and at Shawk-beck, a limestone crops out strongly impregnated with magnesia. This, however, is not the magnesian limestone, as appears from the fossils imbedded in it; the limestone here mentioned containing very fine specimens of the beautiful fossil called by Morris "Strombodes floriforme," which does not extend beyond the mountain limestone. The sandstone lies on the north and east of the parish; and excellent quarries have been opened at different points, particularly at Howrigg and Shawk, where some beautiful white freestone strata have been worked, supplying building stones to many parts of the county. The coal measures run from Ilekirk by Clea Hall and across Broadmoor, where many shallow pits have formerly been opened. It seems probable that a good band might be found at a greater depth, and many seams of cannel coal are yet unwrought. The mountain limestone composes the highest part of the parish.

The difference of these three great divisions is very well marked by the three kinds of primulae found growing in the locality. On banks overlying the sandstone we have the common primrose in abundance; on the limestone soil the cowslip is equally abundant; and between these, on the wet clayey soil of the coal measures, the beautiful primula farinosa, (bird's-eye primrose,) grows in great numbers. There are not many plants of great rarity within the district; perhaps the most uncommon is the toothwort, (lathræa squamaria) which is occasionally found in a wood near Ilekirk. We may also mention the tufted loosestrife, (lysichachia thyriflora), growing on the Penrith road, through Rosley; the herb Paris, (Paris quadrifolia), which grows abundantly near Clea Hall, a very pretty flower, with its four egg-shaped leaves, and golden anthers contrasting with the green petals; the beautiful little pyrola minor, less winter green, with its slender cluster of drooping pale rose-coloured flowers, so very wax-like and delicate; the three different kinds of sun-dew, the round-leaved being very common but well worthy of close examination, its peculiar-shaped leaves are covered with glandular hairs from which exudes a viscid fluid shining like dew, and by which flies are entangled, and supposed, though probably without reason, to contribute to the sustenance of the plant. Chicory grows near the Wiza, at Church Hill. The greater bind-weed, (convolvulus sepium.) near Crofton toll-bar. In other places may be found the yellow asphodel, the enchanter's nightshade, the wild teasel, the mountain globe flower, the broad-leaved hebeborine, the hemp agrimony, the sand garlic, the dwarf elder, and the great bell flower. Another beautiful flower, and in some places rare plant, is the grass of Parnassus, (Parnassia palustris.) The more we examine it, the more we are struck with the beauty displayed in its formation; its pure white flower leaves streaked with lines of green; its nectaries placed alternately with its stamens, and opposite the petals, each covered with a little yellow globe, like the balls on an earl's coronet; its slender graceful stem and heart-shaped leaves point it out as one of the most elegant of our native plants, and forcibly remind us how exquisitely beautiful and how faultless are the works of the Almighty.

The following list of plants growing in the parish, in addition to those above-mentioned, is subjoined not on account of their rarity, but in hopes that persons who have a taste for botany, one of the most innocent and entertaining of pursuits, may, in other localities compare it with the plants in their own neighbourhood and observing what additions can be made, in a short time a complete flora of the county might be compiled. We will first enumerate the grasses which have been observed growing naturally in the district; and then the flowers arranged under the months in which they commonly may be found in perfection. It is not easy to say what is the exact number of British flowers, because some writers enumerate as species what others consider merely as varieties. Macgillivray, in his last edition of Withering, describes 1,462 species. If from them we deduct the trees, 52; the willows, 64; and the sedges, 61; we have remaining 1,285: hence it will be seen that fully one-fourth of this number may be found in the small district of which we speak.

GRASSES.

The whole number of British grasses is 122. The following list contains 40. Almost all the rest are rare, growing only on high mountains, on the sea-shore or other particular places:—

- Anthranthum odoratum*, sweet-scented spring grass.
Phalaris arundinacea, reed Canary grass.
Phleum pratense, cat's tail or Timothy.
Alopecurus pratensis, meadow fox-tail.
 " agrestis, slender do.
 " geniculatus, floating do.
Milium effusum, spreading millet grass.
Agrostis canina, brown bent grass.
 " vulgaris, fine do.
 " alba, marsh do.
Aira caespitosa, turfy hair grass,
 " flexuosa, wavy do.
 " caryophyllia, silver do.
Holcus avenaceus, oat-like soft grass.
 " mollis, creeping do.
 " lanatus, meadow do.
Melica uniflora, wood melic grass.
 " carulea, purple do.
Glyceria fluitans, floating sweet grass.
Briza media, common quaking grass.
Poa trivialis, rough meadow grass.
 " pratensis, smooth do.
 " annua, annual do.
Dactylis glomerata, cock's foot.
Cynosurus cristatus, crested dog's tail.
Festuca ovina, sheep's fescue.
 " durisscula, hard do.
 " gigantea, great do.
 " lohiacea, spiked do.
 " pratensis, meadow do.
 " elatior, tall do.
 " sylvatica, slender wood fescue.
Bromus mollis, soft brome grass.
 " asper, hairy wood do.
 " sterilis, barren do.
Lolium perenne, rye grass.
Avena pratensis, narrow-leaved oat grass.
 " flavescens, yellow do.
Triticum repens, couch grass.
 " continuum, dog's wheat.

A few of these grasses grow only in marshes or watery places: as the reed Canary grass, the floating fox-tail, the floating sweet grass. Others in woods, as the millet and melic grasses, the great, the tall, and the wood fescues, and the hairy brome grass. The agrostis alba is called by some the famous florin grass, said to be the most productive grass ever cultivated. The rest are excellent pasture grasses. Three are troublesome on account of their creeping roots, called twitch, the holcus avenaceus, mollis, and triticum repens. All are perennial except the annual meadow grass, slender fox-tail, silver hair grass, and bromus sterilis.

Those flowers are omitted which, though growing wild in some places, are here found only in gardens, as the snowdrop, tulip, and such like.

In February it can scarcely be said that any plants commence flowering, because those which are then to be found in flower are such as flower throughout the whole year, as chickweed, groundsel, and deadnettle.

In March appear the pile wort, or less celandine, coltsfoot, dog's violet, wild strawberry, butter bur, shepherd's purse, hairy cardamine, and a few others.

In April, moschatel, wall cress, wood anemone, water starwort, bitter cardamine, lamb's lettuce, ground ivy, wood sorrel, goldilocks, spurwort, rue-leaved saxifrage, early orchis, and dog's mercury.

In May, bugle, rampsons, cuckoo pint, woodruff, earth nut, gout weed, wood sanicle, crosswort, corn gromwell, wood loosestrife, mercury, beaked parsley, sweet cicely, water parsnip—the least of the umbelliferous order—harebell, golden saxifrage, meadow saxifrage, stitchwort, sandwort, common avens, celandine; ivy leaved, bulbous, and water crowfoot; several speedwells, bilberry, marsh marigold, toadflax, lady's smock, garlic, hedge mustard, bush vetch, birdsfoot, meadow orchis, cow berry, and sweet gale.

In June, marsh speedwell, butterwort, valerian, several bedstraws, hoary, sea-side, and bucks-horn plantain, forget-me-not, bogbean, sheep-bit, pansy, nightshade, wild carrot, arrow grass, cranberry, bistort, corn cockle, red and white campion, agrimony, water avens, creeping cinquefoil, spearwort, henbit, lousewort, yellow toadflax, water cress, meadow wood, jagged and dove's foot cranebill, fumitory, milkwort, broom, rest harrow, kidney vetch, bitter vetch, goat's beard, hawkweed, hawk's beard, carline thistle, mountain cudweed, corn marigold, feverfew, butterfly orchis, frog orchis, spotted orchis, and aromatic orchis, twayblade, orache.

In July, common stonewort, yellow iris, bristle-stalked clab rush, reed, wild teasel; small, field, and bitter scabions; vipers, bugloss, centaury, marsh penny, fool's parsley, hemlock, hemlock dropwort, burnet saxifrage, water purslane, water plantain, several willow herbs, sea campion, red sandwort, wild wood, stone bramble, rock rose, betony, hemp nettle, woundwort, red bartisa, eyebright, cow wheat, figwort, Pepperwort, musk mallow, wood vetch, hairy and smooth tare; common, trailing, mountain, hairy, square, and upright St. John's wort, wall lettuce, rough and autumn hawkbit, cat's ear, nipplewort, sawwort, hemp agrimony, wormwood, mugwort, golden rod, sneezewort, knapweed, blue bottle, and burreed.

In August, marsh bedstraw, curled pondweed, pepper saxifrage, autumnal gentian, yellow saxifrage, purple loosestrife, marsh woundwort, wild basil, highland cudweed, and hornwort.

In September, biting persicaria, perennial knawel, and dwarf whin.

MOSSES.

These form a numerous family of the cryptogamic class, and present very interesting objects of contemplation with a microscope. The beautifully dotted leaves of the thread moss, and the seed vessels of all the different kinds, are well worthy of inspection. First we find a slender stalk surmounted by an egg-shaped cup, and this cup surrounded generally with one or two sets of fringes: then a neatly fitting lid, and over all a fairy like umbrella, altogether forming a receptacle for the almost invisible seed that must excite our admiration. It is curious to observe that the number of teeth in the fringes is always either four or eight, or sixteen, or thirty-two or sixty-four; no intermediate number is ever found. The number of British mosses is about 320. Some of these are found only in the highest mountains. Eighty-five have been observed in this locality. Of these, about twenty-three sorts belong to the hypnum, or feather mosses; some of which are very fine, as the triquetrous, the prolongus, the proliferous, the tree-like, and several others. The water moss, abundant in streams, with its dark three-cornered stems, is another fine moss; so is the curled neckera, which is found near Clea Hall, the same kind of moss which grows so luxuriantly on rocks overhanging the mouth of the cave on the braes of Lochaber, in which the Pretender took refuge after his defeat at Culloden. Perhaps the most beautiful of our mosses is the apple moss, with its light green leaves and perfectly round capsules on tall slender stalks. Several of the bryums, or thread mosses, are very fine, particularly the bryum ligulatum, with its long strap-shaped leaves and several seed stalks springing from the top of one stem. The bryum argenteum looks like a catkin of the hazel frosted with silver. The bristle mosses grow principally on trees: the hygrometric cord moss where charcoal has been burnt. Then we have several kinds of hair moss—the dwarf, the unbearing, and the great broom hair moss—all with two veils, or umbrellas, instead of one. The lattice moss, with its bright red teeth netted together; the screw moss, with its twisted fringe; the fork moss; the fringe moss, with greatly divided teeth; the twin toothed moss; the hoary grimmia, covering our mountainous pastures; the extinguisher moss, with its veil so exactly resembling the extinguisher of a candle; the four-toothed moss; the branched beardless moss; the bog moss, and the earth moss. Some of the last are so small as scarcely to be visible to the naked eye; and, lastly, the split moss, the capsule of which opens so differently from most other mosses, being divided into four valves perpendicularly instead of having its top cut off horizontally.

FERNS.

In the splendid volume of Nature-Printed Ferns, by Bradbury, the number of British species is reckoned to be forty-five. Of these, we have in this parish twenty. Some of the specimens grow most luxuriantly, and attain a very large size. The moonwort, one of our prettiest ferns, is found in great numbers in the grounds belonging to General Wyndham, at Hill Top; and the oak fern, a handsome species, with its three delicate light green branches, is common in shady places. The following is the list of species:—Common polybody, beech fern, oak fern, parsley fern, lobate shield fern, broad buckler fern, prickly toothed fern, mountain fern, male fern, lady fern, black spleenwort, green ditto, maiden hair ditto, rue-leaved ditto, hard fern, common brakes, brittle fern, hart's tongue, moonwort, adder's tongue.

ORNITHOLOGY OF WESTWARD.

Birds, with respect to any given locality, may be divided into four classes—constant residents, summer visitants for the sake of breeding, winter visitants for food, and occasional visitors or stragglers which some chance had driven to the place. There may be difference of opinion as to the birds to be included in any of these classes; nor need we be surprised at this; it is the same in all classification whatever devised by the art of man. Every class has its transitional forms which run into some adjoining class. Even the line which separates the great kingdoms of nature is invisible; and men of the highest attainments in natural science have disputed whether certain objects which lie on the boundary between the animal and vegetable kingdom do really belong to the one or the other. Among our birds this remark applies to the vagtails; they evidently increase in numbers about the breeding season, yet some are found at all times of the year. They are partly migrant, therefore, and partly resident. Then, again, with regard to the common gull and the heron, they neither breed in the district, nor are they driven from more northern climates for winter food, and yet they may be found occasionally at all times.

The whole number of British birds, according to Yarrel, is 337. Of these 125 are residents, 50 summer visitants, 38 winter visitants, and 124 stragglers. Leaving out this last class as of no value in inquiring into the ornithology of any district, we have in Westward 40 of the first class, 25 of the second, and six of the third, or 80 birds in all. The greatest difference is in the winter visitants, and this arises from the parish being at some distance from the sea, and without any lakes or fens, so that we derive no accession either from the swimming or wading class of birds which are so numerous in other places in winter; while it may be noticed that of fifty birds that migrate to Great Britain in summer, twenty-five are common to this neighbourhood. In the recollection of the writer, one or two very noticeable changes have taken place as to the number of particular kinds of birds. Forty or fifty years ago starlings were very rare birds indeed; now they are very common. The golden-crested wren, too, has increased very much of late, while the bittern or mire drum, once not uncommon, is now entirely banished, and the buzzards, or gleads, as they were called, are only occasionally seen.

Of the birds of prey we have seven residents, merlin, kestrel, sparrow hawk, common buzzard (now rare), common harrier, white or barn owl, and tawny owl.

Of perching birds thirty-two are residents, water ouzel, missel thrush, song thrush, blackbird, robin, gold-crested wren, blue titmouse, greater titmouse, coal tit-mouse, long-tailed titmouse, hedge sparrow, pied wagtail, yellow wagtail, crow, jackdaw, rook, magpie, jay, starling, greenfinch, goldfinch, grey linnet, less redpole, house sparrow, chaffinch, common bunting, yellow bunting, reed bunting, skylark, bulfinch, wren, kingfisher. Twenty summer visitants: Wheatear, whinchat, stonechat, redstart, blackcap, whitethroat, sedge warbler, grasshopper warbler, wood warbler, willow warbler, titlark, tree pipit, spotted flycatcher, common creeper, cuckoo, goatsucker, common swallow, martin, land martin, swift. Three winter visitants: Fieldfare, red wing, and snow bunting (frequently.)

Of the raptors, or scraping birds, we have five residents: Wood pigeon, black grouse, red grouse, partridge, and pheasant. One summer visitant: The quail.

Of wading birds, four residents: Heron, snipe, golden plover, and water hen. Four summer visitants: Sand piper, curlew, and lapwing. Two winter visitants: Woodcock and jacksnipe.

Of the swimming birds we have only one resident, the common wild duck, and two that occasionally visit us at all seasons, the teal and the gull.

WIGTON PARISH.

THE parish of Wigton is bounded on the north by the parishes of Kirkbride and Holme Cultram, on the west by Bromfield, on the south by Bolton and Westward, and on the east by Aikton and Thursby. It is about five miles in length by three in breadth, and consists generally of low, dry, and fertile land, the soil varying from loam, clay, and gravel. Plenty of red freestone is found here, but no coal or limestone. It is intersected by the Wiza, and several small brooks and rivulets, and contains a small lake called Martin Tarn, in which pike, perch, &c., are found. Wigton parish comprises the townships of Wigton, Oulton, Waverton, and Woodside, whose united area is 11,800 acres. The Maryport and Carlisle railway runs through the parish.

WIGTON.

The population of the township of Wigton in 1801 was 2,450; in 1811, 2,977; in 1821, 4,056; in 1831, 4,885; in 1841, 4,738; and in 1851, 4,568. The rateable value is £10,528.

The barony of Wigton was anciently demesne of Allerdale, until Waltheof, son of Gospatric, earl of Dunbar, gave it to Odard de Lucy, whose posterity took their name from the place. At that time the barony contained Wigton, Waverton, Blencogo, Dun-draw, and Kirkbride, with Oulton, each of which townships is still a manor within itself, known by metes and bounds, and lies in the barony of Wigton. Henry I. confirmed Waltheof's grant to Odard, who lived until the reign of King John, so that he must have attained a respectable old age. This Odard had issue Adam, and Adam had issue Odard the second, whose son and heir, Adam the second, dying without issue, the inheritance came to his brother Walter, who had issue Odard the third. The latter died without issue, as did also another Odard, upon which their brother, John de Wigton, son of Walter, came into possession. This John had an only daughter, who was married to John Gernou, and in the reign of Edward III. was impleaded for her birthright, in consequence of which, her mother, Idonisa Lovetot, was for a time kept out of her dower, but she afterwards regained it. Shortly after the demise of the wife of John Gernou, Wigton barony came to Thomas Lucy, lord of Allerdale, "and thereby," say Nicolson and Burn, "in right the seigniority of Wigton was extinguished, and became again part of the ancient barony of Allerdale, though it is still taken and reputed as a distinct barony." From the Lucies Wigton came to the Percies, earls of Northumberland, together with the rest of the estates of that family. When Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, was attainted in 1578, a survey was made of the barony of Wigton, when it was found that Wigton was an ancient barony, and "hath been of long time the inheritance of the ancestors of the said earl . . . and was of ancient time holden of the kings of this realm by knight's service, cornage, &c., and is now holden by the last letters patents, together with all the lands belonging to the said earldom by — part of a knight's fee." From the same MS. we learn that the barony at that time comprised the towns of Wigton, Waverton, Dundraw, Kirkbride, and Oulton, "the which two last-named are accepted both for one town; and there is also the hamlets of Rosenen, Kirkland, Woodside, Aiton, and others, within which circuit the said earl hath the liberties, royalties, and privileges of court barron from three weeks to three weeks; a court leet at two times in the year, viz., within one month next after the feast of Easter, and within one month after the feast of St. Michael the Archangel; and also by a charter bearing date at Westminster, the third day of February, anno regni Henrici Tertii 46 (1262), one market weekly at the town of Wigton on Tuesday, with one fair there every year, to endure for three days, viz., the even, the day, and the morrow after the feast of the nativity of our Saviour, with all things to a market and fair belonging: And also the lords of the said manor and barony have had and used within their limits and bounds, free-warren and all things thereto belonging; and also have had and used, through all the wastes and commons within the said barony according to the limits thereof before set down (excepting Dockwray Moss and Morres Moss), free search and drift yearly; and all goods and chattels found there by the said search of any foreigner and other persons not having liberty or interest of common there were taken, distreyned, and impounded, or detained until such times as the owners thereof did compound and agree and make amends for their depasturing there, to the use of the lord of the manor. And all trespasses committed upon the said wastes or commons by any person by improving or taking up any part thereof, without license of the lord, or in digging of turfe, pulling of ling, or any such like offence there committed, have always been inquired of and presented at the courts of the said manor or barony, and there punished by the way of americiament or otherwise, as the offence required."

The following list of the freeholders of Wigton at this period, extracted from the same inquisition, now printed for the first time, will no doubt be interesting to our readers:—

AT WIGTON.

"Leonard Dykes holdeth two tenements at Tufos-thwaite, in socage tenure and rent at the feast of the nativity of our Lord, pr. ann. 13s. The same Leonard holdeth six acres of land at Guildrigg by like services, and payeth yearly at the feast abovesaid, 8d.

"Anthony Curwen holdeth two tenements at Highmoor by homage, fealtie and suit of court, and payeth by year at the feast of St. Martin and Pentecost, 8s. The same Anthony holdeth ten acres of meadow in Coldmire, late the lands of John Lamb, by like services, and rend. pr. ann. 5s.

"Jo. Thompson and Tho. Thompson hold certain lands at Wigton by like service, late the lands of Robert and Michel Thompson, viz.: two acres, 2s.; four acres of land lying at the foot, 3s. 10d.; six acres of land at Howrigg, 3s. 6½d.; three acres of land at Coldmire, 3s.; two crofts, 1s. 6d.; a tenement and certain lands, called Longmoor, 1s. 2d.; and one tenement, 6d., late the lands of John Thompson, and rend. pr. ann. 15s. 6½d.

"Cuthbert Grainger holdeth there a tenement with an acre of land, late the lands of Alexander Highmoor, by like services, and rend. pr. ann. 2s. 4d.

"Jo. Tiffin holdeth there a tenement called the Longmoor, late the lands of Michael Thompson, by like services, and the 13th mulcture, and rend. pr. ann. 1s. 8d.

"Bartholomew Lamplugh, William Scot, and William Harrison, hold there two tenements, one acre of land, and two acres of meadow, rend. 5s. 5d.

"Jo. Daker holdeth at Wigton aforesaid an acre of meadow in Broading, late the lands of Adam Perts, by like services aforesaid, and rend. pr. ann. 1d.

"The same Jo. Daker holdeth there two tenements in p'tiu', late Adam Perts' by the like services, and payeth for the one 7s., and for the other 2s., in toto, pr. ann. 9s.

From the Lucies, Wigton passed by marriage to the Duke of Somerset, from whom it has come by inheritance to its present proprietor, General Wyndham.

The principal landowners in the township of Wigton are Miss Aglionby, Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; Messrs. John Martindale, John Glaister, John Taylor, Joseph Henderson, Edward Fidler, Joseph Skelton, John Hodgson, and John Mandriell.

THE TOWN OF WIGTON.

The town of Wigton is situated near the right bank of the river Wiza, in 54° 49' north latitude, 3° 9' west longitude, distant eleven miles south-west from Carlisle, 303 miles north-north-west from London by road, and 312 by the North-Western and Lancaster and Carlisle railways. Its population in 1851 was 4,244, of which 2,011 were males and 2,233 females, inhabiting 957 houses, besides which 52 houses were uninhabited, and two were in course of erection.

Wigton consists chiefly of one long and tolerably wide street, which is lighted with gas, and contains many well-built houses. The principal manufactures are checks, gingham, and calicoes; some linen is also made. Tanning, nail making, brewing, and malting, are carried on, besides several other branches of industry. The market, which is held on Tuesday, is well supplied with corn and all kinds of provisions; a great market for butchers' meat, apples, and honey, is held on St. Thomas' Day. Fairs are held on the 20th of February and 5th of April, the former for horses, and the latter for cattle and merchandise, &c. Wigton is one of the polling places for the eastern division of the county. Petty sessions are held every alternate Tuesday, at the police station; a county court for the recovery of debts under £50 is also held here.

THE CHURCH.

Wigton parish church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure, containing about 1,000 sittings, and was erected in 1788 on the site of a former edifice, said to have been built by Odard, first baron of Wigton, with materials taken from the Roman station of old Carlisle in the neighbourhood of the town. It contains monuments to the memory of Colonel Thomas Barwis, who died in 1648; the Rev. John Brown, vicar of Wigton, 1763; and the Rev. Lowther Yates, D.D., master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, who died in 1798. A splendid organ has recently been presented to this church by G. Moore, Esq., of London, a native of this neighbourhood. It cost £320, and was opened on the 26th January, 1859. Margaret de Wigton gave the church to the abbey of Holme Cultram, to which it was soon afterwards appropriated, that the community might find "four chaplains, monks of their own house, to perform divine service in the church of the abbey, and two secular chaplains to officiate in a chantry of the church of St. Mary, at Wigton, for the soul of the said Margaret, and of her husband, John Gernon, and of her ancestors, and of all faithful people." Shortly after the church of Wigton was granted to the abbey, upon the petition of Thomas de Talcane, then abbot of Holme Cultram, and his convent to Bishop Kirkby; the bishop and his commissaries, Robert de Southayke and John de Burden, confirmed the appropriation, and ordained that there should be a perpetual vicar, who should have an annual stipend of twenty-six marks of silver, to be paid by the abbot and convent, and one message and ten acres of arable land in the vill of Kirkland, and one acre of land in the vill of Wigton, near to the mansion-house, but reserving to the bishop the collation to the benefice, in recompense of the diminution of the episcopal right occurring by such appropriation. After the dissolution of the monastic institutions of this country, Queen Elizabeth, by letters patent, dated February 9th, 1588, granted the corn tithes of the villages of Wigton, Waverton, and Oulton, to Edward Downinge and Miles Dodding, who assigned the same to Robert Petrie, whose heir, Sir John Petrie, disposed of them to Richard Fletcher, of Cockermouth, for £650. James I., by letters patent, granted the remainder to the rectory, with the exception of the tithes of eggs, geese, and apples, to Francis Morice, Esq., and Francis Philips; who, in the year 1615, assigned the same to the Richard Fletcher above-mentioned. The same monarch, in 1607, granted the tithes of eggs, geese, and apples to Lewis Owen and William Blake, from whom they passed to the house of Crofton. These tithes have since been commuted. The rectorial tithes belonged to Sir Frederick Fletcher Vane, Bart., as impropror; but he obtained an act of parliament to convert them into other property, and sold them to the proprietors of the land. The benefice is a vicarage, valued in the King's Book at £17 19s. 9d., and having been augmented with £450, obtained from Queen Anne's Bounty, and a yearly rent charge of £13, left by the Rev. John Thompson, is now worth about £150 a year. Efforts are now being made to further augment the living. The Bishop of Carlisle is patron.

VICARS.—Henry de Appleby, 1346; Thomas de Cullerane, —; Richard de Aslaeby, 1359; William de Cressop, —; Richard Danysell, 1367; William de Hayton, 1368; John de Welton, 1399; John King, —; William Loxton, 1577; William Lowson, 1592; Thomas Wareoppe, 1612; John Chambers, 1661; Henry Geddis, 1674; John Brown, 1714; Wilfrid Clarke, sen., 1755; Wilfrid Clarke, jun., 1802; John Dodd, 1804; J. Irving, 1826; W. Lyde, 1857.

There was a free chapel at or near Wigton attached to the hospital of St. Leonard, the lands belonging to which were granted by Edward VI. to Thomas Dalston and William Denton. This hospital is supposed to have been at a place called Spital, nearly a mile east of the town, now the property of Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.

CHARITIES.

The School.—Wigton Free Grammar School, situated in Market Hill, was erected about the year 1730. It is stated in a memorandum added to a list of the principal inhabitants of Wigton, in the year 1714, that a free school should be erected, with convenient lodgings for a master and usher, towards which each inhabitant should contribute £1 for every 1d. they paid to the purvey; and that those who would not pay, and their heirs, should be excluded from having any more benefit in the school than foreigners. From the same list it appears that the family of Thomlinsons subscribed very largely to this establishment. The original endowment of the school also appears to have been raised by contribution. In a deed of re-lease, dated 24th August, 1724, it is recited that an agreement had been heretofore made between the Rev. John Thomlinson, rector of Rothbury, then deceased, and the parishioners of Wigton, whereby the latter had bound themselves to raise a sum of £417 5s. 6d. to be laid out in a rent charge of £20 6s. 8d., for the endowment of a free school or charity school at Wigton, and that in pursuance of such agreement the said sum had been paid into the hands of the said John Thomlinson. He died, however, before the said rent charge was settled; and by his will, dated 12th February, 1719, after leaving to the vicarage of Wigton for the time being £13 per annum out of that part of his rent-charge paid by Robert Smith, of Haughton, in Northumberland, he left to the churchwardens of Wigton, and their successors, for the use of the free school, such a further sum as should answer what he had of them, at the rate of five per cent. It appears that previous to the 24th of August, 1724, the executors settled a rent charge of £20 6s. 8d. upon the free school, payable out of the Haughton estate in Northumberland. Since the first establishment of the school several persons have purchased their freedom, and the following bequests have been made:—John Allison, by will, dated 20th April, 1787, £1,000 stock at three per cent. reduced, to the ministers and churchwardens of Wigton, the interest thereof to be by them paid to the two schoolmasters of the free school at Wigton, share and share alike, upon condition that they should constantly teach four boys that should not belong to the parish of Wigton. Thomas Thomlinson, Esq., by will, dated 16th April, 1798, bequeathed to this school a third part of the residue of his personal property.¹ The sum received by the trustees in respect of this legacy amounted to £355. The only additional property belonging to the school is a small parcel of land consisting of two roods thirty perches, which was allotted to it on the enclosure of a common in the parish. The income is now upwards of £70 a year, about £28 of which is paid to the usher, and the remainder to the master. According to the rules and orders for the regulation of the school, "the head master shall teach in Latin and Greek, gratis, the children of all such, as by contributing to raise the salary of the school, have made their houses free. And that the school may not be burdened with a number of foreigners, he shall not teach any but who are free for a less sum than five shillings a quarter. The under master shall teach all the children of such as are free to read, write, cypher; and those that intend to advance to the head master, he shall teach them the accidence; and all these gratis; nor shall he take any foreigners under his care for less premium than 2s. 6d. per quarter, or any whatever till they can read the Testament." The rules further ordain that the under master "shall be paid out of the income of the school; the fourth part of the school income, and all the rest of that income, together with the dwelling-house, to belong to the head master." Whenever a vacancy happens, the head master and usher are to be elected by a majority of all such as are free to the school, and appear to that purpose, when due notice of their meeting has been given in the church. Four boys are taught free under the will of John Allison. They are appointed according to the directions of the testator, by the heir of the late Henry Allison, of Aspatia, to whom the nomination of the first four boys was assigned. All the children, boys or girls, of the occupiers of the tenements that belonged either to the original contributors, or to those who have since purchased their freedom, are admitted into the school upon the payment of a certain quarterage. Until about six years previous to the publication of the report of the Charity Commissioners, they were all taught free, but the occupiers of the free tenements then agreed that the master should be permitted to demand 3s. a quarter for each of the children learning Latin or Greek, and the usher 2s. 6d. for every one learning reading, writing, or arithmetic.

Widow's Hospital.—This institution was founded in 1724 for six indigent widows of Protestant benefited clergymen, by the Rev. John Thomlinson, M.A., rector of Rothbury, Northumberland, who endowed it with a yearly rent-charge of £45. 12s., to be paid out of lands at Haughton, in that county; £6 a year out of lands near Gateshead, in the county of Durham; and £6 per annum out of lands at Blencogo, besides a yearly rent-charge of £3. 10s., which was purchased in the latter estate, with the £100 left by Mrs. Read, of Carlisle, sister to Dr. Thomlinson, one of the executors to the will of the founder. The hospital is incorporated by the name of the Governors and Sisters of the College of Matrons, or Hospital of Christ, in Wigton. Widows of clergymen in the diocese of Chester, also those of the parish of Rothbury, in Northumberland, and Whickham, in the county of Durham, are eligible to this charity. Widows of clergymen who have served as curates in any of the above places for two years, are, according to the tenor of the regulations, also eligible; but those of a benefited clergyman are to have the preference. No widow is admitted under forty-six years of age. £9 a year is paid to each of the six inmates, and 10s. extra is paid to the eldest, who is appointed governess. They have each three apartments in the hospital, which is a neat edifice on the north side of the church. The chancellor of the diocese, the rectors of Aikton and Caldbeck, and the vicars of Bromfield and Wigton, are the governors.

Barwis' Charity.—An account of the origin and history of this charity is given in our account of Westward Parish. The annual sum of ten shillings, as therein stated, is paid over to the vicar of Wigton, and by him distributed as directed.

Thomas Thomlinson's Bequest for the Poor.—Thomas Thomlinson, by will, dated 16th April, 1798, bequeathed to the poor of Wigton £60, to be distributed by the ministers and churchwardens for the time being, amongst the most industrious and deserving, in such a manner that their ordinary allowance from the parish should not be lessened thereby. The charity is distributed by the vicar, according to the expressed wishes of the donor.

John Thomlinson's Gift to the Vicar.—John Thomlinson, by will, dated 12th February, 1719, left to the vicar of Wigton £13 per annum, part of a rent-charge, payable out of the Houghton estate, in Northumberland.

Wigton and Oulton Quarters, Barnes' Charity.—John Grainger, by will, reciting that his brother, John Barnes, had bequeathed to him £50, to be laid out for raising the sum of 40s. a year, to be distributed by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of Wigton and Oulton quarters, amongst the poor of the said quarters, on the 25th May and the 25th December, yearly, two-thirds thereof to the poor of Wigton and one-third to the poor of Oulton; and reciting that he had not met with an opportunity of laying out the same, charged all his free and customary lord's rents issuing out of several lauds and tenements in the townships of Oulton, Kirkland, Longthwaite, Lowhouses and Waverton, in the parish of Wigton, with a payment of 40s. yearly, to be distributed as aforesaid, until £50, or sufficient to raise the sum of 40s. yearly should be otherwise laid out. The money received on account of this charity is divided into three parts, two of which are paid over to the overseers of Wigton quarter, and the third part to those of Oulton quarter, and distributed as directed.

Sanderson's Charity.—Richard Sanderson, Esq., of Norbury House, Croxton, in the county of Surrey, merchant and citizen of London, but a native of this neighbourhood, by will, dated September, 1836, bequeathed £5,000 bank stock, three per cent. consols, upon trust, to the vicar, churchwardens, and overseers for the time being, after the death of Honor Thompson, the interest thereof to be distributed by them on the 26th December, in each year, amongst twenty poor persons, of either sex, born and resident in the parish of Wigton, who shall have attained the age of fifty years; each person to receive not less than £5, nor more than £10.

Hodge's Bequest.—Mr. Joseph Hodge, manufacturer, of Wigton, who died 27th March, 1846, bequeathed to trustees £1,500, bearing interest at three and a half per cent., for the education of the poor children of the parish of Wigton and Westward, viz.: £900 to the former and £600 to the latter; and directed the residue, if any, to be given in clothing to poor women. Upon the demise of the last survivor of the first trustee the money is to be placed in the funds, stocks, or other government security; and on the death of a trustee the remainder are to elect one to fill up the number. The trustees are not to be ministers, curates, or parish clerks, either of the Established Church or of dissenters; schoolmasters, or teachers. The benevolent donor has also left several small sums, varying from 2s. to 8s. a week, to some of his old workmen.

CHURCHES, CHAPELS, AND SCHOOLS.

St. Cuthbert's Catholic Church is a neat Gothic structure, consisting of nave, chancel, and one transept, the nave being erected in 1835-6 from designs by Bonomi, and the other portions in the spring of 1857, when stone mullions were inserted in all the windows, and the entire edifice otherwise much improved and ornamented, in accordance with the requirements of Catholic worship. Vestries were also added, and a neat and commodious presbytery, or priest's house, erected, which is connected with the vestry by an ornate cloister. Another cloister unites the south transept with the adjoining schools and convent.

The school is in the same style as the church, and is sixty-seven feet long by eighteen broad. It is lighted by three elegant triple lancet windows at each gable, and has two doors opening on the south to the ample play ground in front. Internally as well as externally it is complete in every respect, and presents a very neat appearance.

Adjoining the school is the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, a branch house of the well-known Order of Mercy, founded for the express purpose of educating youth, relieving the sick and distressed, and administering to the spiritual wants of the poor. It is the only establishment of the kind in Cumberland and Westmoreland, and is the first religious house erected in these counties since their suppression at the period of the Reformation. It is in the middle-age style of conventual architecture, and consists of two wings of two stories high, and excellent attics, with triangular dormer windows. With the south-east transept of the church, and school on the south, and the cloister (connecting the convent with the transept) on the west, it forms a quadrangle, embracing recreation grounds of some fifty yards by forty yards. On the north and east sides there are ample kitchen gardens. Five ladies, from the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy at Bermondsey, London, took possession of this convent on the third of September, 1857. Two of these ladies formed part of that noble band who, headed by their superioress, Mrs. Moore, went forth amid the rage of battle and the strife of cruel warfare to tend our sick and wounded soldiers on the ensanguined fields of the Crimea, and in the pestiferous hospitals of Varna and elsewhere, sharing all the dangers and sufferings of the campaign, to which some of their companions fell victims.¹ The year 1858 saw the first reception of a nun in Cumberland since the time of the Reformation, when a young lady, of London, received the white veil of a novice from the hands of the Right Rev. Dr. Hogarth, Bishop of Hexham, in whose diocese the Catholics of Cumberland and Westmoreland are included.

From the period of the Reformation till the year 1830, the Catholics of Wigton and neighbourhood possessed no resident priest, and had to go from time to time to Carlisle to receive the sacraments, but in the year just named the Rev. John Dowdall, a gentleman of considerable talents and attainments, and an eloquent preacher, founded a mission in the town, where he laboured zealously and successfully for several years, during which period his retired and unassuming manner, and kindness of disposition, secured the friendship and esteem of all parties. Mr. Dowdall was subsequently removed to St. Patrick's Church, Manchester, and afterwards to Bolton-le-Moors, where he died, in 1848, universally beloved and regretted. His successor, the Rev. Edmund Kelly, was appointed to Wigton in 1838, where he continued till 1852, when he was transferred to South Shields and the Rev. Canon Nicholas Brown, the present incumbent, succeeded. Mr. Brown's first care was to improve the education of the children of the poor, and the beneficent munificence of a good lady (Miss Aglionby, daughter of the late Major Aglionby, M.P.), whose many charities are but partially known, soon enabled him to purchase a large portion of an adjoining field, and to erect the present elegant buildings as above named. All the several buildings are of stone. The whole group, church, convent, schools and presbytery, gardens, &c., occupying an area of little less than two acres, present a very pleasing and attractive feature on entering the town from the east. The congregation numbers about four hundred persons.

The Friends Meeting House, situated in Allonby Road, to the west of the town, is a handsome structure of red freestone, erected in 1820, upon the site of a previous meeting house, built in 1706, and will accommodate about 500 persons. For many years previous to the erection of the old meeting house, the Society of Friends had a congregation in Wigton, but the date of its first formation cannot now be ascertained.

The Independent Chapel, Water Street, was erected in 1834, at a cost of £1,900, inclusive of the adjacent burial-ground and minister's house. It is a large commodious edifice of three stories, and contains sittings for 600 persons. The lowest story serves as a Sunday school, and also a British day school. The first chapel possessed by the Independent body in Wigton was erected in Market Hill in 1819, when the congregation was placed under the care of the Rev. John Walton, previous to which period they had met for worship in a school-room in Strong's Lane. Mr. Walton was succeeded by the Rev. Edward Leighton, in 1826, and he by the Rev. Jonah Reeves in 1837. Two years later the Rev. Mr. Kelsay became pastor, and in 1845 the Rev. George Young, who was succeeded, in 1858, by the Rev. Henry Perfect, the present minister.

The Presbyterian (United) Church is situated in Market Hill. It was erected in 1819, by the Independents, who upon the completion of their new chapel in 1834 sold it, and it is now private property, rented by the present congregation. It will seat about 300 persons. The Presbyterians first formed a congregation in Wigton, about seventy years ago, and had for their first minister the Rev. Mr. Davis, holding their meetings in Meeting House Lane, from which they removed to their present place of worship. The congregation was for some time without any regular minister. The Rev. Alexander Leitch has been minister for the last few years.

The Wesleyan Chapel is a plain but substantial building in George Street, erected by subscription in 1838, at a cost of £600, and contains 500 sittings. This body was established about the year 1819, when they occupied the school-room in Strong's Lane, after the Independents had left it. Afterwards they removed to Meeting House Lane, where they continued to assemble for worship till the erection of their present chapel—Rev. Edward C. Woolmer, minister.

The Primitive Methodists formed a small congregation in this town for a short time, but they have long since ceased to exist, as such.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTION, &c.

Wigton Mechanics' Institution, situated in Allonby Road, is a handsome building, erected in 1850, from designs furnished by the late Mr. John Walker and Mr. W. Henderson, at a cost of about £400. It is of red freestone, with a portico in front, above which is a group of three figures, the centre one representing Fame. The institution comprises first and second-class reading-rooms, and a library; in the first-class reading-room there is a bust of the late Sir Robert Smirke, who was born in a small cottage which formerly stood opposite the site of the institution. The bust and pedestal of scagliola were presented to the members by Mr. Sydney Smirke, a son of the celebrated painter. Both reading-rooms are well supplied with newspapers and periodicals, &c., and are ornamented with maps, globes, &c., which have, at various times, been presented to the institution. The library occupies a room to the rear of the first-class reading-room, and comprises upwards of 1,400 volumes in the various departments of literature, science, and art. The subscription to the library and reading-rooms is one guinea per annum, to the library alone eight shillings—the subscribers to the latter are principally ladies. Mechanics are admitted for a subscription of eight shillings per annum to the library and second-class reading-room. The affairs of the institution are managed by a committee of thirteen members, who are chosen annually. Lectures are frequently given in connection with the institution.

A working men's reading-room was established in the year 1858 in a room on Market Hill.

The National School, situated in the South End, is a plain stone building, with girls' school over the boys', conducted by master and mistress and two pupil teachers. Average attendance, 120 boys and 80 girls.

In addition to the school mentioned at page 273, and the Catholic schools, and National school just mentioned, there are several other schools; well-attended Sunday schools are attached to all the places of worship in the town.

CEMETERY.

Wigton Cemetery is handsomely situated about a mile north-west from the town. It was opened on the 1st of August, 1855, and consecrated by the present bishop of Carlisle on the 11th of July 1856. The ground, which covers an area of five acres, was given by the late Miss Matthews, of Wigton Hall; £2,000 was expended upon it previous to its being used for interments. It is divided into three parts or divisions, one of which is reserved to the members of the Church of England, another for Catholics, and the third for Nonconformists. There are two chapels, situated to the right and left of the entrance, with a house for the registrar; these are of red freestone. A wall seven feet high encloses the entire cemetery, with the exception of the space between the chapel of the Church of England and the registrar's house, which is palisaded.

GAS WORKS.

The Gas Works, situated in Tenters Field, was erected in 1831, by a company of shareholders of £10 each. It was rebuilt and considerably enlarged in 1854, at a cost of £3,000, twelve retorts being added, and room made for fifteen more, in all twenty-seven. There are two gasometers, one of which is capable of containing 8,000, and the other 2,500 cubic feet. The gas is sold to consumers at six shillings per thousand cubic feet. The annual consumption is about 2,500,000 cubic feet. The affairs of the company are managed by a committee of resident gentlemen; and the estimated value of the works is now about £5,000.

POOR LAW UNION.

The Poor-law Union is divided into three sub-districts, viz., Wigton, comprising Thursby, Crofton, Parton and Micklethwaite, Oughterby, Kirkbampton, Little Bampton, Fingland, Drumburgh, Bowness, Anthorn, Kirkbride, Wampool, Aikton, Biglands and Gamblesby, Wiggonby, Oulton, Wigton, Woodside, Waverton and Holme-east Waver; Abbey Holme, embracing Holme St. Cuthbert, Abbey Holme, Dundraw and Kelsick, Blencogo, Bromfield, Langrigg and Mearlrigg, West Newton and Allonby, Hayton and Melay, Aspatria and Brayton, Blennerhasset and Kirkland, Torpenhow, and Whitrigg, and Allhallows; Caldbeck, including High Bolton, Low Bolton, Stoneraise, Woodside, Rosley, Brocklebank, Low Sebergham, High Sebergham, Low Caldbeck, High Caldbeck, Caldbeck Haltcliff, Low Ireby, High Ireby, and Uldale. The area of the union is 176,529 acres.¹ Its population in 1851 was 23,661, of whom 11,781 were males, and 11,880 females. The number of inhabited houses at the same period was 4,718, of uninhabited 321, and there were 29 building. The rateable value of the union amounts to £110,174. The following statement of accounts shows the receipts and expenditure for the year ending 22nd March, 1858. The receipts were, from poor-rates, £7,461 1s.; in aid of poor-rate, £202 15s.; total, £7,663 16s. The expenditure amounted to the following:—For in-maintenance, £559 9s. 3½d.; out-relief, £1,901 6s. 6d.; maintenance of lunatics in asylums, £360 17s.; extra medical fees, £13 5s.; vaccination fees, £53 11s.; registration fees, £72; county rates, £191 18s. 4d.; building expenses (instalment and interest of loan), £155 7s. 3d.; lunatic medical visits, £5; conveyance of lunatics to and from asylum, school fees, &c., £19 6s. 11d.; common charges, including salaries, rations, relief of irremovable poor, in-door and out-door, &c., £2,148 17s. 3½d.; total, £5,480 13s. 7½d. Expenditure of year ending March, 1857, £5,259 9s. 0½d.; increase, £221 4s. 6½d. Number of paupers relieved in the union on the 1st of January, 1858, in-door, 134; out-door, 910; total, 1,044. Average weekly cost per head of in-door paupers, 2s. 5d.

Aikhead, a small hamlet in Wigton township, about one and a half miles west-by-north of that town, was long the residence of John Rooke, Esq., one of the last of the English Neptunian geologists. He was author of a Geology of the Lake District, and many papers on his favourite science. He died in 1856, and is interred in the Cemetery at Wigton.

Dockray is another hamlet, one and a half miles east-by-north of Wigton, near the confluence of the Wiza and Wampool. It contains the old farm-house called Dockray Hall.

Moorhouse hamlet is two miles north of Wigton, where there is a large farm-house called Moorhouse Hall.

Standing Stones is another small hamlet, occupying an elevated situation above the railway station, half a mile north of Wigton.

OULTON.

The rateable value of this township is £1,840. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 204; in 1811, 321; in 1821, 336; in 1831, 379; in 1841, 406; and in 1851, 421. The Maryport and Carlisle railway runs through the township. A great portion of the land here consists of a kind of moss, producing nothing but peat. Martin Tarn, a small lake about a mile in circumference, is situated in this township.

The manor of Oulton was anciently held by the Dalstons, and we learn from an inquisition taken in 1578, that "John Dalston, Esq., holdeth the other half of Kirkbride, and the hamlet of Ulton (as is aforesaid), which were parcel of the said barony (Wigton) in demesne, and sold by King Henry VIII. to Thomas Dalston, father of the said John Dalston, and were of the yearly rent of — over and besides the free rents of certain freeholders in Ulton aforesaid, amounting to the sum of 33s. 4d. per annum, holden of the said barony, which rents and services of the said freeholders the said John Dalston claimeth and detaineth by colour of his said letters patent (quo pite ignor.) The rents and services of which freeholders hereafter followeth: Robert Dalston holdeth a tenement and two oxgangs of land, late William Morpith's, by fealtie, suit of court, and moult, to the 13th moult., rendering per an. 10s. John Kay holdeth a tenement called Gamsey land, with the same service and moult., and renders per an. 9s. 2d. Robert Vause holdeth certain tenements and lands by like services and moult., and renders per an. 4s. 6d. John Thompson holdeth two tenements and certain lands, with other appurtenances, by like services and moult., and renders per an. 5s. Robert Dalston holdeth there a parcel of meadow, sometime John Sparrow's, by the like services as aforesaid, 9d. The same Robert holdeth another parcel of meadow, late Thomas Pattinson's, by like services, and renders per an. 9d. John Thompson holdeth there three acres of land, late the lands of John Thompson, by like services, rendering 1s. 4d. Cuthbert Grainger and Nicholas Allison holdeth there one parcel of meadow, late Nicholas Brown's, by like services, rendering 6d. The heirs of Robert or Thomas Leche, holdeth there three acres of meadow, by like services, and renders per annum 1s. 4d." At the same time "Richard Barwis holdeth four acres of demaine in Ulton, rendering 5s. 4d." After the extinction of the Dalston family, this manor was sold to — Watson, Esq., from whom it came to William Taylor, Esq., of Greenwich, and is now held by John Taylor, Esq., who holds customary courts from time to time. The landowners of the township are Messrs. John Barnes, Daniel Barnes, William Cape, H. J. Percy, John Todd, John Gibson, John Lightfoot, John M. Watson, John Taylor, John Ismay, and a few other small owners.

The village of Oulton is pleasantly situated, two miles north-by-west of Wigton, and contains a small chapel, erected by the Baptists in 1722, but rebuilt in 1832. It is now used on week nights by the vicar of Wigton.

Eskrigg, Lawrence Holme, Tarnrigg, and Wedholme Hill, are hamlets in this township, situated from one to two miles north and north-west of Oulton village.

WAVERTON.

The population of Waverton township in 1801 was 375; in 1811, 409; in 1821, 477; in 1831, 487; in 1841, 543; and in 1851, 545. Its rateable value is £4,518. The Maryport and Carlisle railway runs through the township.

We possess no information relating to Waverton previous to 1578, in which year a survey of the barony of Wigton was made, and from it we transcribe the following particulars: "Leonard Dykes holdeth the fourth part of the town or manor of Waverton of the said Earl (Northumberland) by the third part of a knight's fee, and suit of court at Wigton, from three weeks to three weeks, cornage, seawake, puture of the sergeants, and for free rent yearly 2s. 8d. The said Leonard Dykes holdeth certain other lands there of another fourth part of the said town, by like services, and payeth for free rent by year 2s. 8d. The said Leonard holdeth a parcel of ground there called the Parke, by homage, fealtie, &c., rendering per an. 1s. 4d. The said Leonard holdeth there two acres of land by homage, fealtie, suit of court &c., and renders per an. 1s. William Osmotherly holdeth a third part of a fourth part of Waverton aforesaid, by the twelfth part of a knight's fee, and other services as is aforesaid, rendering per annum 3½d. The heirs of William Pennington holdeth another third of a fourth part of Waverton aforesaid, by like services, and renders 2½d. Anthony Curwen holdeth another third part of a fourth part of Waverton aforesaid, by like services, rendering 3½d. John Blennerhasset holdeth in Waverton aforesaid one tenement, sometime William Bowett's, and late the lands of Roger Dent, by the like services, rendering per an. 3s. The heirs of Roger Lathes now holdeth the fourth part of Waverton by like service as is aforesaid, and render per an. 8s. 1d. William Osmotherly holdeth four acres of land there in Waverton, called the Marshallflat, by the like service as is aforesaid, and renders per an. 1s. 4d. Robert Vaux holdeth one acre of land in Waverton by fealtie, suit of court, and other services aforesaid, and renders per annum 8d. John Plumer holdeth certain land and tenements in Waverton at Aikbank, by homage, fealtie, and suit of court, rendering —." A few pages further we find that "the tenants of the town of Waverton pay yearly to the lord for cornage 13s. 4d., seawake 2s., and for turnsilver 7s. 6d.: in toto per annum 22s. 10d." The manorial rights of Waverton are now vested in General Wyndham as lord paramount of the barony of Wigton. The landowners are the Rev. William Hewson, Messrs. Charles Ray, John Stamper, John T. Jefferson, Joseph Barnes, Pattison Hayton, John Dixon, William Manduel, Richard Hall, John Martindale, the trustees of the late John Tiffin, Robert Glaister, Thomas Dand, John Swan, the trustees of the late Christopher Gloag, John Dand, — Bragg, Messrs. Tiffin; and Mrs. Donald and Miss Messenger.

The village of Waverton occupies a pleasant situation two miles south-west of Wigton.

Aikbank, a hamlet a mile west from Wigton, was long the residence of Joseph Rooke, who was interred here in his own garden. Lesson, or Lasson's Hall, originally Lassell's Hall, from one of its remote proprietors, is described as being an independent manor in the successive possession of the Waverton, Multon, Mulcaster, or Pennington families. It was purchased of the latter by the Dalstons, having from that time been esteemed parcel of the manor of Oulton, which was enfranchised by Sir George Dalston, Bart., in 1747. Lesson Hall is a neat village, two and a half miles west-by-north of Wigton, where Charles Ray, Esq., has a commodious residence.

The other hamlets are Barugh, Blaithewaite (High and Low), Parkgate, Woodrow, from two to three miles south-west of Wigton. Hawkrigg House is the residence of John T. Jefferson, Esq.; Blaithewaite House the residence of Mrs. Donald.

WOODSIDE.

The rateable value of this township is £3,270. In 1801 it contained 238 inhabitants; in 1811, 344; in 1821, 587; in 1831, 750; in 1841, 745; and in 1851, 695. It is intersected by the Maryport and Carlisle railway.

From the survey quoted in our notice of Waverton township we derive the following information relating to Woodside in 1578:—"William Osmotherley holdeth at Lownthwaite four tenements, late in the tenures of the said William, 8s. Thomas Calvert, 3s. 6d.; Thomas West and Thomas Calvert, 11s. 8d.; and one piece of land there late in the tenure of Thomas Wilkinson, 2s., by fealtie and suit of court, and renders per annum, at the feasts of St. Martin and Pentecost, 25s. 2d." In the margin is noted, in a different hand, "Wm. Calvert, 11s. 2d.; Stubbs, 16s. 2d." The survey continues "John Radcliffe holdeth four tenements, with the appurtenances at Lownthwaite, by fealtie and suit of court, and payeth at the feasts aforesaid, per annum, 10s. 4d. Anthony Barwis holdeth certain acres of land there in Kayrigg, by fealtie and suit of court, and paith at the said feasts 1s. 6d. John Aylne holdeth one acre of land at Kayrigg aforesaid, by like services, and paith by year, ut supra, 9d. Edward Adamson holdeth one acre of land there by like service, and payeth by year, at the feasts aforesaid, 9d. The same Edward holdeth there a tenement and three acres of land by like service, and renders per annum, at the feasts aforesaid, 2s. 11d. John Thompson holdeth at Briggbank a tenement and three acres of land, late John Dayes', by like service, and renders per annum, at the said feasts, 3s. John Timperon and Edward Barvis holdeth there two messuages and five acres of land, late John Dayes' aforesaid, by like services, rendering at the said feasts 10s." The manorial rights of this township, like those of Waverton, are vested in General Wyndham. The landowners are Sir Wastel Brisco, Bart.; F. L. B. Dykes, Esq.; John Taylor, Esq.; Wm. Banks, Esq., the trustees of Brookfield Academy; Messrs. John Martindale, George Studholme, Joseph Carruthers, Joseph Barnes, Thomas Hayton, John Richardson, the trustees of the late John Robinson, John Spencer, the Misses Stockdale, Miss Aglionby, and Jane Cowan.

The hamlet of Kirkland, one mile east; Lownthwaite (High and Low), one mile south-by-west, and Moor-thwaite, two miles east of Wigton, are in this township. High Moor House, the seat of W. Banks, Esq., stands on a gentle eminence commanding an extensive prospect of the surrounding country, about half a mile south of Wigton.

Brookfield Academy, belonging to the Society of Friends, occupies a substantial building in this township, about a mile west from Wigton, erected in 1826, at a cost, inclusive of the purchase of land and master's house, of £6,100. The institution was previously at High Moor House. The number of pupils is limited to thirty boys and thirty girls, from the age of eight to fifteen years. Children attending this school from any part of Cumberland are taught partly at the expense of the society should they require such assistance. This establishment is supported partly by subscription, and the interest of endowments valued at £12,000. The number of scholars taught in the school since its commencement in 1815, amounts to 761.

Among the eminent natives of the parish of Wigton we may mention Mr. Ewan Clarke, the Cumberland poet; R. Smirke, Esq., B.A., the eminent historical painter; George Barnes, a celebrated mathematician; and Joseph Rooke, who, from the rank of a poor weaver, became, self-taught, a mathematician and philosopher, excelling also in music, optics, and botany.

Derwent Ward.

DERWENT WARD is bounded on the north by Allerdale-below-Derwent, on the north-west by the Irish sea, on the west by Allerdale-above-Derwent, on the south by Bootle Ward, and on the south-east and east by Westmoreland and Leath Ward. It is about twenty-two miles in length by eleven in breadth, and contains the market towns of Maryport, Cockermouth, and Keswick. This ward, formed for magisterial purposes in 1833, and for taxes in 1843, is a highly picturesque and interesting district, embracing, as it does, every variety of scenery which mountain and valley, lake and river, can impart to the landscape. It contains the lakes of Derwentwater, Bassenthwaite, Wastwater, Buttermere, Thirlmere, Crummock, and Loweswater; and the rivers Derwent, Wythburn, Marron, and several smaller streams, whose waters augment the various rivers and lakes. Coal, limestone, and plumbago are the chief mineral productions. Derwent Ward comprises the parishes of Bassenthwaite, Bridekirk, Brigham (including Cockermouth), Cammerton, Cross Canonby (including Maryport), Crosthwaite (including Keswick), Dean, Dearham, Flimby, Gilcrux, Isell, and Plumbland, and the chapelry of Loweswater.

BASSENTHWAITE PARISH.

THIS parish is bounded by the parishes of Crosthwaite, Isell, Torpenhow, Ireby, Uldale, and Caldbeck. It comprises no dependant townships, but is divided into the two constabularies of Highside, and Hawes or Lowside, and its area is 6,930 acres; the rateable value £3,109 19s. 10d.

The population, which is scattered over the parish, numbered in 1801, 450; in 1811, 497; in 1821, 537; in 1831, 549; in 1841, 536; and in 1851, 557. Agriculture is the principal employment. The Robin Hood mine, which produced antimony, has been tried several times, by various parties, but without effect, the quantity obtained not being sufficient to pay the cost incurred. The mine has been laid up for the last twelve years. Cockermouth and Keswick are the markets attended. The parish includes the beautiful lake from which it takes its name, as also Skiddaw and other mountains, which will be found described at page 48. The soil on the north-west part of the parish is of a wet and sterile nature, but since the enclosure of the commons, it has been much improved. Near the mountains and lake it is mostly high and gravelly—in some parts loamy, but in general fertile.

The manor of Bassenthwaite was given by Alan, the second lord of Allerdale, to his bastard brother, Gospatric, whose posterity assumed the name of De Bassenthwaite. The last heir male of this family was Sir Adam de Bassenthwaite, who died in the reign of the second Edward, and left two daughters, co-heiresses, the elder of whom having married twice, settled her moiety of the manor, that called Low Bassenthwaite, upon her second husband, one of the Lawsons of Northumberland, in whose posterity it has since continued, and is now held by Sir Wilfred Lawson, Bart. The other co-heiress married one of the Martindale family, whose descendant having been attainted of treason, it was granted by the crown to the Earl of Derby. A survey of the barony of Allerdale, taken in 1578, informs us that "Henry Earl of Derby holdeth the moiety of the manor of Bassinthwaite, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, from three weeks to three weeks, and payeth yearly for cornage, serjeant's food, seawake, and turnsilver, 4s. 7d. Richard Irton, Esq., holdeth the other moiety of the manor aforesaid, by like service, and payeth yearly for cornage, seawake, turn-silver, and serjeant's food, 4s. 7d." In 1714 this estate, called the manor of High Bassenthwaite, passed in marriage with Henrietta Stanley to John Lord Ashburnham, who, in the following year, sold it in parcels to the tenants for the sum of £1,825. The manorial rights and privileges of the manor are consequently vested in Sir Wilfred Lawson, Bart., and the landowners; but General Wyndham, who is lord paramount, is proprietor of the fine lake of Bassenthwaite, and has the sole right of navigation and the whole fishery, with the exception of three draughts, called Ewen Bridge, Stone Wall, and Elars Stile, in which Sir H. R. Vane, Bart., has a right to fish. General Wyndham receives a quit-rent of £3 4s. 10d. from the parish. The principal landowners are Sir Henry Ralph Vane, Bart.; Thomas Story Spedding, Esq.; Abraham Fisher, Esq.; and Messrs. John Rooke, John Ewart, Mrs. Smith, and others. This parish possesses no village of its own name. The commons were enclosed in 1771, in pursuance of an act passed in the previous year.

THE CHURCH.

The parish church, dedicated to St. Bridget, is an ancient structure, in Highside Constablewick, near the margin of the lake, about five miles north-north-west of Keswick. It is of the transition period between the Early English and Decorated styles, and consists of nave, aisle, chancel, north porch, and turret, with one bell. There is an ancient brass in the south aisle and the Vane family has a tablet in the chancel. It was formerly rectorial, and was given to the Abbey of Jedworth by Waltheof, son of Gospatric, and appropriated to that monastery. The dean and chapter of Carlisle are now the appropriators, and patrons of the perpetual curacy, which is worth about £160 per annum. The tithes were commuted at the period of the enclosure of the commons in 1771, when 215 acres were allotted to the incumbent of the parish in lieu of all tithes. There are also about eleven acres of glebe. A lectureship was founded in this church in the beginning of the seventeenth century, by Matthew Cape, a merchant of Carlisle, who endowed it with a lease of the tithe of corn and hay in Levington, or Linton Holme, and Harper Hill. The parish register commences in 1574.

The parsonage house is a substantial stone building, situated on the Keswick road, between the church and Chapel. It was erected in 1858, at a cost of £800, of which £200 was a benefaction from Queen Anne's Bounty, the remainder being raised by subscription.

The school is situated close to the chapel, and is entirely supported by subscriptions and the donations of a few gentlemen, who contribute £25 per annum for that purpose. The average attendance is about forty.

CHARITIES.

A small estate appears to have been left for the use of the poor of this parish, but by whom, or at what time, is unknown. It consists of a close of about four acres of land in the parish of Crosthwaite, with an allotment of common, and two closes in Bassenthwaite, which bring in about £14 a year.

There is also a house, an orchard, about four acres of land, and about one acre of woodland, supposed to have been left for the use of the parish clerk for the time being, by one Mr. Grave, who was himself formerly clerk of this parish.

Hawes is a small village in this parish, in the vicinity of Hawesbeck, six and a half miles north-by-west of Keswick. A feast, with sports, is held here in the early part of August, which is attended by a considerable number of persons.

Chapel is another small village, or hamlet, near the Chapel-beck, in Lowside constablewick, six miles north-by-west of Keswick, where there is a chapel-of-ease to the parish church, and a school.

Armthwaite Hall, the seat of Sir H. R. Vane, Bart.,¹ occupies a delightful situation at the northern extremity of the lake, of which it commands a fine view, eight and a half miles north-north-east of Keswick. It is surrounded with beautiful grounds, and when viewed from the lake, with its trees, single or in clumps, spread over the sloping lawns, the rising grounds behind enrobed with woods, adds very much to the gratification of the tourist.

Mirehouse, the seat and property of Thomas Story Spedding, Esq., is a beautiful mansion, situated between Skiddaw and the lake.

There are two corn-mills in this parish.

BRIDEKIRK PARISH.

BRIDEKIRK parish extends along the Derwent, which separates it from Brigham, and is about seven and a half miles long. It is bounded on the other side by the parishes of Camerton, Plumby, Dearnam, Gibbax, and Isell; and comprises the townships of Bridekirk, Broughton Great, Broughton Little, Dovenby, Papecastle and Goat, Ribton, and Tallantire.

BRIDEKIRK.

The area of this township is 916 acres, and its rateable value £960. Its population in 1801 was 94; in 1811, 115; in 1821, 144; in 1831, 111; in 1841, 121; and in 1851, 113. The inhabitants, who attend the Cockermouth market, are principally collected in the village of Bridekirk; there are also a few scattered houses. Agriculture is the only employment.

The manors of Bridekirk and Appleton, with the church of Bridekirk, were given by Waltheof, first lord of Allerdale, to Gisborne priory, in Yorkshire, which grant was confirmed by Alan, son of Waltheof, and afterwards by two several charters by Alice de Romely for the health of her soul, and the souls of her father and mother, and all her ancestors and successors, and her husbands, Gilbert Pypard and Robert de Courtney, and the same were confirmed and appropriated to the monastery by Ralph de Irton, bishop of Carlisle. The manor continued to be held by the priory of Gisborne, till the dissolution of the religious houses by Henry VIII., who, by letters patent, in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, granted it to Henry Tolson, to be held in capite by the twentieth part of one knight's fee and 26s. yearly. The manor has long been enfranchised, and pays the fee-farm rent of 26s. to the crown. The lands here are all freehold. The principal landowners are Mrs. Dykes, Major Andrew Green Thompson, John Cowley Fisher, and — Dawson, Esqs.

The village of Bridekirk is about two miles north of Cockermouth.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, is a very ancient structure, the tower of which was rebuilt about the year 1720, at which time several of the windows were enlarged. It contains a carved font which, the Messrs. Lysons say, is "the best entitled to notice in this county, and probably the most curious one in the kingdom." The sides of this relic of antiquity are all enriched with sculptures in bas-relief, the style of which alone, independent of a Runic inscription which it bears, clearly indicates it to be the work of an age antecedent to the Norman Conquest. The south side of the font contains the inscription, which was read by Bishop Nicolson thus—"Er Ekard han men egroeten, and to dis men red wer Taner men brogten;" which was interpreted "Here Ekard was converted, and to this man's example was the Danes brought." The late Mr. Kemble, in the Archæologia, vol. xxviii., supplies the following reading:—"Herigar thegn gewrohte, Utel thegn Irmunrics gebrohte,"—"Herigar the Thane wrought it, Utel Eormanrics Thane brought it." "This interpretation," he adds, "I fairly confess is anything but satisfactory to myself. All that I can claim for it is that it is Anglo-Saxon, which no explanation hitherto published is." Professor Munch has been only able to make out " . . . me iwrogte, and to this . . . me brogte." It has been more recently read "Ricard he me iwrocte, and to dis merth genu me brocte;" which may be interpreted, "Richard he me wrought, and to this beauty carefully me brought." The scroll on which the inscription is cut rests on two pillars, one of which is clustered. Above the inscription is a scroll of vine branches, proceeding from a grotesque head, with the figure of a man at the opposite end, eating one of the bunches of grapes; beneath it is introduced the figure of a sculptor, with his mallet and chisel, executing a scroll, and supposed to represent the maker of the font. In the upper part of this and the north and east sides, are introduced various grotesque animals and foliage, with a sort of cross florée on the west side. The east side bears a representation of the Baptism of Our Saviour by St. John, with the dove descending. On the west side is a circular ornament, supported by two grotesque animals, within a border of foliage. The sculpture on the lower part of the north side is supposed to refer to the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise. The benefice, as has been seen above, was granted to Gisborne Priory. After the Dissolution, the advowson of the vicarage was granted by Queen Mary to George Cotton and William Manne, to hold as of the manor of East Greenwich, by fealty only, and not in capite. After this period we find the presentation in the Lamplugh family, from whom it has descended to Mrs. Dykes, in whom it is now vested. James I., by letters patent, in the second year of his reign, granted to Job Gillett and William Blake, among others, the title of corn and grain of Little Broughton, Great Broughton, and Papecastle, to hold to them and their heirs for ever, of the king, as of his manor of East Greenwich, in free socage, and not in capite.

The great tithes of Bridekirk township belong to John Cowley Fisher, Esq., of Woodhall; those of Great and Little Broughton were sold several years ago to the landowners by the late Sir F. F. Vane, Bart.; those of Dovenby and Papcastle belong to Mrs. Dykes; those of Hameshill, Ribton, and Goat, to the Earl of Lonsdale; and those of Talantire to William Browne, Esq.; the latter belonged to Gisborne Priory, and were granted by Queen Elizabeth to George Fletcher, Esq., of Talantire. The present amount of tithes rent-charge for Dovenby is about £56; Mrs. Dykes is the owner, but a considerable portion of original award has been given in exchange for common right, at the enclosure of Dovenby and Papcastle commons in 1842. The living, valued in the King's Book at £10 8s. 6d. is now worth about £240 a year, upon which there is a charge of £22 per annum, to repay the sum (£375) borrowed from Queen Anne's Bounty for the enlargement of the vicarage. In 1839 the tithes of Dovenby were commuted. The great tithes, which belong to Mrs. Dykes, were awarded as £108, and the vicarial to the vicar, £20. In 1820, on the enclosure of the commons, 171 acres were given to the vicar, in lieu of small tithes for Great and Little Broughton townships. The parish registers commence in 1685.

The Vicarage is a good substantial building, close to the church, and was considerably enlarged in 1851, at a cost of £375, borrowed from Queen Anne's Bounty.

Woodhall, in this township, formerly the seat of the Tolsons, has been much improved by J. C. Fisher, Esq. It stands in a beautiful situation, commanding a view of the windings of the Derwent, Cockermouth Castle, and the mountains in the neighbourhood of Keswick. A handsome mansion in the village of Bridekirk is the property and seat of Major A. G. Thompson.

BROUGHTON GREAT.

The population of this township in 1801 was, 403; in 1811, 422; in 1821, 435; in 1831, 523; in 1841, 562; and in 1851, 619. Its rateable value is £3,371. 11s. 5d., and its area, inclusive of that of Little Broughton, is 2,743 acres. The Cockermouth and Workington railway skirts the south of the township.

On Broughton Moor there is a coal mine, worked by the Broughton Moor Colliery Company, the property of John Harris, Esq., of Darlington. It has one shaft 50 fathoms deep, and another of about 10 fathoms. The seams of coal worked at present are the "Ten Quarters Seam," about 6 feet thick; and the "Canal and Metal Seam," about 25 fathoms below the former seam. These seams are of the same thickness wherever found in this part of Cumberland. The colliery employs about 200 persons, and produces annually about 60,000 tons of coal, the whole of which is shipped at Maryport.

The manor of Broughton, which includes the two townships of that name, was given by Waltheof, lord of Allerdale, in marriage with his sister, to Waltheof, son of Gilmin, whose posterity took the name of Broughton, and resided here for several generations. This family becoming extinct about the reign of Henry VI., the manor appears to have reverted to the earls of Northumberland as lords of Allerdale. Henry, the sixth earl, conveyed it to Sir Thomas Wharton. From a survey taken in 1578 we learn the following particulars:—"Philip Lord Wharton holds Little Broughton of the ancient inheritance of the earls of Northumberland, of the yearly value of £3 14s. 8d., granted, among other things, by Henry late Earl of Northumberland, uncle to the said earl that now is, to one Thomas Wharton, then controller of his household, to him and to his heirs male, paying therefore yearly £3 14. 8d. The tenants of the town of Little Broughton pay yearly to the said earl for cornage, 6s. 8d.; seawake, 8d.; and for turnsilver, 2s. 8d.; in toto, 10s. The heirs of William Eaglesfield hold certain lands in Little Broughton by homage, fealty, and suit of court, and render per annum 6d. Philip Lord Wharton holds Great Broughton, being of the ancient possessions of the Earl of Northumberland, of the yearly value of £22 4s. 2d., granted, amongst other things, by Henry, late earl of Northumberland, uncle to the earl that now is, to Thomas Wharton, then controller of his household, to him and his heirs male, &c., and renders £22 4s. 2d. The tenants of the said town of Great Broughton pay yearly to the said lord in two parts divided for cornage, 13s. 4d.; seawake, 4½d.; and for turn-silver, 1s.; in toto, 14s. 8½d." It was subsequently purchased of the trustees of the Duke of Wharton, by Charles, Duke of Somerset, from whom it has descended to its present possessor, General Wyndham, who holds a court baron annually about Michaelmas at the Punch Bowl Inn in the village of Great Broughton. The tenure here is copyhold subject to a nominal charge of one penny; but on the change by death, &c., of either lord or owner a tenpenny fine is paid. The principal landowners are Mrs. Sewell, Messrs.

William Paisley, John Robinson, John Harris, and Isaac Sibson. The common was enclosed in 1820, in pursuance of the provisions of an act passed in 1819. In Spencer's mill-field, in this township, are the remains of an ancient chapel.

The village of Great Broughton is situated on the southern acclivity of a hill above the Derwent, three miles west-by-north of Cockermouth. Here is a Wesleyan chapel erected in 1846. Between this village and that of Little Broughton there is a chapel of ease to the parish church, opened in 1856. There is also a school, which was built in 1846, at a cost of £200, towards which government granted £70; the remainder being raised by subscription. It possesses an endowment of £20 19s. a year, left in 1735, by Mr. Joseph Ashley, for the education of the children of the two Broughtons. An almshouse was founded here in 1735, by the Mr. Ashley just mentioned, for "four poor persons, men or women, out of the poor of Great or Little Broughton, and if not four persons there, out of any other villages within the parish of Bridekirk," which he endowed with £8 a year. Four poor women are appointed by the trustees. These also share in Lord Wharton's Bible Charity.

Broughton Hall, situated in the village, was, about sixty years ago, the property and residence of the Hoskins family; it is now a farm-house, and the property of Mr. Isaac Sibson.

BROUGHTON LITTLE.

The area of this township is returned with Great Broughton. In 1801, it contained 243 inhabitants; in 1811, 231; in 1821, 237; in 1831, 297; in 1841, 344; and in 1851, 439; who are principally collected in the village. Coal mining is the principal employment; some, however, are engaged at the brick and tile works of Mr. Joseph Luccock, on Broughton Moor. The common was enclosed at the same time as that of Great Broughton, in 1820.

The village of Little Broughton is about a quarter of a mile from Great Broughton. Here are a Friends meeting house, erected in 1659, and a Baptist chapel, erected in 1672; the Rev. John Collins is the present minister of the latter. The foundation of this congregation is ascribed by tradition to the officers of Cromwell's army when engaged in the siege of Cockermouth Castle.

Dovenby comprises an area of 1,886 acres, and its rateable value is £1,099 10s. Its population in 1801 was 153; in 1811, 209; in 1821, 214; in 1831, 247; in 1841, 246; and in 1851, 261. To the north-west of this township is Dovenby Close Colliery, carried on by John Steele, Esq. The mine has one shaft, with two air shafts—the first is forty-six fathoms deep. The Little Main Seam extends about 1,000 yards south-east of the shaft, and 600 north-west, and is one foot ten inches thick. Rattle Seam, which is now worked out, extends eighteen fathoms above the Little Main Seam. These seams drift in about 170 yards, and come in with a down-cast fault, and strike in with the Kendal and Nettle Seam, which is eight feet thick, but mixed with many bands. This colliery affords employment to about 100 hands, and produces, on an average, when working, about 13,000 tons per annum. There are nine coke ovens, burning about thirty tons weekly.

There are two rather remarkable appearances of very ancient earthworks close to Dovenby Hall and the village,—one is in the park in front of the hall, of an elliptical shape, the greater diameter being about 112 yards, the lesser about seventy-two yards. At one, or perhaps two points, in the ellipse, the line has a sort of a shoulder or bastion shape given it. There is part of a well defined fosse visible, three or four yards wide at the bottom, with the slopes well marked. The perpendicular height of these (from bottom of ditch to top of platform) must still, in some places, be five or six feet. There is another in a direct line west about 350 yards, in an old grass field belonging to Mrs. Dykes, called the "Guards." It is nearly circular, and about fifty-eight yards in diameter. One or two, of the same peculiar shoulder shapes as in the other, are also visible in this. There is again a smaller circular one directly between these two, in the wood adjoining the hall. As usual in these works, all three are on the edge of the stream, no doubt for the convenience of water. All are very near the Roman line of road, which itself, as in other cases, might have been formed on a more ancient line. The work in the Guards is quite close to the point of junction described below of the track through the fields and the old high road. The ground is on the rise here, and the field has a remarkable appearance of foundations all over it.

At a distance of about 200 yards from the hall, in the grass land around it, is the visible track of the Roman road from Glanoventa (?), Ellenborough, near Maryport, to Derwentio, Papcastle. It was cut through in draining (at least the thickness that remained) at about eighteen inches or two feet from the surface. Further on, through some wood, the remains appear exposed on the surface for a short distance. This track is in a direct line with, and joins part of, the high road formerly used between Maryport and Cockermouth, which is itself undoubtedly on the very line of the Roman road, as evident remains of the materials, in many places, show. At this point a deviation was made from the old Roman line in the more modern direction of Cockermouth, through the adjoining village of Dovenby, and at this spot in particular, many of the immense paving stones are still lying about the hedges, &c. The track traceable through the fields and the old line of high road which it joins would together form a perfectly straight and direct line of communication as used by the Romans between these stations. The large boulder stones, which formed the pavement of the Roman road, have evidently been led from the part lying near the hall, and made use of in the building of the old tower and part of the house, where they appear in the walls on removing the cement or rough-cast. The same was done generally in the construction of ancient dwellings and mediæval castles near the Roman works, the walls, &c.

What was called the Old Cross, formerly stood on the common, when unenclosed, sixteen or seventeen years ago. A piece of the shaft and base was all that remained. There used to be a tradition that markets were held there during the prevalence of the plague. It is still in the same state, and was removed, on the enclosure of the common, by Mrs. Dykes, as lady of the manor, into a suitable situation for its security and preservation. In the Dovenby manor book, date 1690, mention is made of "the Old Thorn Cross on the moor," which, no doubt, refers to the cross in question; the inference being that it was of a religious description, and either bore, in Roman Catholic times, a representation of the Crucifixion, or only the appendages of the Passion, a crown of thorns, inscription, &c.

The manor of Dovenby, or Dolfinby, was given by Waltheof to Dolfin, son of Ailward, whose posterity assumed the name of Dovenby, and continued the possessors until the reign of Henry III., when, the male line becoming extinct, it was brought in marriage to the family of Rawle, or Rolle. Thomas Lucy was possessed of this manor in the reign of Edward I.; it was afterwards in the Kirkbrides, whose heiress, in the time of Henry IV., brought it in marriage to Nicholas Lamplugh, son of Sir Thomas Lamplugh, of Lamplugh, who settled at Dovenby. It descended from him to Abraham Molyne, Esq., in right of Frances, his wife, the granddaughter of William Lamplugh, brother of Sir Thomas, the last male descendant having surviving issue. He sold it, along with the manor of Papcastle, purchased by Francis Lamplugh, of Dovenby,¹ temp.

Elizabeth, to William Cooke, scrivener, of London, in 1672, from whom it passed successively, by purchase, through various parties, to Henry Mason, Esq., of London, who, in 1777, sold it, along with that of Papcastle, to the late William Browne, Esq., of Tarrantire, whose son, the present William Browne, Esq., in 1840, sold both manors to Mrs. Dykes, who, as descendant of the Lamplughs, from whom she had coherited the mansion and demesne, thus united again the two manors to them, and became the possessor of the manorial rights and privileges. Dovenby is an independent manor, held by payment of quit rents and boon services now commuted, and certain fines on alienation and death of lord or tenant. A considerable portion of the manor is enfranchised, only £6 5s. 4½d. manorial rent remaining, including out-tenements. Courts leet and courts baron are held as requested, for the admission of tenants, on the descent or alienation of property, and various other matters within its jurisdiction, relating to the township, for which purpose a jury is summoned, empanelled, and sworn by the steward. The court books of the manor extend from 1662. The tenure is the usual "customary." About one-fifth or one-sixth of the township is in demesne. The principal landowners are Mrs. Dykes; William Browne, Esq.; Messrs. Henry Dodgson, Joseph Archer, William Patison, and Matthew Smith.

Dovenby Hall, in this township, is the seat of Mrs. Dykes, lady of the manor, as it was originally of the lords. The large, square, border tower was first built, no doubt, and as early, most likely, from appearances and circumstances, as the time of Henry II., or probably earlier, as mentioned before. There is every appearance of much of the material, particularly the large boulder stones used in the construction, having been brought from the adjoining line of Roman roads, then existing, no doubt, comparatively perfect. The long and lower building—as a wing—and next the square mansion-house; additions, as usual in other cases in this country, were made to it at later periods, temp. Henry IV. or Henry V., and Elizabeth or James. Some additions were also made during the present century. In parts of the first of these, however, if indicative of an earlier period than that mentioned, Roman road materials also appear. The whole structure has been modernised, so far as not to show any decisive character. On the building, however, with others, there is a very handsome shield, in stone, bearing the Lamplugh and Kirkbride arms quarterly—the marriage, as above, having taken place between those families about 22nd Richard II. There are other shields of the Lamplugh coat, one quartering Barwise, Preston, Fenwick, and Lucy. The ground story in the old tower, now cellars, still shows the marks of stallage for cattle, made use of in the remote and turbulent periods of English and Scottish warfare; and one of the deeply played but narrow embrasures still remains, as used by the bowmen, but now bricked up, of course, for the more peaceful modern arrangements on the other side. The mansion is a large and commodious one, and with its old tower, has still an ancient appearance. Adjoining are ornamental grounds and gardens, surrounded by park-like ground. In the house are several family and other paintings; amongst the former are portraits of Sir Thomas Lamplugh, founder of the school and hospital, temp. Charles I., his wife, Lady Lamplugh, daughter of Sir Thomas Braithwaite, of Burnhead, Westmoreland, who lived to the age of 100; Thomas Lamplugh, archbishop of York, James II., &c.

The village of Dovenby is two and a half miles north-west of Cockermouth.

CHARITIES.

School.—Dovenby Grammar School was founded and endowed by Sir T. Lamplugh, about the year 1620. Mrs. Dykes is patroness, as his representative. The endowment consists of a charge on the tithes of Burgh-on-Sands, since commuted; land in Dovenby, and a small payment to the master in connection with the hospital charity of Dovenby. The number of scholars varies from sixty to eighty. The building is a picturesque and commodious one, erected in 1843, from a design sanctioned by the Committee of Council on Education, who also granted £100 towards defraying the cost of building. The situation is pretty, sheltered as it is by the woods of Dovenby. Adjoining the school there is a playground, which was laid out at the time of the enclosure of the common.

Hospital.—There is also an hospital, which was endowed by Sir T. Lamplugh, about the same time as the school, for "six poor aged persons of the religious poor." It is endowed with the tithes of Redmain, purchased from Leonard Dykes, Esq., of Warthole. Mrs. Dykes is patroness. As regards "religious poor," the patroness makes no distinction of sects; if poor, aged, and religiously disposed. The building itself has long since gone to decay, there being no funds for its restoration, and it is not of much consequence that it is so, as helpless people, recipients of the stipends, live more conveniently with their friends than in an isolated building.

Dykes of Dykesfield and Wadardhall, near of Dovenby Hall, &c.

The name of Dykes, anciently del Dykes, is derived from the Roman Wall of Hadrian, on the line of which Dykesfield, the ancient residence of the family, is directly situated. Mr. Bruce, in his Roman Wall (vide Dykesfield) considers the name "to be derived from the works of the barrier, and to have been the site of a station." The Saxon appellation of the Dyke, or the Dykes—for the Vallum and Murus joined here, the former terminating—was given to the Wall here, as "Graham's Dyke," was to that of Lollius Urbicus. Hence the family located on the spot became del Dykes (of the Dykes), and their residence Dykesfield, and that the place derived its name from the family is the tradition there still. Kimber's Baronetage, vol. ii. p. 408, in its account of the Sussex and Kentish branches of this family says, "The family of Dyke, or Dykes, was seated in Dykesfield, in Cumberland, before the Norman Conquest, but by several later marriages removed their seat to Wardhall, in that county, of which was Leonard Dykes, Esq., chief heir male. A branch of this family very early removed into Sussex, where they were seated at Henfield and other places, and one was seated at Cranbrook, in Kent, of which was Reginald de Dyke, Sheriff of Kent, 29 Edward III." The elder of these junior branches is represented by the present Sir Percyvall Hart Dyke, Bart., and another by Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart. The arms borne are the same.

In a deed without date ROBERT DEL DYKES conveys lands at Burgh to William del Monkys. The name of Lord Hugh de Multon occurring in this fixes the date at the end of Henry III. or beginning of Edward I.

The pedigree commences with WILLIAM DEL DYKES. In a deed also without date, supposed by the writing to be that of Henry III. and Edward I., Symon de Crosseby, clerk of Carlisle, conveys lands at Waverton to William del Dykes. Witnesses: The Lord Hugh de Benton (sheriff), and others. He was father of

WILLIAM DEL DYKES, who, temp. Edward II., married Agnes, or Agneta, heiress of Sir Hugh de Waverton, of Waverton. In 5th Edward III. is a conveyance of lands at Waverton to John de Ormeby, Agnet del Dykes, and their heirs. With this daughter, married to John de Ormeby, as appears, they had a son,

WILLIAM DEL DYKES, living, temp. Edward III. In a deed, 12th Edward III., the witnesses are William de Boyvill, Robert de Quenhow, William del Dykes, and others. He was father of

WILLIAM DEL DYKES, who, temp. Richard II., married Jane, co-heiress of Sir Hugh de Dystington, of Dystington. Margaret, her sister, married Sir Hugh de Moresby. In a deed, 6th Richard II., cited in the Fleming pedigree William del Dykes is a grantee of lands from Nicholas de Bowness, clerk. Witnesses: Sir Richard le Fleming, Knt., and others; and in a deed, 20th Richard II., Adam Gibson conveys lands to William del Dykes, and his heirs. Their son,

WILLIAM DEL DYKES married, temp. Henry IV., Catharine, daughter of William Thwatts, of Thwatts; and 9th Henry IV. is witness to a deed with William de Leigh and others. With two daughters, one married to Nicholas de Irton, of Irton, and another, Isabel, married to Robert Brisco, of Croton, he had a son,

WILLIAM DEL DYKES, temp. Henry VI., who represented the county in parliament. By deeds, 11th and 13th Henry VI., Robert Whitebode conveys to him and his heirs the manor and lands of Wardhall¹ (still in the family). 16th Henry VI. he is witness to deeds with Sir Christopher de Culven and Sir Henry Fenwyke, Knts., and Hugh de Lowther. He married Elizabeth, daughter of William de Leigh, of Isell, the descendant of Sir William de Leigh, who, temp. Edward II., married Margaret, daughter and heir of William, son of Hubert de Multon, of Isell, younger son of Thomas de Multon and Matilda de Vaux, of Gilsland. Through the lines of de Morville, d'Estrivers, d'Engayne, and de Meschines, Elizabeth de Leigh descended directly from Emma, daughter of Arlotta (mother of the Conqueror), and Harlowen de Conteville or de Burgo, who was himself sixth only in direct male line from Charles Duke of Ingelheim, fifth son of Charlemagne.² In a deed, 9th Henry VI., Henry second Earl of Northumberland (son of Hotspur), grants to our well-beloved William Dykes, Esquire, lands at Wyggeton, Ulton, and Waverton. The seal attached to the deed bears the Brabant lion rampant. From this and other circumstances the politics of the family were evidently Lancastrian, as most in the north were. In a French genealogical publication this William del Dykes is mentioned as being wounded, on the Lancastrian side, at the battle of Wakefield:—"Sous le règne de Henri VI., William del Dykes representa le Comte de Cumberland, au parlement Anglais. Il combattit pour la cause de Lancestre, et fut blessé à la bataille de Wakefield," &c. His name is returned amongst the gentry of the county by the commissioners, 12th Henry VI.³ His son and successor,

WILLIAM DYKES, of Wardhall, married, temp. Edward IV., Christians, daughter and co-heir of Sir Richard Salkeld, of Corby, by his wife, Jane Vaux, daughter and heir of Roland Vaux, of Triermain. Marriage settlement dated 21st Edward IV. Witnesses: Sir William Leigh, Knt., William Musgrave, and others. 2nd Richard III., William Dykes presented to the vacant rectory of Dystington.⁴ In Wetherall Church is the curious old altar and effigial tomb of Sir Richard Salkeld and his wife, realising the well-known verses—

"Outstretched together are expressed
Sir knight and my lady fair,
With hands uplifted on the breast,
In attitude of prayer;
Long-visaged, clad in armour he—
With ruffled arm and bodice she."

¹ The adjoining manor of Gilerux, which has since proved a valuable coal field, was acquired about the reign of Edward VI. in exchange for the demesne of Waverton, which came into the family by marriage, as above, with the heiress, temp. Richard II. There is a tradition and story, and apparently a correct one, mentioned also in Hutchinson, vol. ii. p. 349, that all was perilled on the turn of the dice and cards, which fortunately proved a favourable one, as ran the distich—

Up now ace, and down with the traye,
Or Wardhall's gone for ever and ay.

It came as the player wished, and to perpetuate the trick he had the card cut in stone, the ace of clubs, which still exists.

There is a quaint description of the tomb and epitaph in the Lansdowne MS., British Museum, (Sir William Dethick's collection, garter, temp. Elizabeth,) and of the arms sculptured on it, as "Fretty (Salkeld) empaling Vaux of Trevermaine, argent, a bend, dexter, chequy, or, and gules." The co-heiresses of Sir Richard and his wife with their husbands, or their descendants, conveyed to the Lords Thomas and William Dacre, temp. Henry VII. and VIII. and Edward VI.—as enrolled on the survey of the barony of Gilsland, temp. Elizabeth—their purparges of the lordship and demesne of Triermaine, which are stated to come to them as "inheritance from their mother, daughter and sole heir of Roland Vaux," &c.; and she is described in a pedigree of the Salkeld family, in Lord William Howard's papers, preserved at Corby, as "Joh^a. sine Jana sola filia and haeres Rolandi Vaux de Trevermaine, æ. 22nd Henry VII."⁴ Thomas Dykes, son of William and Christiana, conveyed his purparty to Lord William Dacre, by deed (in Latin), 25th Henry VIII., and this gentleman,

THOMAS DYKES, of Wardhall, married, temp. Henry VII., Isabel, only child and heiress of John Pennington, Esq., of Muncaster Castle, eldest son and heir of Sir John Pennington of the same. Thomas Dykes is recorded in the histories of Cumberland as furnishing horse in the border services of this period, and having the command of the watch and ward between Ellen and Derwent. Thomas Dykes, 35th Henry VIII., is found by inquiry to hold the manor of Dystington of the king, as of his Castle of Egremont, &c.⁵ His son and successor (with a daughter, Jane, married to Richard Orfeur, of High Close) was

LEONARD DYKES, Esq., of Wardhall, who married, temp. Henry VIII., Anne, daughter of John Layton, Esq., of Dalemyne. 4th Philip and Mary, he presents to the rectory of Dystington.⁶ He had issue, amongst others, with a daughter, Catharine, married to Gawen Eaglesfield (settlement dated 19th Elizabeth), his son and successor,

THOMAS DYKES, escheator of Westmoreland, temp. Elizabeth. He married Jane, daughter of Lancelot Lancaster, Esq., of Sockbridge; descended from Sir Roger de Lancaster, half or natural brother to William de Lancaster the third, baron of Kendal, and descended from Ivo de Tailbois, first baron of Kendal, brother of Fulk Earl of Anjou, and uncle of Geoffry Plantagenet, husband of the Empress Matilda. He had a brother, Oswald Dykes, who with himself is mentioned honourably by Camden, as stated in the History of Cumberland—"This also, among others (inscriptions), was copied for me (1587) by Oswald Dykes, a very learned divine, and is now at Wardhall, the seat of his brother, T. Dykes, a gentleman of great note." In the Cottonian MSS. of the British Museum (Julius, c. iii., &c.) are preserved two curious letters from Oswald Dykes to his friend Sir Robert Cotton. He "commends himself right heartily unto good Mr. William Camden," &c. In a list in this collection of "the names of all the gentlemen who in the scheyr of Cumberland," is that of "Thoms. Dykes, arm^y," temp. Elizabeth. His son,

LEONARD DYKES, married, 43rd Elizabeth, Anne, only surviving child and heir of Thomas Radcliffe, Esq., of Mayland and Bishop, in Durham: marriage registered at Manchester church, 1601: articles of marriage of this date (16th September, 1601) between his father, Thomas, and himself. As she was a minor, and in ward to the crown, he was arraigned for treason, but received a general pardon by warrant from the crown, under the great seal, which is still preserved amongst the family papers. He was sheriff for Cumberland, and (16th Charles I.) whilst sheriff he was appointed by warrant treasurer for the king's forces for the county and garrison of Carlisle: the document is still preserved. He married, secondly, Margaret, daughter and co-heir of John Frecheville, of Staveley, uncle of John Lord Frecheville (trustees for her dower, 5th December, 1645, are William Pennington, of Muncaster, and Lawson, son of Wilfrid Irton, of Threlkeld), and had a daughter, Elizabeth, married to Thomas Irton, Esq., of Threlkeld. He was succeeded by the son of his first marriage,

THOMAS DYKES, a devoted Royalist. After the defeat of the party, he concealed himself for some time in a large mulberry tree near his house, where food was conveyed to him by his wife and daughter: the tree is still in existence. He eventually fell into the hands of the Republicans, and was imprisoned in Cockermouth Castle, where he is stated to have died. When offered his liberty and property if he would recant, his reply was "Præsumptum quàm fœditur"—since adopted as the family motto. He married, 1628, Joyce Frecheville, daughter and co-heir of John Frecheville, uncle of Lord Frecheville, of Staveley.¹ This lady, through the families of Leke (Lords Deincourt), Savage (Earls of Rivers), Stanley, Fitzalan, and Bohun, was tenth in descent from Eleanor Plantagenet, daughter of Henry Duke of Lancaster, and eleventh from the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Edward I., as recorded in the Herald's College; also (similarly recorded), by another line—Kay of Woodsome, Wentworth of Bretton, the eldest branch of the Fitzwilliams, and the Warrens (Earls of Surrey), all now extinct in the male line—she descended in a direct line from the Conqueror. Ralph Lord Frecheville, her immediate ancestor, of whom she was a co-representative, was summoned to parliament as a baron, temp. Edward I. His descendants have since twice claimed the barony. Thomas Dykes married, secondly, Jane, daughter and heir of Ralph de la Vale, Esq., 1640, trustees for whose settlement are Sir Patricius Curwen and William Pennington, Esq., of Muncaster. The issue of his first marriage was, inter alios—with Frecheville, and Joyce, married to Thomas Curwen, Esq., of Workington, whose descendant and representative, Joyce Curwen, married Wilfrid Hudleston, of Hulton—his heir,

LEONARD DYKES, who, temp. Charles II., married Grace, daughter of John Salkeld, of Threapland, the descendant of Lancelot Salkeld, of Whitehall, who married Margaret, daughter and co-heir of Sir Richard Hudleston, of Millum. Sir Richard descended, through his mother, Joan, co-heir of Sir Miles Stapleton, of Ingham, from the De Lancasters, barons of Kendal; William de Lancaster (the first of that line) having married Gundred Countess of Warwick, daughter of William the Conqueror. Mr. Dykes was twice sheriff of Cumberland. He pulled down the old castle, and built a mansion with an

FRECHEVILLE DYKES, of Wardhall, married, 1697, Jane, eldest sister of Sir Gilfrid Lawson, Bart., of Brayton. They had issue, with two other sons, Frecheville, a captain in the navy, lost at sea, and Gilfrid Lawson, and a daughter, Jane, married to John Ballantine, Esq., of Crooklake Hall. Their son and heir.

LEONARD DYKES, Esq., of Wardhall, married, 1778, Susanna, only surviving child of the Rev. Thomas Capstick, vicar of Newburn, and Esther his wife, granddaughter of Sir John Lowther, first baronet of Lowther; the parties to subsequent settlement, 1780, are Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart., of Hayton Castle, H. Aglionby, and Humphrey Senhouse. They had, with other issue, two sons, FRECHEVILLE and LAWSON. The elder,

FRECHEVILLE DYKES, Esq., of Wardhall, a captain in the 67th Foot, and companion-in-arms of General Wolfe, married, 1763, Mary, only daughter and eventual heir of her father, John Brougham, Esq., of Cockermouth, and her brother, Peter Brougham Lamplugh, Esq., of Dovenby Hall. John Brougham was grandson of John Brougham, of Fairbank and Staveley, son of Thomas Brougham, of Scales, and Mary le Fleming, of Rydal, as recorded in the Herald's College, common ancestor also of the present Lord Brougham. Mr. John Brougham married Frances, daughter and heir of John Woodhall, Esq., and Elizabeth, daughter and eventual heir of Richard Lamplugh, Esq., of Ribton Hall, and his wife, Mary Molyne, of Dovenby Hall, eventual representative and heir of the Dovenby branch of the family of Lamplugh. Richard Lamplugh, of Ribton, cousin to Thomas Lamplugh, archbishop of York, 1688, and named so in his will, descended with him from Thomas de Lamplugh, of Skelsmor (whose descendant removed into Yorkshire), younger son of John de Lamplugh, of Lamplugh (of the main line), and Isabel, daughter of Sir John Pennington, and great-grandson of Sir John de Lamplugh, who married Margaret, daughter of John de Eaglesfield, of Alnburgh, founder's kin of Robert de Eaglesfield, founder of Queen's College, Oxford, and chaplain to Edward III. and his queen Philippa.² The Dovenby line descended from Nicholas, younger son of Sir Thomas Lamplugh, of Lamplugh, who settled at Dovenby on his marriage with the sister and heiress of Richard Kirkbride, temp. Richard II.³ Francis Lamplugh, of that line, living there, temp. Elizabeth, married Jane Salkeld, of Whitehall, as recorded in the Herald's

¹ Leonard Dykes was living 8th Anne, 1709, aged 75. He gives some curious evidence in a case respecting the lords of the manor of Wardhall being owners also of the title within the manor (as is the case) in connection with his grandfather, Leonard, whose marriage took place 4th Elizabeth—a considerable lapse of time in three generations!—mentioning, as circumstances that accounted for facts, or recalled them to his recollection, that "he was taken, in 1697, by his grandfather, to Carlisle, where they stayed till a year after the siege was broken up;" that his grandfather on one occasion made him a present of "a little brass cannon which went upon wheels" (such things were then in vogue also as toys); that "a former decree was burnt—for the family was several times plundered in those troublesome times, their writings burnt, and his father and himself driven from their seats, where the enemy kept a guard." There is a curious old paper drawn up at the time by Leonard, the grandfather, and his son Thomas, 1614, detailing the losses inflicted upon them by the Scottish troops under Lord Montgomery, then quartered at Caldbeck.

College; she was daughter of Marie Vaux, of Catterlen, and granddaughter of Margaret, co-heiress of Sir Richard Huddleston, of Millom, whose descent is given above. Francis Lamplugh was son of Robert, who first presented to Bridekirk, 1563, (his descendant, Mrs. Dykes, is still patroness), and Jane Preston, daughter of Sir Thomas Preston, of Preston Patrick. Her sister, Ellen Lady Leyburne, was mother of Elizabeth Lady Dacre, afterwards Duchess of Norfolk, and Anne Lady Mount-Engle, these ladies, therefore, were first cousins to Francis Lamplugh, of Dovenby. The descendant, then, and great-granddaughter of Richard Lamplugh and Mary Molyne, who united the two branches of Ribton and Dovenby, Mary Brougham, (having married, as above, Frecheville Dykes, Esq., of Wardhall), their only surviving child, Mary, on their death, and that of her uncle, P. Brougham Lamplugh, Esq., of Dovenby Hall, who had taken the name and arms of Lamplugh, inherited the estates of Wardhall and Dovenby, &c., and married her cousin, Joseph Dykes Ballantine, eldest son of LAWSON DYKES, younger son, as above, of Leonard Dykes and Susanna Capstick. He married, 1764, Jane, daughter and heir of John Ballantine, Esq., of Crookdake Hall and Ireby, &c., and took the name and arms of Ballantine in addition, by sign manual. Sir John Ballantine, of Corehouse, in Scotland, their immediate ancestor, married, 1663, Anne, daughter and heir of William Musgrave, Esq., of Crookdake Hall and Ireby, &c., by Dorothy, daughter of Henry Dacre, Esq., of Lanercost. William Musgrave was the descendant and representative of William, younger son of Thomas de Musgrave and Mariotta, daughter and co-heir of Sir William Stapleton, of Edenhall, who, temp. Edward IV., marrying Felicia, granddaughter of John Colvil and Isabel Tilliol, acquired with her the manor and estates of Crookdake and Ireby, and was the founder of the Crookdake branch of the Musgrave family.¹ The family of Ballantine is termed² a family of note in Scotland; one of them, under the Latinised name of Belledunes, was the author of a work, "De Stata," to which Dr. Parr wrote a learned preface, &c. Sir John Ballantine (as recorded in the Lyon College, Scotland) descended from "Sir Richard of Bannockknyne of ye Corbous" (circa 1460), whose grandson, John Bannatyne, married Lady Isabel Hamilton, eldest daughter of James, first Earl of Arran, and granddaughter of the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of James II. The name subsequently became changed (as was not uncommon in those days) to Ballantine. Sir John Ballantine's settlement, 1663, is witnessed by his brother, Sir William Ballantine, and his friend Sir William Lockhart, &c. Miss Dacre, mother of his wife, Anne Musgrave, was granddaughter of Alice Knyvett, daughter of Sir Henry Knyvett, of Beckenham Castle, Norfolk, and Anne, daughter and heir of Sir James Pickering, of Killington. Sir Henry Knyvett was son of Sir Thomas Knyvett and Lady Muriella Howard, daughter of Thomas, second Duke of Norfolk, fifth in descent from Lady Margaret Plantagenet, granddaughter of Edward I. and his second wife Margaret of France. Sir John Ballantine's son and heir, William, married Miss Johnstone, daughter of Sir James Johnstone, of Westerhall, who, through the Lords Oliphant, Errol, Huntly, Erskine, and Morton, descended from James I. of Scotland and Joan de Beaufort, great-granddaughter of John of Gaunt, son of Edward III.

The issue of Lawson Dykes and Jane Ballantine were Joseph, Frecheville, major-general H.E.I.C.; Thomas, East India naval service; and Mary, married to James Spedding, Esq., of Summer Grove. Their eldest son and successor, JOSEPH DYKES BALLANTINE, Esq., of Crookdake Hall, Soales, and Ireby, married, as above, 1800, his cousin, Mary Dykes, heir to her father, Frecheville Dykes, Esq., of Wardhall, and her uncle, P. Brougham Lamplugh, Esq., of Dovenby Hall, and took the name and arms of Dykes again, in addition, by sign manual. He was sheriff for Cumberland, 1806, and died in 1830. The issue of the marriage are,

1. FRECHEVILLE LAWSON, M.P. for Cockermouth, 1832; sheriff for Cumberland, 1842; married, 1844, Anne Eliza, eldest surviving daughter and co-heiress of J. Gunson, Esq., of Ingwell, and has issue,

- IV. Lawson P., Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford.

- v. James William, E.I.C.S., Madras.

1. Mary, married, firstly, John Marshall, Jun., of Headingley, Leeds, and Derwentwater, Cumberland, and has issue,

1. Reginald Dykes.
2. Herbert John, lieut. R.N.
3. Julian.
1. Janet Mary.
2. Catherine Alice.

She married, secondly, P. O'Callaghan, Esq. (late 11th Hussars), and has issue, Desmond Dykes Tynte.

11. Jane Christians, married Thomas Donnelly, lieut.-col. E.I.C., and has issue, John Frecheville Dykes, lieut. R.E.

111. Ellen, married James Walker, Esq., of Dalry House, N.B., and has issue,

1. William Frecheville.
2. Francis Dykes.
1. Mary Ellen.

- IV. Frances, married Edward Ormerod, Esq., of Seymour House, Old Trafford, Lancashire.

- v. Susan.

¹ The crest and arms (the first erroneously given in Moul's Heraldry of Fish as a "crayfish") have reference, no doubt, to the original location of the family, "the more than primeval beach" at Dykesfield, as described by Mr. Bruce in his Roman Wall. The lobster indicates the true presence of sea, in ages past, though now far removed, and the dark-coloured marsh cinquefoil ("sable") would flourish in the more or less submerged low ground adjacent, which anciently gave the name "de Feritate" to its possessors.

PAPCASTLE.

The area of this township is 1,216 acres, and its rateable value £3,609 9s. 3d. The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 283; in 1811, 311; in 1821, 384; in 1831, 461; in 1841, 568; and in 1851, 632. The inhabitants of the townships are principally located in the villages of Papcastle and Goat, the former of which contains many respectable residences. A linen thread manufactory was commenced at the Goat mill, near Cockermouth, in 1820; and in 1835, Messrs. Harris erected the Derwent Side Mills, also near Cockermouth, which were enlarged in 1846 to three times the former size. They now contain 11,000 spindles, and afford employment to about 750 persons.

The first recorded possessor of the manor of Papcastle, is Waltheof, lord of Allerdale, who appears to have resided here previous to his removal to Cockermouth. It was afterwards successively held by the Lucies, Multons, and Dacres, and on the attainer of Leonard Dacre, became vested in the crown. From a survey taken in 1578, we learn that William Lord Dacre held Papcastle of the ancient possessions of the earls of Northumberland, of the yearly value of £17 2s., purchased of the late king, Edward VI., to be holden of the said king by sergeantry. The same document also states that the co-heirs of Lord Dacre held Papcastle, and paid yearly for cornage, 6s. 8d.; seawake, 1s. 6d.; and for free rent, in toto, 8s. 2d. Anthony Barwis, Esq., held one tenement at Papcastle, called Hameshill, and paid yearly for free rent, 2s. It was granted by Queen Elizabeth in 1595, to Lancelot Salkeld, Thomas Braithwaite, and Richard Tolson, from whom it appears to have been subsequently purchased by the Lamplughs, and is now possessed by Mrs. Dykes, of Dovenby. The principal landowners are Messrs. John Steel, John S. Mawson, and William Thornburn. The principal part of this manor has been enfranchised, only £3 6s. 2½d. of customary, or manorial rents, remaining, and including out-tenements in Bothel and Ireby, £5 1s. 10½d. Mrs. Dykes is also the owner of the great tithes, but some part has been exchanged with the landowners for common right. The remaining commutation, or awarded rent charge, is £20 8s. 6d. The township was enclosed by act of parliament, passed in 1841.

The village of Papcastle occupies a pleasant and elevated situation on the north bank of the Derwent, one mile west-north-west of Cockermouth, and is said to derive its name from one Pipard, its owner, in Saxon times. On the summit of a hill here are the traces of a Roman station or castrum, supposed to be Derwentum, where a body of troops, called the Numerus Derven-tionensis, was quartered. This station is connected with that at Ellenborough by a Roman road, traces of which are still visible. A great number of coins and other interesting relics have been discovered at this place and in the neighbourhood. The castrum was subsequently the residence of the above-mentioned Waltheof, by whom it was demolished, and the materials used in the construction of Cockermouth Castle. The new road from Cockermouth is cut through a portion of the field where the castrum stood. The large edible snail (Helix pomatia) is said to be common in the adjoining hedges, and may have been introduced by the Romans as an article of diet.

Goat, a village in this township, forms the north-west suburb of Cockermouth, with which town it is connected by a stone bridge. Here are two corn mills.

Derwent Bank, the seat of John Steel, Esq., is a handsome mansion, erected in 1846, on an elevation about a mile north by west of Cockermouth, overlooking the vale of the river from which it derives its name.

CHARITY.

Whimay's Charity.—Mr. John Whimay, in 1592, bequeathed £6 a-year to the poor of this township.

Skelton of Papcastle.

The family of Skelton, of Armathwaite Castle, was one of great antiquity; and so far back as the time of Richard II. we find by a deed dated 14th November, in the fourteenth year of that monarch's reign, that Sir Robert de Mulcastre then granted to Sir Clement de Skelton "totam terram meam a Threpland."

RICHARD SKELTON, Esq., son of John Skelton, Esq., of Armathwaite, and grandson of Richard Skelton, Esq., of the same place, sold the castle and estate of Armathwaite to William Sanderson, Esq., in 1712. Mr. Skelton left a numerous issue.

The Skeltons of Branthwaite Hall were a junior branch of the Skeltons of Armathwaite, derived from

RICHARD SKELTON, who was present at Azincourt with Henry V., and served the office of high sheriff of Cumberland. He was younger son of JOHN DE SKELTON, who married in 1422 the heiress of the Branthwaite estates, and acquired that property, where his descendants continued to reside till about 1727. Its then possessor was HENRY SKELTON, Esq., of Branthwaite Hall, general in the army, and governor of Portsmouth. This officer was engaged in Flanders, and also in Scotland, in 1745; in the former country his life was saved by his aide-de-camp, Captain James Jones, who shot a dragoon as he was on the point of cutting down the general. The latter, who died 1767, did not forget this, for on the opening of his will, it was found that he left Branthwaite Hall and estate to his friend,

Captain JAMES JONES, of the 3rd Guards, who then became of Branthwaite. He was son of James Jones, who descended from General John Jones, by Catherine, his wife, sister of Oliver Cromwell, and relict of Wheatstone. Captain Jones married, 1749, Jemima, daughter of Colonel Tullekens, who came from Holland with William Prince of Orange, and by this lady had a son, ARNOLDUS, and a daughter, Jemima, who married, 1768, Charles, first Marquis of Cornwallis. The son, ARNOLDUS JONES, of the 3rd Guards, born 1750, assumed the surname of Skelton, 1774. He married, October, 1775, Elizabeth, daughter of William Hicks, Esq., of Whitehaven and Papcastle, and by her (with whom he acquired Papcastle) had four sons and five daughters,

1. HENRY, major 10th Lancers, sold the Branthwaite Hall estate, 1797, to John Christian Curwen, Esq., and died 26th August, 1860, having had previous to his wife Maria, eldest daughter of William Betty, Esq., of Dublin, barrister-at-law, LL.D.
2. DANIEL JONES, present representative.
3. Charles Cornwallis, lieutenant, R.N., killed in action, unmarried.
4. William, lieutenant, R.N., died unmarried.
5. Jemima Tullekens, married to Thomas Foster Gunter, Esq., lieutenant in the army.
6. Elizabeth, married to William Birmingham, Esq.
7. Maria, married to William Rudd, Esq., of Cocker-mouth.
8. Priscilla Sarah, married first to Edward Penruddocke, Esq., of Wyfield, Wilts, and secondly to James Walker, Esq., rear-admiral, R.N.
9. Mary, died unmarried.

Mr. Jones Skelton died 1793, and was succeeded by his son,

DANIEL JONES SKELTON, Esq., of Papcastle, county Cumberland, late a captain, Royal Art., born 1785; married, 10th December, 1810, Mary Anne, daughter of Thomas Theed, Esq., of London, and has issue,

1. Henry Charles Cornwallis, H.E.I.C.S., died 28th May, 1836.
2. HENRY JONES, born 4th July, 1804, deceased.
3. Anne Eliza, married, 28th February, 1844, to William Browne Pousonby, Esq., an officer H.E.I.C.S., who died June, 1859, leaving issue.
4. Maria, married 1st January, 1811, to the Rev. James Barrow, incumbent of Ashford, Bakewell, nephew of Sir Richard Fleming, Bart., and has issue.
5. Mary Dorothea, married Henry Grove, Esq., formerly lieutenant, 23rd Lancers, and has issue.
6. Frances, married George Hutchins Bellasis, Esq., late major H.E.I.C.S., and has issue.
7. Sophia Henrietta.

RIBTON.

The area of Ribton township is 596 acres, and its rateable value £512. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 47; in 1811, 51; in 1821, 36; in 1831, 26; in 1841, 25; and in 1851, 19, who occupy two farm-houses and two cottages. The Cocker-mouth and Workington railway skirts the south of the township.

The manor of Ribton belonged to a family of that name, descended from a younger son of Waltheof, son of Gilmin. It continued in possession of the Ribton family for several generations, and, in the reign of Edward III., we find that John Ribton held it by the service of 2s. 8d. coruage, 8d. seawake, pature of the sergeants, and suit of court at Papcastle, from three weeks to three weeks. The Ribtons occur as owners as late as 1578, for in that year William Ribton, though under age, held Ribton by homage, fealtie, and suit of court, paying yearly for coruage, 6s. 8d.; for seawake, 7½d.; and for sergeant's food, in toto, 7s. 3½d. It was subsequently purchased by Thomas Lamplugh, Esq., of Beverley, in the county of York. His grandson, Richard Lamplugh, Esq., eldest son of Richard Lamplugh, Esq., of Dovenby and Ribton, sold Ribton to Sir James Lowther, Bart., from whom it has descended to the Earl of Lonsdale, who is also proprietor of the lands in the township. There are no corn-tithes in Ribton; the small tithes are £4 6s.

Ribton Hall, a large stone building, formerly the seat of the Lamplughs and Lowthers, is now a farmhouse. From an old chair found in the building, bearing date 1638, that year has been conjectured to be the time of its erection.

The township is about five miles west of Cocker-mouth.

TALLANTIRE.

The township of Tallantire contains 1,913 acres, and its rateable value is £1,672 7s. 6d. In 1801 it contained 182 inhabitants; in 1811, 213; in 1821, 244; in 1831, 237; in 1841, 246; and in 1851, 250. The inhabitants reside partly in the village of Tallantire; their principal employment is agriculture.

The manor of Tallantire was granted by Waltheof, son of Gospatrick, to Odard, son of Liulph, whose descendants assumed the local name, and continued to hold Tallantire till a short time previous to 1578; for, from a survey of the barony of Allerdale taken in that year, we learn that the heirs of John Radcliffe hold Tallantire with Castlerigg and the Isle of Derwentwater by homage, fealtie, and suit of court, paying yearly for coruage, 21s. 10d.; for seawake, 1s. 4d.; for sergeant's food, turnsilver, and free rent, 2s.; in toto, 25s. 2d. It afterwards came by purchase to the Fletchers of Cocker-mouth, from which family it was transferred, by marriage, to that of the Partis of Newcastle. In 1776 it was purchased of Henry Hopper, Esq., devisee of Fletcher Partis, Esq., by William Browne, Esq.; in whose family it still continues. The landowners are William Browne, Esq.; Messrs. John Smith, Thomas Smith, and Richard Harboard. The tenants are all enfranchised. The township was enclosed and allotted in 1812.

The village of Tallantire is three and a half miles north by west of Cocker-mouth, and about a mile and a half north-west of Bridekirk.

Stonewall of Tallantire Hall.

The family of Browne was settled at Woodhall, in the parish of Cuddbeck, for many generations.

WILLIAM BROWNE, Esq., born 19th Sept., 1732, a younger son of William Browne, Esq., of Woodhall and Orithwaite Hall, both in this county, purchased the lordships of Tallantire, Dovenby, and Papecastle, and served as high sheriff in the 90th George III. He married, 23rd September, 1770, Mary, relict of Richard Lancaster, Esq., and died in 1802, leaving a son, WILLIAM, the present possessor of the estate, and three daughters, Mary Dorothea, married to John Pemberton, Esq., of Sherburn Hall, co. Durham; Elizabeth, married to Capt. John Ponsbury, R.N.; and Isabella, married to John Smith, Esq. Mr. Browne, on his demise, was succeeded by his son,

WILLIAM BROWNE, Esq., of Tallantire Hall, J.P., and D.L., high sheriff in 1817, born 3rd December, 1780; married 11th October, 1803, Catherine, daughter of the late William Stewart, of Castle Stewart, co. Wigton, N.B., by his wife, the Hon. Euphemia Mackenzie, and has issue,

- i. William, born 24th July, 1809, married in 1847, Isabella Midford.
- ii. John Stewart, born 10th October, 1814.
1. Catherine. ii. Jane Euphemia.
- ii. Caroline, married in 1838, to Lord Teignmouth.
- iv. Harriette.

BRIGHAM PARISH.

THIS parish, which extends about twelve miles from north to south, and about nine miles from east to west, is bounded by the rivers Deverent and Marron, and by the lakes of Loweswater, Crummock, Buttermere, and Bassenthwaite. It contains the ancient borough, parochial chapelry, and township of Cockermouth; the parochial chapelries and townships of Emlenton, and Lorton; the chapelries and townships of Buttermere, Mosser, Scaunthly, and Wytham; and the townships of Brigham, Blindholthel, Eaglesfield, Greysouthen, Whinfell, and Brackenthwaite. The inhabitants attend the markets at Cockermouth.

BRIGHAM.

Brigham township, inclusive of that of Eaglesfield, contains 6,666 acres; its rateable value is £3,522 9s. 9d. The population in 1801 was 238; in 1811, 277; in 1821, 390; in 1831, 503; in 1841, 490; and in 1851, 446. The inhabitants chiefly reside in the village of Brigham. They are principally engaged in agriculture, but many of the labouring classes are employed in the quarries and coal mines which adjoin this township. The limestone quarries, which are extensively worked, at Brigham Low Houses, are said to be the finest in Cumberland. There is a small earthenware manufactory in this township. The soil here is a rich, fertile loam, and a dry gravelly clay earth; it is very productive. The Cockermouth and Workington railway runs through the township on the south bank of the Derwent, and has a station near the church, a short distance from Brigham, and another at Broughton Cross. The river Derwent flows through part of the township; it is spanned by a fine bridge, called Broughton Bridge, built in 1835, which unites the township of Broughton with that of Brigham.

The manors of Brigham, Eaglesfield, and Greysouthen, were given by William de Meschines, to Waltheof, son of Gospatric, who gave Brigham, together with the manors of Dean and Clifton, to Dolfin, son of Ailward, in marriage with his sister. After a few descents it was divided into moieties between the coheirs of the Brigham family; one moiety, after remaining for some time in the possession of the family of Twinham, and afterwards in that of Hercla, was forfeited on the attainder of Andrew de Hercla, earl of Carlisle, and given to a chantry in the church of Brigham, by Thomas de Burgh, in 16th Edward II.: this moiety, after the suppression of the religious houses, was granted to the Fletchers of Moresby, and was sold to the tenants. The other moiety was held, 8th Edward I., by Gilbert Huthwaite, from whose family it passed to the Swinburnes, one of whom, John Swinburne, in 35th Henry VIII., "held a moiety of the vill of Brigham of the king, as of the honour of Cockermouth, by knight's service, 2s. cornage, pature of the sergeants and witnessman, with suit of court at Cockermouth from three weeks to three weeks." In 1578, the vicar of the parish church of Brigham held there one tenement, with the appurtenances of the Earl of Northumberland, as of his honour of Cockermouth, by homage, fealty, suit of court, and other services. At the same date John Swinbourne, gentleman, held a moiety of the town of Brigham, and paid yearly for cornage 2s. 6d. Anthony Barwis held the other moiety by like service; and William Walker held one tenement by fealty and suit of court, rendering per annum 11s. The Swinburnes sold their moiety, in 1699, to the Hon. Goodwin Wharton. In 1727 the trustees of the Duke of Wharton sold it to Mr. Wilfrid Grisdale, after the death of whose daughter and granddaughter it passed under his will to Mr. William Singleton, who died in 1767; on his death this and other estates became vested jointly in several persons under Mr. Grisdale's will, and having been divided by virtue of a commission of partition issued out of the Court of Chancery, this moiety of the manor of Brigham was allotted to Joshua Lucock, Esq., and is now the property of his trustees.

General Wyndham is lord paramount, and the tenants of this manor render suit and service at his honor courts, held at Cockermouth Castle. The principal landowners are the Earl of Lonsdale; William Lumb, Esq.; J. R. Wilson, Esq.; Mrs. Fawcett; Messrs. J. Fawcett, and L. and F. Grave. The common was enclosed in 1821, under an act of parliament passed in 2nd George IV.

The village of Brigham is about two and a quarter miles west of Cockermouth. It is irregularly built, but has long been famous for the salubrity of its atmosphere, and the longevity of its inhabitants. Middle class houses are much wanted here, and as there is plenty of lime and stone in the vicinity, and sites easily obtainable, it is not easy to explain their absence.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, is an ancient structure, supposed to have been erected in the eleventh century, and consists of nave, chancel, aisle, porch, and square tower; but is much in want of renovation and improvement. It is now a vicarage, but was formerly rectorial. The advowson was conveyed by Thomas de Huthwaite to Isabel, Countess of Albermarle, in the reign of Henry III., and in 1439 it was appropriated to the collegiate church of Staindrop, in the county of Durham. In 1579 the Bishop of Carlisle assumed the patronage, and in 1618 Sir Richard Fletcher, and one Hodgson presented. The Earl of Lonsdale is the present impropriator and patron. The living, which is valued in the King's Book at £20 16s. 0½d., is now worth £190 per annum. When the commons were enclosed in 1821, there were 202 acres allotted to the Earl of Lonsdale in lieu of corn-tithes. The parish register commences in 1564.

INCUMBENTS.—John Pierson, 1661; John Martin, 1665; Henry Stephenson, 1674; Roger Fleming, 1705; Joseph Dixon, 1736; William Henry Leech, 1782 (the Rev. Pearson Simpson officiated as curate for Mr. Leech till 1823, when the Rev. William Henry Leech, jun., officiated as curate for his father up to the latter's death in 1834); John Wordsworth, 1834.

The Vicarage is a commodious house, near the church, erected in 1847, by the Cockermouth and Workington Railway Company, who purchased the site of the old vicarage.

Brigham Parochial School, situated to the south-east of the village, is a small stone building, capable of accommodating about forty-five children, the average number in attendance. At the enclosure of the commons in 1821 the school received an allotment of two acres, which are now let for £3 a year. The vicar and churchwardens for the time being are trustees.

Brigham Sunday-school, a small building at the church gates, was erected in 1839.

A rich pasture field near the church, known by the name of Chantry, contains a fine spring, and a mound supposed by some to cover the ruins of some ancient religious edifice.

The Wesleyans have a chapel in the village, which was erected in 1856, at a cost of £120, and is the first dissenting place of worship that has been built in the township. It is a small stone structure, capable of seating upwards of one hundred persons. For thirty years previous to the erection of this chapel the congregation met at a house in the village.

Fitz House, within about half a mile of Cockermouth, is the property of Humphrey Senhouse, Esq.

CHARITIES.

Susannah Slater's Charity.—About the year 1711 Susannah Slater left £100 to the parish of Brigham. The Charity Commissioners inform us that it is understood in the parish that on the death of Mrs. Slater, £55, being a moiety of the principal, with one year's interest thereon, was distributed by the then vicar. The remaining £50 has been secured on the tolls of the road between Cockermouth and Workington. Such parts of the parish as formed distinct chapelries at the time this legacy was left, and were thus separated from the rest of the parish of Brigham, have been considered as not having been intended to partake of the benefit of this charity. The interest paid upon the £50 above-mentioned, amounting annually to £2, has accordingly been given away on the 14th of February yearly, by the churchwardens of the following divisions, viz., of Brigham, Greysouthen, Eaglesfield, Mosser, Blindbothel, and Whinfell, amongst poor persons of their divisions who receive no parochial relief.

Sawrey's Charity.—Myles Sawrey, by will dated 17th March, 1774, bequeathed £400, upon trust, to apply the yearly dividends amongst eight poor widows of the Church of England, not receiving parochial relief. The trustees of this charity, in 1776, purchased £500 stock, New South Sea Annuities, out of the dividends of which, amounting to £15, there is given to each of eight poor and aged women £7 16s. 6d.; the remaining sum is expended in procuring the dividends and other charges.

to the poor of the township of Brigham. This money is invested at four per cent., and the interest, amounting to 8s., is distributed by the churchwardens amongst poor persons of the township not receiving parochial relief.

John Askew, a native of this township, is the author of a Voyage to Australia and New Zealand, a work which gives an interesting account of those far-off lands at a time when the utmost excitement prevailed, owing to the discovery of the Australian gold fields.

BLINDBOTHEL.

The area of this township is 1,215 acres, and its rateable value £871. The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 82; in 1811, 96; in 1821, 112; in 1831, 106; in 1841, 100; and in 1851, 128. Agriculture is the only employment of the inhabitants, who are scattered over the township. The manorial rights of the commons are vested in General Wyndham, who is also lord paramount of the ancient land, which is freehold, and subject only to a peppercorn rent. In 1578 the following persons occur as freeholders here:—William Fawick, William Fearon, John Fletcher, Robert Yoward, the heirs of Cuthbert Nicholson, John Nicholson, Miles Pearson, the heirs of Matthew Addison, Thomas Head, Christopher Wilkinson, and John Fearon. The landowners at present (1858) are the trustees of the late — Timperon, Esq.; Mrs. Senhouse; Messrs. John Nicholson, William Paisley, Fletcher Norman, Thomas Leathes, Isaac Nicholson, and a few small proprietors. The township was enclosed in 1818, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of parliament passed in 1812, when twenty acres of land were awarded for the education of the children of the poor of this and Eaglesfield township. The Earl of Lonsdale received 264 acres in lieu of tithes for the same townships.

Blindbothel, where the school is situated, is about two and a half miles south of Cockermouth.

CHARITY.

School.—The land awarded to the school at the enclosure of the commons as above mentioned, produces now about £16 per annum, which is paid over to the schoolmaster, who takes all the children of Eaglesfield and Blindbothel at a small quarterage, as fixed by the trustees. The master is allowed to take children from other townships on his own terms. He has upon an average between sixty and seventy children in the school.

At a place called Green Trees, in this township, James Dickinson, one of the earliest propagators of the doctrines of the Society of Friends, was born in 1657.

EAGLESFIELD.

The area of the township of Eaglesfield is returned with that of Brigham; its rateable value is £1,332 2s. 2d. In 1801, it contained 310 inhabitants; in 1811, 333; in 1821, 405; in 1831, 411; in 1841, 371; and in 1851, 309. The population, whose employment is agriculture, are chiefly located in the village, and attend the markets at Cockermouth.

A paved Roman way, seven yards in width, has been discovered at several places in this township, leading from north to south; and in removing the surface for the purpose of quarrying the limestone which abounds here, several human bones, teeth, and instruments of war have been found from time to time, at a place called Endlaw, from which circumstance, it is supposed to have been the site of a Roman station.

The manor of Eaglesfield was given by William de Meschines to Waltheof, son of Gospatric. It afterwards came into the possession of a family who took the local name, one of whom, Robert Eaglesfield, was confessor to Philippa, queen of Edward III., and founder of Queen's College, Oxford. This township is parcel of what is called the manor of the five towns, and the manorial rights are vested in General Wyndham. In 1578 Nicholas Williamson held certain lands and tenements in Eaglesfield (late the lands of Richard Eaglesfield) by knight's service, and rendered 6s. 8d. Richard Jackson held, at the same period, a capital messuage with certain demesne lands belonging to the same, in Eaglesfield, by like service. Anthony Barwis, Esq., and Anthony Curwen, Esq., also held land here by like service; the latter also held some in Blindbothel and Greysouthen. Lancelot Fletcher, and John Gill, also occur among the freeholders. The tenure here is principally copyhold, or tenancy subject to a fine of two years' value, at the death of either lord or tenant. Courts are held at Cockermouth Castle. The Earl of Lonsdale, Messrs. John and Joseph Robinson, Joseph Harris, William Wood, and Thomas Benn, Esq., are the principal landowners. The township was enclosed at the same time as Blindbothel, in 1818, and the inhabitants participate in the benefits conferred by the school situated in that village.

The village of Eaglesfield is two and a half miles south-west of Cockermouth. Close to the village there is a meeting-house belonging to the Society of Friends, as also a burial-ground; over the entrance to the former is the date 1711, over the latter, 1693. The Friends only meet here on occasion of a funeral. There is also a Wesleyan chapel, a small, plain, stone building, situated in the village, erected in 1845, at a cost of £120, and will accommodate about 120 persons.

CHARITY.

Fletcher's Charity.—Henry Fletcher, of Green, in Eaglesfield, by will dated 11th January, 1730, gave to the poor of Eaglesfield the sum of £2 yearly, to be distributed at Green aforesaid; the said £2 a year "to be paid out of the parcel of ground known by the name of Lowfield, in Lorton, in the manor of Derwent Fells."

Upon the enclosure of a common, in this township, about the year 1814, twenty acres of land were set out, with the consent of the inhabitants, for the maintenance of a schoolmaster.¹

Dr. Dalton, the celebrated philosopher and chemist, was a native of this township.

Fletcher Christian, who led the mutineers in the Bounty, and settled in Pitcairn's Island, went from Moorland Close in this township.

GREYSOUTHEN.

Greysouthen township contains 1,635 acres, and its rateable value is 22,784 10s. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 455; in 1811, 466; in 1821, 416; in 1831, 555; in 1841, 584; and in 1851, 638. The inhabitants, who are principally employed in the neighbouring collieries, are chiefly located in the large village of Greysouthen. The township is skirted on the south by the Cockermouth and Workington railway. For upwards of seventy years coal has been found here in abundance, but at present there is only one colliery at work, that of Messrs. Joseph Harris & Co. It consists of one shaft of about forty-two fathoms perpendicular depth. The seam worked is the "Cannel Band," which is from five to five and a half feet thick. The number of hands employed is about seventy; and the produce of this colliery is principally shipped at Workington.

Greysouthen, anciently Crakesothen, one of the five towns belonging to the honor of Cockermouth, was given by William de Meschines to Waltheof, son of Gospatric, and descended in the same manner as the rest of the barony. In 1578 Henry Curwen, Kut., held certain lands here of the Earl of Northumberland, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, rendering per annum 6s. 8d. William Bell also held one tenement by like services. Anthony Barwis also held some land by knight's service, as did also Anthony Curwen, Esq. The principal landowners are Joseph Harris, Esq.; William Paisley, Esq.; Isaac Fletcher, Esq.; and John Harris, Esq. The township was enclosed in 1828, under the authority of an act passed in 1819.

The village of Greysouthen is three and a half miles west-by-south of Cockermouth. To the east of the village is a small Wesleyan place of worship, erected in 1833, at a cost of £161; it possesses accommodation for about 200 hearers. This was the first chapel of the kind built in this township, a private house serving for worship previously. At a short distance to the east of the village is a Friends meeting-house and burial-ground.

CHARITY.

School.—At the enclosure of the common, in 1828, fifteen acres of land were appropriated for the education of the poor of this township.

Here is also an infant school, established, in 1843, by the late Miss Woodville, in a house given for that purpose by Joseph Harris, Esq.; it is supported by voluntary subscriptions, and has an average attendance of forty pupils.

Tarn Bank, the property and residence of Isaac Fletcher, Esq., is situated near the village.

WHINFELL.

In 1801 this township contained 82 inhabitants; in 1811, 84; in 1821, 107; in 1831, 122; in 1841, 132; and in 1851, 108. Its area is 1,733 acres, and its rateable value, £1,201 11s. 2d. The soil here is various, chiefly a gravelly loam. The township consists of old enclosures, lying in the form of a crescent, round the foot of Whinfell Fell, which rises 1,000 or 1,200 feet above the level of the sea; near the base there is soil of good quality, but it becomes poorer and lighter at greater elevations, and is intermixed with patches of gravelly clay and peat.

The township and manor of Whinfell were, in the reign of Henry VIII., the joint property of Christopher Curwen, J. Eaglesfield, and Ambrose Middleton. In 1578 Anthony Barwis held certain lands and tenements at Whinfell and Blindboethel, late the property of Wm. Eaglesfield, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, rendering per annum one halfpenny. The heirs of Ambrose Crackenthorp and Anthony Curwen also held certain lands and tenements in Whinfell and Blindboethel, late the lands of the said Ambrose and Anthony, by like services, rendering one halfpenny. It was afterwards in the Wharton family, and, having been sold by them to the Duke of Somerset, came from him to the family of the Earl of Egremont. The manor is now held in moieties, one of which belongs to General Wyndham, the other to Major Thompson. At the time of the enclosure of the common in 1828, the common and Major Thompson's moiety were enfranchised. The principal landowners are R. Harbord, Esq.; William Dixon, Esq.;

Major Thompson; Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Messrs. Wilson Robinson, Allan Peele, John Wilson, John Nicholson, M. Stainton, and John Asbridge. The tithes have been commuted for a rent charge of £14, payable to the Earl of Lonsdale.

Whinfell township has no village of its own name, but contains the small hamlet of Rogerscale, and a few scattered houses built on the skirts of the Fell, four and a half miles south of Cockermouth.

CHARITY.

Lord Wharton's Charity.—The poor of this township receive from the minister of Dean a share of the books transmitted to him from Lord Wharton's trustees, as stated in our account of the parish of Dean.

COCKERMOUTH PAROCHIAL CHAPELRY.

THE parochial chapelry of Cockermouth is about five miles in length from east to west, and about two miles in breadth from north to south. It is bounded on the north by the Derwent, on the west by Brigham, on the south by Embleton and Lorton, and on the east by the lake of Bassenthwaite. The inhabitants are principally collected in the town of Cockermouth.

COCKERMOUTH.

The area of the township of Cockermouth is 2,326 acres, and its rateable value £12,104. Its population in 1801 was 2,865; in 1811, 2,964; in 1821, 3,790; in 1831, 4,536; in 1841, 4,940; and in 1851, 5,775.

Cockermouth is the site of the barony of Allerdale, since called the barony and honour of Cockermouth. This barony was given by William de Meschines to Waltheof, son of Gospatric, earl of Dunbar, whose granddaughter brought it to William Fitz-Duncan, nephew of Malcolm, king of Scotland; one of the co-heiresses of Fitz-Duncan, was twice married, and died without issue; the two others, whose issue eventually shared this barony in moieties, married William Le Gros, earl of Albermarle, and Reginald Lucy; the heiress of Lucy married one of the Multon family, who took the name of Lucy. After the death of William de Fortibus, earl of Albermarle, and Isabel his countess, without issue, a moiety of the castle and honour of Cockermouth fell to the crown, and having been for a while in the possession of Piers Gaveston, by the grant of Edward II., was some years afterwards¹ (1323), granted to Anthony Lord Lucy,² already possessed by inheritance of the other moiety. Maud, sister and heiress of Anthony Lord Lucy, who died in 1366, settled the castle and honour of Cockermouth on Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, her second husband, and his heirs male, on condition that they should bear the arms of Lucy quarterly with their own.

From a survey taken in 1578 we learn as follows:—
“The said honor consisteth in the liberties and territories of Cockermouth and Darwent Fells, with the signory called the Five Towns on the south of the river Darwent, and of the signory of Allerdale on the north part of the river Darwent, within the several meers and bounds hereafter mentioned. Within the precincts of which said bounds and limits are situated the manors, towns, villages, and hamlets hereunder specified and declared, viz., Cockermouth, Setmurthor, Embleton, Wythop, Lorton, Thackthwaite, Brackin-thwaite, Lowswater, Mockerin, Buttermire, Thorn-thwaite, Brathwaite, Coledale, Rogerset, Borrowdale, Alt. Borrowdale; and also the manors, towns, or hamlets of Brigham, Dean, Ullock, Branthwaite, Deanscales, Pardshow, Woodhall, Crakplace, Graysouthen, Clifton, Stainburne, Eglesfield, Blindbothel, and Whinfell. And also within the limits of the aforesaid boundrie and limits: The said earl and all other his ancestors (whose estate he now hath) have had, holden, and peaceably used and enjoyed the liberties, privileges, and franchises, and freedoms hereunder mentioned and expressed, without any interruption, molestation, let, or impediment, as by a certain record taken by inquisition at Carlisle, the Thursday next after the feast of St. Hilary, in the year of the reign of King Richard II., the 17th (1394) before William, then Lord Daker, and other commissioners, which said record is enrolled in the High Court of Chancery, as by the same appeareth agreeing with these words following, viz.:—To have within the aforesaid limits one coroner by the nomination and constitution of the lord of the said castle, honor, lordship, and manors aforesaid, the same coroner to do and execute all things and whatever to the said office of a coroner belonging within the liberties aforesaid, in as large and ample a manner and form, in all and everything, as any coroner or coronery within the body of the shire heretofore have done or may do; and also to do and execute all and whatsoever to the said office belongeth for and concerning all attachments of the crown; and likewise of all felonies, burgallaries, thefts, murders, manslaughters, robberies, and of all other felonies whatsoever; as well as the suit of our sovereign lady the Queen's majestie, her heirs and successors, as also the partie and parties greved. And also have had and ought to have the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of all persons drowning, strangling, or otherwise willingly and wilfully putting themselves to sudden death, and all other forfeitures and goods of felonnes, persons outlawed and put in exeget. And also they have had at Cockermouth Castle aforesaid one gaol for the security and safe keeping of prisoners and all profits and commodities of the said gaol belonging; together with the escapes of felonnes and other prisoners whosoever to the said gaol committed as prisoners, and all profits and commodities of the said escapes, in such manner and form as the said earl and his officers or ministers, and all and other his ancestors whose estate he now hath have been and shall be exonerated of all and singular the escapes towards our sovereign lady the Queen, her heirs and successors. And also to take knowledge of all pleas and actions in his court of Cockermouth aforesaid, to be holden from three weeks to three weeks, as well by and in nature of writts of right of our sovereign lady the Queen at the common law, as also by other actions there to be begun and commenced; and pleas de vetito namio in such manner and sort as the sheriff hath useth to do within the county, and also the return of all writts and execution of the same, and also to levie and gather the debts of our sovereign lady the Queen, her heirs and successors. And also the lords of the said honor of Cockermouth have and still hath the privilege and royalty of keeping within the said town, courts baron, courts leet, three week courts; and also have and enjoyed the perquisites of the same courts to their own uses without interruption. There is within the said town of Cockermouth a market every week kept upon the Monday, and two horse fairs in the year—the one upon Whitsun-Monday, the other upon the feast of St. Michael the Archangel. There is also a castle in Cockermouth, situate between the waters of Darwent and Coker (or Coke), with a trench or dry ditch about the same, with two barns and other buildings, and also a parcel of land called the Green, without the castle gates, containing by estimation about two acres, which is of small value, for that the castle and other buildings are situate upon the same. The said castle is now in great decay, as well in the stone work as timber work thereof; the said castle is covered with lead, and worth by estimation —. There is also at Cockermouth a parke called Cockermouth Parke, fenced about in some places with a stone wall, and in some places with a hedge and a ditch, and in other some places with the river of Darwent. The said parke is in compass by estimation three miles, and containeth by estimation, of statute measure, 340 acres, whereof there is of plain or pasture ground 200 acres, and of wood ground 140 acres. There is about the castle certain demesne lands rendering £6 10s. per annum." This is followed by a list of the freeholders or burgagers, and the land and tenements they held, and concludes with the following entries:—"All the burgesses of the said town of Cockermouth pay yearly to the lord for their freedom and liberties upon the commons and moors of Cockermouth, at the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin, as in old rentals and records it appeareth, 1lb. of wax, or 4s. Philip Lord Wharton holdeth the herbage of the park of Cockermouth aforesaid, and the milnes and tolls of Cockermouth, and the fishing of the water of Darwent, parcel of the possessions of the said honour of Cockermouth, granted by Henry, late earl of Northumberland, and uncle to the earl that now is, unto one Thomas Wharton, then controller of his household, to have and to hold to him and his heirs males of his body lawfully begotten, paying for the said herbage, £13 6s. 8d.; for the milnes and tolls aforesaid, £18 15s. 6d.; and for the said fishing in Darwent, £7 6s. 8d.; in toto, per annum, £34 8s. 10d. The sum total of the free rents and burgage rents amounted to £37 5s. 8d., besides 4s. 7d., the value of wax, &c." We also find from the same inquisition "that the burgages, or freeholders, within the said town of Cockermouth have been accustomed to pay to the lords of the said honour or manor, at their several deaths, every of them one whole year's rent for and in name of a release; and that as well the said freeholders as also the tenants at will have been and are accustomed to be put on juries and charged for the tryal of all accions betwixt partie and partie pleaded in the courts there."

Elizabeth, sole heiress of Josceline, the last earl of Northumberland, brought Cockermouth and other large estates to Charles Seymour, duke of Somerset. Lady Catherine, second daughter and co-heiress of the duke, married Sir William Wyndham, whose son, Sir Charles, was, in 1749, created Earl of Egremont, and was father of George O'Brien, earl of Egremont. From this nobleman the honour or barony of Cockermouth has descended to General Wyndham, the present possessor. The park, which was long ago disparted, and sold to Sir Thomas Wharton, has since been re-united to the honour. General Wyndham is the largest landowner in the township, but Jeremiah Spencer, Esq., and others have estates here. General Wyndham has several manors of customary tenure in this district, which are governed by a number of commissioners, who preside at the Court of Dimissions, held in the castle of Cockermouth, when the estates are passed according to their ancient tenure, "by deed, surrender, and admittance." All the liberties of the baronies of Wigton and Egremont; of the honour of Cockermouth; of "the Five Towns with Eaglesfield above Cocker," viz., Brigham, Dean, Greysouthen, Clifton, with the hamlets of Little Clifton, and Stainburn; and the manors of Derwent Fells, Braithwaite, Coledale, Aspatria, Bolton, Wasdale, Eskdale, Mitterdale, Kenny-side, and Westward, are amenable to this court. Besides the court of audit, a court leet for this honour is held in the Court House, in Cockermouth, at Christmas and Easter, by the agent of General Wyndham. The town of Cockermouth, the Five Towns with Eaglesfield, and the manor of Derwent Fells, are amenable to this court, for each of which three liberties separate juries are charged. A Court Baron for the recovery of debts under 40s. is held in the Court House every three weeks.

Cockermouth Castle, the ancient baronial seat of the lords of Allerdale, stands on a bold eminence near the confluence of the rivers Derwent and Cocker. It is supposed to have been erected soon after the Conquest, but no part of the existing structure exhibits the architecture prevalent at that period, though it is very probable that it occupies the site of an older fortress. The present building is entirely Edwardian in its character, and may be safely assigned to the latter end of the thirteenth, or beginning of the fourteenth century. Cockermouth Castle is stated, upon the authority of Hardyng's Chronicle, to have been yielded to Henry IV. Part of it appears to have been kept in repair till the period of the civil wars, at which time, we are informed by Whitaker and Rushworth, it was held by Lieutenant Bird, as governor for the parliament, who was besieged for some weeks by a party of Cumberland Royalists, but was, however, relieved by Colonel Ashton, who was sent out of Lancashire by Cromwell for that purpose. From the register of burials for the chapelry, we learn that "the siege was laid against Cockermouth Castle August, 1648, and the castle was relieved the 29th of September, in which time were slain of the besiegers George Buck, &c., &c." It is probable that the castle, if not dismantled, was suffered to go to decay after the civil war, since which period it has lain in ruins, with the exception of the gate-house, the court house, and some adjoining rooms, which are fitted up as the residence of General Wyndham. This fine specimen of the military architecture of the middle ages, forms an irregular square, enclosed by strong walls, 600 yards in compass, and was formerly defended at the entrance by a portcullis, drawbridge, and moat. It consists of two courts, the first a very small one. The Gateway Tower, embellished with the arms of the Umfravilles, Multons, Lucies, Percies, and Nevilles, is a striking object. On each side of the gateway leading to the interior and more ancient court is a deep vaulted dungeon, capable of holding from forty to fifty persons. The south-west front, of which much still remains, stood on the brink of the precipice above the rivers, where appear to have been the state-rooms and other apartments in the great tower. Under this tower is a vault thirty feet square, lighted by a small grated window, and approached by a descent of twelve steps, the roof upheld by a single octagonal pillar, which branches out into ribs supporting the groining.

THE TOWN OF COCKERMOUTH.

The ancient borough and market-town of Cockermouth occupies a beautiful and advantageous situation in the heart of a most picturesque and highly cultivated country, on the south side of the river Derwent, and at the mouth of the Cocker, whence its name is derived, eight miles east of Workington, seven miles south-east of Maryport, fourteen miles north-east of Whitehaven, twenty-seven south-west-by-west of Carlisle, and about 305 miles north-west of London, in 54° 40' north latitude, and 3° 20' west longitude. The river Cocker runs through the town, and on its eastern side are situated the market-place, castle, and church. The bridge over this stream consists of one arch, 160 feet in length, erected, in 1828, at a cost of £2,600. The two principal streets are spacious. The Derwent, after receiving the waters of the Cocker, is crossed by a handsome bridge of two arches, erected in 1822, at a cost of £3,000. A large number of antique remains have been found in this town and neighbourhood. On the north side of the town is a tumulus called Toot's Hill; and one mile to the west are the remains of a rampart and ditch of an encampment, 750 feet in circuit, called Fitz-Wood. On the summit of a hill at Papcastle, a village one mile and a half south-west of Cockermouth, there were until lately the traces of a Roman castrum, which in the early Norman times served as a residence to Waltheof, the first lord of Allerdale, by whom it was demolished, and the materials used in the construction of Cockermouth Castle.

The early history of Cockermouth is interwoven with, and inseparable from, the great families who possessed its castle, and exercised the lordship of the honour, and must be sought for and studied in connexion with them. The town itself does not appear to have made any figure in the history of bygone ages previous to the time of Elizabeth, when a new interest became attached to it from its being one of the places in which the hapless Mary Queen of Scots staid during the early days of her sojourn in this country; and as Miss Agnes Strickland has described in her own graphic style all that is known of Mary's sojourn in this ancient town, we cannot do better than give in extenso the account furnished by that gifted authoress. Having described the Queen's arrival at Workington, and given the letter which Mary wrote, from Workington, to Elizabeth, Miss Strickland continues:—

"Lord Herries's letter to Sir Richard Lowther having prepared the authorities on the English border for such an event (Mary's landing), every one was on the alert. The news of Queen Mary's arrival at Workington spread with inconceivable rapidity, and the Earl of Northumberland, who claimed the pre-eminence in that district, under colour of showing her a mark of respect, sent a band of gentlemen to wait upon her as a guard of honour, with strict orders to prevent her from leaving the country till Queen Elizabeth's pleasure concerning her should be ascertained. He communicated her arrival at the same time to the council at York. The result was a warrant from that body, addressed in the name of the sovereign to the high sheriff, magistrates, and gentlemen of Cumberland, 'to use the Scottish queen and her company honourably, but to see that not one of them escaped.'

"Thus it is apparent that the Earl of Northumberland, who subsequently lost his head for engaging in the northern rebellion, which was excited for the liberation of the Scottish queen, was the first person who constituted her a prisoner, under the pretext of doing her honour. After the arrival of the gentlemen deputed by him to keep guard over her, it was out of her power to embark for France, which, with the friendly assistance of Sir Henry Curwen, she might previously have done. Under these circumstances, it is plain she did not exercise free will in her advance to Cockermouth, which, with its strong and stately castle on the confluence of the Cocker and the Derwent, its park, forest, and manor, were the demesnes of the Earl of Northumberland.

"Attended by her kind English host Sir Henry Curwen, his son, and most of the gentlemen in that neighbourhood, Queen Mary left Workington Hall on the morning of the 17th of May, with her devoted little train of Scottish nobles and ladies. The journey, a pleasant distance of six miles, was performed on horseback. It lay through a green picturesque country, enamelled with spring flowers, and intersected by the devious course of the beautiful river Derwent. The first bold range of English mountains, Skiddaw 'and her cubs,' rose in the foreground; while the mighty forms of Sreel and Criffel stood like hostile giants across the Firth of Solway. What would have been Mary's feelings when she saw their broad blue outlines mingle with the misty clouds on the verge of the horizon, could she have known that her tearful eyes had looked their last on Scotland, and that in England, the land of promise which lay so bright before her in its May livery, nothing awaited her—the representative of the elder line of Alfred, and presumptive heiress of the nation—but a succession of gloomy prisons and a bloody grave? The dark page of the future was in mercy hidden from her sight, and for the present she had met with a frank and courteous reception from Sir Henry Curwen, his family, and the stout Cumberland knights and squires his neighbours, who mustered strongly round her, apparently to do her honour. She entered Cockermouth, if not with royal pomp, in very pleasant fashion, for man, woman, and child came forth in their holiday attire to meet and welcome her. The Earl of Northumberland was absent from the castle, being then at his house at Topcliffe; so Mary and her Scottish train were lodged at Cockermouth Hall, the mansion of the wealthy merchant, Master Henry Fletcher, at that time sufficiently spacious and well-appointed to have accommodated a queen in more prosperous circumstances than those under which the unfortunate sovereign of Scotland entered it. A dilapidated portion of the once stately quadrangular elevation of Cockermouth Hall is still in existence, but reduced to the lowest degree of degradation, being divided into three tenements, which are used as a carpenter's shop, a beerhouse, and a mechanics' lodging-house. Even by the humble occupants of the lodging-house, three large apartments on the first floor, leading one through the other, are called 'Queen Mary's Rooms.'¹ They are built after the French fashion, and probably served as ante-room, presence-chamber, and bed-chamber for the distinguished guest. In the absence of documentary records, it becomes the duty of her biographer to trace the local traditions that, after the lapse of centuries, linger on spots connected with this romantic portion of Mary's history. The oral chroniclers of Cockermouth declare that their princely merchant, Henry Fletcher, observing the deplorable condition of his royal guest's habiliments, presented her with thirteen ells of rich crimson velvet to make her a new robe; and this pleasing story is verified by the fact that Mary wrote a letter to her kind host, thanking him for having sent her a velvet robe, and gratefully acknowledging all his courtesies to her. Nor were these forgotten by her more fortunate son James I., who, when Thomas Fletcher, the only son and representative of Henry Fletcher, came to meet him at Carlisle on his accession to the throne of England, treated him with great distinction, and offered to bestow the honour of knighthood on him, as a token of grateful acknowledgment for his late father's kindness to his royal mother.¹

¹ On entering the last, the good woman of the house said to me, "This was Queen Mary's bed-chamber, but she did not sleep here, for the poor lady was in fear of her life, and passed the night in this closet," opening, as she spoke, the doors of an arched recess, which had been partially built up, but was neither more nor less than the remains of the alcove where the bed formerly stood, a fashion of which my humble informant could scarcely have been aware, and is therefore confirmatory of the local tradition, as identifying the precise spot where the hapless Mary rested her weary head the night she passed at Cockermouth.

"The next morning, May 18th, Mary held a little court in her presence-chamber at Cockermouth Hall, for the reception of the ladies of that district, with Lady Scroope, the Duke of Norfolk's sister, at their head, they having been hastily summoned from their castles and halls by circular letters, in the queen's their sovereign's name, sent by post-haste expresses, to come in their best array to wait upon the Queen of Scotland, and pay her all proper respect by attending her on her journey to Carlisle.²

"Brief warning had there been for the ladies of that district to equip themselves and ride to Cockermouth for presentation to the illustrious refugee, whom they were required to meet and attend on her way to Carlisle; but it was happily accomplished, and all knotty points of precedence amicably arranged, in time for them to bring her on to her appointed resting-place that day. Surely the details of that memorable gathering of the female aristocracy of the border, to pay their devoir to the Queen of Scots, the manner of reception she gave them, and the order of their cavalcade to merry Carlisle, must exist in the family archives of the Percies, the Scroopes, the Dacres, or the Howards, and may one day be discovered, and add a rich page in some future edition of these personal annals of the princess through whom her present Majesty derives her title to reign over Great Britain. There had not been time to convert the considerate presence of the munificent English merchant of Cockermouth Hall into the regal robe for which it was designed; and though some useful articles had been contributed by the widowed mother of Sir Henry Curwen and his lady, the deficiencies and incongruities of a toilette thus made up must have been no trifling mortification to a royal beauty so attentive to all the elegant proprieties of dress as Mary Stuart, and who had been not only the Queen of France, but the glass of fashion in that polished court, which then, as now, gave laws to Western Europe in all matters of costume.

"Mary had, however, every reason to feel cheered and delighted with her first reception in the realm she expected one day to call her own, but not only was she affectionately and respectfully welcomed by the ladies of the hospitable northern counties of England with demonstrations of sympathy and deference, but all sorts and conditions of people flocked to meet and follow in in the procession which conducted her to Carlisle; so that her journey thither, malgré the presence of Captain Read and fifty soldiers under his command, commissioned to prevent her escape or rescue, resembled a triumphant progress. Nor was this wonderful. 'Beauteous, and royal, and distressed,' she appeared under circumstances of no common interest. Not yet six-and-twenty, she had experienced trials and vicissitudes of the most painful nature; but, unconquered by the inexorable destiny which appeared to pursue all of her race and name, she had borne up under her troubles with a courage, both physical and moral, that excited no common admiration. Many a manly English heart had thrilled at the report of all she had suffered during her incarceration in the grim fortress of Lochleven, and rejoiced in the marvellous tale of her deliverance by the founding boy Willie Douglas, whose arm God had strengthened for the achievement of an enterprise which the stoutest champion in Christendom might have been proud to have performed. That brave stripling rode near his royal mistress in the faithful little train who had assisted in carrying her off from the fatal field of Langside, and attended her on her adventurous voyage to England. Mary Stuart was the very beau-ideal of a distressed Queen. 'No man,' says Brantôme, 'ever saw her without love, or will read her history without pity;' a sentiment that held good with regard to the high-minded and generous portion of mankind, those, in a word, whom sordid and selfish interests had not hardened, nor fanaticism inflamed against her. The impression made by her personal graces and winning manners in the north of England was never forgotten. The lapse of nearly three centuries, indeed, has not cooled the enthusiasm with which her memory is still regarded by the descendants of those who saw and judged of her according to the witness of their own senses, and not from the political libels of her foes.

² State paper, revised by Secretary Cecil—in Anderson's Collections, vol. iv. Sir Richard Lowther had, on the first note of the arrival of the royal stranger, summoned the gentlemen by beacon, according to the ancient border custom of telegraphing. He afterwards complained that they were negligent in attending to his signals. Yet it is certain a very numerous and splendid company was assembled in an incredibly short time at Cockermouth, two days, indeed before it was possible for Queen Elizabeth to have signified her pleasure on the occasion, for she did not receive Mary's letter till the 20th; so that what was done in her name on this occasion was without her orders.

"On the road between Cockermouth and Carlisle, Queen Mary and her cavalcade were encountered by Villeroi de Beaumont, the French ambassador, from whom she had parted scarcely a week before at Hamilton under circumstances far different. She was then full of hope, at the head of a numerous party, in hourly expectation of the arrival of the gay Gordons and gallant Ogilvies to swell her forces to such numbers as might once more have enabled her to drive her perfidious brother Moray and his faction over the border. Yet she had been willing to settle the quarrel amicably, and had employed Beaumont to negotiate with the usurpers of her rights. His efforts having proved unavailing, he had, on the unexpected ruin of her cause, signified his intention of returning to France through England, but had been beset and plundered by the Regent's partisans, and his servants maltreated, before they could cross the border. The only tidings he could give Mary were of the most dispiriting nature. He accompanied her to Carlisle."

Such is the account furnished by Miss Strickland of Mary's residence in Cockermouth. From the time of the departure of the Scottish queen, history is silent respecting this ancient town, till the time of her unfortunate descendant, Charles I., when, as we have seen above, the castle was seized by the Parliamentarians, who resisted all the efforts of the Cumberland Royalists to dislodge them. This appears to have been the last military transaction which occurred in the town, and there is nothing since recorded save the advance of Cockermouth in peaceful industry and commerce. Among the manufactures of the place that of cotton claims the first place, whether we consider the amount of capital engaged in that branch of trade, or the number of people depending upon it for their support. The Messrs. Harris have a large mill in the township of Papcastle, which affords employment to 800 persons. The woollen trade is carried on in two establishments, Croft Mills and Fitz Mills, which together employ about 100 hands. The Messrs. Banks pursue the linen manufacture at Simon Seales, about a mile and a half from the town. An extensive establishment for the manufacture of bats was spiritedly carried on for years by the late Mr. T. Wilson till his demise, when his son succeeded him. Besides these establishments there are four tanneries, two skinneries, and a brewery; and in the neighbourhood are extensive coal mines. A market is held on Monday for corn and cattle, and on Saturdays for provisions. From May to midsummer cattle shows are held every alternate Wednesday. Fairs for horses and cattle are held on February 18th and October 10th; and for hiring servants on Whit Monday and the Monday next after Martinmas Day. A railway eight miles in length connects Cockermouth with Workington, whence other railways extend north to Carlisle, and south to Furness and Lancaster; the station is to the west of the town. Cockermouth is well supplied with water, and lighted with gas. Gas works were established in 1834, at a cost of £3,000, raised by seventy-five shareholders, in £5 shares. In consequence of the increased demand for gas, it was found necessary, in 1856, to enlarge the works, and an additional sum of £3,000 was subscribed by the shareholders, in the same proportion as before. The works now comprise two gasholders, capable of containing 30,000 cubic feet of gas. While attending to the requirements of the living, the decent interment of the dead has not been neglected, a new cemetery being opened in June, 1856, about a quarter of a mile south-east of the town, and consecrated by the Bishop of Carlisle on the 12th of the following September. It contains upwards of five acres, and possesses two neat chapels, in the Early English style. The total cost was about £2,800. A high opinion may be formed of the salubrity of the town by the fact that in the year 1857 there were buried in the cemetery, in consecrated ground, eighteen individuals, whose united ages amounted to 1,486, two of them attaining the advanced age of 92 years. There were sixteen others died during the same period, whose united ages amounted to 1,052 years.

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a beautiful and noble structure, situated on an eminence at the head of Kirkgate. The foundation stone was laid by Archdeacon Hedlam, on the 28th of February, 1852, and the consecration took place on the 15th of June, 1854. It is a cruciform structure in the Early English style, comprising nave and aisles, transepts, chancel, north and south porches, and central tower, surmounted by a spire. Its dimensions are as follow:—Length of nave, seventy feet; width of transepts, twenty-two feet; length of chancel, thirty; total length, 122 feet. The height of the roof of the nave is sixty feet; of the tower, ninety feet; of the spire, from its base to the top of the tower, ninety feet; making a total height of the spire from the ground, inclusive of the cross, of 180 feet. Nearly all the foundations of the old church remain undisturbed, thereby binding and strengthening the foundations of the present edifice. The walls are of solid rubble masonry, faced with hammer-dressed stones. The nave consists of four bays of elegant pointed arches, the pillars of which have foliated capitals, beautifully sculptured. The aisles, transepts, and nave are paved with Staffordshire tiles, in diamond and other patterns; the chancel with Minto's encaustic pavement. The church is neatly furnished. The seats, which are all open, are of red pine, stained and varnished, and are constructed in square-panelled framing, with framed and panelled ends. The seats in the chancel are more ornamental than those in the body of the church, having solid ends and carved poppyheads, with tracery fronts. The reading-desk is on the south side, and is ascended by a wooden staircase; the seat is in a recess, constructed in the solid masonry of the pier behind; the head of this recess is arched, and the border all round deeply grooved and enriched with sculptured flowers. The pulpit, which is fixed against the north-west pier of the tower, is of Caen stone; it is octangular in shape, and is ascended by a stone staircase, with a fine circular brass handrail. The font is also of Caen stone, and is massive, chaste, and appropriate. It was presented to the church by P. S. Coxe, Esq., formerly of Cocker-mouth. The beauty of the interior is much enhanced by three handsome screens, one of which is under the arch from the chancel to the south transept aisle; another under the opposite arch, having a doorway for an entrance from the vestry; and the third under the arch of the north transept aisle. The principal trusses of the roof of the nave are supported by finely carved corbels, which are much and deservedly admired. The groined ceiling of the tower is also a striking feature in the church, and is a very scientific, elegant, and well-executed piece of work. The east window is fitted with stained glass, through which the light streams in beautifully softened rays, giving to the church that solemnity so appropriate and so much admired by every well-educated mind. The Wordsworth memorial window in this church was erected by subscription, and is a fine specimen of modern art. It consists of five lights, with tracery in the upper portion. The centre light contains a representation of our Lord, seated in majesty; beneath, a canopy, on which are figures of

Adam, Eve, and St. John the Baptist, surmounted by a half-length figure of King David, which occupies the upper portion of the light. The figure of our Lord is surrounded with cherubim, in the act of adoration; and beneath the Saviour, in the lower part of the light, is a group of the apostles, with the insignia of martyrdom, the three in the front of the group being Peter, James, and John. In the two lateral lights, on the left of the centre, are the four greater prophets, with symbols and scrolls, while the side lights on the right of the centre contain representations of the four evangelists. In the various canopies are smaller figures of the remainder of the patriarchs and prophets. The tracery consists of trefoils and sexfoils, filled with figures representing Abraham, Moses, Noah, St. Mary Magdalene, St. George, St. Alban, St. Stephen, St. Thomas, and St. Catherine. The tower contains a clock, chimes, and a peal of eight bells. The architect of the church was J. Clarke, Esq., of London. The total cost of the building amounted to £7,143 12s. 7d., inclusive of organ £300, bells £600, clock and chimes £240. There is a very beautiful monumental tablet, to the memory of the late Thomas Wilson, a liberal contributor to the funds for the erection of church. In the churchyard is a tombstone, bearing the following inscription:—"Rev. Joseph Gillbanks erected a gravestone in memory of his three faithful and affectionate wives—first, Elizabeth, aged 27 years, died August 9th, 1783; second, Jane, aged 42, died October 24th, 1791; third, Mary, aged 38, died May 8th, 1794. This stone is inscribed by the above Joseph Gillbanks, twenty years minister of this church, in the firm hope of an eternal and happy re-union with these ever-beloved objects of his affection."

The benefice is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale, who is also the impropiator. It was returned to the governors of Queen Anne's bounty, in the early part of the last century, as being worth £26 18s. 4d., paid by the Earl of Lonsdale, and £8 surplice fees; and was certified to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as of the average value of £132 per annum. The curacy was augmented in 1798, with £200, given by a Mr. Baines; and in 1811 it received a parliamentary grant of £1,000. The registers of the chapelry commence in 1632. There was formerly a chantry in the chapel of Cocker-mouth, founded in the 18th Richard II., by Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, who probably endowed it with lands in Cocker-mouth, for in the 20th Elizabeth there is a grant from the crown, to Percival Gupson, of two acres of land in Cocker-mouth, late in the tenure of Alan Ribton; two acres, late in the tenure of William Thompson; and two acres, late in the tenure of Michael Bouch; parcel of the possessions of the late collegiate church of Staindrop, in the county of Durham.

INCUMBENTS.—Robert Rickardley, previous to the civil wars; George Larkham, during the Commonwealth; Robert Rickardley again; Thomas Jefferson, 1699; from 1771 to 1778 it was served by the churchwardens; Joseph Gillbank, 1778; John Wheatley, 1795; Edward Fawcett, 1801.

The parsonage was erected in 1814, at a cost of £1,300, of which £900 was granted from Queen Anne's Bounty, and £400 by the Earl of Lonsdale. When the commons were enclosed, in 1813, an acre of land was set aside for the parsonage, to which four acres were added by the parishioners, in 1815.

CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.

The Catholic church, dedicated to St. Joseph, is a neat edifice, in the Gothic style, erected in 1850, from designs furnished by Thomas Gibson, Esq., of Newcastle, upon a suitable site at the west end of the town. It will accommodate about 500 persons, and cost, inclusive of the priest's house, £1,400. The Bishop of Hexham was the chief benefactor, and to him the Catholics of Cockermouth are much indebted for their present suitable place of worship. Previous to the erection of the church, the congregation worshipped, for many years, in a room over a stable in the Sun Inn Yard, to which place the Prince de Joinville, and other members of the exiled family of Orleans, repaired to hear mass, during their sojourn at Keswick in 1856.

The Primitive Methodist chapel is situated in Sand Lane, and formerly belonged to the Wesleyan body, from whom it was purchased by its present possessors on the erection of the Wesleyan chapel.

The Wesleyan chapel, a good substantial stone building, in Market-street, was erected in 1841, at a cost of £1,800. It contains 850 sittings, 250 of which are free.

The Congregational chapel is a handsome Gothic edifice, erected in the year 1850, at a cost of £2,200, and contains sittings for 500 persons. Behind the present place of worship is the old chapel, previously occupied by this congregation; it was erected in 1735, and is now used as a Sunday school, in which 340 children are taught. The Independents, or Congregationalists, were formed into a church in this town as early as the year 1651, from which time their records are preserved. Their first pastor, the Rev. George Larkham, who was a man of superior literary attainments, and a conscientious Nonconformist, suffered imprisonment for three years in York Castle, for his adherence to Puritan principles. The history of this religious body was chiefly written by Mr. Larkham, during his prolonged pastorate, and contains many curious and interesting entries of the sufferings of both pastor and people during the operation of the "Five Mile" and "Conventicle" acts. The following passage is extracted to show the opinion of a contemporary, and a country pastor, on the character of Cromwell:—"On this day died that eminent servant of God, and nursing father of the churches, Oliver Cromwell, lord protector of Great Britain and Ireland." The number of communicants during Mr. Larkham's ministry seems to have averaged 215, many of whom resided at a considerable distance from Cockermouth. Mr. Larkham died on the 26th of December, 1700, after being minister of this religious body for 49 years.

MINISTERS.—George Larkham, 1651; J. Atkinson, 1701; — Walker, 1733; W. Aspinwall, B.A., of Magdalen College, Cambridge, (ejected from the rectory of Mattersey, Notts), 1734; T. Jollie, 1737; T. Lewthion, 1764; Henry Townsend, 1763; Mr. Trail, 1793; Mr. Williams, 1793; Robert Swan, 1797; James Muscut, 1810; Jonathan Edwards, 1810; Edward Gately, 1821; Joseph Mather, 1825; Andrew Fielder Shawyer, 1835; Robert Wilson, 1843; Portus Howart Davidson, 1848; Patrick Morrison, 1856; William Southwick, 1858.

SCHOOLS, &c.

The Grammar School for the townships of Cockermouth and Embleton is situated near the church. It appears to have been founded in 1676. There is the following inscription over the door:—

SCHOOL: HENRY'S FUND: FACT: FURBURN NEW, DIE
MENNIS MAIL AN DON:
B. R. C. L. XVII.

And on a stone in the school-room are inscribed these lines:—

Harades pulchras cum postera videret ætas
Et Lowry et Tubman sit grata utrique Ricardo
Ultima cujus habet subscripta linea nomen,
Hujus erat primus Gymnasiarcha Scholæ, Gavens Nobis, 1676.

The following account of the school is given in Nicolson and Burn's History of Westmoreland and Cumberland:—"Here is a free school, which, in 1717, was certified at £26 15s. a year, viz. £10 paid by Mr. Fletcher Vane, then proprietor of the church; £5 by Mrs. Fletcher, of Tallantire; £5 by the Duke of Somerset, £5 rents of houses in the town, 35s. interest of money. The school was founded by Philip Lord Wharton, Sir George Fletcher, Sir Richard Grahame, Doctor Smith, dean, afterwards Bishop of Carlisle, and other contributors." In the reports of the Charity Commissioners the endowments of this school are set at £24 3s. 1d. per annum, of which £10 are paid out of the tithes of the chapelry, and the remainder arises from rents of houses in Cockermouth, dividends on stock, and a payment of 6s. 8d. from Embleton. It is considered that with respect to classical instruction, all the children of Cockermouth are free, and those of Embleton, on the payment of a small fee. All, however, pay a small quarterage.

The National School, situate in New-street, was erected in 1845, mainly through the exertions of the Rev. Charles C. Southey, son of the poet. It is a good substantial stone structure, capable of accommodating about 220 pupils, the average number in attendance being 180. It is supported by subscription, is under government inspection, and is conducted by a master, an assistant master, and two pupil teachers. In 1847, the late George L. Bragg, Esq., of Lorton Hall, left £100 to this school.

In the same street there is an infant school, which is also under government inspection, and attended by upwards of 100 children. It is conducted by a mistress and two pupil teachers.

The Catholics opened a school in 1858, which is now attended by about seventy children.

CHARITIES.

Poor Stock.—Barbara Relfe, in 1735, left £50 for the benefit of the poor of Cockermouth. Sir Thomas Pangelly, in 1737, left £50, and Mary Winder, in 1789, left £100 for the same purpose. Besides these, Hugh Potter, in 1669, left £52; an unknown person, in 1669, £50; Sir Orlando Gee, in 1691, £50; Thomas Little-dale, in 1720, £50; John Mounsey, in 1766, £100. In addition to these there are some small legacies. The whole amount of the above-named benefactions is £527. Speaking of these bequests, the Charity Commissioners say:—"Whether any of these donations were distributed at the time they were given, or whether any part of them has been lost, is not known. It appears, however, that in 1784 the whole of the stock then belonging to the poor was £427 12s. 7d.; that sum was then laid out, with other charity money, in the funds, and now forms part of a sum of £1,335 6s. 11½d. stock, three per cent. consols. Out of the dividends of that stock, £17 is annually distributed on St. Thomas's Day, in respect of the poor stock, by the chapelwardens and overseers, amongst poor persons of the township of Cockermouth."

Glaister's Charity.—Joseph Glaister, by will dated 22nd of January, 1773, left 50s. yearly, to be distributed among poor housekeepers of the town of Cockermouth by the minister and churchwardens. By a codicil to his will the testator directed that no less a sum than 5s. should be given to each housekeeper. And he further directed that a Maryport harbour ticket for £200 should be appropriated as a security for the payment above mentioned. The sum of 50s., on account of this charity, is distributed amongst poor persons, together with the dividends arising from the poor stock belonging to this township, every year, about Christmas.

Bread Money.—Barbara Relfe, in 1735, in addition to what she left to be distributed to the poor, bequeathed also £50, the interest thereof to be distributed in bread, every Sunday, to the poor widows frequenting the chapel of Cockermouth; and Richard Baynes, by will dated October, 1771, left £100, the interest thereof to be distributed in penny loaves of bread every Sunday, to poor persons, not receiving alms, who should attend chapel. There are also mentioned in the table of benefactions two other legacies for supplying bread to the poor—£30 left by Elizabeth Todd, and £20 left by Mary English. The two legacies last mentioned appear to have been entirely lost, previous to 1784. At that time £150 was, with other money, laid out in the purchase of stock, which now forms part of the sum of £1,335 6s. 11½d. three per cent. consols before mentioned. Out of that stock, £10 5s. is expended annually in bread, of which 4s. worth is given away every Sunday, amongst poor widows of the township who attend divine service.

Widows' Hospital.—The Rev. Thomas Leathes, by will dated 8th of April, 1760, left £100 for the use of six poor widows, or other unmarried poor women above sixty years of age, that should live in a house in Kirk-gate, which he gave for their residence, the interest of the said £100 to be divided equally amongst the said six women by the minister and churchwardens. Elizabeth Winder, daughter of the said Thomas Leathes, by will dated 4th December, 1775, gave £50, secured on the tolls of the Carlisle and Workington road, the interest of which was to be applied, in the first place, towards the repairing of the premises in Kirkgate, given by her father, and the residue thereof to be distributed amongst the poor widows, share and share alike, with the assistance of the vicar or officiating clergyman of Isell. The sum of £100, left by the Rev. Thos. Leathes, was laid out in the funds, with other money, in the purchase of £1,335 6s. 11½d. three per cent. consols. Six poor women are always appointed under this charity, but the house in Kirkgate, which consists only of three rooms, is not sufficient to accommodate more than three persons, the others are therefore obliged to reside elsewhere. Out of the dividends of the stock £5 4s. is paid to the six women, in equal proportions, as from Thomas Leathes's legacy; £2 10s. is received annually as the interest upon the turnpike toll ticket, left by Elizabeth Winder, the residue of which, after the payment of such expenses as may be incurred in the repairs of the alms-house, is divided amongst the said poor women. A small allotment of very poor land was made to this hospital a few years ago, on the inclosure of a common in this parish.

Ritson's Charity.—Mrs. Deborah Ritson, who died about the year 1800, left £100, the interest of which was to be divided annually, about the month of January, amongst poor widows, resident in or near Cockermouth, as should not receive parochial relief, in sums not smaller than 2s. 6d. each. The sum of £94 only was received, the residue having been deducted for legacy duty, and for expenses; that sum was laid out in the purchase of stock, and forms part of the £1,335 6s. 11½d. three per cent. consols before mentioned. Out of the dividends thereof, £4 2s. 6d. is regularly given away, in respect of this charity, to thirty-three poor widows of Cockermouth, in sums of 2s. 6d. each.

Dr. Bray's Library.—There is a library in Cockermouth, established by the associates of the late Dr. Bray, consisting of about 500 volumes. This library is under the management of trustees. Part of the school building is appropriated and fitted up for this purpose.

Lord Wharton's Charity.—The minister of Cockermouth receives annually, from the trustees of Lord Wharton's Charity, thirty Bibles, and a proportionate number of Expositions of the Catechism, and reward books, and he distributes them according to the directions of the donor, amongst poor persons at Cockermouth.

Miss Leathes' Charity.—Miss Elizabeth Leathes, of Workington, repaired the alms-houses, and in 1851, left £100, vested in the public funds, towards the maintenance of the six widows placed in the alms-houses.

GEN. HENSON'S INSTITUTION, &c.

The Mechanics' Institution, held in a building attached to the Savings Bank, given gratuitously by the trustees of the same for the time being, was established by subscription in 1845. It contains an excellent library, and a fine collection of birds presented to the institution by J. W. Harris, Esq. In 1858 it received a munificent bequest from General Benson, Hasnes, who left to it the whole of his valuable library, amounting to upwards of 1,000 volumes, and also a legacy of £100. The committee keep the books thus acquired separate and distinct from the general library, and have entered them in the catalogue as "General Benson's Bequest." The receipts during the year 1858, including a balance of £6 18s. 6d. in hand, at the commencement, amounted to the sum of £80 7s. 5d.; and after deducting the expenditure, £76 8s. 9d., a balance of £3 18s. 1d. remained to credit. The institute numbers upwards of 240 members, and has a library containing 2,300 volumes. The members pay a contribution of 5s. a year, with the exception of ladies and junior members, who pay 3s. There are classes for French, arithmetic, writing, &c.

There is a news-room in the Court-house Buildings, supported by subscribers of a guinea each per annum; and there is also a working men's reading-room, established in 1855.

The Savings Bank, established in 1818, is situated in a neat building near the Court House, erected in 1846. This institution has proved of great utility to the town and neighbourhood, and has been extensively used by the inhabitants. The number of depositors at present (1858), is 1,333, and the deposits amount to £44,305. The bank is opened every Saturday evening for the receipt and payment of deposits, &c., from six to seven o'clock.

The Dispensary, one of the most important charitable institutions in Cockermouth, was established in 1785, since which time it has administered medical and surgical aid to thousands of indigent patients.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION.

Cockermouth ranks among the oldest boroughs in the kingdom, and sent two members to parliament as early as the reign of Edward I. It was subsequently disfranchised, upon the petition of the inhabitants, who wished to avoid the expense attendant upon representation, the members of parliament being at that time paid for their services. In 1640, the franchise was restored by Charles I., and it has since continued to be possessed by the town. Previous to the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, the only persons qualified to vote for the election of members of parliament for this town were those who held their property by burgage tenure, about 300 in number, the bailiff being the returning officer, but for a long period before the passing of the act just named the representation of the borough was not contested, the Earl of Lonsdale, who owned most of the burgage tenements, appointing whom he thought proper. The number of electors is 355. The parliamentary borough of Cockermouth consists of Brigham and Eaglesfield, and the chapelry of Cockermouth in the parish of Brigham; the townships of Bridekirk and Papecastle, with a detached part of Dovenby township, in the parish of Bridekirk. Its population in 1851 was 7,275, of whom 3,425 were males and 3,850 females, inhabiting 1,506 houses; the number of uninhabited houses being 63, and there were 19 in course of erection. We subjoin a list of the members of

POWELLAN UNION.

The Cockermouth Union Workhouse, at the top of Lollart-street, was erected in 1840, and with subsequent additions and improvements has cost about £3,800. The average number of paupers is about 240—in the winter season about 290. The union is divided into four sub-districts as follow:—Keswick, containing Bewaldeth and Snittlegarth, Embleton, Wythop, Bassen-thwaite, Keswick, St. John Castlerigg and Wythburn, Under Skiddaw, Borrowdale, Newlands, Coledale or Portinscale, Braithwaite, Thornthwaite, and Greta Mills and Briery Cottages; Cockermouth, including Lorton, Brackenthwaite, Loweswater, Whinfell, Buttermere, Mosser, Brigham, Eaglesfield, Cockermouth, Blindboethel, Setmurthy, Isell Old Park, Sunderland, Blindcrake Isell and Redmaine, Bridekirk, Papcastle, Little Broughton, and Great Broughton; Workington, including Seatou, Cammertown, Ribton, Greysouthen, Little Clifton, Great Clifton, Stainburn, Workington, Winscales, Cioffocks, Dean, Ullock, and Branthwaite; Maryport, comprehending Dovenby, Tallantire, Gilerux, Plumbland, Bothel and Threepland, Oughterside and Allerby, Cross Canonby, Crosby, Birkby, Maryport, Dearham, Ellenborough and Ewanrigg, and Flimby. The union comprises an area of 156,025 acres. Its population in 1851 was 38,510, of whom 18,606 were males and 19,814 females. The number of inhabited houses at the same period was 7,999, of uninhabited 378, and 61 were building. We subjoin the receipts and expenditure of the union for the year ending Lady Day, 1858. The receipts were, from poor rates, £11,325 8s.; in aid of poor rates, £371 11s.; total, £11,896 19s. The expenditure was, for in-maintenance, £1,751 8s.; out-relief, £4,885 11s.; maintenance of lunatics in asylum, £549 19s.; workhouse loan repaid, and interest thereon, £167 14s.; salaries and rations of officers, £757 15s.; other expenses of or immediately connected with relief, £533 14s.; costs of proceedings in law or in equity, £21 11s.; county and police rate, £2,373; constables' expenses and costs of proceedings before justices, £67 19s.; payments on account of the registration act, £123 18s.; vaccination fees, £59 19s.; cost of parliamentary registration and grand jury lists, £41 9s.; survey and valuation expenses, £18 2s.; money expended for all other purposes, £777 7s.; total expenses, £12,159 6s.

Cockermouth has the honour of being the birthplace of the poet Wordsworth, and John Walker, M.D., "the great apostle and martyr in the cause of vaccination."

SETMURTHY.

In 1801 this township contained 164 inhabitants; in 1811, 140; in 1821, 188; in 1831, 182; in 1841, 181; and in 1851, 167. Its area is 2,579 statute acres, and its rateable value, £1,831 11s. 0½d. One penny in the pound of Setmurthy property produces £7 12s. 8½d. Agriculture is the only employment of the inhabitants, who live dispersedly in the township, which contains two gentlemen's seats, called Higham and Dunthwaite Hall, and sixteen farm-houses, not including the tenement at Wythop. Cockermouth is the market attended.

Setmurthy is parcel of the manor of the Five Towns, and as such its manorial rights and privileges are vested in General Wyndham.

The manor of Hewthwaite, or Huthwaite, in this township, gave name to its early possessors, and, having passed by marriage to the Swinburns, underwent the same alienations as a moiety of the manor of Brigham.¹ After the death of Mr. Singleton, in 1767, the manor was allotted to Judith, the wife of Thomas Bolton, and was by her and her husband conveyed to the father of John Sanderson Fisher, Esq., of Woodhall. It subsequently became the property of the late H. T. Thompson, Esq., of Bridekirk, who exchanged lands in Lorton for it, with the late George L. Bragg, Esq., of Lorton Hall, but is now held by Major A. Green Thompson.

The commons of the township were enclosed in 1821, by an act passed in 1813. The principal landowners are Thomas Alison Hoskins, Esq.; Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.; Sir H. R. Vane, Bart.; and Mr. Daniel Harrison.

THE CHAPEL.

The chapel, situated four and a half miles north-east from the church at Cockermouth, was rebuilt in 1794, at a cost of upwards of £107, subscribed by the inhabitants of the township. It is a small building, with a turret containing one bell, and will seat about 105 persons. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the inhabitants of the township, valued, at present, at £45 8s. 4d., viz., £20 from Queen Anne's Bounty, the remainder from land. The glebe belonging to Setmurthy is as follows: two fields at Skelton, near Penrith; two fields at Broughton Moor; one at Botchergate, Carlisle,—the whole amounting to about thirty acres. The governors of Queen Anne's Bounty have appropriated to Setmurthy £13 2s. 6d.; the interest of which, 8s. 4d., is paid half-yearly in April and October; the rents are payable at Candelmas and Lammas.¹ The register of the chapelry commences in 1759, for baptisms; for burials in 1836; and for marriages in 1838.

INCUMBENTS.—William Cookson, 1759; Henry Brown, 1760; Thomas Blund, 1764; William Sewell, 1769; Joseph Simpson, 1894; Charles C. Southey, 1842; William Earee, 1851.

CHARITY.

The School.—There is a free school in this township. On the enclosure of the commons, there were rather more than 56 acres of pasture land set out by the common consent of the proprietors of this township, under the award of the Enclosure Commissioners, as a source of stipend to the schoolmaster for the free education of all children in Setmurthy. The land at present (1858) lets for £43 15s. In addition to this income, there is a rent charge, or school stock, of £1 18s.,² arising from an annual charge upon all the estates in the township, which makes a total income of £45 13s. Of this sum, the master receives £40, the remainder is devoted to the improvement of the land. The master is bound to instruct all children of this township free, but has the privilege of receiving pupils from other places, for whom he may make his own charge. He is elected by the inhabitants, and may be dismissed on receiving two months' notice. The chapel warden for the time being is trustee.

There is a girl's school at Higham Lodge, partly supported by the Hoskins' family.

¹ "Before the augmentation of the living," says Hutchinson, "the reader of Divine Service had a precarious income; but an actual custom subsisted for several years, of allowing the poor minister a whittle gate. He was privileged to go from house to house in the chapelry, and stay a certain number of days at each place, where he was permitted to enter his whittle, or knife, with the rest of the people of the household, and to share the provisions prepared for the use of the family. This custom has been abolished in such modern times, that it is in the memory of many now [1794] living."

² This school stock arises from the surplus remaining after defraying the cost of the rebuilding of the chapel, which the subscribers agreed to invest in the land for the purpose above stated.

Hoskins of Higham.

This family is descended from

ALFRED DE HOSKINS, Esq., who was born at Moor Park, Hertfordshire, Aug. 1724, descended from the family of Hoskins, of Rogers Green, Oxford, Surrey, was first called out at Sir William Hoskins, Knight-baronet of Youghal, who escaped from the Irish massacre in 1641. Alexander Hoskins, Esq., called at Great Brimston, Cumberland, in 1745, and was the youngest son of the late Sir William Hoskins, of Higham. His youngest son, George Hoskins, Esq., married Mary Alison, of Liverpool, and left issue the present THOMAS ALISON HOSKINS, Esq., of Higham; George Alexander, of Gloucester Square, London, who died in 1844; Mary Thelwatt; and Mary Anne Hoskins. Mr. Hoskins was succeeded by his son,

THOMAS ALISON HOSKINS, Esq., of Higham, J.P. and D.L., high sheriff in 1854, born 29th March, 1800, married 16th Oct., 1827, Sarah, daughter of Thomas Irwin, Esq., of Justicetown, and sister of Thomas Irwin Esq. of Colver Abbey and his issue,

COCKERMOUTH.

This township is situated in a deep valley which surrounds the lake of that name, about ten miles south-south-east of Cockermouth. Its area is 4,398 acres, and its rateable value £733 9s. 6d. Its population in 1801 was 74; in 1811, 109; in 1821, 136; in 1831, 89; in 1841, 84; and in 1851, 78. Sheep farming is the chief employment of the inhabitants, but slate quarrying is also carried on at Houister Crag, which forms the south bank of the narrow vale of Gatescarthdale. Cockermouth is the market attended.

This township, with the lake, which is customary, is held of General Wyndham, as parcel of his manor of Braithwaite and Coledale. The principal landowners are W. Marshall, Esq., General Wyndham, and Robert Jopson.

The village of Buttermere stands on declining ground near the foot of the lake, eight miles south-west of Keswick. It consists of a few scattered farm-houses, and two good inns, which are much resorted to by visitors during the summer months, and forms, by reason of the surrounding hills, the very picture of seclusion. "The margin of the lake," says De Quincey, "which is overhung by some of the loftiest and steepest of the Cumbrian mountains, exhibits on either side few traces of human neighbourhood; the level area, where the hills recede enough to allow of any, is of a wild pastoral character, or almost savage. The waters of the lake are deep and sullen, and the barrier mountains, by excluding the sun for much of his daily course, strengthen the gloomy impressions. At the foot of this lake lie a few unornamented fields, through which rolls a little brook, connecting it with the larger lake of Crummock, and at the edge of the miniature domain, upon the road side, stands a cluster of cottages, so small and so few that in the richer tracts of the island they would scarcely be complimented with the name of hamlet."

THE CHAPEL.

Here is a chapel-of-ease to the church of Brigham, erected by the road side, at the expense of the Rev. Vaughan Thomas, on the site of a smaller one, which was perhaps the most diminutive of all in England, as it would only hold about half a dozen families. The curacy was "certified at £1, paid by contributions of the inhabitants;" and it was also certified—"this chapel and Wythop were served by readers, except that the curate of Lorton officiated there three or four times in the year." The living is now worth about £58 per annum, and is in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale, and incumbency of the Rev. J. M. Woodmason, who is also incumbent of Wythop, which is worth about £50 a year. The tithes of Buttermere have been commuted for a yearly rent charge of £30.

The story of Mary, the beauty of Buttermere, is now, from its repeated publication, very generally known—briefly stated it is as follows:—She was possessed of considerable personal charms, and being the daughter of the innkeeper, her usual employment was to wait upon those guests who at that time made their way so far into the hearts of the hills. Her beauty in this way became the theme of what may be called extensive praise. A man who designated himself the Hon. Colonel Hope, brother of Lord Hopetown, but whose real name was Hatfield, fleeing from the arm of the law to those sequestered parts, was struck with Mary's attractions, and paid his addresses to her. "No great length of time elapsed after the marriage before he was apprehended on a charge of forgery. He was tried at Carlisle, and, being found guilty, suffered the extreme penalty of the law. Mary married for her second husband a respectable farmer of Caldbeck, and died a few years ago.

EMBLETON.

Embleton township is situated in a fertile vale, about three miles east-south-east of Cockermouth. Its area is 3,870 acres, and rateable value £3,167 15s. The population in 1801 was 292; in 1811, 338; in 1821, 391; in 1831, 442; in 1841, 408; and in 1851, 421. Agriculture is the principal employment. There is a tile works in the township. Cockermouth markets are attended.

The manor of Embleton was given by Alice, one of the co-heiresses of William Fitz-Duncan, and her husband, Robert Courteney, to Orme Ireby, whose family held it for several generations, subsequently coming to the Kirkbys, one of whom, Sir John, held it in fee, in the 39th Edward III. (1365). In 22nd Richard II. (1398), it was held by Geoffrey Tilliol, in right of Alice, his third wife. We hear no more of Embleton till 19th Henry VI. (1440-1), when an assize, of novel disseizen, was brought by Eleanor, the daughter of Robert Ross, Kut., and others, against James Kellome, and Catherine, his wife, for Embleton. And in 1453-4 the said James Kellome, and Catherine his wife, recovered half the lands against the said Eleanor Ross. In 1472 John Powlett held the same of the Earl of Northumberland. It came afterwards into the possession of the Braithwaites, from whom it passed by purchase to Philip Lord Wharton, who, according to Denton's MSS. possessed it in 1688. This township, which is now deemed to be within the manor of Derwent Fells, belongs to General Wyndham. The landowners are Messrs. Wm. Alexander, Isaac Thompson, Thomas Fearon, Robert Benson, Carter and Martin, William Wilkinson, Thomas — Glasson, E. B. Steele; the trustees of the late William Dickson; Rev. M. P. Knubley, Rev. T. Tomlinson; Major Andrew Green Thompson; Miss Rooke, and several yeomen. The enclosure of the commons of this township, amounting to 2,000 acres, took place in 1821, according to the provisions of an act of parliament passed in 1813.

THE CHAPEL.

The chapel-of-ease to the parish church is a plain, but neat and substantial edifice, with a bell turret and two bells, erected in 1813, and will accommodate about 250 persons. It is dedicated to St. Cuthbert, and stands in a cemetery, near to Beckhouse hamlet, three miles east-south-east of Cockermouth. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. Hutchinson says it is "endowed with lands of the yearly value of £2 4s., a stipend of £5 paid by the impropiator, and £1 1s. yearly produce of a money stock." It was certified to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as of the annual value of £54. The tithes, which belong to the Earl of Lonsdale, were commuted in 1841 for £190.

INCUMBENTS.—Thomas Fisher, first curate, 1754; — Atty, year not known; Joseph Lowther, 1833; Henry Kitchen, 1843; Andrew B. Clarke, 1858.

There is a school in this township for the children of Embleton and Wythop chapelries. It is supported by the quarter-pence, and has an average attendance of forty pupils. A Sunday-school is held in Embleton chapel.

This township pays 6s. 8d. per annum from the poor rates to the grammar school at Cockermouth, in consideration of which sum any person belonging to Embleton may send their child to that school to learn Latin.

Beckhouse is a hamlet in this township, three miles east-south-east of Cockermouth; High Side is another hamlet, consisting of a few farm-houses and cottages, three and a half miles south-east of the same place; the hamlet of Shatton is two miles south-south-east, and Stanger two miles south-by-east of the same town. At the latter hamlet is a strong mineral spring called Stanger Spa, said to be very efficacious in skin diseases. Stanley Hall is another hamlet about three miles east of Cockermouth.

LORTON PAROCHIAL CHAPELRY.

This chapelry is bounded on the north by the township of Embleton; on the west by the river Cocker, which separates it from the townships of Whinifell and Loweswater; on the south by Buttermere; and on the east by Thornthwaite and Bassetthwaite. It comprises the townships of Lorton and Brackenthwaite, and the chapelry of Wythop. The inhabitants are principally engaged in agriculture, and attend the markets at Cockermouth.

LORTON.

The area of the township of Lorton is 5,264 acres, and its rateable value £2,045. Its population in 1801 was 298; in 1811, 394; in 1821, 353; in 1831, 388; in 1841, 394; and in 1851, 449. The township was enclosed in pursuance of an act passed in 1826.

The manor of Lorton was early broken into several ties. In the 35th Henry VIII. — held one third part of the vill of Lorton, of the king as of his honour of Cockermouth, by homage and fealty 3s. 4d., free rent, witnessman in Derwent Fells, and suit of court. William Sandes held another third part, and William Huddleston the remaining third part, probably by marriage of, or descent from, co-heiresses. The survey taken in 1578 informs us that "the dean and chapter of Carlisle hold certain lands and tenements there by homage, fealty, and suit of court. Robert Sandes, gentleman, holdeth the third part of the town of Lorton, by like service and witnessman, rendering per annum 3s. 4d. John Winder, gentleman, holdeth the third part of the town of Nether Lorton by like services, rendering per annum 3s. 4d. The heirs of Thomas Hoales hold certain tenements and lands there by like service, rendering 1s. 8d. Christopher Hall holdeth certain lands and tenements there, late William Huddleston's, by like service. Alexander Highmoor holdeth certain lands and tenements there called Highside, late the lands of Henry Mitshal, rendering 10s. Nicholas Bell holdeth a tenement, with the appurtenances, called Casseplace-of-the-How, by like services. John Winder holdeth one tenement called Gilbank, by fealty and suit of court. The heirs of Richard Barwis holdeth one messuage and twenty acres of land and meadow by like service. Relicta — de Williamson de Nether Lorton holdeth certain lands and tenements there by like service. Sum total of the free rent in Lorton aforesaid, 18s. 4d." The whole of Lorton now belongs to the honour of Cockermouth, as parcel of the manor of Derwent Fells, except a small customary manor which is held by the dean and chapter of Carlisle, to whose court here their tenants in this neighbourhood are amenable. The customary tenants of the dean and chapter pay a fourpenny fine upon change of tenant by death, but the lord never dies, and the tenants are entitled to all wood upon their respective customary estates. The manor of Derwent Fells belongs to General Wyndham as lord paramount of the honour of Cockermouth; and there are many enfranchised freehold and customary tenements within Lorton held of him as lord of the manor of Derwent Fells. The landowners are Mrs. Bridge; Richard Hardbord, Esq.; Messrs. John Jennings, J. Wilson, — Knubley, John Pearson, and others.

THE CHURCH.

The church, or parochial chapel, dedicated to St. Cuthbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, is situated between High and Low Lorton, and is a plain substantial building with a small square tower or belfry. It includes within its jurisdiction the townships of Lorton, Brackenthwaite, and Wythop, the inhabitants of which, together with those of the chapelry of Buttermere, marry at Lorton chapel and also bury their dead there, and consequently contribute towards its repairs, under the direction of four chapel wardens, appointed by the different quarters of this parochial chapelry. The living, a perpetual curacy, certified to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as of the average annual value of £84, is in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. The tithes have been commuted for the yearly rent-charge of £25. The registers of the chapelry commence in 1538.

INCUMBENTS.—Thomas Fisher, 1741; John Sisson, 1800; Fletcher Fleming, 1833; William Arncliffe, 1836.

CHARITY.

There is in this township an ancient school-stock of £100, the origin of which is unknown, but it is secured on the tolls of the Cumberland roads. Besides this sum, the school possesses £100, left in 1844, by Arthur Bowe, Esq., the interest of which is paid to the schoolmaster of Lorton; and £100, left in 1847, by the late G. L. Bragg, Esq., for the education of poor children of the township of Lorton. Both these sums are invested in government security, and yield £3 per cent; the minister, chapelwardens, and overseers are the trustees. The nomination of the master is vested in five feoffees.

High and Low Lorton are two villages in this township, distant about half a mile from each other, and four miles south-by-east of Cockermouth. At High Lorton is a flax-spinning and thread manufactory, belonging to Mr. John Jennings, and a brewery carried on by John Jennings and Co. The Wesleyans have a small chapel here, erected in 1840.

Lorton Hall, the seat and property of Mrs. Bridge, occupies a fine situation on the banks of the Cocker.

The sylvan vale of Lorton will be found described at page 48. It is watered by the river Cocker, which, issuing from Crummock Lake, joins the Derwent at Cockermouth. The famous old Lorton Yew is best described in the beautiful lines of Wordsworth—

"There is a yew-tree, pride of Lorton Vale,
Which to this day stands single in the midst
Of its own darkness, as it stood of yore.
Not loth to furnish weapons for the hands
Of Unfraville or Percy, ere they march'd
To Scotland's heaths; or those that crossed the sea,
And drew their sounding bows at Agincourt,
Perhaps at earlier Cressy or Poitiers.
Of vast circumference and gloom profound,
This solitary tree!—a living thing
Produced too slowly ever to decay;
Of form and aspect too magnificent
To be destroyed."

BRACKENTHWAITE.

This township comprises an area of 2,478 acres, and its rateable value is £737 1s. 10d. The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 136; in 1811, 144; in 1821, 140; in 1831, 130; in 1841, 116; and in 1851, 140.

The population, who are all engaged in agricultural pursuits, are very scattered, there being no village or hamlet in the township; but at Seale Hill, seven and a half miles south-by-east of Cockermouth, and near the lakes of Loweswater, Crummock, and Buttermere, there is a commodious and delightfully-situated hotel and posting-house, where boats are kept for the convenience of tourists visiting the majestic scenery of the neighbourhood. The township is said to derive its name of Brackenthwaite from the brackens or ferns that formerly abounded here.

The manor of Brackenthwaite was held in ancient times by the Moresby family, from whom it was purchased by Thomas Multon, who assumed the name of Lucy, and by whose descendants it continued to be held till given by the heiress of that family to the Percys, by whom it was given to Henry VIII. It was subsequently granted by the crown to Lord Grey, of Wilton, and John Bannister, Esq., who, by license in the 3rd Edward VI. alienated to Richard Robinson, clerk, "all the several possessions late in the tenure of Peter Mirehouse, Thomas Wilkinson, Christopher Stanger, John Robinson, John Newton, and John Stubb, and all those lands called Dolehoves and Thwaite, in Brackenthwaite, late parcel of the possessions of Henry, late earl of Northumberland; and all lands, tenements, rents, reversions, services, and hereditaments whatsoever in Brackenthwaite aforesaid, and in the office or collection of the steward of Brackenthwaite aforesaid." There is a similar license in the 4th and 5th of Philip and Mary to John Robinson, to alienate the same to Thomas Stanley, Esq. In 1578 Edward Herbert, Knt., held "Brackenthwaite, parcel of the possessions of the honour of Cockermouth, purchased of the said late King Henry VIII.; in the same time when the said honour or lordship was in the said king his hands, being then of the yearly value of 10s. 2d., wherout there is now reserved unto the earl, which is now payable per annum, 16s. 8d." Subsequently the manor passed to the Fishers and others, coming ultimately to General Wyndham, the present proprietor. It is now, and has long been, considered to form part of the manor of Derwent Fells, within and parcel of the honour of Cockermouth. The principal landowners are General Wyndham; William Marshall, Esq.; John Fisher, Esq.; Miss Jane Wood; and several resident yeomen. The tenure is principally enfranchised freehold.

In this township is the lofty eminence of Grassmoor, rising in solemn and majestic grandeur 2,756 feet above the sea level.

WYTHOP.

In 1801 this township contained a population of 137; in 1811, 132; in 1821, 100; in 1831, 121; in 1841, 125; and in 1851, 119. Its area is 3,013 acres, and its rateable value £670 11s. 6d. Wythop is said to derive its name from the "wyths" or willows formerly growing here in great abundance. It extends from four to six miles south-east-by-east of Cockermouth.

The manor of Wythop belonged at an early period to the Lucy family, one of whom, Alice Lucy, second daughter and co-heir of Richard Lucy, and wife of Alan Multon, second son of Thomas Multon, who married the widow of Richard Lucy, gave Wythop and Whinfell, near Lorton, the eighth part of Lorton, and certain corn out of the mill at Aspatria, with three messuages and thirty acres of land in Caldbeck, unto John Lucy, her second son, whom she bore to the said Alan Multon, upon the condition of his disusing the name of Multon and assuming that of Lucy, with its armorial bearings. Her reason for doing this is said to have been in consequence of her elder sister, Amabil, having married Lambert Multon, continued the name and arms of Thomas Multon, their father, in the family of Egremont. When making the above grant of Wythop, she reserved to herself a penny rent service, or a pair of gloves; and after it was inhabited it was valued at £10 a year, and the residue, about £8 11s. 2d., out of which she also reserved a rent service of 4d. a year. This John Lucy lived in the time of Henry III. and Edward I., and died in the 8th Edward II. (1314-15), or some time before; for Hugh Lowther, son of Hugh Lowther, after the demise of the said John Lucy, enjoyed Wythop, and in the year just mentioned was impleaded by Christian, John Lucy's widow, for her dower there. The Lowthers continued to possess this manor for a considerable period. By an inquisition of knights' fees taken in the 35th Henry VIII. (1543-4) it is found that J. Lowther, Knt., then held the manor of Wythop of the king by the third part of a knight's fee, as of the honour of Cockermouth, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, from three weeks to three weeks, and the free rent of one penny or one red rose. In 1606 Sir Richard Lowther sold the manor to Richard Fletcher, of Cockermouth, who, as is described at page 302, had the honour of entertaining Mary Queen of Scots during her residence in that town. Mr. Fletcher received the honour of knighthood from James I. Sir Henry Fletcher, Bart., one of his descendants, became a convert to the Catholic faith, and died in a monastery in Flanders, in the early part of the last century, having settled the estate upon Thomas Fletcher, with remainder to Henry Vane, son to Mr. Vane, of Lang Newton, Durham, so that it now belongs to Sir H. R. Vane, Bart.

THE CHAPEL.

Wythop chapel is a small edifice standing near the farm called Kelsick, over the steep woody bank that rises from the west side of Bassenthwaite lake. The living, a curacy in the patronage of the inhabitants, was certified to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as of the average annual value of £51. The Rev. James M. Woodmason is incumbent. The tithes were commuted in 1844 for £18 9s. 5d.

Old Scales and Baughton Beck are two small hamlets in this township, four and a half miles south-east-by-east from Cockermouth.

MOSSER.

The area of Mosser township is 1,018 acres, its rateable value £629. Its population in 1801 was 101; in 1811, 111; in 1821, 102; in 1831, 94; in 1841, 107; and in 1851, 76. Agriculture is the principal employment of the inhabitants, who attend the Cockermouth market.

The township of Mosser, Mosergh, or Mosier, belonged to the Salkelds, one of whom, Thomas Salkeld, of Corby, in 1543, held it of the king as of his castle of Egremont, by homage and fealty, suit of court.

13s. 4d. cornage, and pature of the sergeants. It was afterwards enfranchised. William Fletcher, Esq.; John Fawcett, Esq.; John Harris, Esq.; Mr. Henry Dodgson, Mr. William Peile; Mrs. M. Whiteside, and Ann Blackburn and Co., are the principal landowners.

There are two villages in this township, High Mosser and Low Mosser, the former about four and the latter about three and a half miles south-by-west of Cockermouth.

THE CHAPEL.

The chapel-of-ease is a small plain edifice, dedicated to St. Philip. The living is a perpetual curacy in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale, and incumbency of the Rev. S. Sherwen, rector of Dean. It was returned to the Parliamentary Commissioners as of the average annual value of £44. The tithes were commuted in 1844, for a yearly rent charge of £16. Previous to the dissolution of the monastic institutions of England in the reign of Henry VIII., there was a richly endowed chantry here, the possessions of which were granted by Edward VI. to Thomas Brende, scrivener, of London.

CHARITY.

Mrs. Mary Porter left, in 1792, £100, which is invested in the Three per Cent Consols, for the education of the poor of Mosser chapelry, legally settled, and not receiving parish relief.

CAMERTON PARISH.

The parish of Camerton, which is about three and a half miles in length by two in breadth, is bounded on the north by Humber, on the west by the Irish Sea, on the south by the river Derwent, and on the east by the township of Great Broughton. It comprises the townships of Camerton and Seaton. The population of the parish is principally located at Camerton and High and Low Seaton, and attend the markets at Workington. The soil in the neighbourhood of the Derwent is loamy, and very fertile, yielding excellent crops of wheat, oats, and grass; near the coast it is light and sandy; and in other parts of the parish a deep clayey soil prevails. Agriculture and coal mining, but particularly the latter, are the principal employments pursued by the inhabitants, who are described as "a hard working race of men, but very illiterate, and prone to drink, and formerly much addicted to cock fighting and smuggling." The Cockermouth railway intersects the parish all the way from Holston Wood Beck to Workington Harbour, and crosses the Derwent five times in about three miles; and the Maryport railway runs along the shore the whole length of the parish.

CAMERTON.

Camerton township, comprising 788 acres, contained in 1801, 71 inhabitants, in 1811, 85; in 1821, 86; in 1831, 101; in 1841, 154; and in 1851, 191. The rateable value is £1,517; total rent charge for tithe, £32 1s. This township abounds with coal. Camerton Pit, the property of Ralph Cooke, Esq., is worked by Mr. William Cooke, and consists of one shaft, the perpendicular depth of which is forty-two fathoms, with about fifty acres of workings. The seams of coal connected with the shaft are the "Ten Quarters Seam," five feet thick; the "White Metal Seam," three feet six inches thick, and a small seam two feet eight inches thick. The "Main Seam," nine feet thick, has been wrought to the west of the existing shaft. There are about 150 persons employed, and the annual produce is about 20,000 tons.

The manor of Camerton, with that of Seaton, was given by Waltheof, first lord of Allerdale, to Orme, son of Ketel, in marriage with his sister Gunhilda, "who," according to Nicholson and Burn, "dwelt at Seaton, and made it a manor, to which Camerton is appendant." The posterity of Orme assumed the name of Camerton, and afterwards that of Culwen or Curwen,¹ from whom the Curwen family, of Workington Hall, derive their descent. In 1578 Anthony Curwen, Esq., held Camerton "by homage, fealty, and suit of court, and paid yearly for corage, 4s. 6d.; for seawake, 8d.; in toto, per annum, 5s. 2d." The manor of Camerton, with the exception of a small portion claimed by the dean and chapter of Carlisle, is now the property of Ralph Cooke, Esq., of Camerton Hall. The township was enclosed in 1830, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of parliament passed in 1824.

The village of Camerton is seated on the Derwent, three miles east-by-north of Workington.

THE CHURCH.

The church, which is beautifully situated on the banks of the Derwent, was first erected in the year 1000. It was rebuilt in 1694, and in 1796. In 1855 a tower and spire was erected by voluntary subscription, at a cost of £117; a new bell was also added at an additional cost of £23. Towards these expenses the Earl of Lonsdale subscribed £20; Ralph Cooke, Esq., £20; Thomas Jackson, Esq., £33; C. and M. Holliday, £27; the dean and chapter of Carlisle, £5; Mrs. Lowdys, Green Gill, £1; Mr. James Ramsey, Camerton, £5; Mrs. Dodgsons, Ribton Hall, £1; Mrs. Cape, St. Helens, 10s.; Rev. Daniel Wilson, £3 12s. 7d., interest of money while in bank, 11s. 4d.; total, £116 3s. 11d. The church is sixty-six feet in length by thirty in breadth, and will accommodate about 300 persons. In the chancel window is some fine painted glass, representing our Redeemer carrying the cross to Mount Calvary. It was presented to the church by Miss Holliday, of Seaton. There is a marble monument to the memory of the Rev. Joseph Pearson, for forty-four years incumbent of this parish; and an ancient effigy, in armour, of a renowned warrior, called "Black Tom," who is said to have resided at Seaton Castle, and to have been buried at Shap, in Westmoreland. Gospatric, son of Orme, gave the church of Camerton to the priory of Carlisle. The prior and convent took the tithes and employed a curate. The living is now a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Carlisle. The Earl of Lonsdale is improprator, and rents the whole of the tithes, amounting to £327 1s. 6d., from the dean and chapter. The tithes were commuted in 1841. The curacy, certified to the governors of Queen Ann's Bounty at £15 10s., and to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners at £95, is now worth about £94 14s., arising from money in the funds, and twenty-four acres of land at Little Clifton. The parish registers extend through a period of 200 years.

The parsonage, erected by subscription in 1850, is a neat modern Gothic structure.

The parish school, situated at Seaton, and attended by about forty children, was licensed by the late Bishop Percy, of Carlisle, and a full service is performed there every Sunday evening. The present incumbent has obtained £5 per annum for the school from Betton's Charity, in London. The Earl of Lonsdale gives £2 a year to the Sunday-school. There are also two dame schools in the parish, in which about fifty children are taught.

Camerton Hall, the seat of Ralph Cooke, Esq., is a substantial stone structure, rebuilt in 1833.

SEATON.

The township of Seaton comprises an area of 2,939 acres, and its rateable value is £4,028; total rent charge for tithe, £295 0s. 6d. Its population in 1801 was 562; in 1811, 726; in 1821, 620; in 1831, 745; in 1841, 787; and in 1851, 835. A Roman road formerly passed through this township on the high grounds along the shore. About four years ago some remains of antiquity were brought to light at or near Barrow Walls, the ancient manorial seat of the Curwen family. Patrick de Culwen is said to have pulled down the mansion at Seaton, and to have removed to Workington about the latter end of the twelfth century. It is certain, nevertheless, that Thomas de Culwen, in 1270, procured a charter for a market at Seaton on Thursday, and a fair for three days at the festival of St. Peter ad Vincula (August 1st).¹ There are still traces of the old mansion. In 1578, Henry Curwen, Knt., held the manor of Seaton "by homage, fealty, and suit of court, with other services, and paid yearly for corage, 10s.; for seawake, 1s. 3d.; and for sergeants' food, turn-silver, and free rent, 3s. 10d.; in toto, 15s. 1d." The manor passed by bequest from the Curwens to Charles Pelham, Esq., from whom it was purchased by the late Earl of Lonsdale, whose son and successor is the present owner of the manorial rights and privileges.

Nearly the whole of the lands are held under the lord by customary tenure, and courts are held at Seaton annually. The Earl of Lonsdale is the largest landowner. The commons were enclosed in 1830, and allotted to the respective proprietors.

Within a mile north-east of Workington, in this township, are the works of the Derwent Iron Tin-plate Company, which afford employment to about 200 persons, and are in connection with the Quay Iron Works, at Workington, where the iron is prepared for the manufacture of the tin-plate. There are extensive brick and tile works at Murray Guards, on Seaton Moor. There is also a corn-mill (Seaton Mill) on the Derwent.

Salmon Hall, in this township, the property of the Earl of Lonsdale, was erected about a century ago. It derives its name from the occupier or owner holding the fisheries.

Between Seaton and the sea is a place called St. Helen's, formerly fortified; it is traditionally said to be the site of a chapel.

CROSS CANONBY PARISH.

THE parish of Cross Canonby is bounded on the north and west by the sea, on the south by the river Ellen, and on the east by Aspatria parish. It possesses in general a light sandy or gravelly soil, which produces early and excellent crops of wheat, barley, oats, &c. Coal and limestone are the principal minerals, large quantities of the former being shipped at Maryport, from the mines in the neighbourhood. The parish comprises the townships of Cross Canonby, Crosby, Birkby, and the chapelry of Maryport. The inhabitants attend the Maryport markets.

CANONBY.

The area of this township is 1,093 acres, and its rateable value £742 8s. 5d. The population in 1801 was 127; in 1811, 138; in 1821, 60; in 1831, 59; in 1841, 59; and in 1851, 76, who are chiefly resident in the small village of Canonby. Agriculture is the principal employment. The Maryport and Carlisle railway runs through the township.

The manor of Crosby, or Cross Canonby, was demesne of Allerdale, and continued to be held by the lords of Allerdale till Henry, the sixth Earl of Northumberland, gave it to Henry VIII., who, on February 4th, 1546, granted to "Richard Bridges, Esq., and John Knight, gentleman, inter alia, the manor of Crosbie, with the appurtenances, late parcel of the possessions of Henry, late Earl of Northumberland, and all messuages, granges, mills, profits, emoluments, and hereditaments whatsoever in Cross Canonby, which late belonged to the said Earl of Northumberland, of the yearly value of £4 3s. 10½d. And, on the 30th of January in the same year, there is a license to them for the fine of 28s. paid into the Exchequer to alienate the manor of Crosby, in the parish of Cross Canonby, and ten messuages, four cottages, two acres of arable land, sixty acres of meadow, 108 acres of pasture, 140 acres of moor, and 12d. rent, with the appurtenances in Crosbie, alias Cross Canonby, late parcel of the possessions of Henry, late Earl of Northumberland, to Gabriel Highmore, gentleman; and, in the 11th Elizabeth (1568-9) Gabriel Highmore conveyed it to Anthony Highmore."

In the 20th Elizabeth (1577-8) Anthony Highmore held certain lands in Crosby "by homage, fealty, and suit of court, and paid yearly for cornage, 6s. 8d.; seawake, 1s. 2d.; turnsilver, 3s. 10d.; serjeant's food, and free farm, and rendered in toto, 11s. 9d." Soon after this Crosby was purchased by the Porters of Weary Hall, in which family it continued for some generations, until one of them enfranchised the manor and sold it to the tenants, who are now all freeholders. The principal landowners are Joseph Hall, Esq.; Mrs. M. B. Dykes; Messrs. John Curry, John Richmond, and John Norman.

The village of Canonby is situated three miles north-east of Maryport.

THE CHURCH.

Cross Canonby church is an ancient structure, dedicated to St. John. It consists of nave, chancel, and a bell turret with one bell; and possesses a sculptured font of great antiquity. The church, with a carucate of land, was given by Alan, second lord of Allerdale, to the priory of Carlisle, which grant was confirmed by the kings Henry II. and Edward III. The benefice is now a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Carlisle, and worth about £150 per annum. The tithes were commuted in 1844, for £308 1s. 9d.; viz.:—Canonby, £70 11s. 9d.; Birkby, £83 12s.; Crosby, £153 18s. They belonged to the dean and chapter of Carlisle, but are now held by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church contains several monuments to the memory of different members of the Senhouse family.

INCUMBENTS.—William Lancaster, died 1700; Mr. Taylor; John Donald; Richard Dugdale, 1853.

BIRKBY.

The area of the township of Birkby is 871 acres, and its rateable value £1,053 17s. 6d. The population was returned with that of Canonby township in 1801 and 1811: in 1821 it was 96; in 1831, 110; in 1841, 89; and in 1851, 117. The inhabitants are chiefly located in the village of Birkby, and in a few good farms scattered over the township. Agriculture is the chief employment. At Ellengrove are a small manufactory for pencils and a tannery. The Maryport and Carlisle railway is on the south of the township.

Birkby manor is parcel of the barony of Allerdale, belonging to General Wyndham. In the 20th Elizabeth (1577-8), we find it recorded that "Philip Lord Wharton holdeth Birkby of the ancient possessions of the earls of Northumberland, of the yearly value of 6s., granted, amongst other things, by Henry, late Earl of Northumberland, grandfather to the earl that now is, to one Thomas Wharton, then controller of his household, to him and his heirs males, and rendering 6s." The dean and chapter of Carlisle have a manor here, given to the priory with the church, by Alan, second lord of Allerdale; this is annexed to, or is now deemed part of, their manor of Lorton. William Ostle, Esq.; Capt. Joseph Cuthbertson; Messrs. Isaac Sibson, Thomas Beeby, and John Richmond, are the principal landowners.

The commons, containing upwards of sixty-four acres, were enclosed in 1853. This township was formerly subject to a tithe rent charge of £83 12s., the greater portion of which was enfranchised, in 1850, by the present owners of the soil.

The village of Birkby is pleasantly situated on the Aspatria turnpike road, two miles east by north of Maryport, and contains some good houses.

Ellen Bank, the property and seat of Robert Ritson, Esq., is a fine structure, in the Elizabethan style, erected in 1850. It is very pleasantly situated, about a mile east by north of Maryport.

Birkby Lodge is another good residence in this township, two and a half miles east by north of the same place.

CROSEY.

This township comprises 1,041 statute acres; its rateable value is £2,168 7s. 6½d. In 1801 the number of inhabitants was 193; in 1811, 207; in 1821, 200; in 1831, 197; in 1841, 272; and in 1851, 273, who are chiefly collected in the village of Crosby, the only village or hamlet in the township. Agriculture and coal mining is the occupation of the inhabitants, a colliery having been opened here in 1856, by Messrs. Cooke, Nicholson, and Co. The mine has one shaft seventy fathoms in perpendicular depth. The seam working at present is the "Ten Quarters Seam," which is seven and a half feet thick; the number of hands employed is upwards of 100. The Maryport and Carlisle railway runs through the south of the township, within half a mile of the village. Cockermouth and Maryport are the markets attended. In the reign of Henry VIII. the manorial rights belonged to the earls of Northumberland, and afterwards were in the hands of the Porters of Weary Hall, by whom they were sold to the different owners of the land, amongst whom were the family of Osmotherley. William Osmotherley was twice high sheriff, and also M.P. for the county, in the reign of the unfortunate Richard II. This old family has long since been extinct. One of the daughters married into the family of the Jacksons, of Crosby, which also ended in daughters, the last having married into the Reay family, of the Gill, the present John Reay, Esq., being now owner of the estate. This family also intermarried with the Laws, the ancestors of the earls of Ellenborough, the first of whom took his title from Ellenborough, which adjoins the parish. A survey, taken in 1578, informs us that "Thomas Porter holds in the town of Alta Crosby two messuages and four oxgangs of land, late Thomas Lowther's, by homage, fealty, and suit of court; and paieth yearly for cornage, 9d.; for seawake, 1½d.; with serjeant's food, &c.; in toto, per annum, 10½d. John Jackson holdeth in the same town of Alta Crosby one messuage with the appurtenances, late William Dikes', by like service, and paieth yearly for free rent 1d." The landowners are Henry Richmond, Esq.; John Reay, Esq.; John Richmond, Esq.; Edward B. Steel, Esq.; and William Swinburn, Esq. Each proprietor claims the manorial rights of his own land; the tenure here is freehold. The enclosure of the commons took place in 1853, when there were two acres, which are subject to a rent charge of 20s., allotted to the guardians of the poor of the township. The tithes for Crosby township amount to £153 18s.

The village of Crosby occupies a pleasant situation three miles west-north-west of Maryport. Here is a small parochial school, capable of accommodating about sixty children.

CHARITY.

The late Mr. J. Nicholson, in 1818, left £415 13s. 9d. Three per Cent. Consols, the interest of which, amounting to £12 9s. 4d. per annum, is divided in the following manner, viz.:—Two-thirds to the schoolmaster of Crosby (if approved of by the trustees) for the education of twenty children of the townships of Crosby, Canonby, and Kirkby; and the remaining one-third to the poor widows of Maryport. The trustees are J. P. Senhouse, Esq.; Rev. Mr. Bewsher, and the Rev. Richard Dugdale.

Solway Villa, the seat of John Curry, Esq., situated close to the village, is a neat modern building, erected in 1853.

Crosby corn mill is on the river Ellen, which runs through this township, and divides Cross Canonby and Dearham parishes at this point.

THE TOWN OF MARYPORT.

This seaport and market town is situated on the sea-coast at the mouth of the river Ellen, in 54° 43' north latitude, and 3° 29' west longitude. It is distant 29 miles south-west from Carlisle, 311 north-west from London by road, and 328 via Carlisle. The population of the town of Maryport in 1851 was 5,698, of whom 2,666 were males, and 3,032 females, inhabiting 1,242 houses; 55 houses being uninhabited, and 12 in course of erection.

The history of Maryport belongs entirely to modern times. The town is, as it were, a creation of yesterday, and cannot fall back upon its old traditions or historical reminiscences like some of the other towns of the county; yet its youth shadows forth great things, and the time will surely come when it will take its place in the annals of industry and peaceful commerce—annals more great and glorious than those of war and rapine, speaking as they do of science, and skill, and fortitude, and daring, and the triumph of mind over matter in a thousand different ways, each of which has been for the benefit and welfare of the whole human race. Maryport is the growth of a single century. Like many modern towns in the north of England, it has been called into existence by the universal demand for coal, a demand that it has fortunately been able, in some measure, to supply. Little more than a hundred years ago, in 1748, on the present site of Maryport, there stood but one house, which is described in the act, 27th George II., c. 6., "as only one farm house, with the outhouses and offices thereto belonging, standing, and built near the harbour of Ellenfoot." This farmstead is now the "Golden Lion." Two years afterwards, the second house was built, and in 1756 the town received its present name by act of parliament; and it seems very probable that Pennant is correct in stating that Humphrey Senhouse, Esq., the lord of the manor, suggested the name, though some of the inhabitants will have it that Mary Queen of Scots gave it its appellation as she passed through it on her visit to England. In 1774 the town had increased to 100 houses and 1,300 inhabitants. This was owing to the opening up and extension of the coal trade. Shipping had also commenced in the harbour, and a series of wooden pens had been erected on either side of the river, for the convenience of loading the vessels, about seventy of which belonged to the port. There was also a considerable trade and commerce in iron, potters' ware, glass, cordage, and fish, and other wares and merchandise. Hutchinson, in his History of Cumberland, published in 1791, observes, "The land at Maryport has become of such value that in a building lease, it lets from 6d. to 2s. 6d. a yard in front and forty backwards. There are about ninety vessels belonging to the port, some of them are 250 tons burden, and upon an average 120 tons each, and seven men and a boy to each vessel. Their chief trade is the export of coals to Ireland; but they also ship iron and glass to distant parts. Before the unhappy divisions between the mother country and the colonies, they sent out several ships to America. They import timber, flax, and iron from the Baltic. The place is happily situated for sea-bathing, and is greatly resorted to in the proper season." Maryport has not, perhaps, justified the concluding eulogium of Hutchinson, by becoming a fashionable watering place, but the incipient energy of its traders, who had sent their little vessels to Boston, before the tea riots there had established the great modern republic, and who had brought timber and flax from the Baltic, has manifested itself in the constant progress of the port to our own times. As it is to the coal trade that Maryport is indebted for its present position, we will first cast a glance at that branch of industry. There are in the vicinity, and properly speaking belonging to Maryport, some nine or ten pits, many of which have only recently been opened, though others have been worked for a great number of years, and with the many improvements that have been effected in the winning of coal the produce of these pits has been greatly increased, so much so, that the quantity of coal exported has been about trebled within the last twenty years. In 1839, there were shipped from Maryport of coal alone, about 110,000 tons. In 1841, it had increased to 150,000 tons, or about 3,000 tons per week. In the following year, however, in consequence of the ruinous rate at which coal was selling in Ireland, whither, we ought to have observed, almost all the coal is shipped, the trade considerably decreased, and the exportation sank much lower. By dint of energy and perseverance

a rally was made, and in the last five years the returns of this the staple trade of Maryport, stand thus:—

Year.	No. of Vessels	Coals tons.	Culm. tons.	Coals tons.
1854	2,806	300,504	1,168	2,464
1855	2,614	291,994	1,860	2,129
1856	2,816	291,068	1,591	2,877
1857	3,054	333,577	1,192	2,359
1858	2,840	328,034	..	1,425

It appears, therefore, that this trade is rapidly on the road to very great and important results, and now, with the facilities for loading in the New Dock, it will receive an additional impetus.

Having thus glanced at the staple trade of the town, we will proceed with the next in importance—shipbuilding, for the operations connected with which there are three establishments, or yards. Two of these belong to the largest firm, Messrs. R. Ritson & Co., while the other is the property of Messrs. J. Wood and Co. The former company employ nearly 200 hands in the various departments of their business, and have built since their commencement in 1830, about fifty vessels of various sizes and burdens. The establishment of Messrs. Wood and Co. is also well and favourably known. A large number of workmen are employed, and several fine ships have been from time to time erected here. There formerly existed another yard, but it has now for some time been unoccupied. In concluding this account of Maryport shipbuilding we may state that most of the vessels constructed here are engaged in the India and China trades.

The rest of the Maryport trade is unimportant, if it can be said to have any other, excepting the ordinary occupations of a rising seaport town. During the fishing season employment is given to a number of hands, in the herring and cod fisheries, the produce of which afterwards find their way to Carlisle, and the other towns in the county. Until lately rope and cordage were manufactured in large quantities, but this branch of industry has been discontinued. Sailcloth and sails are made here, but chiefly for local use.

The imports are not of sufficient importance to form a special subject of interest in connection with the town. Timber, a small quantity of which arrives from America every year, and from the shores of the Baltic at different times, is the only import worthy of the name; that from America is principally forwarded by the railways to the various parts of this and the adjoining county. It is very probable that as the exports of the town increase, so also will its imports rise in importance and value, and such a consummation is much to be desired.

The shipping and shipping stock of the port during this progress in its trade and manufactures must of course have proportionately increased. As stated above, in 1750 there were about seventy vessels in connection with the port, and from the registers we learn that this number had increased in 1810 to 101 vessels, with a burden of 13,580 tons. The following table, made up from the Custom-house returns since 1836, exhibits the annual number of vessels, foreign and coastwise, which have cleared from Maryport, the number and registered tonnage of vessels belonging to the port, and the amount of customs' duties received, thus giving a résumé of the trade of Maryport:—

Up to 1838 no ships were registered at Maryport, and it was not till 1842 that the port, for Custom-house purposes, was entirely separated from Whitehaven, so that in this table, previous to that time, the number of vessels belonging to the port is incorrectly given. The great decrease in the number of "foreign" vessels noticeable in 1845, is to be attributed to the Isle of Man having in that year being placed under coasting regulations. The above table shows the gradual increase of shipping stock and burden belonging to the harbour, which will, of course, increase more rapidly as facilities for accommodation open up. Tugs are now employed for facilitating harbour and coast movements among the vessels. All steamers for passengers were discontinued last year (1858).

The town and population also have kept pace with the increase of trade and shipping. In 1841 the population numbered about 5,300 persons, while in 1851, as before-mentioned, there were only 5,600, so that it has increased its number by almost one half since that period, being now about 8,000. In 1834 a company was formed for the purpose of lighting the town with gas, and works were erected at a cost of nearly £4,000. The whole town is now lighted inside and out, harbour and quay, and the general arrangements give great satisfaction, as well as reflect credit upon all parties concerned.

In addition to the trades mentioned above, there are two well-known foundries for iron and brass founding, the Valentia and the Solway, both of which employ a large number of hands, and have existed for some time as sources of profitable labour in the town. The chief nature of the work is of course of a naval character, consisting of the requisites in the respective materials of vessels being built in the yards. There is also a steam flour-mill, built originally for a cotton manufactory, on the shore, a little way out of the town; and a pencil mill, which, since 1844, has sent out some ten millions of pencils. The markets are held on Friday, in Fleming Square, which possesses a covered building for the "butter women" in the centre. It is well supplied with fruit, vegetables, fish, potatoes, &c. The corn market was commenced in 1832-3, and is now of some importance. Petty sessions are held in a room of the Court-house in the square every Friday.

In 1749 trustees were appointed by act of parliament to levy dues and other moneys for the maintenance and extension of the harbour. Until 1833 these trustees continued to be nominated by the lord of the manor, but by a new act passed in that year, the lord of the manor was declared a trustee in perpetuity, with power to place four others on the board, while eight additional members were to be elected by the townspeople. The duties of the new body include the management of the town as well as the harbour, and they are authorised to levy rates upon the town and also upon the harbour, under certain restrictions, for the proper development of their resources. The trustees are elected every five years. The qualification of a trustee must be personal property worth £1,000—freehold, customary, or copyhold property, worth £50 a year, either by himself or his wife—the occupation of a house of the clear annual value of £20—or ownership of a certain number of shares in shipping belonging to the port. The qualification to vote for trustees is the payment of annual rates of not less than £6, or a certain value of shares in ships. The constituency decide the method of election, which, hitherto, has been by ballot.

The township and harbour are both under the same government, although their accounts are kept separate; and from these we extract the revenues for each year (the accounts are made up at the beginning of October) for the eight years ending with 1857. There are two years in which we have not obtained the revenue of the township:—

At the 8th October, 1857, the liabilities of the harbour amounted to £63,895, on mortgage, and £8,437 14s. 1d. due to the treasurer, having been increased by £17,750 borrowed in 1855, and by £2,400 borrowed in 1853. In 1857 the interest on mortgages amounted to £2,729, but even with this heavy charge, there was, on the ordinary receipts and expenditure, a surplus revenue of £1,595 16s. 7d., which was of course swallowed up, along with some £10,000 more, by the expenditure upon the New Dock, the total cost of which will amount to upwards of £40,000. The debt of the township amounted last year to £1,350; but there was a balance of £535 9s. 7d. in the hands of the treasurer.

Let us now take a glance at the harbour of Maryport, with its progress and improvements. One hundred years ago, around the mouth of the Ellen, a few wooden posts supported a platform which constituted the pier and quay. However, as trade increased, and capital accumulated by the levying of dues and other charges, and the investment of money by the lord of the manor, the harbour works were reconstructed, and something more suitable and substantial erected. On reference to the harbour accounts for years gone by, there will frequently be found large sums of money spent on improvements in the harbour and its approaches. In 1846 the present cast-iron lighthouse was erected at a considerable expense. Bridges have also been built, embankments made, tramways laid down, piers constructed, and all the requisite harbour fittings collected as means permitted. A great flood and storm in 1853 washed away the timbers of the pier, which resulted in an erection of an increased size and strength. The harbour revenues increased as trade and commerce opened up and the harbour extended. In 1851, in consequence of the large increase in the trade since the port was made independent in 1842, the harbour was declared of the sixth class, and soon rose considerably in importance. At length, in 1853-4, an agitation commenced for a floating dock, a want which had long been felt. The harbour, though easy of access, was inadequate to the increasing necessities of the times. Contracts were accordingly entered into, and a floating dock commenced to be built, four acres in extent, and capable of accommodating some 150 vessels. At the same time the deepening of the harbour and channel was vigorously carried out. In little more than three years the dock was completed, and a truly noble piece of work it is—with its solid masses of stone, its heavy gates, its broad clear platforms, and its wharfs and sheds. The dock is situated at the west end of the old harbour. Its length is 600 feet, and width 240 feet; consequently it covers an area of a little over three acres. The entrance is fifty feet in width, and the depth of water over the sill is twenty-one feet at spring tides, and about ten feet at neaps. The stone used in the construction of the walls and entrance of the dock is red sandstone—chiefly obtained from quarries in the neighbourhood; the sill is formed of Lazonby stone, and the hollow quoins of granite from the Nith. Great care has been taken and no expense spared in the construction of the gates. The harbour is provided with seven coal drops, and a timber slip has been formed at the south end. With these improvements, the harbour is one of the most complete on the coast. As an additional improvement to the port, and indeed an improvement to the Solway, the trustees have placed at the end of the stone pier a catadroptric sea light, similar to those in use at Sunderland, Hartlepool, and other ports on the east coast, and much approved of in these places. This light will take the place of the present inner light. It will have a range of twelve miles in average weather, and will be the next light in importance to that at St. Bees Head. The outer light will also be altered to a red light, and placed so as to give vessels the lead into the harbour. The lineal quayage at the dock is 1,630 feet, and the additional quay space is 12,000 superficial yards,—of which upwards of 2,000 yards are available for the landage and storage of timber. Nor were the railway company backward in performing their part in this great undertaking. They evinced a most commendable spirit, and went to great expense in remodelling and increasing the facilities for shipping. The whole of their system of lines in connection with the dock were re-arranged; two new bridges were erected, by which a considerable saving of distance was effected; and a number of minor improvements were made, including the erection of the Hurries. A new station is projected at a point nearer the town, and in anticipation of this great improvement a new street has been laid out by the trustees, which runs directly through the town to the site of the proposed new station. The plans for the dock were furnished by Mr. Dees, and they were carried out under the superintendence of Mr. Stanley. Mr. Nelson, of Carlisle, was the contractor, under whom the whole of the dock works were carried out. The cost of the works exceeded £40,000.

The formation and rapid success of the Maryport and Carlisle railway is intimately connected with the progress of Maryport and its harbour. The year 1845 saw the opening of the railway, and the through traffic of the line then commenced. From the subjoined statistics the reader will see how much and how fast the traffic has increased:—

CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.

Maryport chapel, a chapel-of-ease, under Cross Canonby, and dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome edifice in the Early English style. It was erected in 1760, and consecrated on 4th of August, 1763. The cost of erection amounted to £265, Mr. Senhouse giving stones to the amount of £100. It was considerably enlarged in 1837 by the erection of a chancel and transepts, and in 1847 a tower was added, so that the structure at present consists of nave, chancel, transepts, and tower. The church contains a mural monument to the memory of Humphrey Senhouse, Esq., the founder of Maryport, and a tablet to the memory of Mary, wife of Kelsick Wood, of Workington, and daughter of Philip Nelson, of Birkby. A tablet, bearing the following inscription, is inserted in the north wall of the north transept:—"This chapel was enlarged in the year 1837 by voluntary subscription, raised amongst the inhabitants of the town of Maryport, aided by donations from other places, and particularly by means of a munificent donation of four hundred and fifty pounds from the personal representatives of the late William Jenkins, Esq., of Shepton Mallet, a pious and liberal Presbyterian, who, whilst he differed from the form, preserved the doctrine and spirit of the Established Church, and earnestly desired its welfare." The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Mrs. Pocklington Senhouse, whose family have presented since the chapel was erected. Mr. Senhouse, the great-grandfather of Mrs. Senhouse, by whom the chapel was built, gave £200 to obtain Queen Anne's Bounty. The rights of baptism and marriage are performed in the chapel. The living is worth between £150 and £160 per annum, and is derived from Queen Anne's Bounty, land, pews, and surplice fees. The registers of the chapelry extend from 1761 to the present time. At the top of the first page occurs the following memorandum:—"That Maryport chapel was built by Humphrey Senhouse, Esq., A. DOM. 1760, and paid for by about 70 principal inhabitants, who purchased pews after it was built. Joseph Gibbanks, clerk, nominated minister to the said chapel by the ss. Humphrey Senhouse, March 25th, 1761. Galleries erected in the said chapel 1762. And the said chapel consecrated by Charles Littleton, lord bishop of Carlisle, August 4th, 1763."

INCUMBENTS.—Joseph Gibbanks, 1761; Anthony Dixon, 1794; Robert Nicholson Featherston, 1845; William Dewsher, 1850.

There is a parsonage house, purchased and appropriated to the living twelve or thirteen years ago. It is an ordinary dwelling, of modern erection, in no particular style, pleasantly situated on the elevated ground overlooking the harbour.

The Catholic church, dedicated to St. Patrick, is situated in Crosby-street. It is partly in the Early English style of architecture, and was erected in 1844-5, at a cost of about £1,500, inclusive of the purchase of the site, and of the organ. The altar is constructed on the mediæval model, and the chancel and aisle are paved with ornamental tiles. The window over the altar is filled with richly-stained glass, bearing a figure of our Saviour, and emblematical representations of the four Evangelists. The west window contains a small figure of the patron saint of the church. For several years previous to the erection of this church, the Catholics of Maryport assembled for worship in an old house on the quay, and were dependent upon the ministrations of the priest at Carlisle, who visited them and administered the sacraments at stated periods. The Rev. Francis Bernard Williams, O.S.B., the first resident priest in Maryport, was succeeded by the Rev. James Poole, in 1859. There is a presbytery, or dwelling-house for the priest, attached to the church.

The Baptist Chapel, High-street, was erected in 1834, at a cost of about £800. It is a good plain stone building, capable of accommodating 500 persons, and contains an organ, which was placed in the chapel in 1854, at a cost of about £30. The Baptist congregation of Maryport was formed in 1809, when they met for religious worship in a sail-loft in Senhouse-street, the services being conducted by the Rev. Charles Kitchen until the opening of the chapel in 1834, at which date the Rev. Hugh Anderson was appointed minister. This gentleman continued to officiate till 1849, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Daniel Kirkbride, the present minister.

The Friends Meeting House is a plain neat building, situated at the east end of King-street. It was considerably enlarged and improved about sixty years ago, and is capable of seating about 300 people. There is a graveyard attached, but it was closed to interments in 1855.

The Presbyterian (English) Chapel, situated in John-street, and enlarged in 1811, will accommodate about 500 persons. The congregation was formed in 1776, and was soon afterwards placed under the care of the Rev. Mr. Dunn, who was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Wallace, and he, in his turn, by the Rev. Mr. Court. The next minister was the Rev. Mr. Blackwood; after whom comes the Rev. Moses Harvey, in 1844, who was succeeded in 1852 by his brother, the Rev. William Harvey, the present incumbent.

The Presbyterian (United) Chapel, in Crosby-street, was erected in 1831, at a cost of £1,000, and will seat 600 persons. There are about fifty free sittings. The Rev. William Brookless appears to have been the first minister of this chapel. He was appointed in 1831, and, after being pastor for twenty years, was succeeded in 1851 by the present minister, the Rev. John Scott Craig. Previous to the erection of this place of worship the congregation assembled in a factory in the town.

Besides these chapels there are a Primitive Methodist chapel in Eaglesfield-street, erected in 1839; and a Wesleyan Methodist chapel in Well Lane, built in 1806.

SCHOOLS, ETC.

The British School, situated in High-street, was erected in 1845, and was enlarged by the addition of a class-room in 1852, at a total cost of £450, which was raised by subscription, and a grant from the Committee of Privy Council on Education. It will accommodate 180 pupils, and has an average attendance of 165. It is a mixed school, conducted by a master and three pupil teachers, and is under government inspection.

The National School is an excellent stone building, in Eaglesfield-street, erected in 1847. It comprises schools for boys and girls, and will accommodate 300 children, the average number in attendance being, boys, seventy; girls, sixty. It is under government inspection, and is conducted by a master and one pupil teacher. There are also several private schools in the town.

The Mechanics' Institution, held in the Athenæum, was established in 1844. It consists of a reading and newsroom well supplied with newspapers and periodicals; a library containing 850 volumes, principally of new and popular works; and a class-room, in which classes for general instruction are held. Lectures are occasionally delivered, to which members are admitted at a nominal charge. The institution is supported entirely by the contributions of its members, numbering about 160, who pay an annual subscription of 6s. The exertions of the committee in holding annual pic-nics, soirées, &c., have also been a source of profit to the institution. Polytechnic exhibitions upon an extensive scale were held in 1846 and 1849, and attracted great numbers of the public, but proving unremunerative, they have not since been attempted. A general half-yearly meeting is held in April and October, when the members elect by ballot the officers, to whom the government of the institution is confided.

The Maryport Athenæum, erected in 1856, at a cost of £2,300, is the property of a body of shareholders designated in the deed of settlement as the Maryport Public Building Company. It is held in shares of £2 each, vested in trustees, and is managed by a board of directors who are annually appointed by the shareholders. It is one of the largest halls in the county, is no less handsome than commodious, and will contain on the floor, and in the galleries, nearly 1,000 persons. It is decorated with much good taste, and lighted like the House of Commons, from the glass covered roof, an arrangement alike useful and pleasant.

While speaking of the schools, mechanics' institution, &c., of Maryport, we may as well say a few words respecting the local press. Four monthlies have been commenced in the town at different periods, by some one or other of the printers. Of these periodicals three are now extinct, viz., the Royal Sailor, the Locomotive, and the Gazette; the existing one, the Advertiser, was commenced in 1853. Besides these, several publications have been issued here, chiefly volumes of poems, by residents and others.

PROVIDENT INSTITUTIONS.

Among the provident institutions of the town there is one, the success of which deserves special notice—the Savings Bank, established in November, 1842, and which carries on its operations in Senhouse-street. It has been cordially cherished by the inhabitants as a safe and not unprofitable investment for their small yet regular savings, as the following figures will clearly show:—In November, 1846, four years after its commencement, the deposits amounted to £6,569 4s., belonging to 351 depositors, of which number fourteen were charitable and friendly societies. In the same month, 1858, there were 680 depositors, with a total deposit of £15,370 8s. 1d. Most of the leading inhabitants are managers of the bank, to which, no doubt, is owing the confidence of so many of their fellow-townsmen in its results. The respective orders of Free Masons, Oddfellows, and Foresters have lodges in the town, and have proved of the greatest assistance to the great bulk of the population by the timely relief afforded to their sick and distressed members.

CEMETERY.

Maryport Cemetery is situated a little way out of the town, upon a gentle ridge rising from the shore. It was opened in 1856, at a cost of about £3,000. It is a pleasant little spot, already sacred as the last resting place of many who a short time ago took their part in the toil and bustle of the town, "but whose place is now known no more," and with the little chapels that stand within its enclosure, forms an interesting object from the view of Ellenborough Fort.

The Roman station at Ellenborough is situated on a hill above Maryport, on the north side of the mouth of the river Ellen. Its position gives it a commanding view of the Solway Frith and Irish Channel. The camp is a very large one, and the lines of its ramparts are very boldly developed. The eastern side, which is the only one that is not defended by a natural defile, or valley, was protected by a double ditch. There are some traces of masonry also near the gateway on this side, which render it probable that this entrance was guarded by additional outworks. Some portions of this gateway remain; the sill of it strongly marked with chariot wheels. The ruts are about five inches deep, and five feet ten inches apart. Within the station is a well, encased with circular masonry. The interior of the station was excavated in 1766. An account of the appearances which were then observed, will be found at pages 6 and 7. In the grounds of Nether Hall is a small entrenchment containing an area of about an acre and a half; it is in a low and sheltered position, and has probably been a retreat for invalids. Ancient roads have diverged from this station, leading to Bowness, Wigton, and Papcastle. On draining, some time ago, the fields on the line of road leading towards old Carlisle, its pavement was met with, and to a great extent removed. The body of the road was composed of large granite boulders, some of them quarter of a ton in weight; the interstices being filled up with smaller stones. On the south side of this way several slabs of stone were found lying flat on the ground. They probably covered the ashes of the dead; fragments of pottery and glass were found beneath them. Very numerous and important are the remains of antiquity which the station has yielded. With the exception of two altars, they are all carefully preserved in the house and grounds at Nether Hall. Many of the sculptured stones which have been found here are more highly carved and more tastefully designed than is usual in this part of England. An altar to the genius of the place, which has been removed to Whitehaven Castle, is remarkable for its elaborate ornamentation, and bears the following inscription:—

GENIO DEI
FORTUNÆ REDVCI
ROMÆ AETERNÆ
ET FATO LONGO
G. CORNELIANVS
PEREGRINVS

and to propitious Fate,

The last line of the inscription, probably containing the usual formula VSLLM (votum solvens libentissimo merito), has been entirely erased, and we have only two letters left of the name of the town from which Peregrinus came; perhaps it was on the river Serbes. Another altar of peculiarly graceful form, which has been found here, is of importance, as proving the residence here of the "Prima Cohors Hispanorum." In consequence, probably, of some service done to Hadrian this cohort seems, subsequently to the dedication of this altar, to have obtained the rank of Milliaria equitata, and the title of ÆLIA. The inscription may be read—

A plain, square, but now partially fractured, pillar, inscribed, ROMÆ AETERNÆ ET FORTUNÆ REDVCI: on a base, the symbol of the twentieth legion; and a slab which bears testimony to the labours which the second and twentieth legion underwent in constructing the works of this station have also been found here. There is preserved in the piazza at Nether Hall, a carving in relief of a warrior on horseback trampling on a fallen enemy. Besides these, there are several large and instructive altars and funeral slabs, as well as a tablet having a Greek inscription to this effect:—"Aulus Egnatius Pastor set up this to Æsculapius." The minor antiquities consist of fragments of tiles, one of which bears the stamp of the first cohort of the Spaniards, a bronze pot bearing a marked resemblance to some which are still in use, several earthenware vessels of large size and quite perfect, implements of iron, and weapons of war. Amongst the coins which have been found in the station, are a great many forged denarii of Trajan and Hadrian. They are chiefly formed of lead, and are badly made; in some instances the metal has not reached the centre of the mould, and in scarcely any have the edges of the castings been properly dressed. Genuine coin must have been exceedingly scarce amongst the soldiery of the camp, and their credulity very great to allow of the circulation of such base imitations. A large artificial mound or barrow is to the left of the station. The inhabitants had an old tradition respecting it; they conceived it to be the sepulchre of a king. It was opened in 1763, near the centre the pole and shank bones of an ox were found, but neither urns, burnt bones, nor coins were discovered. There is great uncertainty about the ancient name of this fort. Camden pronounced it to be Oleuacum, chiefly influenced by the resemblance in sound between it and the name of the neighbouring village of Ellenborough (Maryport is but of recent origin). This supposition gathers force from the fact that in ancient documents the river Ellen, which gives name to the place, is written "Aine" and "Olue." Modern antiquaries appear, however, to be inclined to make it the site of Glanoventa, which is the name given to it in the Map Britannia Romana, published in the Monumenta Historica Britannica.¹ A Roman altar, found at this station, is now in the grounds of Lorn House, Isle of Man, the residence of the Lieut.-Governor. It bears an inscription, the following reading of which has been suggested by the Rev. J. G. Cumming, of Queen's College, Birmingham:—

Nether Hall, a short distance from the town, on the banks of the Ellen, is the residence of Joseph Pocklington Senhouse, Esq., and is said to have been formerly called "Aneborough" or "Ellenborough Hall," being within the manor of Ellenborough, which includes the chapelry of Maryport and the township of Ellenborough, in Dearham parish.

Senhouse of Nether Hall.

JOSEPH POCKLINGTON SENHOUSE, Esq., of Nether Hall and Barrow House, J.P., and D.L., high sheriff, 1846, born 21st November, 1804; married 13th October, 1835, Elizabeth, eldest daughter and co-heiress of the late Humphrey Senhouse, Esq., of Nether Hall, and has issue,

i. Humphrey, born 13th August, 1843.

ii. Ellen.

iii. Blanche, married 3rd July, 1856, to Alfred Lord Searisdale.

iv. Fanny.

Mr. Pocklington Senhouse assumed his second surname by royal license on the 27th of September, 1842.

The very ancient family of Pocklington is supposed to have derived, at an early period, its appellation from the town of that name in the East Riding of Yorkshire.

THOMAS POCKLINGTON (son of William Pocklington, living temp. Henry VIII.) had the chantry lands in Coddington, Notts, belonging to the Priory of St. Catherine, near Lincoln, settled on him, 4th Elizabeth; his son, JOHN POCKINGTON, of Coddington, was father, by Letitia, his wife, of WILLIAM POCKINGTON, of Coddington, who was one of the grand jury who subscribed and sent instructions to the Knights of the Shire of Nottingham, during the violent debates of the year 1643, in favour of the king. By Mildred, his wife, he left, inter alios, a son, ROGER POCKINGTON, of Newark, father of ROGER POCKINGTON, of Kesham, Notts, who died 31st October, 1720, leaving, by Mary, his wife, daughter of Thomas Saxton, Esq., several children, of whom was

ROGER POCKINGTON, Esq., of Bassingham, co. Lincoln, born in 1660, who married Ann, daughter of Thomas Haslam, Esq., of Newark, and dying in 1751, left a son, WILLIAM POCKINGTON, of Newark, co. Notts, born 1694, who married 1734, Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel Rastall, Esq., of the Friary, Newark, and died July, 1764, having had issue,

i. ROGER.

ii. Joseph, of Muskharn House, Notts, and Barrow House, co. Cumberland, born 29th April, 1736, died unmarried 31st May, 1817.

iii. Mary, died unmarried, 8th March, 1809.

The eldest son,

ROGER POCKINGTON, of Winthorp Hall, co. Notts, born 25th October, 1734, married 2nd March, 1774, Mary, eldest daughter and co-heiress of William Roe, Esq., of Sudbrook Hall, near Ancaster, co. Lincoln, and died on 12th October, 1810, leaving issue, ROGER.

Elizabeth, married 12th September, 1804, the Rev. Godfrey Gilbert Cooper, rector of Ewhurst, co. Sussex; died 19th February, 1841.

The son,

ROGER POCKINGTON, Esq., of Carlton House, co. Notts, born 10th August, 1775, married 2nd February, 1802, Jane, daughter of Sir James Campbell, Knt., of Inverneil, co. Argyll, and died 25th April, 1847, having had issue,

i. Roger, in holy orders, M.A., vicar of Walesby, co. Notts, born 15th November, 1802; married 17th November, 1831, Mary, second daughter of George Hulton, Esq., of Carlton-upon-Trent, and has issue,

1. Roger, born 22nd September, 1832.

2. Bertram Milford, born 9th October, 1835.

3. Evelyn, born 23rd March, 1847.

4. Duncan, born 19th June, 1841.

1. Mary Jane.

2. Frances Elizabeth.

ii. JOSEPH, the present Joseph Pocklington Senhouse, Esq., of Nether Hall.

iii. Evelyn Henry Frederic, lieut.-col., born 18th January, 1811; married 9th August, 1847, Barbara Campbell, only child of A. Scott Broomfield, Esq., of Hollywood, co. Wicklow, and has issue,

1. Evelyn, born 13th June, 1843.

2. Frederic Charles, born 15th June, 1849.

3. Archibald James, born 9th June, 1861.

1. Alice Jane.

2. Edith Harriet.

i. Mary Elizabeth Agnes.

ii. Jane Augusta, married 20th March, 1832, James Archibald Campbell, Esq., of Inverawe, co. Argyll, and died 11th June, 1842.

FAMILY OF SENHOUSE.

The family De Seynhouse, De Sevenhouse, or De Senhouse, derives its name from Hall Sevenhouse, or Senhouse, a district of Cumberland. The first of its members upon record,

WALTER DE SEYNHOUSE had a grant of the fifth part of the township of Bolton, in the parish of Gosforth, from Alan de Copeland, and likewise a grant of other lands in the same parish from William de Weyberdwaiite. These grants are both without date, but both are witnessed by Sir Adam de Lamplugh, Knt., who lived in the times of Richard I. and King John. From Walter descended

JOHN SENHOUSE, who married in 1528, Elizabeth, elder sister and co-heiress of Richard Eglesfield, son of Gawen Eglesfield, of Aneburgh Hall, High Sheriff of the co. of Cumberland, in 9th Henry VIII. (which Gawen was the descendant in a right line from John de Eylesfield, the elder brother of Robert de Eylesfield, the founder of Queen's College, Oxford). This John Senhouse died 1508, leaving four sons, viz.:-

- i. THOMAS, ancestor of the family of SENHOUSE, of Senhouse Hall, Cumberland, now extinct in the male line.
- ii. Peter, of Ellenborough Hall, died unmarried.
- iii. JOHN, of whom presently.
- iv. Richard, incumbent of Cloughton, Lancashire.

The third son,

JOHN SENHOUSE, of Ellenborough, is the person whom Camden mentions in his Britannia, as having collected with great industry numerous Roman stones, altars, lavers, and statues, with inscriptions, which he had placed with much taste in his houses and buildings; and as having entertained in 1599 the celebrated antiquary himself, and Sir Robert Cotton, of Conington, with great civility. He married ANNE, daughter of John Ponsoby, Esq., of Hale Hall, and had, with other issue,

- i. PETER, his successor.
- ii. Simon, who was murdered near Dovenby, by Skelton, of Armthwaite.
- iii. Richard, in holy orders, D.D., fellow of St. John's, Cambridge, afterwards dean of Gloucester, and subsequently bishop of Carlisle.
- i. Eleanor, married to Henry Fletcher, Esq., of Moresby Hall.
- ii. Jane, married to Blomchessett Tindley.
- iii. Elizabeth, married to William Briscoe, Esq., of Crofton.

Mr. Senhouse died 1601, and was succeeded by his eldest son, PETER SENHOUSE, Esq., of Alneburgh, or Ellenborough Hall, otherwise Nether Hall, who was constituted by letters patent (20th James I.) escheator of the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and served the office of sheriff for the former shire, 3rd Charles I. He married Frances, daughter of Lancelot Skelton, Esq., of Armthwaite Castle, in Cumberland, and had, with other children, JOHN, his successor, and Thomas, of Long Newton, in Cumberland. Peter Senhouse died 1654, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

JOHN SENHOUSE, Esq., of Alneburgh Hall, who married Elizabeth, third daughter of Humphrey Wharton, Esq., of Gillingwood, co. York, and had, with other issue,

- i. Humphrey, who died before his father, without issue.
- ii. JOHN, successor to his father.
- iii. Richard.
- iv. Patience, who married 1635, Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Thomas Bromfield, Esq., of Hames Hall, Cumberland, and relict of Henry Dalton, Esq., of Brigham. This gentleman's great-grandson,

HUMPHREY SENHOUSE, Esq., of Bridgefoot, co. Cumberland, J.P., major of the Cumberland Militia, married Isabella, daughter of William Ponsoby, Esq., of Whitehaven (by Catherine, his wife, daughter and co-heiress of John Senhouse, Esq., of the same place), and left issue at his decease, in 1829, Humphrey, a captain in the Cumberland Militia, married, and has issue.

William, of Lincoln's Inn, barrister-at-law, who died 1839.
Catherine, married to Ralph Cook, Esq., of Camerton Hall.
Mary.

- i. Margaret, married to Henry Eglesfield, Esq., of Cross Canonby, and died 1691.
- ii. Elizabeth, married to William Nicholson, Esq.

Mr. Senhouse died 1667, and was succeeded by his son,

JOHN SENHOUSE, Esq., of Nether Hall, captain in King Charles I.'s army. He married first, Elizabeth, daughter of Jerome Tolhurst, Esq., lieutenant-governor and M.P. of Carlisle, but had no issue. He married secondly, Mary, daughter of Andrew Huddleston, Esq., of Hutton John, Cumberland, and had issue,

- i. JOHN, his heir.
- ii. Andrew, killed at sea, fighting against the French.
- iii. Dudley, drowned in the river Lune.
- iv. Peter, married Catherine, daughter of Skelton of Branthwaite, and had issue,

- i. John, who had a son, Peter, who died unmarried.
2. Richard, M.D., left a son, Peter, who died unmarried in 1700.
- i. Catherine, married to William Ponsoby, Esq., of Whitehaven.

- v. HUMPHREY, of whom presently.
- i. Dorothy, married to Patricius Senhouse, of Hames Hall.
- ii. Mary, married to Richard Richmond, Esq., of Crosby.

Captain Senhouse died 1667, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

JOHN SENHOUSE, Esq., of Nether Hall, who married Jane, daughter of Richard Lupton, Esq., of Dovenby Hall, Cumberland, by whom (who married secondly, Charles Orfeur, Esq., of Plumblund) he had surviving issue at his decease in 1694,

- i. Mary, first married to Francis Skelton, Esq., of Branthwaite, and secondly, to Richard Butler, Esq., of Rockcliffe, Lancashire.
- ii. Jane, married to John Stephenson, Esq., of Bakelod, Isle of Man.
- iii. Frances, died unmarried.
- iv. Grace, married to Richard Viscount Shannon.
- v. Isabel, married to John Fletcher, Esq., of Clia Hall, Cumberland.
- vi. Elizabeth, died unmarried.

These ladies who inherited as co-heirs to their father, disposed of the demesne of Nether Hall and manor of Alneburgh, or Ellenborough, to their uncle,

HUMPHREY SENHOUSE, who thus became possessed of Nether Hall, or Ellenborough. He married Eleanor, daughter of William Kirby, Esq., of Aslack, co. Lancaster, and had issue,

- i. Joseph Richard, who died unmarried in 1718.
- ii. HUMPHREY, his successor.
- iii. William John, who died unmarried in 1727.
- i. Bridget, married to John Christian, Esq., of Unerigg Hall, and had, with other issue, a daughter, Mary, who married Edmund Law, bishop of Carlisle.
- ii. Johanna, married to Gustavus Thompson, of Arleley.

Mr. Senhouse, who served the office of Sheriff of Cumberland 1st George I. died 1738, and was succeeded by his son,

HUMPHREY SENHOUSE, of Nether Hall, who married Mary, daughter and ultimately co-heir of Sir George Fleming, Bart., of Rydal, bishop of Carlisle, and had issue,

- i. HUMPHREY, his successor.
- ii. William, born in 1741, a lieutenant R.N., and subsequently surveyor general of Barbadoes and the Leeward Islands. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Samson Wood, Esq., of Barbadoes, speaker of the House of Assembly, and, dying in 1800, left, amongst other issue,
1. William Wood, commander R.N., died before his father, in 1803.
2. Samson, of Ponsoby, Cumberland, married, 1801, Mary, daughter and co-heir of Nicholas le Mesurier, Esq., of the Island of Guernsey, but had no issue.
3. Humphrey Fleming (Sir), post-captain R.N., K.C.H., married, 1810, Elizabeth, daughter and eventually co-heiress of Vice-admiral John Manley, of Plymouth, and left two daughters, Elizabeth Maidey and Mary le Fleming.

4. George Septimus, Lieut. R.N., died unmarried, 1808.
5. Edward Hooper, commander R.N., married, 1815, Elizabeth Bishop, daughter of John Spooner, Esq., of Barbadoes, and has issue.
6. James Lowther, in holy orders, perpetual curate of Sawley, Derbyshire, and rector of Gosforth, married, 1824, Miss Elizabeth Brooks.
1. Mary Ward, married to John Barrow, Esq., of Barbadoes.
2. Johanna.
3. Sarah.

III. Joseph (Sir), born 1749, in the E. I. Co.'s Naval Service, knighted 1783, married Mary, daughter and co-heiress of John Ashley, Esq., of Ashley St. Legers, co. Northampton, and, dying in 1829, left surviving issue,

1. Joseph Ashley, H.E.I.C.S.
2. Michael le Fleming, died 1836.
3. Humphrey Dykes Ballanyne.
4. William, an officer in the army.
1. Maria, married to Joseph Gaiskell, M.D., of Bath.
2. Catherine.
3. Sarah.

a. Mary, married to Robert Gale, Esq., of London.

Mr. Senhouse was high sheriff of co. Cumberland in the 16th George II. He died in 1770, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

HUMPHREY SENHOUSE, Esq., of Nether Hall, Lieut.-col. of the Cumberland Militia, M.P. for Cockermouth in 1786, and for

Cumberland in 1790. He married, 1768, Catherine, daughter of Thomas Wood, Esq., of Beadnell, in Northumberland, and died in 1814, leaving an only surviving child, HUMPHREY SENHOUSE, Esq., of Alneburgh, or Ellenborough, otherwise Nether Hall, co. Cumberland; born 27th November, 1773; high sheriff, 1826; married, 29th Sept., 1803, Elizabeth Frances, daughter and co-heiress of Robert Charles Greaves, Esq. (who afterwards assumed the surname of Ley), of Ingleby Hall, in Derbyshire, and had issue,

1. HUMPHREY, born 16th April, 1809, deceased.
1. ELIZABETH, married, 1835, to Joseph Pocklington, Esq., the present Joseph Pocklington Senhouse, Esq., of Nether Hall.
- II. Catherine.
- III. Ellen, married, 18th April, 1837, Capt. Goldie Taubman, of the Nursery, Isle of Man, and died on 28th January, 1885, leaving a son.

CROSTHWAITE PARISH.

CROSTHWAITE parish, one of the largest and most interesting in the Lake District, is upwards of ten miles in length, and eight in breadth, stretching westward from Helvellyn and Great Dodd to Great Gavel, Grassmoor, Grisedale Pikes, and other mountains; and northward from the boundary of Westmoreland to Skiddaw and Saddleback. It contains the beautiful Lakes of Derwentwater and Thirlmere, and has that of Bassenthwaite at its northern extremity. The parish is very extensive, containing scenery not to be surpassed, whether we regard the varied beauties of Derwentwater, the stern majesty of Thirlmere, the lovely rural meads of Newlands, the sublime gorge of Borrowdale, or the lone grandeur of Watendlath. At Borrowdale is found the celebrated plumage, or black lead, and in other places lead and copper ore are found. This extensive parish includes the townships of Keswick, St. John Casterigg and Wythburn, Underskiddaw, Borrowdale, Coledale, or Portingscale, Braithwaite, Thornthwaite, and the chapelry of Newlands, whose united area is 58,330 statute acres. Greta Mills and Briery Cottages, included in this area, are deemed extra-parochial. Previous to the formation of Derwent Ward, Borrowdale, Braithwaite, Newlands, and Thornthwaite, were in Allerdale-above-Derwent Ward, and the remainder in Allerdale-below-Derwent Ward, but the whole parish is now in Derwent Ward.

UNDERSKIDAW.

The population of this township in 1801 was 338; in 1811, 380; in 1821, 487; in 1831, 477; in 1841, 549; and in 1851, 508. Its rateable value is £3,500. Although the parish church, Grammar School, &c., are in this township, yet it has no village of its own name, but comprises the hamlets of Great Crosthwaite, Appletwhaite, High Hall, and Millbeck, with several neat mansions. There are two coarse woollen factories in the township, one situated at Appletwhaite and the other at Millbeck.

The manor of Brundholme, which includes the entire township, was part of the possessions given by Henry Earl of Northumberland to Henry VIII., who granted it to the Dalston family, one of whom, John Dalston, Esq., held it in 1578, under a reserved rent of 22s., due to the Earl of Northumberland. It subsequently came into possession of the Tolsons, who sold it to the Relphs, from whom it appears to have passed to the Hassels of Palemain, who sold it to the Bishop of Llandaff. The celebrated mountain, Skiddaw, extends into several parishes and townships—that part which is in the parish of Crosthwaite is within the manor of Brundholme and the township of Underskiddaw. This was enclosed by an act of parliament, passed in 1808, for enclosing the manor of Brundholme, and divided chiefly between the Bishop of Llandaff, Sir John Benn Walsh, Bart., and John Spedding, Esq., of Mirehouse—the summit belongs to Sir H. R. Vane, Bart. The tenants of the manor are enfranchised. The principal landowners are Sir John Walsh; Abraham Fisher, Esq.; and T. S. Spedding, Esq.

THE CHURCH.

The church of Crosthwaite, dedicated to St. Kentigern, stands on a slight green knoll, near the centre of the beautiful vale of Keswick, about midway between the lakes of Derwentwater and Bassenthwaite, half a mile from the town of Keswick and somewhat farther from Skiddaw. It is a spacious structure, consisting exteriorly of nave, aisle, clerestory, western tower, and south porch, but without a distinctly marked chancel. The walls, which are coated with rough-cast and white-wash (the parapets, battlements, and dressings of the doorways and windows excepted), are thick, and strengthened with buttresses. The prevailing style is Debased Perpendicular, but many remnants of the preceding styles may be discovered in various parts of the building. It formerly possessed a chantry dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene of Keswick, but by whom founded, or at what period, we are entirely ignorant. From the circumstance of the eastern end of the south aisle, which had been appropriated for the purposes of the chantry, being also used as a place of interment by the early members of the Derwentwater family, and adorned with their monuments, it is very probable that it was established by them. For the last century the exterior of the church seems to have undergone little or no change. A drawing in pencil of its appearance in 1745 is preserved in Crosthwaite's Museum. In the year 1818 the old leaden roof, which had become full of holes, was stripped off, and one of slate substituted. About the same date much of the ancient glass with which the windows of the church had been decorated was found to have been removed by the glazier to whom the repair of the windows had been intrusted. Not being looked after, he was in the habit of taking out bits of the coloured glass, so that in process of time he carried away all except the pictured effigy of St. Anthony, the head of St. Mary Magdalene, and the Ratcliff arms, making of the abstracted pieces small boxes for sale or disposal among his friends. The church underwent a partial repair in 1829. In 1841 it was found to be in a greatly dilapidated state, the roof of 1812 had become decayed, and on the point of falling in; and the exterior walls were in a very unsatisfactory condition. Such was the state of the venerable edifice when James Stanger, Esq., of Lairthwaite, proposed to restore and embellish it principally at his own expense. The opportunity that thus presented itself was not to be neglected, the parishioners at once agreed, the necessary ecclesiastical consent was soon obtained, and the work of restoration was immediately commenced under the directions of G. G. Scott, Esq., from whose plans and under whose judicious superintendence the church has been brought to its present state of beauty and perfection. The entire cost, with the exception of £400 subscribed by the parishioners for the expenses of the roof of the nave, being borne by Mr. Stanger.

The church at present consists of a nave and chancel, with north and south aisles, a vestry taken off the west end of the south aisle, a south porch, a chancel door, and a western tower, containing six fine-toned bells, hung in 1707, previous to which time the peal consisted of four bells only. Viewed on the exterior the church presents an embattled square tower about sixty feet in height, with stair turret at the south-western corner. In the western front of the tower, about midway from its base, is a large perpendicular window of four lights, and on each side of the story above is a small stone mullioned round-headed belfry window of three lights. A handsome south porch, erected in 1840, occupies the site of the old one—its coped gable terminating in a floriated cross. There is also a doorway of Early English character near the east end of the south aisle of the chancel, on the right hand of which is a small niche with a mutilated stoup, formerly used to contain holy water. The doors are of oak, studded with nail-heads, and have large scroll hinges of ornamental character and ancient design. The windows on the south side of the church are six in number, and are all of three stone mullioned semi-circular headed lights each, under square-headed frames. At the west end of the south aisle of the nave is an ogee, arched stone mullioned two-light trefoiled window. On the north side of the church there are eight stone mullioned windows set within square frames. Three of them are of two lights each, with trefoiled heads under ogee arches; two of two lights, with cinquefoil heads under lancet arches; one three-light trefoil window under an ogee arch; and two round-headed of two and three lights respectively. In the centre of the east end is the large pointed east window, designed after the old one. It is divided by simple chamfered stone mullions, with three lights, the head being filled by very neat foliated intersecting tracery. The window at the end of the north aisle has heavy stone mullions, and consists of two trefoil lights under ogee arches. The window at the end of the south aisle consists of three round-headed lights, with square stone mullions. The roofs are covered with slate; and those of the nave and chancel, on the south and east, have an embrasured parapet, the battlements of which harmonise with those on the tower. The roof of the south aisle is less imposing. On the north, placed at nearly equal intervals, are six clerestory stone mullioned windows of three semi-circular headed lights each; and on the south are seven, all of very late Perpendicular. The interior comprises a tower, open to the nave by a lofty pointed arch, and a nave and chancel, which are separated from the aisles on each side by six plain octagonal pillars and two engaged ones. The bases of the piers are plain, and all have capitals to match. The two western arches are filled with panelling, which partly encloses the vestry taken off the south, and the corresponding portion of the north aisle. The font stands a little to the north of the west end of the nave, and immediately below the gallery; it is of stone, and has a pyramidal cover of deal, stained or painted to imitate oak. The base of the font is square, and is surmounted by a sloping surface, with mutilated sculptures, from which rises an octagonal pedestal, bearing on seven of its sides carving, in high relief, of windows with three lights, of the Decorated Period, and on the eighth side is represented a window of the same number of lights, but in the Early Perpendicular style. The upper portion of the pedestal is quadrangular in shape, and bears four sculptures, which are, however, so mutilated that they cannot be defined. This is surmounted by the bowl of the font itself, which is octangular in form, and has carved on its lower part, in old characters, a Latin inscription, now for every useful purpose illegible. On the sides of the font are some ancient sculptures rudely executed. On the first side is a representation of the Tree of Life; the second, on a triangular shield, displays the emblems of Passion; the third face typifies the word proceeding out of the mouth of the Almighty to all parts of the earth; the fourth symbolises the Trinity; the fifth is difficult to make out, but some appearances like vine leaves may be traced; the sixth, within a triangular shield, has Aaron's rod, and in the corners smaller escutcheons of the same form—that on the dexter base of the larger, as nearly as the almost obliterated state of the sculpture will permit examination, is charged with the armorial bearings of the Derwentwater family, or of the Muttons of Cockermouth; and the one on the sinister base is likewise much defaced, though something like unto fretté, or chequy, on the lower part of the shield is discernible; the seventh face depicts the Tree of Knowledge, with the tempter of mankind in the form of a dragon, passing through the trunk; on the eighth face, within another escutcheon of triangular shape, is the royal arms of England, as borne by Edward III. This face likewise has two lesser sentiform figures, that next the dexter base of the royal arms is charged with a crescent, and the one near the sinister base carries three lucas hauriant, the bearings of the Lucies, lords of Egremont, Allerdale, and Cockermouth. The organ and singers' gallery occupy the west end of the nave. The pulpit and reading desk are features of the interior which add much to its general effect. The former, which is hexagonal, stands against the south pier at the joining of the nave and chancel, and on a line with the reading desk. It terminates in a single pedestal, resting upon a plinth of the same design. The sides are panelled and filled with recessed pointed cinquefoil arches, rising from several circular pillars, above which an eagle with expanded wings supports the bookboard. The reading desk is slightly elevated, and stands on the north side of the nave, opposite to the pulpit. It is an irregular pentagon of handsome design. Light pillars, which rise from an appropriate base, support cinquefoil arches, and form small pierced panels. Above them the bookboard rests; and beneath it are half-length figures of the four Evangelists, with their customary emblems. The chancel is raised two steps above the floor of the nave, from which it is separated by the pulpit and reading desk, and the high backs of such of the stalls as from their transverse position are turned towards the east, and mark the distinction between the two principal divisions of the church. Wainscots of oak open on the upper part, and are adorned with plain shields in the expanded heads of the balusters or rails, which sustain heavy embattled architraves, from the backs of the remainder of the stalls. They extend between the first arches from the nave, and, partially flanking the chancel on the north and south, further indicate the separation of that portion of the church from its aisles. The stalls in the chancel, eight of which face the east, are twenty in number, and with the numerous oaken benches, which were rendered necessary by the claims to sittings of the impropriators, are of oak. These benches are worked in carved panels in front, and further distinguished by high raised standards, terminated by carved finials, and with the benches in its aisles, which have only plain slightly raised ends, face either north or south. The altar table, chairs, and rails, are of oak. In the angle formed by the east and south walls is a plain and perfect piscina, with a segmental head. The reredos extends across the entire width of the chancel. It is divided into nine narrow upright square-headed panels, filled with cinquefoil arches. The middle panel is of purple diapered ground enclosed by a border of oak and vine leaves following the course of the arch. It contains a cross floree, emblazoned in gold and colours, within whose radiated centre is the sacred monogram, surrounded by a gold circle, bearing in red and black letters the sentence: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." The two next panels on each side contain the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments. The east end of the south aisle, generally known as the Derwentwater, or Lord's Chapel, as well as the Magdalene chantry, is divided from the chancel by an arch whose span is considerably wider than that of the corresponding arch on the north side. Here for many generations rested the remains of the Derwentwater family, until their removal to the burial ground, previous to the restoration of the church. This was also the depository of two of those interesting relics of bygone days, their sculptured effigies, which are now located near the south end of the altar rails, upon a bed of red sandstone, enclosed by an open screen of the same material, on the top of which rests a heavy slab of marble inlaid with the brass noticed below. The recumbent effigies are those of a knight and his lady, and are conjectured to commemorate one of the Derwentwaters and his wife, but we have no account given of the particular individuals; the general supposition, however, is that they represent the last Sir John Derwentwater and his wife, who flourished in the reign of Henry VI., and the preceding sovereigns of England. The figures are habited in the costume prevalent at that period. Besides these effigies there is a sepulchral brass in perfect preservation. It is laid down on the slab of grey marble mentioned above, and is known as the "Radclyffe brass." Like the sculptured effigies, it also contains figures of a knight and his lady. The figure of the knight is sheathed in complete armour of plate, martial and serviceable in all its appointments. The lady is represented in the dress worn by females of rank during the latter part of the reign of Henry VII. At the feet of the figures is the following inscription in black letter:—"Of your charity pray for the soule of Sir John Ratcliff, Knyght, and for the state of Dame Alice, his wyfe; which Sir John dyed y^e 2nd day of February, A.D. 1527, on whose soule Jesus have mercy." From this inscription it is apparent that Lady Ratcliff was alive at the period of her husband's death; and it is probable that not only was this brass under her directions placed upon his tomb, but also that other mark of hereditary distinction, his armorial escutcheon in stained glass in the window, was likewise set up in her lifetime. Above the head of the knight is a shield charged with argent, a bend engrained sable, the bearing of the Ratcliffs; and at his feet another, or, two lionsels passant azure, the device of the family from which Lady Ratcliff was descended. The shield above Dame Alice also carries her paternal cognizance, and upon that below are her husband's arms repeated, with the additional charge of a cinquefoil, or rose in the sinister chief, for a due difference of the younger house from which he sprung. The walls in the interior of the church are in places incrustured with handsome marble tablets, commemorative of the Wrens and Scotts of Casterigg; the Brownriggs of Ormathwaite; the Calverts of Greta Bank; Peachey of the Island; Bristow of Portinscale; Jacksons of Armboth; the Dentons and Edmondsons, Fishers, Whites, and Hodgsons, of Keswick; Leathes of Dalehead, and others; but such do not call for more than this concise mention.

The windows filled with stained glass are but six in number. They are all the production of Wailes of Newcastle, and are not the least beautiful specimens of his triumphs in glass work. They are designed, with the exception of the large east window, which is after the fourteenth century, in conformity with the style of window decoration which prevailed in the succeeding age. The eastern window, as also the windows at the ends of the south aisle, are the gifts of the gentleman at whose expense chiefly the church has been restored. The large window is very fine, and contains representations of the following incidents in the life of the Redeemer:—Christ Washing the feet of the Apostles, the Last Supper, the Agony in the Garden, Christ bearing his Cross, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection. The upper portion of the window is filled with tracery, containing the Ascension, with figures of angels holding labels and harps; and, above all, the Lamb of God; the whole being interspersed with devices, which, by the disposition and tone of the predominating colours, produce a brilliant example of art, full of fine effects and devotional tendencies. The last window of the south aisle is remarkable for its appropriate design, and the beautiful transparency of its colouring. It contains pictures of Mary Magdalene anointing the Saviour's feet, the Three Maries at the sepulchre, and Christ and Magdalene. Above the second of these subjects, replaced in its old position, appears in ancient stained glass, the head of Magdalene, and below it the armorial escutcheon of the family, for whom the voice of intercession rose within the consecrated walls, being, quarterly, first, Ratcliffe; second and third, Someri de Dudley; fourth, Argent, two bars gules, on a canton of the second a cinquefoil of the first, Derwentwater. In the vestry window are representations of St. Kentigern and St. Cuthbert. The east window of the north aisle, known as the "Hulton Window," from its having been erected by a gentleman of that name in the neighbourhood, displays in the richest colours the Adoration and Transfiguration, with some beautiful tracery and the armorial bearings of the donor. The adjoining window, on the north side of the same aisle, the "Speddington Window," consists of three lights, in the first of which there is a beautiful figure of the Blessed Virgin, with the text "Ecce ex hoc beatam me vocant omnes generationes," "Behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed," at her feet. The second light has the Saviour of the world bearing a sceptre and globe, surmounted by a cross, with this sentence beneath, "Ego sum resurrectio et vita," "I am the resurrection and life." In the third light is St. John, with the Eagle; and below, the words "Ecce filius tuus"—Behold thy Son. Underneath the Saviour is a circle bearing an inscription setting forth by whose liberality the window was erected in 1846. The second window from the east end of the south aisle is known as the Memorial Window. It was erected at the expense of the parishioners, to commemorate the restoration and embellishment of the church by Mr. Stanger. It is of three lights, each filled with two subjects taken from the 25th chapter of the Gospel of St. Matthew, and representing what are generally six of the corporal works of mercy. Those in the first light illustrate the words "I was an hungry, and ye gave me meat;" "I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink." Those in the second light, "I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me." Those in the third, "I was sick, and ye visited me;" "I was in prison, and ye came unto me." Underneath these pictures is the text from the same chapter, "Verily I say unto you; inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." On the sill beneath is affixed a brass tablet, with the following inscription:—"A memorial window by the parishioners gratefully to commemorate the munificent restoration and embellishment of this church by James Stanger, Esquire, A. D. 1845. The Rev. James Lynn, vicar; Henry Wood, George Williamson, churchwardens." In the second window from the east end of the north aisle is the half-length figure of a priest, with bell, book, and crutch, or staff, generally supposed to represent St. Anthony. The principal object of interest in this church is, however, the monument raised to the memory of the poet, Southey, and one more chaste in design and execution as well as appropriate to the position it occupies, it would be difficult to conceive. It is situated in the south aisle of the chancel, opposite the door, and close to the oaken wainscot, which separates that division of the church from the aisle. It consists of a full-length recumbent figure, in white marble, resting on an altar-tomb of Caen stone, the sides of which are divided into five square compartments or panels, the centre one displaying an empty shield. The figure of the poet, clad in academic robes, reclines upon a couch, the head and shoulders elevated on cushions. The left hand rests upon the bosom; and the face turned towards the spectator, is cast in meditation, as if musing on the contents of an open volume, which in the intensity of mental abstraction has, together with the hand that held it, dropped listlessly by the side. The likeness is said to be perfect, and the whole monument reflects the highest credit upon Lough, by whom it was executed. The west end of the tomb bears the following inscription:—

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF
ROBERT SOUTHEY, WHOSE MORTAL REMAINS ARE INTERRED
IN THE ADJOINING CHURCHYARD.
HE WAS BORN AT BRISTOL, AUGUST XII, MDCCCLXIV, AND DIED,
AFTER A RESIDENCE OF NEARLY XL YEARS, AT GRETA HALL, IN THIS PARISH,
MARCH XXI, MDCCCLXIII.
THIS MEMORIAL WAS ERECTED BY THE FRIENDS OF
ROBERT SOUTHEY.

At the east end are the following lines of Wordsworth, his early friend, and successor in the laureateship.

Ye vales and hills whose beauty hither drew
The poet's steps, and fixed them here—on you
His eyes have closed! And ye loved books, no more Shall Southey feed upon your precious lore,
To works that ne'er shall forfeit their renown
Adding immortal labours of his own—
Whether he traced historic truth, with zeal
For the State's guidance, or the Church's weal:
Or fancy disciplined with studious art
Informed his pen, or wisdom of the heart,
Or judgment sanctioned in the patriot's mind,
By reverence for the rights of all mankind,
Wide were his aims, yet in no human breast
Could private feelings find a holier rest—
His joys, his griefs, have vanished like a cloud
From Skiddaw's top; but he to Heaven was vowed Through a life long and pure; and Christian faith
Calmed in his soul the fear of change and death.

Leading round the tower of the church, a well-trodden path leads to Southey's grave. A plain monumental tablet records his death and that of his wife. The grave is surrounded by others of his household.

Southey tells us that "Alice de Romili, heiress of Egremont and Skipton, who, in the reign of Stephen, or his successor, married the lord of Allerdale, is supposed to have been the person who founded and endowed this church, and subsequently gave it to Fountains Abbey. It was soon afterwards appropriated to that monastery, the collation being reserved to the Bishop of Carlisle. William Fitz-Duncan, the husband of this Alice, was son to the Earl of Murray, and brother to David King of Scotland, and this may perhaps explain why the church was dedicated to the Scotch Saint Kentigern, Bishop of Glasgow, and patron of that cathedral." This is the only writer who states distinctly that the Lady Alice de Romley was the founder of Crosthwaite church, the local and other writers who have noticed it, merely stating that it was anciently rectorial, and was given to Fountains Abbey by this lady, and soon after made appropriate, the presentation of the vicar being reserved to the Bishop of Carlisle. Such being all the knowledge we possess relating to the first establishment of a church at Crosthwaite, we may reasonably conjecture that its antiquity dates to a more remote period than that in which Alice de Romley lived, and that it owes its origin to the Scots, by whom it was erected and dedicated to one of their tutelar saints. But be that as it may, we know that it is very ancient, and was at an early period given to Fountains Abbey, in Yorkshire. In the "Valor of Pope Nicholas," taken in — the church of Crosthwaite is valued at £30 13s. 4d., and the vicarage at £20. In the reign of Edward II., in 1318, it is returned at the reduced valuation of £10 for the church, and £1 for the vicarage. Its value in the King's Book is £30 8s. 11d. In 1832 it was certified to the Parliamentary Commissioners as of the average annual value of £312, and in 1845 the tithes were commuted for a yearly rent in the following proportions:—Keswick, vicarial, £48 13s. 4d., and £7 7s. 6d. to the impropricators, who are also the landowners. Under Skiddaw, vicarial, £79 4s. 6d., and £18 18s. 4d. as above; and to Sir John Walsh and Abraham Fisher, Esq., £100 7s., and to Jane Spedding, 10s. Borrowdale, vicarial, £81 9s. 2d. St. John's Castlerigg and Wythburn, vicarial, £118 18s. 11d. Over Derwent, £104 7s. 3d., vicarial; and to the impropricators, £103 3s. 6d.; and £2 8s. to Sir John Walsh and Abraham Fisher, Esq. Total, £432 13s. 2d. vicarials; to the impropricators, who are also the landowners, £283 5s. 4d.; and to Sir John Walsh and Abraham Fisher, Esq., £102 15s. There was formerly a chantry here, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, as we have seen above, and endowed with lands and tenements, which, after the dissolution of the religious houses, was granted to one Thomas Brende, scrivener, of London. From the survey of Henry VIII. we learn the following particulars relating to this chantry:—"Johu Steyle, chantry priest of the chantry of St. Mary of Keswick, within the parish of Crosthwaite, which is worth, one year with another, on oath made, £4 19s. 7d." From the certificates of surveys of chantries within the county of Cumberland, made pursuant to a commission of 37th Henry VIII., and preserved among the records of the late Court of Augmentation, it appears that the lands assigned for the support of the chaplain of this chantry were in possession of eight individuals, whose names, with the respective rents payable by each, are there set forth. A certificate under another survey made pursuant to a commission of 2nd Edward VI., certifies under the various heads of inquiry that the parish of Crosthwaite contained "M' M' howsclinge people," or persons of sufficient age, accustomed to receive the holy communion; and that the chantry in the church was used "to celebrate masse." That Gawen Brathwayte, aged thirty-five years, who was the incumbent, had the clear yearly revenue of the same for his salary, and that he had nothing else for his support. The parish registers commence in 1562, and for the most part appear to have been carefully kept, except during from 1658 to 1669, in which period only about a dozen baptisms are entered, and no marriages nor funerals.

VICARS.—Jeffrey Wotheunstead, 1294; Richard de Graystoke, 1313; Thomas Lime, occurs in 1354; John Henry de Broughston, 1359; John de Walton, 1360; Peter de Mosland, appointed curate, the vicarage being vacant, 1361; John Herynge, 1395; John Ratcliff. —; John Maybrake, 1507; William Bennett, 1508; Peter Mayson, 1585; Robert Beek, 1592; Peter Beek, 1597; Giles Robinson, 1602; Isaac Singleton, 1623; John Winter, 1643; William Meoles, died 1653; Percivall Radcliffe, 1654; Henry Marshall, 1661; Richard Lowrie, 1667; Thomas Tallie, 1710; Thomas Nicholson, 1737; Thomas Christian 1728; James S. Lushington, 1770; Henry Denton, 1780; Isaac Denton, 1786; James Lynn, 1820; Henry Gipps, 1855.

The vicarage is situate on an eminence between the church and the town of Keswick, and commands beautiful views of Derwentwater and the surrounding mountain scenery.

In the year 1300, Isabel, the second wife of William de Fortibus, third earl of Albermarle, lord of Skipton, and who, in right of her descent from Alice de Romley, inherited not only that great fief, but also a moiety of the barony of Allerdale and of the honour of Cockermouth, being summoned to prove by what right she held a market at Crosthwaite, denied she held any market there, but that the men of the neighbourhood met at the church on festival days and there sold flesh and fish; and that she, as lady of the manor of Derwent Fells, took no toll. It would seem that this practice obtained, for in 1806, the inhabitants of Cockermouth petitioned parliament on the subject, representing that there was a great concourse of people every Sunday at Crosthwaite church, where corn, flour, beans, peas, linen, cloth, meat, fish, and other merchandise were bought and sold, which was so very injurious to the market at Cockermouth, that the persons at the place who farmed the tolls of the king were unable to pay their rent. Upon this a proclamation was issued against the practice, which appears to have been discontinued.

The population of this parish, as well as that of most others in the north of England, continued attached to the Catholic religion long after the inhabitants of the southern counties had embraced Protestantism, and so late as the 13th Elizabeth (1571) we find that the services of the ancient church were celebrated here, and attended by the people. In that year an ordinance was issued by the Bishop of Carlisle, directed to Henry Lord Scrope, of Bolton, lordwarden of the Western Marches of England; Simon Musgrave, Knt.; Richard Dudley, Esq., of Yanwath Hall; and other commissioners for causes ecclesiastical within the province of York; the vicar of Crosthwaite, the eighteen sworn men (sidesmen), the churchwardens; the representatives of the house of Derwentwater; the sealer and receiver of the Queen's majesty's portion at the mines; the bailiffs of Keswick, Wythburn, Borrowdale, Thornthwaite, Brundholme, and the forester of Derwent Fells, who are commanded to assemble at Crosthwaite church upon the afternoon of Ascension Day, and then and there to elect, choose, and nominate the eighteen men for the ensuing year, and also the churchwardens, who should, on the Sunday following, between morning prayer and the saying of the Litany, before the vicar, or the curate, take their oath of office as follows: "You, and every one of you, now chosen to be for this year next coming, the eighteen men for this parish of Crosthwaite, shall swear by God and the holy contents of the blessed evangelists here by you bodily touched that you and every one of you, shall well and faithfully exercise and execute the office whereunto you be now chosen, to the most commodity and behoof of the said parish. The stock and money accruing thereof, you shall maintain, better and not impair, and, finally, you shall faithfully fulfil and accomplish all that unto that office of right or lawful custom shall appertain.

And at the end of the year you shall render and give up, together with the office, a full, perfect, and true account of all, and singular, the sums by you received and employed, or bestowed in the said office; wherein you shall do nothing without the consent of the fellows, or of a greater, or more part of them. And upon the account determined you shall make present pay of the remainder of all such sums of money as shall rest in your hands, and therewithal deliver over to the successor all such other implements and goods, belonging to this parish, as in your hands and custody shall remain by inventory. So God you help by Jesus Christ."

A nearly similar oath is then administered to the churchwardens, and in order to root out every remnant of the old religion, the churchwardens and sidesmen were commanded by this decree, "to sell before the first day of December of the aforesaid year, all the Popish relics and monuments of superstition and idolatry, as presently remain in the said parish, of the church or parish goods, converting the prices thereof received to the parish use wholly, viz., two pipes of silver, one silver paxe, one cross of cloth of gold, which was on a vestiment; one copper cross, two chalices of silver, two corporase rases, three hand-bells, the iron whereon the paschal stood, one pair of censures, one ship, one head of a pair of censures, twenty-nine brazen or Latyne candlesticks, of six quarters long; one holy water tankard of brass, the canopies which hanged, and that which was carried over the blessed sacrament; two brazen or Latyne chrismatories, the vail cloth, the sepulchre cloths, and painted cloths, with pictures of Peter and Paul, and of the Trinity."

It was also ordered that "the four vestiments, tunicles, five chestables, and all other vestiments belonging to the said parish church, and to the chapels within the said parish, be defaced, cut in pieces, and of them a covering for the pulpit and cushions for the church made and provided; and that the albes and amyses should likewise be sold; and fine linen cloths for the communion table, and a covering of buckram, fringed, for the same, be bought and provided before Christmas next; and that there should be provided before that period, for the chapels in the parish, decent common cups of silver or of tin." It was also enjoined, "that before Christmas next they should make and set up a decent perclose of wood, wherein the morning and evening prayer should be read, to be placed without the choir door; and that they should also see the said church furnished with all books convenient for the same before Christmas then next; that was to say, with a Bible of the largest volume, one or two Communion Books, four Psalter Books, the two tomes of the Homilies, the Injunctions, the Defence of the Apology, the Paraphrases in English, or instead thereof, Moderate upon the Evangelists, and Bacon's Postills, and also four Psalter Books in metre." It was likewise ordered that "all the parishoners of Crosthwaite being of years of discretion, and sufficiently instructed in the grounds and principles of the Christian faith, should openly communicate at least three times in their parish church yearly, whereof Easter was the one time; and at all such general communions the deacons and ministers of the chapels in the parish should help and assist the vicar and curate at the ministration of the same." It was also commanded that "from henceforth there should be no divine service publicly said in the church on any abrogate holiday, or any concourse of idle people to church on such forbidden days; that is to wit, on the feasts or days of All Souls, or the evening or night before; on St. Catherine, St. Nicholas, Thomas à Beckett, St. George; the Wednesdays in Easter or Whitsun weeks; the Conception, Assumption, or Nativity of our Lady; St. Lawrence, Mary Magdalene, St. Ann, or such like: which are forbidden to be kept holidays by the laws of this realme." It was "straitly commanded that none should hereafter pray upon any beads, knots, portasses, papistical and superstitious Latyne primers, or otherwise forbidden or ungodly books, either publicly or openly, and that there should be no communion said, celebrated, or ministered at the burial of the dead, nor for any dead; nor for any months' minds, anniversaries, or such superstitions used."

The churchwardens and sidesmen are still elected according to ancient custom, take the oath as above, and exercise the powers vested in their predecessors connected with the church and Free Grammar School.

CHARITIES.

The School.—The origin of this school is quite unknown, though its antiquity is undoubted. It is stated to have been founded and endowed by the parishioners, and was in existence previous to the Reformation. It is first mentioned in the decree of the 31st October, 1571, above quoted, which is still preserved in the school chest. This decree provides for the yearly election of the eighteen sidesmen, as we have seen, by whom the parish of Crosthwaite was then and is still governed, and directs the oath above given to be taken on election, prescribing the penalties incurred by any person refusing to take that office; one of which is, that he shall forfeit 40s. "to the uses of the parish and increase of the stock of the school." The decree then proceeds as follows: "And we having had consideration for the better maintaining the common and free school at Crosthwaite, which we find to be supported of the commodities accruing of and upon certain stock, put forth to use in the said parish, which sums were not great, nor fully sufficient to maintain and support a learned and industrious schoolmaster there, have for the enlarging and increasing of the said schoolmaster's stipend and salary, decreed, constituted, and ordained, that whereas every fire-house within the said parish of Crosthwaite, hath, time out of mind, and yet doth yield, and by the inhabitants therein, yearly, twopence is paid for the clerk's wages, over and besides certain ordinary fees for night watch, burials, weddings, and over and besides certain annual benevolences of lamb wool, eggs, and such like, which seemeth to grow up to a greater sum yearly than is competent for a parish clerk's wages and stipeud, the eighteen men of the said parish shall this year, and so forth yearly for ever hereafter, receive, collect, gather, and take up the said yearly contributions of twopence for every fire-house, to the use of the said free school, and to the augmenting of the schoolmaster's stipend and salary, paying yearly on the Sunday next after the Feast of Ascension, unto the parish clerk, Gawin Radcliffe, and his successors, forty-six shillings and eightpence, lawful English money, for his wages out of the said contribution of twopence for every house, and employing the remainder to the schoolmaster's use: whereof we will that they yield a full account yearly, at their general accompts. And we furthermore decree and ordain, and by these presents firmly charge and command, that the said eighteen men do from henceforth occupy the said stock of money, to the utmost and greatest commodity it by any way may thereby, or thereof, accrue or grow to the use of the school; thinking that if the said sums were levied and paid over to purchase of a yearly annuity or rent charge of some free and good manors or lordships, upon good and strong assurance, there might be had about sixteen pounds yearly annuity for the same, and faithfully assured. Nevertheless the consideration hereof, and the husbanding the said stock and sums, for the behoof of the said free school, which wholly and utterly leave and refer to the eighteen men, from time to time, as to their discretion shall seem most beheviable to the said school." A dispute having arisen between Henry, lord bishop of Carlisle, and the eighteen sworn men, respecting the right of collation, placing and displacing of the schoolmaster, and the bishop of the diocese having committed thirteen of the sworn men to prison, an inquisition was taken at Keswick, in the year 1610, before Sir William Hutton Knight, and others, and a jury of "thirteen good and lawful men of the county." The jury presented, upon oath, "that there hath been a grammar school, within the parish of Crosthwaite, in the said county, time whereof the memory of man knoweth not the contrary; and that for like time there hath always been by an ancient custom, eighteen men yearly elected by the preceding eighteen men; that the said eighteen sworn men have always by prescription and ancient custom, yea even times without memory, used and accustomed to choose, place, and displace the schoolmaster of the said school . . . that long time since, as the said jurors do plainly perceive, by the testimony of living witnesses of the age of ninety years or thereabouts, and by the general consent and reputation of the parishioners and other good evidence, that divers of the parishoners and inhabitants within the said parish, and no other to their knowledge, voluntarily and freely, out of their charitable dispositions, for a more certainty and increase of maintenance of the said school, gave every of them several sums of money, and collected the same together, all amounting, with the sum which was the ancient school stock, unto one hundred and forty-eight pounds two shillings and threepence half-penny, which was given and bestowed by them, and delivered over unto the conscionable care and trust of the said eighteen sworn men, by them, and those which should succeed them, perpetually so to be employed, that out of the increase thereof and such other profits as they then had the disposition of, or thereafter might have, to the use of the said school, a competent yearly stipend might be raised, and paid by them, unto such schoolmaster, whom they should choose, and continue from time to time, to teach in the school for the education of the youth of the said parish." It was therefore decreed, under the hands and seals of the commissioners and jurors, that the "eighteen sworn men of the said parish, now, and from time to time, to be elected hereafter, shall be, as of right they are, and ought to be for ever hereafter, the sole and only governors of the said school and school stock . . . and they shall have the sole and only power and authority of election, collection, placing, and displacing of the said schoolmaster, in the said school, according to their most ancient and laudable custom." About twenty-one years subsequent to the above inquisition, 21st Charles I. (1645-6), an obligatory decree, under the great seal of England, appears to have been issued, whereby the parties are willed and commanded, firmly, without distinction, that all and singular whatsoever, in the decree aforesaid contained and specified (so far as to them or any of them it belongeth and appertaineth) should fulfil and execute; and that every of them should fulfil and execute with effect, according to the tenor and the true intention of the decree aforesaid, under the penalty of £500. The collections or cesses for the support of this school have long since ceased; it has now for a lengthened period been solely supported by the funds arising from the property belonging to the school, which consists of an entire estate situate at Great Crosthwaite, and another estate at St. John's, called Wanthwaite. Part of the first property was purchased in the year 1695, for the sum of £85, and the other part in 1702, for the sum of £123; and the latter estate in 1730, for the sum of £130, out of the school stock, which had by degrees amounted to more than the sums laid out in the purchase of those estates. These premises were conveyed to the sidesmen of the parish, their heirs and assigns, in trust for the school, and now bring in about £113 a year. The school, which is entirely free to the parish, is in the parish churchyard. It is under government inspection, conducted by a master, aided by an assistant teacher and two pupil teachers, and has an average attendance of 150 children.

Sir John Banks' Charity.—Sir John Banks, a native of Keswick, by will dated 23rd September, 1642, devised to trustees, "two tenements, with the close, orchard, and ground adjoining, situate in Keswick, and directed that the said tenements should be pulled down, and that a workhouse should be built there, to be kept and maintained for ever for the setting of poor people on work; and he devised to the same persons £200 to be employed for the building thereof, and directed that what remained should be kept in their hands as part of a stock. He also gave to the same persons £30 per annum, to be employed for the first three years for the increase of the said stock, and he directed, that after the three years had expired, the said stock of money, as also the £30 per annum, should be employed for the raising and maintaining a sufficient stock of wool, flax, hemp, thread, yarn, iron, and other necessary wares and stuff, to set the poor people on work, who should be born within the parish of Crosthwaite; and he directed that his trustees should set to work the children of all such whose parents should not be able to maintain them, and the children of the fatherless, and poor aged men and aged women and widows, who should be able to work in any reasonable manner; and also for the setting on work all other persons born within the said parish, having no means to maintain them; and he directed, that the profits arising by the said stock and the said £30 should be employed towards the necessary relief of the same impotent old men and women and blind, and such others of the parish being poor and not able to work, and also for the putting out the children of poor people to be apprentices. And he further directed, that five marks out of the said profits and rent should be yearly laid up to maintain the workhouse in repair, and for other extraordinary occasions, and he allowed 20s. yearly to such person as should take care of this business; and stating, that he conceived that the weekly wages to the workers would be moderate; and that there would remain the more to perform the charitable uses, he directed, that cloth of linen arising by the said manufacture might be given to poor people, and the rest sold for the uses aforesaid; and he directed that the said rent of £30 should issue out of all his freehold lands and tenements in the parish of Crosthwaite, except his dwelling-house and the appurtenances in Keswick, with a power of distress. By a decree of commissioners of charitable uses, dated 4th July 1672, reciting an inquisition held at Keswick of the same date, whereby it was found that Sir John Banks made his will as above stated, and whereby it was further found that the trustees had not been diligent in their trust, by reason whereof the charitable uses had not been performed; it was ordered and decreed, that the surviving trustees should convey the several premises devised by the testator, and the stock and property belonging thereto to the use of themselves and other trustees therein named, of whom the vicar of Crosthwaite, for the time being, was to be one for the trusts of the said will; and it was further ordered, that when the fees should be reduced to three, that the survivors should convey the said premises to the use of themselves and their heirs, and to the vicar of Crosthwaite for the time being, and to the heirs of Sir William Dalston, Sir Ralph Banks, Richard Tolson, Christopher Blencowe, and Thomas Tickell, and to so many more parishioners of Crosthwaite, and their heirs, as should make up the number of six parishioners of Crosthwaite; and the eighteen sworn men of Crosthwaite, with the churchwardens and overseers, to be aiding and assisting the trustees and the churchwardens and overseers to act as they should be directed by the trustees; and that a chest should be obtained and books procured for keeping the accounts in the manner therein mentioned; and that the trustees should take order for the setting up and promoting of a trade when they should have an opportunity, and for the binding and preferring of poor children to be apprentices, repairing of the house, distribution to the poor or lame persons, or other things mentioned in the said will; and that until they should have such an opportunity to set up a manufactory, some of the rooms should be disposed of to poor widows, and that some competency should be allowed them; and that the rest of the income (after paying a collector of the rents, and five marks to be laid up in the chest for repairs being first deducted) should be yearly bestowed upon woollen and linen cloth and made fit for wearing, and some stockings and shoes, and distributed yearly at the said workhouse at the feast of All Saints. And further reciting, that although the said yearly rent-charge of £30 was extinct, it was ordered and decreed, that the said rent-charge should revive, and that who did or should possess the said lands charged with the payment of the same, should yearly pay the same according to the said will and this decree, with power for the said trustees to enter and distrain for the same. And it was further ordered, that certain sums of money, amounting in the whole to £255 19s. should be paid by certain persons therein named to the trustees in the said decree mentioned." At the time of the publication of the Charity Commissioners' Report, from which we have taken the above extract, the property in the possession of the trustees consisted of land and money: an estate at Howard Coldale, containing 124 acres and 35 perches; a field near the church at Crosthwaite, containing about four acres; and two cattle gates in White Moss, and an acre of land in a field called the Cow Pasture; an estate, called Birkett Wood, in Crosthwaite Parish, containing about 29 acres; between three and four acres of woodland in Birkett Wood; the sum of £500, which was out at interest at 4½ per cent; and the workhouse premises mentioned in Sir John Banks' will. This charity has been augmented by 20 acres and 15 perches of land, known as the High, in Newlands, purchased in 1857, at a cost of £610, of which sum £500 was bequeathed on 26th March, 1852, by Miss Ogle, and appropriated by Sir Charles Ogle and H. Denton, Esq., her executors to this charity. It was long ago found impracticable to use as a workhouse the premises devised by the testator. The use of machinery has rendered it impossible to work up woollen with effect by hand. The charity is at present devoted to the comfortable support of eighteen aged and poor persons of the parish of Crosthwaite, who reside in the Sir John Banks' Charity House, at a short distance north of the Town Hall, in the town of Keswick.

Grave's Charity.—Thomas Grave, by will, dated 29th November, 1666, gave to trustees, eight cows, grasses and pasture for eight kine, in an enclosed ground called White Moss, of which he was then mortgagee, and if they were redeemed, the money was to be devoted as thereafter mentioned; and he also bequeathed all such sum and sums of money as were owing unto him upon will or bond, to be by them let out at five per cent, until they could conveniently purchase free lands with the same; and he desired that the rent of the said cows' grasses, and the interest of the said money, and the rent of the land when purchased, should be yearly upon Good Friday, Easter Eve, or thereabouts, distributed by the churchwardens of Crosthwaite, with the advice of his trustees above-mentioned, and such as should be by the surviving two of them successively elected and appointed to such of the parish of Crosthwaite as were poor, blind, lame, sick, widows, fatherless and motherless children not being able to work, nor to go from door to door to seek their living, not in the least abating such allowance as should be granted them by law authority, or from the parish not easing the abler sort of their cess. It is not known what was the amount of the money received under his will. The mortgage of the eight cow grasses appears to have been redeemed, and the money was probably applied in the purchase of other property of the same nature, as we find two deeds, dated respectively in 1688 and in 1676, whereby fourteen cow grasses in Whitey Moss were conveyed to the trustees of this charity in consideration of £71. In 1673, the sum of £58 7s. 3d. was laid out in the purchase of fee-farm rents from the crown, of the annual value of £3 7s. 8d., arising out of the rectory of Crosthwaite. By three other deeds, two dated in 1680, and the other in 1682, certain persons therein named, in consideration of three several sums, amounting in the whole to £55 16s., conveyed certain premises at Applethwaite to the trustees of this charity. The whole of the property at present belonging to this charity is as follows:—The house and land at Applethwaite, consisting of about seven acres; the fourteen cowgrasses; the fee-farm rents, the rent of about an acre of land; and the interest of £39. The proceeds of this charity are given away every Good Friday in small sums, varying from 2s. to 8s. 6d. to poor persons of the parish at large. All their names are entered in a book, which commences with the year 1767, and bears the following title, "The Distribution of the Charities of Mr. Thomas Grave, and the Rev. James Clark," which circumstance is explained by the next charity.

Clark's Charity.—The Rev. James Clark was vicar of Crosthwaite, and in his lifetime gave £2, the interest thereof to be applied in the same manner as Mr. Grave's charity, and by the same trustees. This is supposed to form part of the general fund, and to be distributed with the above charity without any distinction.

Tickell's Charities.—By indenture, dated February 27th, 1685, Hugh Tickell conveyed to trustees three closes at Mill Beck, in Under Skiddaw, two closes called Parrocks, and one close called Muddell's; one acre of meadow, half an acre of arable land, a dale below the way of Galaborrow; one dale called Greystones, situate at Applethwaite, in Under Skiddaw, with the appurtenances, upon trust that the yearly rents should be distributed by the said trustees amongst such poor people inhabiting and dwelling within the parish of Crosthwaite, as in their discretion they should think meet. By another indenture of the same date he conveyed to other trustees his messuages, lands, and tenements at Mill Beck, in Under Skiddaw, being of the ancient yearly free rent of 3s. 4d.; three closes of land, known by the name of Common Closes; one close of meadow, called Long-with-Ing, of the rent of 1d.; a parcel of meadow, called Stanley Stubbings, of the free rent of 1s. 2d.; a parcel of ground, called the Schoolhouse Orchard, and a house, situated in the same, of the free-rent of 1d., all which premises were situated in the parish of Crosthwaite; upon trust, that after the death of himself and his wife, the rents of the said premises should be distributed by the said trustees amongst such poor people as should be inhabiting and dwelling within the said county of Cumberland as they should think meet and convenient. And the said Hugh Tickell, by will bearing date the same 27th February, devised to his trustees a close, commonly called Four Acres, at Udder Skiddaw; a close of meadow called Long Stubbings; and three roods of land, called Cow Pasture, in Crosthwaite aforesaid, in trust that they should divide the yearly profits thereof into three equal parts, two parts thereof to be distributed amongst the poor people inhabiting and dwelling within the said county of Cumberland, according to the discretion of his said trustees for Cumberland; and the other third part thereof amongst such poor people as should be inhabiting and dwelling within the parish of Crosthwaite, according to the discretion of the Crosthwaite trustees. The property now in the possession of the trustees for the poor of the parish of Crosthwaite consists of about fifteen acres of land in Under Skiddaw, producing about £50 a year, which is given away yearly, on Whitsun Eve, to the poor of the parish at large, in sums varying from two to ten shillings. The proceeds of the property held for the poor of the county of Cumberland is, and always has been, distributed among poor persons of the Society of Friends in the county of Cumberland, to which body the donor belonged.

Wren's Charity.—Grace Wren, by will, dated 23rd January, 1721, left £40 on trust, for the use of poor children born in the parish of Crosthwaite; that is to say, to lend out the same, or purchase freehold land therewith; and to lay out the profits thereof yearly in buying school-books or Bibles, to be distributed about Easter, amongst poor children born in Crosthwaite. This money was laid out in land in Borrowdale, called Scale Closes, a copse and a small enclosure, altogether about four or five acres of land. The enclosure is let for about £5 per annum. The copse is detained in hand. It is cut about every 17 years, and the money produced placed out at interest. There is also belonging to this charity 7s. 6d., received annually, called the meal tithe, paid by the curate of St. John's Chapel out of a field called Birkland Sikes, belonging to his curacy. The income from these various sources, amounting to upwards of £10 a year, is disposed of in bibles, testaments, prayer books, spelling books, and religious books, to the poor people of the parish. The books are given away on Good Friday, when the children from the distant parts of the parish attend to receive them.

Denton's Charity.—The late Henry Denton, Esq., who died in 1857, bequeathed £500 to the Free Grammar School of Crosthwaite, to be paid at the death of his brother, William Denton, Esq., of Greta Farm, near Keswick.

Close to Keswick, but in this township, is a Sunday school, erected in 1833, by James Stanger, Esq., at a cost of £1,100. It is now used, on week days, as a national school for girls. It is under government inspection, and is conducted by a mistress and one pupil teacher. There is another Sunday school on the road between Applethwaite and Mill Beck, erected about the year 1828, by the late Daniel Dover, Esq.

The hamlets in this township are Applethwaite, situated at the end of a deep and wide chasm, one and a half miles north of Keswick; Great Crosthwaite, which gives its name to the parish, stands a short distance east of the parish church; High Hill, not far from Keswick; Ormathwaite, about a mile east-north-east of the same place; and Mill Beck, two miles north.

KESWICK.

The population of the township of Keswick in 1801 was 1,350; in 1811, 1,683; in 1821, 1,901; in 1831, 2,159; in 1841, 2,442; and in 1851, 2,618; who are located all over the township, but principally in the town of Keswick. The rateable value is £9,022 6s. 9d.

This township is included in the manor of Castlerigg and Keswick, alias Derwentwater, which previous to the reign of Edward I. was held by the ancient family of Derwentwater, or De Derwentwater. The heiress of Sir John Derwentwater, in the reign of Henry VI. married Sir Nicholas Ratcliffe, Knt., of Dilston, in the county of Northumberland, whose descendant, Sir Francis Ratcliffe, Knt., was, by James II., created Earl of Derwentwater. James, the second earl, taking a prominent part in the "rising" of 1715, was beheaded on Tower Hill, and the above manor, with other estates, becoming forfeited to the crown, was settled upon Greenwich Hospital by act of parliament. In 1832 it was purchased by the late John Marshall, Esq., whose son, Reginald Dykes Marshall, Esq., is the present lord of the manor. The tenure is principally leasehold, subject to a yearly lord's rent, and a fourpenny fine at the death or change of either lord or tenant. There are a few estates subject to an arbitrary fine. The Town Hall, in Keswick, and the tolls belong to the present lord, who holds there his courts baron and customary courts yearly in May. The enclosure of commons, in the manor of Castlerigg and Derwentwater, which manor comprises the townships or divisions of Keswick, St. John's, and Castlerigg, the whole containing 200 acres or thereabouts, took place by act of parliament in 1842, when a field, containing two and a half acres, situated at Brigham, within one mile of Keswick, was allotted for the recreation of the inhabitants.

Derwentwater Family.

This ancient family is said to have taken their name from having their seat on the banks of the lake of that name.

SIR JOHN DE DERWENTWATER seems to have resided here in the reign of Edward I., as we learn from an inquisition concerning the furniture of a chantry in the chapel of Bolton, in Westmoreland. SIR JOHN DE DERWENTWATER occurs in the 20th Edward II. (1326-7). Another JOHN DE DERWENTWATER after appears sheriff of Cumberland in the 48th Edward III., and again two years later, as also in the 1st and 4th of Richard II. He represented the county in parliament in the 2nd and 10th years of the same king's reign. This Sir John had issue a daughter Margaret (called Elizabeth Whitaker and Surtees), married to Sir Nicholas Ratcliffe, Knt., a younger son of Ratcliffe of Wymerley, who was a younger son of Ratcliff of Ratcliff Tower, an ancient Lancashire family. Sir Nicholas had issue by his wife Margaret, a son and heir,

SIR THOMAS RATCLIFFE, who married Margaret, daughter of Sir William Parr, Knt., of Kendal Castle, who bore him six sons, Richard, Edward, John, Nicholas, Christopher, and Rowland, the two last of whom embraced the religious life. Some difficulties may arise in the tracing of this pedigree, and authorities differ very much on the subject. We shall however state the facts as they stand, and leave the reader to draw his own conclusion; and in doing this, we must express our obligations to an article in the Gentleman's Magazine for May, 1849, headed "Who was the Sir John Ratcliffe buried at Crosthwaite?" The writer, after giving the pedigree of the family as above down to Sir Thomas Ratcliffe, says, "Sir Thomas Ratcliffe, son of Sir Nicholas, and the heiress of Derwentwater, had several sons, amongst whom were Sir Edward, John, and Sir Richard. Sir Edward had an elder son, Sir Cuthbert, and a younger son, John. John, the brother of Sir Edward, had a son, John, according to some authorities; but according to others he died without issue. Sir John Ratcliffe, who married Dame Alice, and died in 1527, has been identified by some with John, the younger son of Sir Edward; by others with John, the son of John, and nephew of Edward; and, whilst some have represented him as dying without issue, others have made him the father of a Sir John, and grandfather of a Dorothy Ratcliffe, who married into the Daere family. According to Hutchinson, John, the brother of Sir Edward, died without issue. According to Nicolson and Burn's History of Cumberland and Westmoreland, vol. ii., p. 78, Sir John Ratcliffe was the son of Sir Edward; and John the son of John, and nephew of Sir Edward, died without issue. According to Surtees, History of Durham, vol. i., p. 82, John, the brother of Sir Edward, married Anne Fenwick, and had issue the Sir John Ratcliffe in question, and a daughter Anne. The daughter became her brother's heir by his death without issue, and married John Ratcliffe, the son of Sir Edward, by whom she had John Ratcliffe, the father of Dorothy. According to Harleian MSS., 1448, Sir John was the son of John, and died without issue, as did also John the son of Sir Edward. According to Harleian MSS., 1171, 1536, and 1554, Sir John was the son of John Ratcliffe, and had issue John, father of Dorothy. According to the latter MSS. John, the son of Sir Edward, died without issue. Of the above MSS., 1448, is a copy of the Visitation of Northumberland, taken in 1615 by Richard St. George Norroy, and in it the pedigree of this family, as far as it goes, seems tolerably correct. 1536 is Mr. Mundy's copy of the Visitation of Cumberland in the same year; 1554 the Visitation of Northumberland; in 1575 and 1615, and 1171 is described as 'Certain pedigrees of Northumbrian families as registered by William Flower Norroy, at his visitation of that county A. D. 1575'. The inaccuracies in the Ratcliffe pedigrees in the three last MSS. are wonderful. After all, was not Sir John Ratcliffe, who died in 1527, and was buried at Crosthwaite church, a younger son of Sir Richard Ratcliffe? Surtees makes mention of a deed of settlement made by Sir Thomas Ratcliffe in 21st Edward IV. (1461-2) whereby (subject of course to his own life interest he settled the Derwentwater estates on Sir Richard, his third son in tail male, with remainder over to Sir Edward in tail male, with remainder over to others of his sons successively in like manner.) Sir Richard was killed at Bosworth in his father's lifetime, and attained by act of parliament passed in the first year of Henry VII. Richard Ratcliffe, son and heir of Sir Richard, obtained another act which reversed his father's attainder, and on his grandfather, Sir Thomas's death, should have become possessor of the Derwentwater estates. He died without issue male, on which event the property would have devolved, under the settlement, to his brother, if he had one. Now, I venture to suggest as a probability, that Richard had a brother, and that Sir John Ratcliffe was that brother, but he, dying without issue in 1527, the estate passed (still under the settlement) to his cousin, Sir Cuthbert, the heir male of Sir Edward Ratcliffe, then deceased. The MSS. to which I have had access do not, I confess, bear out my supposition, but then they give but very little information as to Sir Richard Ratcliffe, although he was unquestionably the most noted man of his family in the age in which he lived." From these facts and suggestions we may continue the pedigree as follows:—On the demise of Sir Richard as above, he was succeeded by

Sir JOHN RATCLIFFE, Knt., who married Alice, daughter of Sir Edmund Sutton de Dudley, lord of Dudley, in Warwickshire, by Maud, his second wife, daughter to Thomas Lord Clifford, of Westmoreland. This Sir John appears to have been a great man in his day, being repeatedly selected to fill the important and then martial post of sheriff of Cumberland, which office he held at the time of his decease, February 2nd, 1527.

Sir John had no children. Dame Alice, his wife, survived, and died in 1554, being interred in the cathedral church of Salisbury. On Sir John's decease, the estates of the family passed to his cousin,

Sir CUTHBERT RATCLIFFE, Knt., who married Margaret, daughter of Henry Lord Clifford, and by her had issue GEORGE, Thomas, and Anthony. In an inquisition taken in 35th Henry VIII. it is found that Sir Cuthbert Ratcliffe, Knt., held the manor of Tallantire, and divers messuages, lands, and tenements in Casterlrig and in the island of Derwentwater, of the king as of his manor of Papcastle, by the service of two knights' fees, 23s. 3d. cornage, 16d. seawake, pature of the sergeants, and suit of court at Papcastle; late in the tenure of Lady Anne Ratcliffe. On the demise of Sir Cuthbert, he was succeeded by his eldest son,

Sir GEORGE RATCLIFFE, Knt., who married Catherine, daughter of Sir John Mallony, Knt., and had issue one son,

FRANCIS RATCLIFFE, Esq., of Derwentwater and Dilston, who married Isabel, daughter of Sir Ralph Grey, Knt., of Chillingham, by whom he had issue EDWARD, Thomas, Francis, John, Cuthbert, Mary, Margaret, Catherine, Elizabeth, Dorothy, Anne, and Jane. His successor was

EDWARD, his eldest son and heir, who married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Barton, Esq., of Whalley, by whom he had issue a son and heir. This gentleman was made a baronet, and on his decease was succeeded by his son,

Sir FRANCIS RATCLIFFE, Bart., who was advanced to the peerage by James I. in 1609, by the titles of Earl of Derwentwater, Baron Tynedale, and Viscount Ratcliffe and Langley. He died in 1697, and was succeeded by his son

EDWARD, the second earl, who had married in 1689 the Lady Mary Tudor, the youngest natural daughter of Charles II. It was on occasion of this marriage that the Derwentwaters were ennobled. His lordship had three sons and one daughter, viz., JAMES, Francis, Charles, and Mary Tudor, and dying in 1705, the titles and estates devolved upon

JAMES, the third earl, born in 1689. This nobleman married Mary Anne, daughter of Sir John Webb, Bart., co. Dorset. This nobleman having taken part in the rising of 1715, was captured at Preston, and at once taken to London, where he arrived on the 9th of December, and was committed to the Tower. On the 19th of the following January, he was brought before his peers at Westminster where he confessed his guilt, and threw himself on the mercy of the king. His subsequent history is thus told in the words of a modern historian:—"The united interests and earnest supplication of the Duchesses of Cleveland and Bolton—of the young Countess of Derwentwater, pleading with tears for the husband she tenderly loved—and many other ladies of rank, failed in moving the rough and sturdy king, who admitted them to an audience, but adhered to his purpose, which was the purpose of a majority of his ministers. Bribes, which had succeeded before in like circumstances, were offered now without effect. Sixty thousand pounds were tendered for the single pardon of Lord Derwentwater, who, up to the time of the mad rising in the north, had been living happily and hospitably in his fine old castle, reflected in the clear waters of one of the most beautiful of the English lakes; and for whose present hard fate tears were shed and lamentations raised in every valley and on every hill-side in Cumberland. At an early hour on the morning of the 24th February, he and Lord Kenmure were brought to the scaffold on Tower Hill. The English lord was the first that suffered. He was deadly pale, but his voice was firm, and on the whole he behaved like a man of courage and conscience. He declared that he died a Roman Catholic; that he deeply repented his plea of guilty at his trial; and that he knew and acknowledged no king but James III., his rightful and lawful sovereign, 'whom he had an inclination to serve from his infancy.' He further insisted that he had intended wrong to no man, that he harboured malice against no man, not even against those of the present ministry who were instrumental in his death, that he had intended to serve his country as well as his legitimate king, and to contribute to the restoration of the ancient and fundamental constitution of these kingdoms. At one blow the executioner severed the neck of James Ratcliffe, third and last earl of Derwentwater, a gallant, courteous young man, perhaps the most interesting victim of this attempted revolution." The fate of this young and generous-hearted nobleman excited very general commiseration. "The apparent cruelty of his execution led to his being esteemed in the light of a martyr; handkerchiefs steeped in his blood were preserved as sacred relics; and when the mansion house at Dilston was demolished, amid the regrets of the neighbourhood, there was great difficulty in obtaining hands to assist in the work of destruction, which was considered almost sacrilegious. The aurora borealis was observed to flash with unwonted brilliancy on the fatal night of his execution—an omen it was said, of heaven's wrath; and to this day many of the country people know that meteor only by the name of Lord Derwentwater's lights." His memory is still cherished and revered in Northumberland, where numerous instances of his affability and kindness are related with feelings of sympathy and regret. His lordship had two children, a son and a daughter, the latter of whom was born in 1716, after her father's untimely death. The son died in France at the age of nineteen, from injuries received while riding on horseback; the daughter was married to Lord Petre in 1732. The widowed countess died in France, aged about thirty years, and was buried in the church of the English Regular Canonesses of St. Austin at Louvain. Charles Ratcliffe, brother of the unfortunate earl, who was condemned to death at the same time, escaped after conviction, and got safe to France. Here, after living in a state of indigence for several years, he attached himself to the fortunes of the Stuarts, and subsisted on a pension allowed him by the prince. In 1724 he married the Lady Charlotte Livingstone, countess of Newburgh, in her own right. He twice visited England secretly, but sought in vain to obtain his pardon. In 1745 he engaged ardently in the cause of Prince Charles Edward, and was taken prisoner in the Esperance privateer, on his way to Scotland. After lying a year in prison, he was brought before the bar of the King's Bench, his former sentence was read to him, and after raising a curious question of identity, which for a time perplexed the crown lawyers, he was beheaded on Tower Hill, 8th December, 1746, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. On the attainder of the earl in 1716, the large possessions of the family were confiscated to the crown, by whom they were held, under trustees, till 1735, when they were bestowed by act of parliament upon Greenwich Hospital. The Earl of Newburgh, the representative of the family, petitioned parliament for the reversal of the attainder; but as the forfeited estates had been appropriated to the support of the hospital, the petition could not be granted; and an annuity of £2,500 was all that he could obtain. These possessions, which are now said to be of the annual value of more than £80,000, are situated in the counties of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Durham. The last of the Ratcliffes died in 1814.

Marshall Family.

This family, who now hold a portion of the Cumberland estates of the Derwentwaters, is derived from John Marshall, Esq., of Headingley, near Leeds, M.P. for Yorkshire, born 27th July, 1705, the second son of John Marshall, of Yeadon Low Hall, co. York, acquired great wealth by his successful introduction of mechanical improvements into a branch of the linen manufacture, the spinning of flax, for which he founded extensive establishments at Leeds and Shrewsbury. He married 5th August, 1735, Jane, 5th daughter of William Pollard, Esq., of Halifax. His second son,

JOHN MARSHALL, Esq., late M.P. for Leeds, born 28th of December, 1707, married 18th November, 1828, Mary, eldest daughter of the late Joseph Dykes Ballantyne Dykes, Esq., of Dovenby Hall, Cumberland, and had by her

1. REGINALD DYKES, his successor, who married, January, 1838, Louisa, second daughter of Sir John Herschel, the astronomer, of Collingwood Park.
11. Herbert John.
111. Julian.
1. Janet Mary.
11. Catherine Alice.

This gentleman purchased the forfeited estates of the Earls of Derwentwater from the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital. He died 31st October, 1836, and was succeeded, in 1857, by his son, REGINALD DYKES MARSHALL, Esq., the present lord of the manor of Castlerigg and Derwentwater.

Arms.—Arg., three bars, sa., a canton, erm.

Crest.—A man in armour proper.

THE TOWN OF KESWICK.

The market town of Keswick is situated in 54° 36' north latitude, 3° 7' west longitude, and is distant thirty miles south-by-west from Carlisle, and 291 miles north-west-by-north from London, by road. It occupies a fine situation in one of the largest and most beautiful of the vales of Cumberland, at the northern extremity of the Lake District, on the high road, and nearly midway between Ambleside, Cockermouth, and Penrith. It forms one of the polling-places for the western division of the county, and is included in the third circuit of County Court towns. The population of Keswick in 1793 appears to have been 1,093; in 1801, it was 1,350; in 1811, 1,683; in 1821, 1,901; in 1831, 2,159; in 1841, 2,375; and in 1851, 2,618, of whom 1,250 were males and 1,368 females, inhabiting 552 houses—twelve being uninhabited, and six building.

Keswick consists chiefly of one long street, in which are some good stone houses. Its principal manufactures are woollens, ginghams, &c. During the last century the first-mentioned manufacture formed the chief production of the town. The several processes of carding, spinning, dyeing, and weaving, were then principally performed by hand labour, forming part of the daily labours of the respective members of most households in the surrounding rural districts; and even down to a comparatively recent period, long subsequent to that which witnessed the gradual development and application of scientific invention to manufactures in other parts of the kingdom, the hand-cards and spinning-wheel formed part of the requisite furniture of the farmstead. The town was at that time the emporium of the woollen trade for the county, and was much resorted to at its annual fairs and markets; its yarns and cloths forming a considerable item of exportation to the neighbouring towns of this and the adjoining county of Westmoreland. The woollen trade has considerably declined here during the present century, nor is there much hope that it will be revived, at least for some time, the re-arrangement of the lines of traffic by the construction of railways having placed Keswick in a somewhat isolated position, and nothing less than its connection with the great "iron roads" by means of a railway will have much effect upon the trade of the town and neighbourhood. Within the last thirty, but principally within the last twenty years, the manufacture of black lead, and other description of pencils, has made rapid progress in Keswick, and may be said to constitute at present its principal article of manufacture. Up to the period just named the few pencils in use were made by hand labour, and were sold at from one shilling to eighteen pence each. They consisted solely of those used by artists, still manufactured here, and known in the trade as pure Borrowdale lead. The number of hands now employed in the manufacture in Keswick is about one hundred and thirty. At a moderate computation, the quantity produced by these workmen annually, and sent out to all parts of the world, cannot be less than ten millions of pencils, which are now sold, we believe, at from one shilling and sixpence a gross, and upwards.

Of Keswick in ancient times we possess but little information. Its early history finds no place in the chronicles and records of the past. Surrounded by its "everlasting hills," which secluded it from the more accessible and fertile parts of the island, the region now known as the Lake District, furnished few topics of interest to our early historians, though we learn from them that it formed the retreat and refuge of those Britons who would not become the slaves of imperial Rome, and who preferred a life of freedom, though accompanied with toil and exposure to the rough winds of heaven, to the privileges and honours of Roman subjects, when these brought in their train servitude and oppression. The Lake District continued to afford a shelter to the Britons during the time that the supremacy of the island was in the hands of the Anglo-Saxons; and when the latter had in turn to submit to the Norman conquerors of England, it served as an asylum for such of them as chose to fly to its fastnesses rather than submit to the invaders, becoming in this manner a resting-place for the bravest spirits of the many races formerly dominant in the country, whose various and different languages give names borne at the present day by the mountains, and hills, and valleys, and rivers, and streams, and towers, and villages, and hamlets spread far and wide over the fair face of the district. How long the parish church of Crosthwaite was built before the twelfth century is uncertain, and there is now no means of ascertaining. A list of rectors is preserved, dating from about the close of the thirteenth. From the Close Rolls of the reign of Henry III., we find that the mines in the neighbourhood of Keswick were known at that time. The privilege of a market was procured for the town from Edward I. by Sir John de Derwentwater, lord of the place. Edward IV. granted a charter for working the mines. In the 2nd Elizabeth (1559-60), the mine of Goldscope, in Newlands, was made the subject of a memorable trial between the crown and Thomas Percy, earl of Northumberland, lord of the manor of Derwent Fells. The gold and silver in this vein being proved to be of more value than the copper and lead, by virtue of the royal prerogative the mine was adjudged to be a royal mine, and the property of the crown, by whom it was carried on under commissioners. These commissioners would appear to have exercised a considerable share of influence in the direction and management of local affairs, during this, and the two succeeding reigns. Leland describes Keswick as "a poor little market town called Keswike, a mile from St. Herbert's Isle, that Bede speaketh of." Camden found it inhabited by miners.

We possess no authentic information relating to Keswick from this period till the middle of the eighteenth century. An occasional traveller, tempted by a desire to explore regions hitherto almost unknown, or perhaps, feeling an interest in their mineral productions, passed through the place, struck with scenes of romantic beauty in the midst of so much seeming wild seclusion, and with the simple manners of the people, an exaggerated description of all connected with the lakes and mountains of Cumberland would seem to have followed but as a natural consequence. In early numbers of the Gentleman's Magazine several such descriptions may be found. In one of those for the year 1751, a writer, whose account of the scenery in the vale of Keswick is as marvellously overwrought as his character of the people is unpardonable, says, "the poorer inhabitants of Keswick subsist chiefly by stealing, or clandestinely buying of those that steal, the black lead, which they sell to Jews or other hawkers." Dr. Brown, a native of Cumberland, an author of no inconsiderable repute, published a letter to a friend, in the year 1767, in which simple justice was done to the vale, without any of the inflated descriptions of his predecessors. Two years afterwards, Gray made his celebrated tour to the lakes. The result was a series of letters to his friend Dr. Wharton, who had been prevented by illness from accompanying him. The publication of these letters led the way to the lakes, and was the beginning of a new order of things. Mail roads took the place of horse tracks and the few old military roads. Tourists flocked to them from all parts of England; wealthy strangers soon began to settle in the district and the face of the country gradually to assume a more cultivated appearance. The Lake District has become better known year after year, and is now annually visited by thousands, who, jaded and worn out with years of foreign travel, find that England itself contains nooks and corners well worth visiting.

CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.

Until 1856 Keswick was comprised in the parish of Crosthwaite, but since the passing of Lord Blandford's act, in that year, that portion of the town situated south and east of the Town Hall, together with an assigned district, has for all ecclesiastical purposes become a separate and distinct parish.

The church, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, is an elegant structure, in the Early English style, erected in 1838-9, from designs by Salvin, at the sole expense of the late John Marshall, Esq., and family, at a cost of £4,100. It is constructed in ashlar work, of light pink freestone, from the quarries of Lamony, near Greystoke, and consists of nave, tower, and beautiful spire, which is a conspicuous object from all the neighbouring country. It will accommodate about 450 persons. In the interior repose the remains of Mr. Marshall, the founder, who died before the completion of the building; and in the churchyard are laid those of the first incumbent, the Rev. F. Myers. There are mural monuments to the memory of each of these gentlemen in the church. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Mr. Marshall's heirs, subject to a power of veto from a trustee appointed by the congregation, and is worth about £180. The whole value of the living is about £220. The registers commence in 1839. A service is held on Sunday afternoons in one of the school rooms in the parish.

INCUMBENTS. — Frederic Myers, 1839; T. J. H. Battersby, 1851.

The parsonage, a neat building in the Elizabethan style, erected in 1842, occupies a delightful situation a short distance from the church.

The Independent chapel, a small building, erected in 1803, is situated in that part of the town where the road branches off to the lake, but it will be soon superseded by a new and more commodious structure, the erection of which was commenced in June, 1858. We may here state that Protestant dissenters have existed in Keswick as a distinct body for upwards of two hundred years, the present Independent chapel occupying the site of a building that had served as a place of worship from the time of the Commonwealth. Mention is made in an old church book at Cockermouth of the Keswick minister attending a meeting at the former place in 1657. The present minister is the Rev. W. Colville.

High-street chapel is a neat building, in the Gothic style, erected in 1851, at the sole expense of E. W. Wakefield, Esq., of Birkland, Kendal, and will seat about 300 persons. The congregation which assembles here for worship bears the designation of "Christian Brethren." They meet upon the open communion Baptist principles. In connection with this chapel there is a Sunday school and library, which is attended by upwards of 100 children. This place of worship is conducted on the purely voluntary principle, by Mr. Joseph Dallow, who has officiated as minister for upwards of fourteen years.

The Wesleyans have also a small place of worship in a yard off the principal street, erected in 1814. It is of stone, and will accommodate about 200 persons. Previous to the erection of this chapel, this body worshipped in a dwelling-house in the same yard.

SCHOOLS, MECHANICS' INSTITUTION, &c.

Situated near the church, and in connection with it, is a school for girls and infants. It is in the Elizabethan style, and comprises one large school-room, with class-room, and a residence for the teacher and apprentices. There is a play-ground attached. The original building was erected by the Marshall family, and possesses a small endowment of £8, but is chiefly supported by voluntary contributions and the payments of the children, about ninety-eight of whom are in regular attendance. The mistress is assisted by three pupil teachers. The schools are under government inspection.

There is a second school for boys and girls, erected by the late incumbent, the Rev. F. Myers, in 1850, at a cost of £500. It is also under government inspection, and is conducted by a master, assisted by three pupil teachers. It is supported by the children's pence and voluntary contributions. This school is also in the Elizabethan style, and has a play-ground and garden attached. It contains the same number of rooms as the school above-mentioned.

There is a charitable fund, left by the late John Marshall, Esq., founder of the church, for the increase of the stipends of poor clergymen, schoolmasters, and libraries in the neighbourhood of Keswick. The incumbent is the administrator.

The Keswick library, situated on the left of the road leading to Ambleside, was established by the late Rev. F. Myers in 1849, and contains about 2,000 volumes in the various departments of literature. It is supported by the subscriptions of the members, proceeds of lectures, &c. There is a lecture-room attached, which was added in 1855, with class-rooms for instruction in the winter. The reading-room is comfortable and commodious. The number of members is about eighty. In connexion with this institution (Keswick Library) is a working men's association, established in 1858, the members of which have a reading-room in the centre of the town, but have the privilege of borrowing books from the Keswick Library, and free admission to the lectures delivered monthly during the winter. The number of members is about forty.

Keswick Mechanics' Institution was established in its present form in 1849, but existed some years previously under the name of the "Young Men's Improvement Society." Its rooms are in the Market Place, and are divided into reading-room, class-room, and library. The reading-room is supplied with the leading metropolitan and local newspapers, periodicals, &c. Classes for elementary instruction, conducted by paid teachers, are held during the winter months, and are pretty numerously attended. There are also occasional classes for music and drawing. It is supported by the subscriptions of the members, of whom there are about 100, who pay—patrons, £1; tradesmen, 10s.; mechanics, 6s. each per annum. The library is small, more attention being given to the news-room and classes, as the Keswick library contains an ample supply of books for the town.

Keswick Savings Bank was established in 1818, and has proved of great utility to the town and neighbourhood. The number of depositors in the present year (1858) is 819, with one charitable and three friendly societies. The balance due to the depositors, and in the hands of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, is £17,472 14s. 6½d.; the amount of surplus fund, £478.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, &c.

The Town Hall, or Moot Hall, the property of the lord of the manor, erected in 1813 upon the site of the old Court House, stands in the centre of the town, near the top of the main street. The clock bell, which was taken from a building that formerly stood on Lord's Island, in Derwent Lake, said to have been the manor house of the Earls of Derwentwater, has the letters and figures "H. D. R. O., 1001," upon it—a decisive proof of its high antiquity. It is said to have been originally the curfew bell for the district. The ground floor of this building is used as a market-house on Saturdays for butter, eggs, poultry, bread stuff, &c. A spacious room overhead serves as a court-house, in which the weekly petty sessions of the district are held. The manor courts are also held here annually, in May, for the purpose of receiving fines, adjusting tenements held under the manor, or any other business within the competency of the court, which may be brought before it. In this room is exhibited during the summer months the well-known model of the Lake District, by Flintoft.

The Oddfellows' Hall is situated near the Town Hall, but a little removed from the front street, and consists of a large room of a somewhat ornamental style of architecture, with the requisite offices for the transaction of the business of the order. It was erected in the summer of 1850, by the members of the St. Herbert's Lodge of Oddfellows, of the Manchester Unity, which comprises a considerable number of the respectable inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood.

The Post Office is located in part of the conspicuous building known as Crosthwaite's Museum, a short distance north of the Town Hall. In the same building is the Keswick branch of the Cumberland Union Bank.

Crosthwaite's Museum of Natural and Historical Curiosities and Antiquities was founded about eighty years ago by Mr. Peter Crosthwaite, a native of Keswick, and has long had the reputation of being unrivalled among the private collections in the north of England. Our space precludes from giving more than a brief notice of the many varied objects which may be inspected in this collection, but we may state, that neither labour nor expense is spared to make it as complete as possible in every respect. It is rich in British, Roman, Saxon, and Norman antiquities, illustrating the early history of the district, and contains a fine collection of Roman and early English coins. Among the ancient books we may mention a Book of Psalms, in Latin, of the year 1488; Latimer's Sermons, 1562; Titin Livii, 1548; Statius Aldus Venet, 1502; Augustine's de Trinitate, 1489; an Ancient folio Church

Bible, black letter, 1613; an Ancient Manuscript, written in a very small hand, explanatory of the Church Catechism, by C. B., 1622. The geology and mineralogy of the Lake District are well represented, as is also its natural history. We may add that this museum is patronised by numerous visitors from every part of the United Kingdom, from the continent, and also from America, and the visitors' book shows the autographs of the most eminent and distinguished persons of the age.

Flintoft's Model of the Lake District is exhibited during the summer months in the Town Hall. It is the labour of many years, and is considered the finest specimen of geographical modelling that has been constructed in this country; its accuracy is such as to have secured the approbation of Dr. Buckland, Professor Sedgwick, and the other leading geologists. For the tourist it possesses peculiar interest, exhibiting, as it does, an exact representation of the country through which he is travelling, with every object minutely laid down, and the whole coloured after nature. The model is on the scale of three inches to a mile, and its dimensions are 12 feet 9 inches by 9 feet 3 inches.

Keswick Gas Works, situated in Back Lane, were established in 1846, at a cost of £2,000, raised by a company in shares at £5 each. They comprise one gas holder, measuring about 5,000 cubic feet, and six retorts. There are thirty-six public lamps. Gas is supplied to the public at 6s. 8d. per 1000 cubic feet.

The Water Works were established in 1856, by a private company, and cost £3,000. The value of the shares was £5 each. The water is supplied from Skiddaw, where a reservoir has been formed about 130 yards above the level of the town, capable of containing 100,000 gallons. The prices charged by the company for the supply of water for domestic purposes varies from 4s. 4d. a year for houses of the annual rent of £5, to 20s. a year for houses the rent of which is £40.

Water-closets are charged 10s. per annum extra. Baths, inns, manufactories, workshops, and stables are supplied by special agreement. The supply of water is constant, and no tanks or cisterns are required.

Keswick has the honour of being the birth-place of Sir John Banks, Lord Chief Justice of Common Pleas; Peter Crosthwaite, the founder of the museum which bears his name; and Jonathan Otley, the author of the first Guide to the Lakes. Of the numerous celebrated men who have resided here, their names are now "Household Words."

Rothery of Littlethorpe and Greta Hall.

The present owner of Littlethorpe and Greta Hall is descended on the mother's side through the Simpsons and Claytons of Knaresboro', from the ancient Yorkshire family of Staveley. His father, the late JOHN ROTHERY, merchant, of Leeds (son of J. Rothery, who died November 1st, 1804, by his wife, Elizabeth Moss, of Guiseley), married Mary Clayton, daughter of William Simpson, Esq., of Knaresboro' and Gildthorn, by Mary, his wife, daughter and heir of William Clayton, Esq., of Knaresboro', son of John Clayton, Esq., of Masham (descended from the Claytons of West Clayton, parish of High Hoyland), by Gracey his wife, third daughter of Miles Staveley, Esq., of North Stanley. By Mary, his wife (who married 2ndly George Gibbon, Esq., and died in January, 1849), Mr. Rothery left issue,

i. CHARLES WILLIAM, of Littlethorpe.

ii. John S.

i. Charlotte Augusta, married to Frederick Henry Wood, Esq., of Hollin Hall, co. York.

ii. Phoebe Althes, married to George Frederick Leigh, son of the Hon. Mrs. Leigh, sister of Lord Byron, the poet.

Mr. Rothery was succeeded by his son,

CHARLES WILLIAM ROTHERY, Esq., of Littlethorpe, co. York, now resident at Greta Hall, near Keswick, long the residence of the poets Coleridge and Southey, born March 21st, 1823.

ST. JOHN'S-IN-THE-VALE CHAPELRY.

This chapelry is bounded on the north by Penrith high road and Blencathra, or Saddleback; on the west by Castlerigg Fells and Shoulthwaite Moss; on the south by Dale Head Hall; and on the east by Wanthwaite and the Helvellyn range of hills. The chapelry comprises but one township, which is, however, divided into the five divisions of Legberthwaite, Naddle, Burns, Wanthwaite, and Fornsile. The inhabitants, who are a shrewd, sensible, and primitive set of people, remarkably peaceable, honest, and upright in their dealings, are engaged in agricultural pursuits; they attend the Keswick markets. In this chapelry are two vales, separated by Naddle Fell, called the Vale of Wanthwaite and the Vale of St. John: the former, which is most admired for its scenery, has often been taken for the latter.

ST. JOHN'S CASTLERIGG AND WYTHBURN.

The area of this township is returned with the parish; its rateable value is £3,618 17s. 6d. The population in 1801 was 469; in 1811, 606; in 1821, 566; in 1831, 567; in 1841, 499; and in 1851, 558.

The manor of St. John and Castlerigg, or Naddle, was part of the Derwentwater estate, and as such is now held by R. D. Marshall, Esq. The principal landowners are R. D. Marshall, Esq.; the trustees of the late William Jackson, Esq.; Abraham Fisher, Esq.; Frederick Cooper, Esq.; T. L. S. Leathes, Esq.; Joseph Hall, Esq.; T. S. Spedding, Esq.; Mr. Dover; and Mrs. Scott.

THE CHAPEL.

The chapel is dedicated to St. John, and is most romantically situated on the pass between the Vale of Naddle and the beautiful Vale of St. John. It was rebuilt in the year 1842, at a cost of £290, raised by subscription and a chapel-rate, and is a very neat structure, most comfortable and commodious. The roof is of stained pine, and the whole of the interior tastefully painted. It has a small belfry and porch, and will seat about 280 persons. The inhabitants have been accustomed to pay chapel gifts to the minister, which formed originally his only stipend, and is levied upon certain lands within the township. These gifts, however, now form but an inconsiderable portion of the income. The rites of Christian burial, and of the sacraments, together with the usual services upon Sundays, fasts, and festivals, are performed here. The living, worth about £98 a year, is a perpetual curacy in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale, and those inhabitants or landowners who pay chapel gifts. In 1719 the living was augmented with £500, of which £200 was obtained from Queen Anne's Bounty, £200 given by Dr. Gatskarth, and the remainder by the inhabitants.

INCUMBENTS.—Thomas Robinson, —; Edward Wilson, who held the living for a period of forty-nine years, and died in 1853; A. C. Perring, who was removed 1855, and was succeeded by John Taylor, M.A., the present incumbent.

The parsonage house has been recently erected, and is most beautifully situated upon the Ambleside road, about two miles from Keswick. It has been built through the active exertions of the present incumbent, who has been most liberally assisted by the principal gentry and landowners of the neighbourhood.

The school is chiefly supported by private subscriptions and the children's quarter-pence, and a small endowment of £5 a year.

CHARITIES.

Williamson's Charity.—Thomas Williamson, by will dated 14th December, 1574, gave £20 to trustees, to be laid out in land, and the rent to be bestowed upon poor people born within St. John's chapelry or Castlerigg, in mutton or veal, at Martinmas yearly. This charity was afterwards increased to £40, and was distributed in meat till the year 1810; since which date the distribution has been in money, two or three shillings being given to each of ten or twelve poor persons of St. John and Castlerigg.

Poor Stock.—An entry in an old parish book, under the date of 1748, contains an account of ten legacies and gifts (some as old as 1685) amounting in the whole to £22 10s. And by another entry in the same book in 1772, it appears that the above sum was laid out in the purchase of a turnpike ticket for securing £25 on mortgage of the tolls of roads in Cumberland. The interest received is £1 2s. 6d., which is given away by the chapelwarden on the 22nd November yearly, in sums varying from 1s. to 6d. amongst poor persons belonging to the division of St. John's only, whether they receive relief or not. This and the two following charities do not extend to Castlerigg, which is part of the chapelry of St. John's.

Howe's Charity.—Thomas Howe, who died in 1797, gave, by his will, £20 to the chapelwarden of St. John's, to be placed out at interest by them, and the produce to be applied yearly for ever, for the relief of the indigent and necessitous poor in the chapelry of St. John's, who had no regular maintenance or relief from the said chapelry.

Stanley's Charities.—Mark Stanley, by will dated 6th June, 1808, gave £5 towards the expense of erecting a stone wall on the east side of Gate Moss, for the prevention of cattle being drowned therein; but in case the wall should not be erected within twelve months after his decease, then the legacy to lapse. He also left a guinea towards the expense of draining Stubb Moss, on similar conditions. Also one guinea to the poor of St. John's, to be distributed at the discretion of his executor; and another guinea to the poor of Threlkeld, to be divided at the discretion of the overseers. He also gave the sum of £40, in trust, to the chapelwardens of St. John's, that they should make an offer of the same, in equal proportions, to the divisions of Wythburn, Newlands, Thornthwaite, and Grisedale, to be paid to the respective chapelwardens, provided that they should each give security for the regular payment of 11d. per pound interest, so long as they chose to keep the said £10; but if this offer should not be accepted, and security given within twelve months, then the testator further willed that the whole legacy of £10, or the part thereof so refused, should be put out to interest, and that half of the interest so arising should be regularly, on Old Martinmas Day, divided among such poor persons as the trustees should think most proper; and they should divide the other half amongst poor parents and others in their division, in aiding them to pay the quarter pence for their children at school. He also gave the sum of £20 to the said chapelwardens, in trust, to place out the same, and to give the interest annually to poor householders in St. John's towards assisting them in paying their house rents, namely, to such of them as had no support from the parish. He also gave the further sum of £20 to the same trustees, to put out the same, and to lay out one-half the interest in the purchase of books of Common Prayer, to be given to poor children of St. John's; and the other half amongst the poorest sort of widows in St. John's. Also the further sum of £20 to the said chapelwardens, upon trust, to put out the same, and to lay out the interest in purchasing the best sort of sixpenny wheaten loaves, to be distributed at their discretion at the altar table in St. John's Chapel, on Whit Sunday, in the afternoon, to such poor persons of St. John's as should appear there to receive them. Also the further sum of £20 to the said chapelwardens, in trust, to lay out the same in erecting the seats of their chapel into pews. Also the sum of £5 in addition, for the erection of two new porches over the chapel doors. The testator died in 1809, and when the Charity Commissioners' published their report they stated that no part of the legacies mentioned in this will were paid, except one guinea to the poor. The commissioners add that, "With respect to the last mentioned legacies of £20 and £5, a vestry meeting was held for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of accepting the legacy on the terms proposed. Very few persons attended. The majority of those present were of opinion that the bequest should be accepted, provided the landowners of the parish would agree in giving the security required; but afterwards, upon further inquiry, it turned out that the great majority of the principal inhabitants and landholders were against giving such security or accepting the bequest upon those terms, and no further steps were taken in the business. This vestry meeting took place within the year after the testator's death. The chapel has since been pewed at the expense of the inhabitants, in consequence of an injunction from the chancellor of the diocese. These legacies therefore became forfeited, and sunk into the residue of the testator's estate."

Stanley's and Howe's charities yield now about £5 per annum, which is usually given to the poor connected with the township.

The lake Thirlmere, through which issues St. John's stream, which flows through the beautiful vale of St. John, and joins the Greta at Threlkeld Bridge; and the Castle Rock, which Sir Walter Scott has immortalised in his Bridal of Triermain, are situated in this vale; as are also Lyborthwaite mill and an old house which, some years ago, was nearly destroyed by a water-spout; and Wanthwaite mill, the property of R. D. Marshall, Esq.

Fenton of Castlerigg.

This family appears to have been very anciently settled in the neighbourhood of Leeds. Thorsby, the historian of that town, notes that the first marriage of the ancient family of Legh of Middleton (a village adjacent to Hunslet, where they long resided, and of which they are lords of the manor), after its transplanting into Yorkshire, was with Clarie, daughter of Mr. Thomas Fenton, 8th Edward III., A. D. 1332. Of the same family it appears was Sir Geoffrey Fenton, Knt., secretary of state, who married Alice, daughter of Richard Weston, lord chancellor of Ireland, by whom he had one son, William, and a daughter Catherine, married to Richard Boyle, Esq., first earl of Cork, from which marriage several noble families derive their descent. He died in 1608. In the two years immediately preceding the restoration, William Fenton served the office of mayor of Leeds.

THOMAS FENTON, who died in 1689, aged 70, left by Anne Tatham, his wife, five daughters and one son.

THOMAS FENTON, Esq., who married twice, by his first wife, Elizabeth, had a son ABRAHAM, of whom no male issue remains; and by his second, Mary, sister of James Hubston, Esq., father of the first baronet of that name, he had issue, THOMAS, his heir; Naomi died 1596, aged 69; Tabitha, married to John Hare, M.D.; Hannah; Mary, married to Josiah Oates, Esq.; Anne, married to the Rev. William Pendlebury; Mary, married to Josiah Ryder, died in 1756; and Rachel, married to D. Leach, Esq., of Riddlesden Hall. Thomas Fenton died 1705, aged 58, and was succeeded by his son,

THOMAS FENTON, Esq., who married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Charles Houghton, Bart., of Houghton Tower, Lancashire, by Mary, daughter of Viscount John Massereene, and died 1734, aged 46, leaving, with other issue, two sons, SAMUEL, of whom presently; and James, who married Dorothy Greame, and died 1804, leaving issue, James of Hampstead. The elder of these two brothers,

SAMUEL FENTON, Esq., married Ellen Leach, and died 1794, leaving issue, three daughters and five sons,

I. Thomas, barrister at law, died 1794, aged 37.

II. SAMUEL, of whom presently.

III. James, of Leeds.

IV. William, married Miss Pearson, and had issue.

V. Hubston, died 1811, aged 44.

The second son,

SAMUEL FENTON, Esq., married Harriet Greame, and by her (who married secondly, Benjamin Sadler, Esq., of Leeds, merchant) by her had issue,

1. SAMUEL GREAME, now of Castlerigg.
2. George, lieutenant in the army, died unmarried at Aracan, in India.
3. Anne, married to Michael Thomas Sadler, Esq.
4. Harriet.

On Mr. Fenton's decease he was succeeded by his eldest son, SAMUEL GREAME FENTON, Esq., born 30th May, 1795, married first, 3rd January, 1820, Eliza Catherine, daughter of the Rev. William Metcalfe, rector of Brimsfield, Gloucestershire; secondly, Susan Agnes, daughter of Thomas Chorley, Esq., of Leeds; and thirdly, Anne Maria, daughter of William Barleet, Esq., of Reddich, Worcestershire. By his first wife he has issue,

1. SAMUEL GREAME, born 24th December, 1821.
2. George Metcalfe, born 24th September, 1826.
3. Georgiana Anne.

Seat.—Castlerigg, near Keswick.

Wythburn chapelry and joint township with St. John's, extends from five to ten miles south-by-east of Keswick, to the confines of Westmoreland, where Dunmalle Raise marks the boundaries of the two counties. The manor of Wythburn belonged to the Braithwaites of Warcop. Sir Thomas Braithwaite, who died in 1640, was seised of the manors or hamlets of Wythburn, Arnboth, Smarthwaite, and Paddie, held of the Earl of Northumberland. This estate was sold by Richard Braithwaite, Esq., to George Fletcher, of Hutton Hall, ancestor of Sir Henry Vane, Bart., the present lord of the manor.

In Wythburn is Dalehead, the seat of T. L. Stanger Leathes, Esq., which is beautifully situated upon the banks of Thirlmere or Leathes' Water. Mr. Leathes is the lord of the manor here called Legberthwaite, and the owner of Thirlmere or Leathes' Water.

"The City" is a small hamlet in Wythburn, situated near the head of Thirlmere, eight miles south-south-east of Keswick.

THE CHAPEL.¹

Wythburn chapel is situated near "the City," and is a very ancient structure of stone: the date of its erection is not known. The living, a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the vicar of Crosthwaite, is now worth about £86 per annum, arising from glebe, purchased with augmentations amounting to £800, £60 of which was received from Queen Anne's bounty, and the remaining £200 from the Dowager Countess Gower. The glebe lands are situated in Crosthwaite, Great Salkeld, and Grasmere. The registers commence in 1777.

INCUMBENTS.—The Rev. — Simpson held this living for about fifty years; Rev. Edward Wilson, for about two or three; Rev. Isaac Denton, for about forty, who was succeeded by the Rev. Basil R. Lawson, the present incumbent, in 1851.

 As lowly as the lowliest dwelling."

At page 51, there will be found a full description of Thirlmere.

BORROWDALE CHAPELRY.

The number of inhabitants in Borrowdale township, in 1801, was 342; in 1811, 319; in 1821, 346; in 1831, 356; in 1841, 369; and in 1851, 425. The rateable value is £1,632 19s. 10d. The population is located in a few scattered houses, and in the villages or hamlets of Grange, Rosthwaite, Stonethwaite, Seatoller, and Seathwaite. Sheep farming is the principal occupation. Situated near Grange is an excellent slate quarry. Near Derwentwater lake, on the glebe land, is a lead mine, carried on by Messrs. A. Fletcher and Co. It is worked by one shaft of fifteen fathoms, and though in the third year of its operation, a workable vein has not yet been met with. The world-famous blacklead mine of Borrowdale is situated in this township, near the hamlet of Seatoller. Its produce is unequalled, no other species of native or foreign plumbago being comparable to it, and it is invaluable for artistic purposes. So far back as the reign of George II., an act was passed to prevent the lead of this mine from being stolen, by rendering parties guilty of this offence liable to the same punishment as for felony. In those days the valuable quality of this mineral for pencil manufacture [was unknown, for the act in question recites that "it hath been found by experience to be necessary, in the casting of bombshells, round shot, and cannon balls." From 1850, the mine was closed till October of the year 1858, when it was again opened,—a company having been formed for its efficient working. The mine has been leased from the trustees of Mr. Banks, of Carfe Castle, by a London company, the directors of which are well known and respected in the financial circles of the metropolis, and the capital invested is £20,000. Captain Dixon, the former manager of the mine, has resumed his old position, and an efficient staff of officials and operatives is in the course of formation; and it is only fair to say, that the undertaking starts under auspices which, whether they command or not, deserve success. Keswick is the market usually attended by the inhabitants. There is a sheep fair, with the customary rural sports, held on the first Wednesday in September, at Rosthwaite. For a full description of the romantic and picturesque scenery of Borrowdale, from the pen of Mrs. Harriet Martineau, see pages 46 and 47. The famous Bowder Stone is a massive body of rock, standing on an elevated terrace of ground, a short distance from the road that runs through the valley. It is sixty-two feet in length, thirty-six feet high, and measures in circumference eighty-nine feet—its weight has been computed at upwards of nineteen hundred tons. The most curious feature about it, however, is its peculiar position.

"Upon a semicircle of turf-clad ground
A mass of rock, resembling as it lay
Right at the foot of that moist precipice,
A stranded ship, with keel upturned, that rests
Careless of winds and waves."—WORDSWORTH.

From the summit of the rock, there is a fine view of the Borrowdale valley and mountains.

The manor of Borrowdale was parcel of the ancient manor of Castlerigg, which belonged to the Derwent-water estate. The Lawson family had also a manor in Borrowdale. A survey of the manor of Derwent Fells, taken in 1578, informs us that "the abbot and convent of Furness, late held of the honour of Cockermouth, in pure and perpetual alms, Borrowdale, which, by the dissolution of the said monasterie, came to the hands of King Henry VIII., and as yet remaineth in the hands of our Sovereign Lady the Queen's Majesty that now is. The abbot and convent of Fountains, late held the other Borrowdale, of the said honour, in pure and perpetual alms, which came to the said King, by the dissolution of the abbey, and by the said King Henry, granted to Richard Grame, and his heirs." The manor of Borrowdale is now held by Sir Wilfred Lawson, Bart., of Brayton, who holds a court baron once a year at the inn at Rothwaite. There are several resident yeoman, but Abraham Fisher, S. Z. Langton, and Thomas Simpson, Esqrs., are the principal landowners.

Rothwaite hamlet is beautifully situated near the centre of the dale, and at the confluence of the two mountain brooks which form the Derwent, six and a half miles south of Keswick.

THE CHAPEL.

A short distance from Rothwaite is a chapel-of-ease to the parish church of Crosthwaite. It is a small plain stone structure, rebuilt in 1825-6, at a cost of about £300. The living, in the patronage of the vicar of the parish, is now worth about £80: up to 1844 it was only worth about £60, but in that year the Ecclesiastical Commissioners made a grant of £12 per annum towards its augmentation. Tithes are paid to the mother church of Crosthwaite. The register commences in 1777.

INCUMBENTS.—John Harrison, who held the living about fifty-three years, he was succeeded by William Parsable, about 1804; and in 1838, George Newby, the present minister, was inducted.

The parsonage house, a substantial stone building, situated near the chapel, was erected in 1842, at a cost, including the purchase of site, of £900. The late

Joseph Fisher, Esq., left £800 for the purpose of erecting a residence for the incumbent, to which sum £200 was added by the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty. The £100 remaining, after defraying all expenses, is invested at three-and-a-half per cent. interest, which is paid to the clergyman.

There is a small school in connection with the chapel. It was rebuilt in 1825, and is supported by the pence of the children, about twenty-five of whom constitute the average attendance.

Grange is another hamlet in this township, situated at the entrance of the dale, about four miles south-by-west of Keswick. When the abbots of Furness owned Borrowdale, a few monks were placed at its entrance, to receive and guard the crops; and this place was their granary. It is now a picturesque hamlet, well known for its beauty. Just behind it, the noble wooded rock, which leaves room only for the road and the river, is Castle Crag, the view from the summit of which is splendid. In the hamlet of Grange is a small chapel, erected by Miss Heathcote, which is used also as a school. It is private property, and is not as yet completed and endowed.

The other hamlets in the township are Stonethwaite, seven miles, Seatoller (the seat of Abraham Fisher, Esq.,) seven and a half, and Seathwaite, eight and a half miles south of Keswick.

In Park Field, near Grange, there is a saline spring.

The Rev. George Newby, the present incumbent, is the author of some poetical works.

NEWLANDS CHAPELRY.

The area of Newlands is returned with the parish; the rateable value, inclusive of Thornthwaite, Braithwaite, and Portinscale, is £3,614 10s. The population of Newlands, including Coledale, or Portinscale, was, in 1801, 282; in 1811, of Newlands alone, 118; in 1821, 115; in 1831, 113; in 1841, 133; and in 1851, 196.

This township is parcel of the manor of Derwent Fells, belonging to General Whyndham. There is an annual sheep fair held at Newlands on the first Friday in September. The inhabitants attend the markets at Keswick. There are many resident yeomen in Braithwaite, Thornthwaite, Portinscale, and Newlands; but the principal landowners are Sir John Woodford; R. E. W. P. Standish, Esq.; Sir John B. Walsh; John Sanderson, Esq.; R. D. Marshall, Esq.; H. H. Fawcett, Esq.; Mr. Joseph Thompson, and Miss Fisher.

Here are lead mines, one of which, Goldscope Mine, has been worked for a great number of years. It is supposed that about 200 years ago large quantities of copper were obtained. On the vein now worked by the Goldscope Mine about 190 fathoms were driven in a westerly direction, at which part a crop, or lead-ore vein was met with, where it was upwards of twelve feet wide. Over this level large quantities of lead-ore were secured, and the vein greatly increased in width, in some places over twenty feet wide, and its average produce from three to four tons per fathom. This vein was discovered about six years ago, since which time upwards of 2,000 tons of lead-ore have been obtained. The lead contains but little silver. A shaft has been sunk in sole of the adit level forty fathoms—the vein is at this point about four feet wide, yielding, at places, two and a half tons of ore per fathom. The length of the ore ground is about twenty-four fathoms—the strata bored through a blue clay-slate. Mr. A. R. Clarke is the proprietor of the mine, which affords employment to about fifty hands, and yields about 500 tons per annum of lead-ore.

THE CHAPEL.

Newlands chapel is a plain but neat structure, rebuilt in 1843, at a cost of about £180, of which sum £70 was raised by subscription, £32 collected amongst the inhabitants of the chapelry, £10 given by the late Queen Dowager, and the remainder by the incumbent. The windows of the chapel have semi-circular heads; there is a small porch, and a bell turret, with two bells. In 1845 the eastern window was filled with stained glass, as a testimony of respect to the incumbent, and to commemorate the rebuilding of the chapel. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the vicar of Crosthwaite. It was certified to the commissioners as of the annual value of £51, but is now worth about £80, arising from lands purchased in 1757, with £600 received from Queen Anne's Bounty. The register of baptisms commences in 1749.

INCUMBENTS.—Joseph Fisher, 1791; John Kirby, 1799; Benjamin Jackson, 1799; Christopher Howe, 1792; William Cruickell, 1793; William Parsdale, 1794; James Currie, 1826; John Monkhouse, 1840.

The parsonage house is at present occupied by the schoolmaster, the incumbent residing in Underskiddaw township.

The school is a neat building near the church, and is supported by the children's quarter pence, the incumbent supplying the necessary amount to make the income £40 a year, which he guarantees to the teacher.

CHARITIES.

Udall's Charity.—Peter Udall, in 1653, left £4 10s. 4d. to the poor of Thorthwaite, Great Braithwaite, Little Braithwaite, Ullock, and Portinscale, arising out of land, called Bishop's Hall, in Essex; but in consequence of the charity not being paid for twenty-two years, the trustees were enabled to purchase a field in Portinscale Constablewick, called Lowfield, which now lets for £12 15s. a year, which, added to the original sum, makes a total of £17 5s. 4d. per annum. This amount is annually divided on the 2nd of February amongst the poor of the above-named places, when there is 8s. paid to the minister of Thorthwaite, for a goodly admonition to the poor, and a like sum for a dinner to the six trustees. John Sanderson, Thomas Bowe, Thomas Harriman, George Muckle, John Walker, and another, are the trustees at present.

Fisher's Charity.—Mr. Joseph Fisher, a native of Newlands, but at present a resident of Portinscale, gave, in 1856, to the perpetual curate and chapelwardens of Newlands for the time being, £100, the interest to be expended in books published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. On the 1st of June, 1853, he further gave £150 to the same trustees, the interest of which he ordered to be divided by them on Whitsun Thursday amongst the poor of Newlands,—ten shillings to be given to the incumbent for preaching a sermon on that day. Both these bequests are invested in the Three-per-cent. Consols.

Little Town is a hamlet in this chapelry, about four miles south-west of Keswick.

COLEDALE, OR PORTINSCALE.

The population of this township was returned with that of Newlands in 1801; in 1811, it was 225; in 1821, 294; in 1831, 253; in 1841, 262; and in 1851, 293. Portinscale, or Coledale, forms parcel of the manor of Derwent Fells, and its freeholders, &c., in 1578, will be found in our account of Braithwaite, at page 351.

At the south-west corner of Derwentwater, in this township, are the Brandley lead mines, which have been worked for several years, and since 1848 by the Keswick Mining Company. There are two shafts, one, by steam, of twenty-six horse-power, which is fifty fathoms deep; the other, by water, twelve-horse, of thirty fathoms, below the level of the lake. About 200 fathoms have been worked since 1848—the liberty of workings is about six square miles. The strata bored through are principally clay-slate. The vein varies from one to six feet. The number of men employed is about eighty, and the mine produces about 300 tons of lead-ore per annum. There are also veins of copper, but they are not workable at present. A salt spring rises up at the bottom of the fifty-fathom shaft. This company have had lead-ore mines in Thorthwaite, which are now laid in in consequence of not being productive. There is a woollen manufactory here called Stair Factory.

The pretty village of Portinscale is situated at the foot of Derwentwater, one mile and a quarter north-west of Keswick, and in its vicinity are several pleasant villa residences, and a capital hotel, from which fine views of Derwent lake and the surrounding scenery can be obtained.

Ullock is a small hamlet in this township, two and a half miles north-west of Keswick.

BRAITHWAITE.

Its population of this township in 1801 was 282; in 1811, 205; in 1821, 214; in 1831, 245; in 1841, 318; and in 1851, 351.

The manor of Braithwaite and Coledale form parcel of the manor of Derwent Fells, of which General Wyndham is lord, and his tenants here pay arbitrary fines. In a survey taken in 1578, the following particulars are given under the head "Brathwate and Coledale." "Anthony Barwis, Esq., holdeth the manor or town of Thornthwaite, by homage, fealtie, and suit of court, and witnessman in Derwent Fells and foreign service, rendering per annum ——. The abbot and convent of Furnesse, late held of the honour aforesaid, in pure and perpetual alms, Borrodale, which, by the dissolution of the said monasterie, came to the hands of King Henry VIII., and as yet remaineth in the hands of our sovereign lady the Queen's majesty that now is. The abbot and convent of Fountaine, late held the other Borrodale of the said honour in pure and perpetual alms, which came to the said king by the dissolution of the Abbey, and by the King Henry granted to Richard Grame, and his heirs. George Porter, gentleman, holdeth certain lands and tenements called Frankshaw, late Richard Orpewer, by homage, foreign service, witnessmen, and other services, and renders two shillings. William Bow, Robert Mason, William Studdart, Thomas Mason, John Bow, and John Mason, John Bow de Swineside, and Richard Tickel, hold certain lands and tenements called Husacre, and Last-acre,—some time the land of Robert Stanley, by homage, suit of court, from three weeks to three weeks, and witnessman in Skiddaw, and between Cocker and Darwent, and render per annum for Lastacre 4s., for the moiety of Husacre, 6s. 8d., and for one other close there 1s. 4d., in toto, 12s. The heirs of Myles Hodgson, hold there the moiety of one tenement in Portinscales, late the lands of John Ile, by homage, witnessman, foreign service, and suit of court, and renders per annum 1s. The heirs of John Reed hold there certain lands and tenements by like service, and render 1s. Anthony Barwis, Esq., holdeth certain lands and tenements in Braithwaite and Portinscale, late the lands of Thomas Wilkinson, by like service, and renders 6d. Thomas Wood holdeth certain lands and tenements in Braithwaite by like service, and renders 6d. Robert Dands, gentleman, holdeth one tenement with th' appurtenances in Gillbank, by like services, and renders per annum 4d. Sum total of the free rents in Braithwaite and Coledale aforesaid, 17s. 4d." The mill at Braithwaite was held at the same period by John Robinson, who paid ten shillings a year; and the sum total of the rents of the tenants at will in Braithwaite and Coledale amounted to £38 13s.

The village of Braithwaite is situated at the lower end of Winlatter, two and a half miles west-by-north of Keswick. Here is a large woollen manufactory, and at Force Cragg is a lead mine, worked by Walton, Cooper, and Co., which employs about fourteen hands. In the village is a Wesleyan chapel, and also a neat national school, with teacher's residence, erected in 1841, at a cost of above £550, of which £200 was given by John Crosthwaite, Esq., of Liverpool, a native of Braithwaite, and the remainder by James Stanger, Esq., of Larthwaite. The school, which is attended by about forty pupils, is under government inspection, and is supported by the children's quarter pence, aided by a grant from the Committee of Council on Education. In connection with the school is a lending library of 400 volumes, and a penny bank: the latter was established in 1854, and is managed gratuitously by the schoolmaster. Besides the woollen manufactory just mentioned there are two corn-mills, one in the village, the other situated near the Stair Factory, called Stair Mill, and a blacklead pencil manufactory.

Little Braithwaite and Powder How, are two hamlets in this township, the latter being about four and a half miles north-west of Keswick.

THORNTWHAITE.

The number of inhabitants in this township in 1801, was —; in 1811, 120; in 1821, 164; in 1831, 174; in 1841, 187; and in 1851, 275. Thornthwaite manor belongs to the executors of the late John Marshall, Esq. In this township there are a bobbin-mill, a woollen manufactory, and a sand-mill.

The village of Thornthwaite is situated on the Cockermouth New Road, three and a half miles west-north-west of Keswick.

THE CHURCH.

Thornthwaite church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is a small plain building, near the head of Bassenthwaite Lake. The living, a perpetual curacy in the patronage of the vicar of Crosthwaite and the incumbent of St. John's, Keswick, is worth about £100 per annum, having been augmented with the sum of £2,000 by James Stanger, Esq., and £1,000 by Captain Henry. The late Bishop of Carlisle obtained a grant of £800 from two societies towards providing a parsonage, which was purchased in 1845, and the residue of the money placed in the Three-and-a-quarter per Cent Stock. The Rev. Mr. Short is the present incumbent.

The beautiful lake of Derwentwater, with its islands and surrounding scenery, will be found described at page 47, we need only add here that, on Derwent Isle, a neat mansion or summer-house was erected by the late — Pocklington, Esq., which has been considerably enlarged by the present proprietor, H. C. Marshall, Esq. On Lord's Island may be seen the remains of the house erected by the Derwentwaters. Rampsholme Island is the property of R. D. Marshall, Esq.; St. Herbert's Island was purchased from Sir Wilfred Lawson, by H. C. Marshall, Esq.

GRETA MILLS AND BRIERY COTTAGES, EXTRA-PAROCHIAL.

The population of these extra-parochial places were prior to 1841 probably included in the return for Crosthwaite parish, by which they are surrounded. In 1841 it was 100, and in 1851, 91. The small hamlet of Greta Mills contains a woollen factory and a bobbin mill, the latter of which employs about thirty hands. It is expected that these extra-parochial places will be soon annexed to the chapelry of St. John-in-the-Vale.

DEAN PARISH.

The parish of Dean is bounded on the north by Brigham, on the west by Distington and Workington, on the south by Lamplugh and Arlecdon, and on the east by Loweswater. It is about three miles in length by the same in breadth, and comprises the townships of Dean, Branthwaite, and Ullock Pardshaw and Deanscales, whose united area is 6,360 acres. The inhabitants usually attend the Cockermouth and Workington markets.

DEAN.

This township contained, in 1801, 178 inhabitants; in 1811, 192; in 1821, 168; in 1831, 193; in 1841, 226; and in 1851, 205.

Dean is one of the five towns given by William de Meschines to Waltheof; having passed by descent to the families of Lucy and Percy, it was given by Henry Earl of Northumberland to Henry VIII. In 1578 Philip Lord Wharton held the town of Dean and Whinfell, sometime parcel of the possessions of the honour of Cockermouth, granted by Henry Earl of Northumberland to Thomas Wharton, the controller of his household, and to his heirs male, paying for Dean £13 8s. 1d., and for the lands and tenements at Whinfell £7 1s. 7d. per annum. At the same date the tenants of Lord Wharton in Dean paid yearly for certain lands, &c., 7s. 6d.; and the tenants of George Porter, 2s. 4d. John Allason also held lands in Dean at this period. It was afterwards granted to the Whartons, purchased by the Duke of Somerset, and from him has descended to General Wyndham, the present owner, who holds his courts annually in October for Dean and Whinfell, at the Royal Inn. The commons were enclosed in 1809, by an act of Parliament passed the same year. The land here is all freehold, except a few small plots, for which a 20d. fine is paid.

The village of Dean is situated on the east side of the Marron, five miles south-west of Cockermouth.¹

THE CHURCH.

The church, dedicated to St. Oswald, is an ancient structure, consisting of nave, chancel, aisle, porch, and bell turret, with two bells. It is situated near the village. It is said to have been erected in 1447 upon the site of a previous church, and to have been consecrated by the Bishop of Drumore. The benefice is a rectory, valued in the King's Book at £10 13s. 1d.,

¹ John Dalton, M.D. the son of the Rev. John Dalton, rector of Dean, who was born here in 1769, was an admired poet, and author of verses descriptive of the vale of Keswick and its neighbourhood. In 1799 he adapted to the stage Milton's Comus, and during its run he sought out a grand-daughter of Milton in distressed circumstances, and procured a benefit for her, which is said to have produced upwards of £120. Dr. Johnson wrote a prologue for the occasion, which was spoken by Garrick.

but now worth about £300 a year. At the enclosure of the commons there was a portion allotted in lieu of the tithes of the parish, with the exception of fifty-two acres, which were commuted in 1849 for £3 per annum. In 1426 Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, presented to this living. The advowson passed to the Whartons in the seventeenth century, and was granted by Philip Duke of Wharton to M. Smailes, Esq., from whom, after several transfers, it came to the Rev. Miles Tarn, rector of Dean, and is now possessed by the present rector. The parish register commences in 1656.

Rectors.—Thomas Pickard, 1664; Daniel Pinner, 1679; Anthony Proctor, 1688; John Dalton, 1705; William Ponsonby, 1712; Miles Tarn, 1750; John Tarn, 1783; Henry Lill, 1803; Samuel Sherwen, 1827.

The rectory is a good stone building, situated near the church. It was rebuilt some years ago, and remodelled in 1833, by the present rector.

CHARITIES.

The parochial school, situated close to the churchyard, was endowed on the 14th March, 1596, by John Fox, of the Goldsmiths' Company, a native of Branthwaite, with the sum of £150, which was then invested in landed property in the vicinity of London, out of which the master of this school receives £10 per annum for the free education of poor men's children belonging to this parish, payable half-yearly at Lady Day and Michaelmas. The commissioners of the Goldsmiths' Company are the trustees. On the 18th of October, 1850, the late Mrs. S. Fidler left the interest of £100, placed in the Savings Bank, Cockermouth, for which the schoolmaster is to teach such children as the trustees think eligible. There is the interest of another £100 left by Mrs. Dinah Robinson, in 1822, for the education of poor children of this parish; preference, however, being given to the children of Pardshaw Hall, as expressed in the will of the donor.

Mrs. Sarah Fidler, as above, also bequeathed £100, the interest of which is to be given to the poor of the parish not receiving relief.

An entry in the churchwardens' book states that John Lancaster, by will dated 23rd October, 1775, gave £20 to the poor stock of the parish of Dean and for the same uses.

The parish of Dean is entitled to a certain number of Bibles under Lord Wharton's Charity. Twenty Bibles with the Common Prayer are sent annually to the clergyman of Dean, who distributes them amongst the children of Dean, Broughton, in Bridekirk parish; Whinfell, in Brigham parish; and Birkby, in the parish of Cross Canonby, according to the directions sent with the books.

BRANTHWAITE.

The population of this township in 1801 was 271; in 1811, 324; in 1821, 355; in 1831, 317; in 1841, 300; and in 1851, 332. They are principally employed in agriculture. There is a paper-mill situated within half a mile of the village, and a saw-mill and two corn-mills in the village.

The manor of Branthwaite was granted, together with Dean, by William de Meschines to Waltheof, whose son Alan gave it in marriage with one of his kinswomen to a person who took the name of De Branthwaite. The heiress of the De Branthwaites brought the manor in marriage to the Skeltons, which family continued in possession for several generations. In the 35th Henry VIII. it was found by inquisition that John Skelton held the manor of Branthwaite of the king by knight's service, as of his manor of Dean, rendering for the same 24s. cornage, suit of court at Dean, homage and fealty, and witnessman within the five towns. The Skeltons held Branthwaite till after 1578, for in that year we find that Thomas Skelton held "the manor of Branthwaite as of the said earl (Northumberland), as of his honour of Cockermouth, by homage, fealty, and suit of court at Cockermouth, from three weeks to three weeks, with witnessman and other services, rendering per annum 23s. 4d." General Skelton afterwards devised the manor to Captain Jones, whose son, Arnoldus Jones, took the name of Skelton, and died in 1793. It was afterwards held by the Curwens of Workington, but is now the property of General Wyndham. The customary tenants were enfranchised by Henry Skelton, on payment of eighty years' purchase. The principal land-owners are Henry Curwen, Esq., and John F. Harrison, Esq.

The village of Branthwaite is situated on the banks of the Marron, four and a half miles south-east of Workington.

Branthwaite Hall is supposed, from a date which it bears, to have been erected in 1604. It is a strong, old building, nearly covered with ivy, and is the property of Henry Curwen, Esq. It now serves as a farm-house.

Calva, or Calvah Hall, is another old building in this township, also the property of Henry Curwen, Esq., and now occupied by a farmer.

ULLOCK.

Ullock township contained in 1801 229 inhabitants; in 1811, 226; in 1821, 309; in 1831, 356; in 1841, 350; and in 1851, 321. The population is principally collected in the villages or hamlets of Ullock, Pardshaw, Pardshaw Hall, and Deanscales: agriculture is the chief employment. At Dean Moor is a colliery, worked by Mr. Percival, consisting of one shaft, whose perpendicular depth is sixteen fathoms. The seam now working is two feet ten inches thick,—the other seams, varying from two feet two inches to three feet, are worked out. There are also some tile works on the Moor.

A moiety of the vill of Ullock was held in 35th Henry VIII., by John Skelton, as of the manor of Dean, by knight's service, 8½d. cornage, 2s. 8d. free rent, service of witnessman within the five towns, with homage and fealty. John Thompson held the other moiety by like services. From a survey taken in 1578 we learn the following particulars relating to Woodhall and Ullock:—"George Porter holdeth a capital messuage, with certain lands thereto belonging or adjoining, called Woodhall, late the lands of Thomas Woodhall, by homage, fealty, suit of court at Cockermouth, from three weeks to three weeks, and other services, rendering per annum 10½d. The same holdeth certain lands and tenements at Woodhall, (sive Ullock) late the lands of Thomas Woodhall, by the same services, rendering per annum 1s. 9d. There is yearly paid by the tenants of Ullock 6s. 8d. free rent, as followeth:—The heirs of John Thompson holdeth the fourth part of Ullock, nigh Dean, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, as is aforesaid, and payeth yearly for cornage, 4d., and for free rent, 1s. 8d., with other services. Lancelot Fletcher holdeth the moiety of the fourth part of Ullock, by like services, and witnessman, and renders for cornage, 2d., for free rent, 1s. 2d., in toto, 1s. 4d. William Skelton de Armathwaite ar' holdeth the other moiety of the fourth part of Ullock, by like services as aforesaid, and renders 2d. The heirs of Oswald Crakeplaco, holdeth the fourth part of Ullock aforesaid, late Robert Nicholson's, by like services as aforesaid, and payeth for cornage, 4½d.; for free rent, 1s. 2d. in toto, 1s. 6½d. Cuthbert Roger, Thomas Lathes, Henry Bowman, and William Skelton, holdeth certain lands and tenements in Ullock aforesaid, by like services, and render 1s. 7½d. All the tenants of Ullock aforesaid, pay yearly 4d. at the feast of St. Michael the Archangel."

The village of Ullock is situated on the Marron, at the southern extremity of the parish, five and a half miles south-west-by-south of Cockermouth.

Pardshaw is a hamlet in this parish, four and a half miles south-south-west of Cockermouth. By the inquisition mentioned above of knights' fees in Cumberland, in the 35th Henry VIII., it is found that "Thomas Salkeld, of Corkby, then held Pardishow of the king, as of his manor of Dean, by the service of the moiety of one knight's fee, 2s. 8d. cornage, puture of the sergeants, 8d. free rent, homage and fealty." In 1578 George Salkeld, in right of his wife, Barbara, daughter and heir of Richard Salkeld, Esq., held certain lands at Pardshaw, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, paying yearly for cornage, 2s. 8½., for free rent, 10s. 8d.: in toto, 13s. 4½d. George Porter, James Reed, John Fearn, also occur as freeholders. Pardshaw Hall is about four miles south-by-west of Cockermouth, where there is a meeting-house of the Society of Friends and a Methodist chapel. Pardshaw School is endowed with £3 12s. a year, the interest of £100 left in 1832 by Sarah Fletcher. In the seventeenth century the Quakers were very numerous in this parish. George Fox, their founder, in his journal, speaks of two general meetings held at Pardshaw Crag, in 1657 and 1663.

Deanscales, or shields for the cattle of Dean, is another hamlet in this parish, three and a half miles south-west-by-south of Cockermouth. It is situated on what was formerly a common, being a place for sheltering the cattle. The common has been since enclosed and granted into tenancies. The following occur as freeholders at Deanscales in 1578:—John Fearon. Thomas Porter.

DEARHAM PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the north by the river Ellen, on the west by the Irish Sea, on the south by the township of Dovenby and the parish of M'limby, and on the east by Gilerux parish. It comprises the townships of Dearham and Ellenborough with Unerigg. The Maryport and Carlisle railway runs through the parish, the inhabitants of which usually attend the markets at Cockermouth and Maryport.

DEARHAM.

The area of this township is 2,153 acres. The population in 1801 was 403; in 1811, 443; in 1821, 515; in 1831, 736; in 1841, 1,037; and in 1851, 1,209, principally resident in the village of Dearham. Coal mining is the chief employment of the people in this neighbourhood. There are two coal pits situated near the village, and worked by the firm of John and Thomas Walker. These mines possess two shafts, called respectively the "Lonsdale" and the "Lowther," the former of which is about sixty fathoms deep, to the "Ten Quarters Seam," of about seven and a half feet in thickness; the latter sixty-one fathoms deep, to the "Metal Band." The two collieries employ about 300 hands. There is also the "Orchard" pit, which is worked by John Steel, Esq., and possesses a shaft of forty-six feet perpendicular depth. The seam worked in this pit is the "Little Main Seam," one foot ten inches thick, which extends about 800 yards north and south of the shaft. Another small seam, the "Ligbank," two feet ten inches thick, but now worked out, lay eight fathoms below the "Little Main." The "Orchard" pit gives employment to about eighty persons, and when in constant work produces about 11,000 tons per annum. Besides these, there is the "John" pit, which lies a little south of the "Orchard" pit, but is now worked out. Its shaft, thirty-six fathoms deep, is at present used for pumping water from the "Orchard" pit.

A moiety of the manor of Dearham was given by Alan, second lord of Allerdale, to Simon Sheffling, and the remaining moiety to Dolphin, son of Gospatric. Sheffling's posterity assumed the name of Dearham, or Deerham, and continued to possess their moiety till their heiress brought it in marriage to the Barwis family, the last male descendant of whom, Richard Barwis, Esq., of Islekirk, had a sister and heir, who married a Lamplugh, and had a son, Richard Lamplugh, Esq., who, in 1722, sold this estate to Sir James Lowther, Bart., ancestor of the Earl of Lonsdale, the present proprietor. The other moiety came to the Multons, and was given by Thomas de Multon, in the reign of Henry III., to Calder Abbey, to which it continued attached till the suppression of the religious houses, when Queen Elizabeth, under letters patent, bearing date June 23rd, 1564, granted "to Thomas Lyfford and John Lyfford (inter alia) twenty-one tenements and two cottages in Dearham, in the tenure of so many different persons, and also the water-mill there, late parcel of the possession of the priory of Calder; and also all woods, lands, rents, reversions, services, court leet, view of frank pledge, fines, amerciaments, free warren, and all other jurisdictions, liberties, privileges, profits, and hereditaments whatsoever, in Dearham aforesaid; and this moiety soon after seems to have been conveyed to the tenants in sevralty." Besides the Earl of Lonsdale, Calder Abbey, and the freeholders, the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle claim a share of the manorial rights and privileges. The commons, amounting to 408 acres, were enclosed in 1825.

The village of Dearham is situated in a beautiful glen, about two and a half miles east of Maryport.

THE CHURCH.

Dearham church is an ancient structure, in the Norman style, consisting of nave and chancel, and large square tower; but was much modernised in 1814. It contains a very ancient square font, [the sides of which are ornamented with sculptured imagery.¹ Over one of the windows, on the south side of the nave, is a grave stone, with a cross florée and sword, having the words "Kestula Radulph . . ." (Cestula Radulphi, the coffin of Radulphus) cut upon it in antique characters.² In the church there is a gravestone, without any inscription, ornamented with a very rich cross florée, from the staff of which proceed branches of oak; on one side is a book, and on the other a pair of shears.³ Another gravestone, with the cross and sword, but without inscription, is found in the porch. A stone, three feet six inches in length, which appears to have been part of an ancient cross, is now used as the transom stone of a window in the north aisle. It is covered with rude sculpture in bas-relief. In the church yard is a cross, five feet four inches in height, ornamented with guilloches, and not unlike some of the crosses found so plentifully in the Isle of Man. The church contains a monument for the family of Christian of Unerigg, and that of William and Ann Bowman, who lived sixty-four years together as man and wife, and died in 1800; he aged eighty-seven, she ninety-one. The church of Dearham was given by Alice de Romeley, daughter of William Fitz Duncan, "to God and the church of St. Mary, at Gisburne, and the canons serving God there, for the health of her soul," and the ² "This inscription," say the Messrs. Lysons, was communicated by the Vicar of Dearham to Mr. G. Smith, as being in the window of his church, and was inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1751, p. 112. The late Mr. Pegge, under his usual signature of Paul Gemsege, afterwards communicated his conjectures upon it to the same magazine, (p. 354). Supposing it to have been on the glass, and to have related to some repairs of the church windows, with no small degree of ingenuity he conjectured that it should be read, "Hærentas Galfridus Guding Reparavit Anno Domini M.C.L."—*Mog. souls of her father and mother, and all her ancestors and successors, and her husbands Gilbert de Pipard and Robert de Courtenay, which grant was confirmed by Hugh, bishop of Carlisle," to which the great tithes were appropriated; they are now vested in the Earl of Lonsdale, and amount to (com.) £148 15s. 1d.; in 1821, they were commuted in 1839. In 1826, at the enclosure of the common, 34 acres were allotted to the vicar, in lieu of small tithes. After the dissolution of the monastic establishments the advowson of Dearham was granted by Queen Mary to the Bishop of Carlisle; but the right of presentation was claimed and exercised by two Yorkshire gentlemen, to whom it had been granted by the prior and convent of Gisbourne, previous to their suppression. The patronage came, subsequently, to the bishop of the diocese, by whom it was exercised till 1747; it is now possessed by the Christian family of Unerigg Hall. The living, a vicarage, is worth about £120 a year.¹ The parish register commences about 1560.

VICARS.—John de Gilerouce, —; John de Derham, 1554; William de Hayton, 1365; Robert Udall, —; Thomas Watson,² 1563; Henry Simpson, 1573; William Troughere, 1577; Edward Dykes, 1578; Henry Adcock, 1593; Edward Dykes again; John Bowman, 1600; Michael Hurd, —; William Harrison, 1623; Musgrave Sleddall, —; Richard Murthwaite, 1686; Peter Murthwaite, 1701; Joseph Ritson, 1736; Anthony Sharp, 1757; Mr. Dalzell, 1794; John Whitelock, 1815; John Swinburn, 1834; Henry Overend, 1836; James Currie, 1839.

The vicarage, situated close to the church, is a plain stone building, erected about the year 1815.

The Wesleyans have a place of worship in the village, erected in 1839; a schoolroom was added in 1844; the cost of the whole amounted to £300. The chapel will seat about 300 persons. The Primitive Methodists built a chapel here in 1856, which contains sittings for about 800, at an expense of £210.

The parochial school, situated in the village, has an average attendance of 60 pupils. It receives £5 a year from Beton's charity. During the summer months an evening school, which is well attended, is carried on in the same building.

CHARITY.

Ewan Christian's Charity.—Ewan Christian, by will dated Nov. 22nd, 1718, devised a rent-charge of 20s. yearly on the close called Rough White Croft, for and towards the buying of books, viz., the Whole Duty of Man, Bishop Beveridge's (or some other) Exposition of the Catechism, and Common Prayer Books, to be distributed to such persons within the parish of Dearham and township of Flimby as his representatives should think fit; the said books to be so given yearly, at the schoolhouse, every 11th day of March, the anniversary of the testator's baptism. This charity is carried out according to the directions of the donor.

The Dearham General Improvement Society, which was established in 1855, consists of 53 members, and possesses a good library, of about 300 volumes. The receipts for the past year amounted to £35 19s. 10d., and the expenditure to £34 6s. 5d.

There are two corn-mills in this township, one situate in the village, the other, called Dearham Mill, on the river Ellen, near the railway station.

ELLENBOROUGH AND UNERIGG.

The area of this township is 1,224 acres, and its rateable value £3,975 5s. 1d. The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 471; in 1811, 638; in 1821, 621; in 1831, 713; in 1841, 766; and in 1851, 969, who are principally collected in the village of Ellenborough. Mining is the chief employment. The manor of Ellenborough, formerly called Alneburgh, comprising the township of Ellenborough, in Dearham parish, and Netherhall, in Cross Canonby parish, was at a very early period possessed by Simon de Sheffling, in whose family it continued till the reign of Edward I., when it was purchased by the Eaglesfields. In the reign of Henry VIII., a co-heiress of the Eaglesfields brought it to John Senhouse, Esq., of Seascales, at which place the ancestors of this ancient family had been settled for several generations. A younger son of this John settled at Netherhall, now the property and residence of J. P. Senhouse, Esq., the present lord of the manor.

The manor of Unerigg, or Ewanrigg, appears to have been anciently possessed by a family bearing the local name, as Robert de Ewanrigg appears as witness to several deeds. In 1368 the Lady Margaret de Multon appears to have been in possession of this place, for in that year a license was granted by the bishop to John de Thwaytes to be domestic chaplain to her, in any convenient building within the manor. It afterwards became the property of the Thwaytes family; and, in 1638, was conveyed by Richard Barwise, Esq., to Ewan Christian, Esq., of Milntown, in the Isle of Man, deemster of that island, from whom it has descended to the present lord, H. T. Christian, Esq.

The township was enclosed in 1849, when two acres were allotted as a pleasure ground, and a like quantity for cottage gardens, for the use of the inhabitants of Ellenborough.

The village of Ellenborough is situated one and a half mile east-south-east of Maryport. Lord Chief Justice Law derived his title from this place.

CHARITIES.

School.—Ewan Christian, by will dated 22nd Nov., 1718, devised to his heirs a building at Unerigg, to be used as a schoolhouse for ever, and for the support of a schoolmaster therein, and necessary repairs of the said school, and gave and devised a yearly rent-charge of £6 6s. 11d. John Christian, by will dated Feb. 23rd, 1742, "reciting, amongst other things, that his brother William Christian had bequeathed to him £40, upon trust, to dispose of the same in the purchase of freehold lands or tithes, one moiety of the rents or profits thereof for the augmentation of the yearly maintenance of the master of Unerigg school, and the other moiety for the use of the poor of the townships of Unerigg and Ellenborough, to be distributed on the 3rd of February every year, by the said John Christian or his heirs; and further reciting that his aunt, Mrs. Margaret Christian, had by her will bequeathed £50 upon trust, to be settled by the said John Christian in the purchase of freehold lands or tithes for the augmentation of the yearly maintenance of the master of Unerigg school, and until such purchase was made, that he should pay the yearly sum of 50s." In performance of the several trusts reposed in him, and for the assuring of the said several payments, pursuant to the charitable intentions of his brother and aunt, he devised the close called White Rough, Croft, charged with the payment of 40s. and 50s. yearly, to be paid to the master of the said school, amongst the poor, according to the wills of his aunt and brother, provided that if his son or heirs should thereafter lay out £90 in the purchase of freehold lands or tithes, then the said payments should cease. Though the school has been discontinued for about twenty years the trustees have received the yearly rent-charge, for which it is now supposed they intend establishing a girls' school in the village.

An additional endowment was given to this school by Mrs. Anne Bowman, who, by will dated 5th July, 1800, left to trustees the sum of £661 3s. 2d., to be invested in the public funds, upon trust that they should pay the dividends thereof to the master of this school, or of such other school as the said trustees should think proper, for the instruction of poor children of Ellenborough. This legacy was laid out in the purchase of stock, and produces a dividend of nearly £20, which is paid to the master of Ellenborough and Unerigg school, who also receives the weekly payments of the scholars, whose average number is sixty. The trustees for Mrs. Bowman's bequest are Messrs. Thomas Bowman, William Bowman, and Joseph Robinson.

John Christian's Charity.—It is stated in the above report of the school that the sum of 20s. yearly was left for the poor of the township by William Christian, Esq., and was charged by his brother John upon the close called the Rough White Croft. This rent-charge is distributed as directed.

Unerigg Hall, a large mansion, pleasantly situated, is the property of H. T. Christian, Esq.

Christian of Unerigg Hall.

The first ancestor of the family on record was a member of the House of Keys, in the Isle of Man, at the Tynwald Court held in that island in 1432. The manorial records previous to that year were all destroyed, and, in consequence, the pedigree cannot be traced farther back. It is registered in the College of Arms, Book VII., D. 14, p. 170. The first who settled at Unerigg was EWAN CHRISTIAN, Esq., of Milntown, barrister-at-law, eldest son of Edward Christian, Esq., of Milntown, a demesne of the Isle of Man, by Dorothy, his wife, sister of Edward Wilson, Esq., of Dallam Tower, and grandson, by Margaret, his wife, daughter of John Parker, Esq., of Bradkirk, co. Lancaster, of John Christian, Esq., of Milntown, living in 1643, who was son of Ewan Christian, Esq., of Milntown, made demesne of the Isle of Man in 1605, and grandson of William McChristian, of Milntown, a member of the House of Keys in 1432. Ewan Christian (the first settler of Unerigg,) married in 1677, Mary, eldest daughter of John Caine, Esq., and dying in 1719, was succeeded by his eldest surviving son.

JOHN CHRISTIAN, Esq., of Unerigg and Milntown, born in 1688, who married 14th May, 1717, Bridget, eldest daughter of Humphrey Senhouse, Esq., of Nether Hall, and by her, who died in 1749, had seven sons and four daughters; of the latter, Mary married Edward Law, bishop of Carlisle, and was mother of Edward Law, Baron Ellenborough. Mr. Christian died 20th September, 1745, and was succeeded by his son,

JOHN CHRISTIAN, Esq., of Milntown and Unerigg Hall, born 5th October, 1719, high sheriff of Cumberland in 1766; married Jane, eldest daughter of Eldred Curwen, Esq., of Workington Hall, co. Cumberland, and by her, who died in 1762, had two sons and six daughters, viz.:

- i. JOHN, his heir.
- ii. Henry, born in 1761.
- i. Bridget.
- ii. Julia, married in 1769, to Edward Stanley, Esq., of Workington.
- iii. Jane, married to William Blamie, Esq.
- iv. Frances, married to Edward Christian, Esq., of Brancaster, Norfolk.
- v. Dorothy, married in 1774, to John Taubman, Esq., of Nainery, Isle of Man.
- vi. Mary.

He died in 1757, and was succeeded by his eldest son,

JOHN CHRISTIAN, Esq., of Milntown and Unerigg Hall, who married, first, 10th September, 1775, Margaret, daughter of John Taubman, Esq., of the Isle of Man, and by her, who died in 1778, had one son, JOHN, now of Unerigg. He married, secondly, 5th October, 1782, Isabella, daughter and sole heir of Henry Curwen, Esq., M.P., of Workington Hall, and had by her four sons and three daughters. (See CURWEN, of Workington.) Mr. Christian, who was for many years M.P. for Cumberland, assumed the surname of Curwen. He died 13th December, 1829, when he was succeeded by his son by his first marriage, the present John Christian, Esq., of Unerigg Hall and Milntown.

CHRISTIAN, JOHN, Esq., M.A., of Unerigg Hall, and Milntown, Isle of Man, barrister-at-law, and chief judge of the Isle of Man, born 12th July, 1776, married 23rd April, 1807, Susanna, daughter of Lewis Robert Allen, Esq., of Bath, and has issue, i. John Allen, born 28th February, 1809, died, unmarried 3rd June, 1828.

ii. HENRY TACMAN, born 29th January, 1810

iii. Robert, born 30th August, 1813, died 1813.

iv. William Bell, in holy orders, born 17th August, 1815, married Charlotte Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Brine, Esq., of the Isle of Man, and has issue, Annie Louisa, and Charlotte Elizabeth.

v. Charles Craik, born 28th March, 1821, died in 1839.

i. Susan Curwen, married to Augustus William Hillary, only son of Sir William Hillary, Bart.

ii. Margaret, married to Thomas Underwood, Esq., M.D.

iii. Isabella Anne.

iv. Louisa Dorothy, married to the Rev. John William Moynaux.

FLIMBY PARISH.

FLIMBY parish is bounded on the north-east and north by the parishes of Dearham and Cross Canonby, on the west by the Irish Sea, and on the south and south-east by Camerton parish. It comprises no dependent townships. Flimby has sometimes been esteemed extra-parochial, sometimes as a separate parish, and sometimes as a chapelry, under Camerton. It is called a parish in the population returns.

Flimby contains 1,842 acres, and its rateable value is £3,184 1s. 4d. Its population in 1801 was 273; in 1811, 271; in 1821, 376; in 1831, 404; in 1841, 546; and in 1851, 555. The inhabitants, who are chiefly engaged in mining, dwell for the most part in the village, and attend the Cockermouth and Maryport markets. The Whitehaven and Maryport railway intersects the township. Coal is abundant here.

The manor of Flimby was part of the possessions of Orme, son of Ketel, whose son, Gospatric, gave it to the abbey of Holme Cultram, as we learn from the grant in the register of that abbey, from which it appears that Gospatric, the son of Orme, with the consent of Thomas, his son and heir, and Alan, his son, granted to God and St. Mary of Holme Cultram, and the monks serving God there, Flimby, with its appurtenances, within the boundaries then specified, engaging at the same time to do himself the foreign service due for the same to the king, and also the services due to the lord of Allerdale, such as senwage, castleward, pleas, aids, and other services. This gift was confirmed by Thomas, son of Gospatric, who also granted to the abbot and convent of Holme Cultram, with the consent of Grace, his wife, eight acres of land in Seton, contiguous to their own estate there. Adam, another son of Gospatric, who was also patron of the church at Camerton, granted to the same community the chapel of Flimby, and all the land and tithes thereof, which belonged to the mother church of Camerton. Gospatric's grant was confirmed by King John, Henry III., and Richard I. The abbot and convent of Holme Cultram also received from Alice de Romley, daughter of William

Fitz Duncan, a grant of common of pasture on Brechton Moor, for the cattle of the grange of Flimby; and Edward I. granted them free warren in their demesne of Flimby. In 1279 Robert de Haverington, son of Michael de Haverington, before the justices itinerant in Cumberland, quitted claim to Gervase, abbot of Holme Cultram, of the whole of the manor of Flimby, with the exception of 380 acres, and the abbot and convent enrolled him amongst the benefactors of the community, and as such he had a place in their daily prayers. After the suppression of the religious houses, Henry VIII., on 12th July, 1545, granted to Thomas Dalston, Esq., and Eleanor, his wife (amongst other particulars), nine messuages and tenements in Flimby, and all other the lands then called Lambert Garths, Thwaite Croft, and Rey Garths, a fishery in Flimby, and the wood and lands called Flimby Park, late the property of the abbey of Holme Cultram; and on the 11th of June, in the following year, a license was granted to Thomas Dalston, Esq., of Carlisle, and Eleanor, his wife, to alienate their property in Flimby, to John Blennerhasset, Esq., and his heirs, for the sum of 14s. 1d., paid into the exchequer, and from that time, till 1772, Flimby Hall was the chief residence of the Blennerhasset family.¹ In the year just mentioned Flimby was sold by Wm. Blennerhasset, Esq., to Sir James Lowther, Bart. The royalties are now vested in the freeholders: the demesne and hall are the property of the Earl of Lonsdale, besides whom Henry Curwen, Esq., and Thomas Walker, Esq., are the principal landowners. The common was enclosed and divided among the landowners in 1826.

The village of Flimby occupies a pleasant situation, two and a half miles south-east of Maryport.

THE CHURCH.

Flimby church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is a neat but plain edifice, rebuilt in 1794, on the site of the previous church; it will accommodate about 200 persons. On the suppression of the monastic establishments the living of Flimby appears to have been made a vicarage, but it is now a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of such landowners as pay moduses. The parish is tithe free, but there is a small modus, amounting to £2 10s., which is paid out of the land, and sixteen cottages, at 8d. each. In 1828, by an order of Hugh Bishop of Carlisle, there were two parcels of land awarded as glebe to the incumbent of this parish; one, containing three acres, is situated at Flimby Outgang, and now lets for £6 a year; the other, situated at the bottom of Flimby village, contains half an acre, on which, in 1841, the parsonage house was erected. In 1766 the governors of Queen Anne's bounty purchased lands in the Abbot Park, in the parish of Coulton, and county of Lancaster, amounting to 145 acres, of which 71 acres were allotted to Flimby, 36 to Borrowdale, and 38 to Dearham. This land produces £60 a year, one half of which is payable to the incumbent of Flimby, the other half being equally divided between Dearham and Borrowdale. There is also the interest of £200, received in 1829, and likewise a further augmentation out of the parliamentary grants, to the amount of £1,200, in 1817, all in the hands of the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, at three per cent. Out of this parliamentary augmentation there was raised, in 1841, £275, for the erection of the parsonage house, which leaves the present value of the living at £70. The parish register commences in 1696.

INCUMBENTS.—Henry Mattinson, 1774; William Mawson, 1798; William D. Grice; 1839; A. F. Sheppard, 1855.

The parsonage house, which is now let, is a good substantial stone building, situated at the end of the village; it was erected, as we have seen above, in 1841, at a cost of £275.

The Wesleyans have a neat chapel in the village, which was erected in 1858, and opened in the following year.

The parochial school, situated in the village, is a small structure, possessing accommodation for about 80 children. It is supported by the quarter pence of the pupils, and £5 a year from Beton's Charity. The average number in attendance is 40.

There is also a boarding-school, conducted by Miss Wilson, at Flimby Lodge, which is beautifully situated near the sea.

For Ewan Christian's Charity, see Dearham Parish.

GILCRUX PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the north by the river Ellen, which divides it from Crosby, Allerby, and Oughterside townships; on the west by Row Gill and part of Outfield Beck, separating it from Dearham parish; on the south-west and south by Grange Grassings farm-house, Threeping Beck, and part of the road leading from Tallantire; and on the east by Gill Beck, which divides it from Plumblaud. It possesses no dependent townships.

Gilcrux township comprises an area of 1,964 acres, and its rateable value is £2,395 10s. In 1801, the population was 249; in 1811, 276; in 1821, 377; in 1831, 382; in 1841, 464; and in 1851, 504, who are principally collected in the village, and chiefly engaged in coal mining. The inhabitants are steady and industrious, and consequently are much respected; they attend the markets at Maryport and Cockermouth. The Maryport and Carlisle railway intersects the township.

The first recorded possessor of Gilcrux is Waltheof, first lord of Allderale, who gave it to Adam, son of Lyulph, whose daughter and heiress brought it in marriage to one of the Bonnekill family, who granted the same to a younger brother, Robert Bonnekill, whose sons, Thomas and Walter, gave it to the Abbey of Calder; a grant confirmed by Sir Ranulph Bonnekill, Knt., but, upon the appropriation, the patronage was reserved to the bishop. After the dissolution of the monastic establishments King Philip and Queen Mary, in 1557-8, granted to Alexander Armstrong "all those twenty-four messuages and tenements and water-mill, with the appurtenances, lying and being in the town of Gilcrux, in the county of Cumberland, in the several tenure of divers tenants there, at the will of the lord, late parcel of the possessions of the late monastery or priory of Calder, with a free rent then of 22d., and other rents and profits of the yearly value of £14 15s. 10d., to hold to the said Alexander and his heirs male, on condition of finding and maintaining five horsemen ready and well furnished whensoever the king and queen, and the successors of the said queen, shall summon them within the said county." In 1565 Alexander and Herbert Armstrong, conveyed by fine, to William Armstrong, son of the said Herbert and Katharine Dalston, and the heirs of the said William, the manor of Gilcrux, with all its appurtenances in the town and fields of Gilcrux, holden of the king in capite. The manor appears to have been afterwards resumed by the crown, for, in the 17th Elizabeth (1575), under date 22nd of June, there is a grant by that queen to John Soukey and Percival Gunson of the grange and vill of Gilcrux, and "all the messuages, lands, tenements, water-mill, rent, reversions, and services, with the appurtenances, in Gilcrux aforesaid, late in the tenure of William Armstrong, parcel of the possessions of the late monastery or priory of Calder, to hold as of the manor of East Greenwich, by fealty only, in free and common socage, and not in capite, nor by knight's service."¹ Gilcrux came subsequently into the possession of the Dykes family, who are still its owners; Mrs. Dykes being lady of the manor, and also the largest landowner; the others are Messrs. Matthew and Joseph Smith, James Moffet, the executors of the late Mrs. Hutchinson, the executors of the late Mrs. Smith, and Thomas Hall. A court for the manor, the first since 1844, was recently held at Mrs. Halliday's inn.

The village of Gilcrux is about five and a half miles east-by-north of Maryport, and five north of Cockermouth. It is remarkable for the number of its springs, which rise at almost every door, and when united form a considerable stream. In a field a little to the east of the village are two springs, about forty or fifty yards asunder, one being of fresh, and the other of salt water, the latter having medicinal properties, and being known as "Funny Tack." The formation of these numerous springs is ascribed to the great dyke which, crossing by the low side of the village, prevents the passage of the water, and causes it to rise to the surface. There are five excellent fresh water springs, which never fail in summer, besides numerous smaller ones.

THE CHURCH.

Gilcrux church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a very ancient structure, pleasantly situated on an eminence east of the village, and possesses a turret with one bell. The benefice was formerly rectorial, but being appropriated to Calder Abbey, it became a vicarage, which it has since continued. In 1368 Bishop Strickland set out and appointed an endowment for the vicar, consisting of "the mansion house opposite to the church, with the lands arable, meadow, and pasture, in the fields of Gilcrux, half of the tithes of hay, and all the tithes of wool, lamb, mills, fishings, and oblations, with the whole altarage and other profits, except only the corn tithes; and that the abbey and convent of Calder shall pay moreover to the vicar four marks yearly. The vicar to bear all charges ordinary and extraordinary, except the repair of the chancel." The living, valued in the King's Book at £5 14s. 2d., was certified to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty at £22 16s. 4d., and to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as of the annual value of £71; it is now worth about £120. Mrs. Mary Dykes, lady of the manor, is the impropriator, and the Bishop of Carlisle patron. The tithes were commuted in 1844 for £32 16s. 9d.; of which £10 10s. is payable to the vicar; £16 10s. to Mrs. Dykes, and £5 16s. 9d. to other landowners. The greater part of this parish is free of tithes, several landowners having purchased them from the late Mr. Dykes.

VICARS.—John Lesteson, 1334; William de Kirkby, —; Richard de Irland, 1371; Adam Forward, —; Robert de Pomfret, 1385; William Milner, —; Thomas Trowghere, 1565; Thomas Dover, 1589; Nicholas Banks, —; Edward Cooke, 1611; Richard Wilkinson, 1612; Peter Murthwaite, 1664; Richard Murthwaite, 1675; Peter Murthwaite, 1704; Thomas Hobson, 1736; William Walker, —; Anthony Sharp, 1762; Henry Fletcher Sharp, —; John Cowen, —; Jonathan Irving, —; William Passable, —; Joseph Hutchinson Whitelock, 1837.

The parsonage, which is an old building, is now let with the glebe farm, containing about seventy-five acres.

The parish school is situated in the village near the church, and is attended by from fifty to sixty children.

CHARITARY.

School.—By indenture dated 4th December, 1799, Joseph Tordiff assigned and assured £800 in the Three-per-Cent Consols to several parties upon trust, the dividends to be applied half-yearly towards the support of the schoolmaster of the parish of Gilcrux, for educating and instructing in the principles of the Church of England as by law established, and the church catechism, and in reading English, and writing, and other proper and useful learning as free scholars, such and so many of the children of the inhabitants of Gilcrux, whether boys or girls, or the majority of the governors of Gilcrux school should direct and appoint: such children being of the inhabitants of Gilcrux, owners of real and personal property under £20 a year, or occupiers under £60 a year, or children of owners under £10 a year, who should at the same time be occupiers under £30. And he directed that the said schoolmaster should not receive any presents from the children educated by this charity, but that he should be at liberty to receive other scholars, children of the inhabitants. The interest of the stock above-mentioned being £24, is paid regularly to the schoolmaster of Gilcrux, for which he instructs twenty-four children qualified in the manner mentioned in the endowment. The children are appointed by the governors of the parish school, who have limited the number to twenty-four. Messrs. William Swinburn and Jonathan Fell are the present trustees.

Ellen Hall, an old ruined building near the river Ellen, anciently the seat of the Dykes family, is now a farm-house. Besides Ellen Hall, the single houses having particular names are High Platt, Grange, Grange Grassings, and Greengill.

Joseph Jackson, an eminent philosopher and mineralogist, was a native of Gilcrux, and died at Bordeaux in 1789, on his return from Spain, whither he had gone to open a colliery in Andalusia.

In the midst of a field on the Grange Hill, in the occupancy of Mr. Davidson, is a natural cave in the limestone rock, into which runs a stream of fresh water. It is said to have served at one time as a place for illicit distillation.

Gilcrux Colliery is leased by John Steel, Esq., M.P., of Derwent Bank, near Cockermouth, and consists of two pits, the Jane and the Eliza, the depth of the former being seventy-six and a half fathoms, and of the latter twenty-seven fathoms. Jane pit was first sunk in the year 1815, and has since been sunk deeper at three different periods. On the first occasion it was sunk forty-seven fathoms to the Ten Quarters Seam, and when all the coal on that level was worked out the pit was sunk nine fathoms deeper. In consequence of a downcast dyke on the south side, a drift was made to the south to raise the coal through the dyke, and one to the north to raise a greater hold of the coal to the dip. On this level there was worked about sixty acres of Ten Quarters coal, great part of which was worked out of the dip with steam and horse power. It was then sunk again twenty and a half fathoms deeper to the Yard coal, on account of a great downcast to the east side of the pit. Fortunately the Ten Quarters coal was on a level with the Yard coal through the dyke, also by a drift through the Nine Fathoms Dyke on the south side of the pit the Metal Band coal was won. There are now three different bands or seams of coal on one level, and at present worked. There have been about 100 acres of the Ten Quarters coal worked in this pit, about fifteen acres of Yard coal, and about six of Metal Band. The following are the particulars of the seams:—First, Ten Quarters, twenty fathoms below Thirty-inch and Metal Band Seam, and ten fathoms below the Metal Band is the Yard coal. These seams are all that are worth working. There is a number of other small seams, but they are not of sufficient importance to claim attention. The Yard Seam is the deepest seam known here, and though the strata below it have been bored to a great depth, nothing has been found workable. These mines are very expensive to work on account of the number of faults, dykes, hitches, &c., which interrupt the general working of the mines by running in every direction, and having to be crossed with drifts. The great faults or dykes generally keep a direct course. The coal field is cut up by a great upcast to the south, which runs east and west, and brings up the limestone on its south side. The course of the dyke on the surface is by Occupation Road from Outfields, by the low side of the village of Gilcrux, and through by Near-side Guards. There is rough brown freestone, as well as limestone, on the south side of this great dyke. Eliza Pit was sunk in 1854. It is also in the Ten Quarters Seam, and is situated about one mile east of Jane Pit. The quantity of coal raised per day at these pits is 250 tons, which is carried by the Maryport and Carlisle railway to Maryport for shipment to Ireland. The pits are close to the railway. The number of people employed is about 150, and with steam power amounting to 150 horses. The Ten Quarters coal is generally sold for household purposes, on account of the ashes being heavy, and making little dust, and it possesses great durability and heat, which cause it to be superior to any coal in the neighbourhood. The Yard coal is the best here for making coke. The mines are the property of Mrs. Dykes, but are leased as above.

ISELL PARISH.

This parish is bounded on the east and north by Torpenhow, on the west by Bridekirk, and on the south by the river Derwent. It comprises the townships of Blinderake, Isell, and Redmain, Isell Old Park, and Sunderland, whose united area is 6,760 acres. There are surveys for the enclosure of the commons of Isell Old Park, Sunderland, and Moota, in Blinderake township, made in 1810. There is a survey of Redmain township, made by the tithe commissioners about the year 1840. The population is spread over the several townships of the parish in small villages and hamlets, and in a few separate farm houses. The people are all employed in agriculture, or in small mechanical trades more or less connected with agriculture. The geological character of the rocks forbid an old prevailing notion that there can be underlying beds of coal. There are no old workings of copper, as Hutchinson imagines, but merely fissures here and there in the rocks, produced at the very remote period of the upheaving of the range of hills extending from Buisay, in the parish of Torpenhow, in a line westward of the Derwent through the parish. The inhabitants are in general truthful, industrious, and comfortable. This may in part arise from the smallness of the population, and in part from the endeavours made by their superiors to improve them. The people here invariably attend the markets at Cockermouth, held on Monday. There does not appear to be any remains of the early inhabitants of Britain in the parish, but there is a line of fields lying between the villages of Blinderake and Redmain, along the brow of the rising ground called the "Grey Barrow," and it has been assumed that these might in former times be the stone sepulchres of the people of the neighbourhood. This notion is not improbable.

BLINDRAKE, ISELL, AND REDMAIN.

The population of this township in 1801 was 188; in 1811, 293; in 1821, 311; in 1831, 323; in 1841, 347; and in 1851, 370. Its rateable value is £2,776 13s. 4d. The land in Blinderake is, on the north, high and poor; in the middle, excellent for pasture; on the south, good, but requires draining. In Isell the land being almost entirely in grass, is, on the north, high but good; and on the south, near the Derwent, excellent. The land in Redmain is, on the north, high and poor; in the west, called the Trinities, in grass, and very good; in the south, good, and fruitful in corn.

The parish of Isell now constitutes but one manor, originally granted, with the exception of Redmain, by Alan, lord of Allerdale, to Ranulph de Engayne. His granddaughter, Ada, conveyed it in marriage to Simon de Morville, whose grandson, Hugh de Morville, is said to have been implicated in the murder of Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Henry II. The daughter of this last conveyed the manor by marriage, in the time of Henry III., to Thomas de Multon, whose great-granddaughter, Margaret, in the reign of Edward II., brought it in marriage to Thomas Leigh. Their descendant, Thomas Leigh, married Maud Redmain, lady of the manor of Redmain, in the time of Elizabeth. She having the manor of Isell, bequeathed to her by her husband, conveyed in the reign of James I., by marriage to William Lawson, of Fawkesgrave, in the county of York. The present lord of the united manors of Isell and Redmain is Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., of Brayton, in the parish of Aspatiria. During the last hundred years the lords of the manor of Brayton have been the lords of Isell and Redmain, and have generally resided at Brayton. Cornage money is annually paid to the superior barony of Egremont. About one-third of the whole parish is demesne. The other landowners are J. C. Fisher, Esq., Wood Hall, Bridekirk; Major Green Thompson, Bridekirk; General Steel, of the East India Service; and the Rev. Joseph Simpson, of Home Cultram. The lands of the parish are in general free. The lands in the township of Redmain were enfranchised in 1663, those in Blinderake and Sunderland in 1804. Since that time the courts of the manor have generally ceased to be held. The lands in the townships of Isell and Isell Old Park belong to the lord of the manor, Sir Wilfred Lawson, Bart. There is no unenclosed laid within the parish—the act of Parliament for enclosure would be about 1808. The lord of the manor has the ancient seat of Isell Hall, in the township of Isell, on the north bank of the Derwent, in one of the most eligible situations that can be imagined, on a slight elevation looking westward down the valley of the Derwent towards Cockermouth, and having a splendid opening of the valley eastward to the range of Skiddaw, having on the south the view of a gently elevated range of hills covered with wood, and on the north the park belonging to the mansion, beautified with a natural succession of terraces of wood, which are finally surmounted by the rocky and picturesque heights of what are called the Clints. The hall consists of a strong and high embattled tower of the period of Henry VI., and of a long edifice of the period of Queen Elizabeth. Within the present century the hall had more the appearance, in its external walls and guard-house, of a regularly fortified place. The ancient armour and paintings have generally been carried to Brayton.

The village of Isell is pleasantly situated on the north bank of the Derwent, three-and-a-quarter miles east-north-east of Cockermouth.

THE CHURCH.

Isell church, dedicated to St. Michael, stands in a most sequestered spot, on the bank of the Derwent, and a short distance east from the hall. It is a very ancient building, and consists of a nave and chancel, with porch and bell-turret, containing two bells. The entrance doorway is Norman, as is also the arch leading into the chancel. There is a beautiful ancient monogram of our Saviour in the wall on the north side of the entrance into the chancel. There are two ancient monuments, one on each side of the chancel window, to members of the Lawson family. The impropiator is Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., the lord of the manor. The church and tithes, at the dissolution, belonged to the prior and convent of Hexham, in Northumberland. These continued in the crown until the year 1559, when they were granted by Queen Elizabeth to Thomas Leigh, the lord of the manor, since which period the advowson has continued to be held with the manor. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the third lord of that name, granted the tithes of Blinderake, Sunderland, and Isell Old Park, to the church. The living, valued in the King's Book at £8 13s. 9d., is now worth £157. At the time of the enclosure of the commons the tithes of Blinderake, Sunderland, and Isell Old Park, were, by mutual consent, commuted for portions of land on the respective commons of these townships. The tithes of Redmain, after remaining for some time in the crown, came at last into the possession of Thomas Lamplugh, of Dovenby Hall, who, in the beginning of the last century, conveyed them towards the support of an alms house, and the endowment of a school at Dovenby, in Bridekirk parish.

VICARS.—William Burton, 1341; John Wanton, —; John Baynard, 1362; John Mason, 1385; William Adeock, deprived, 1575; Thomas Harrison, 1575; William Adeock, restored, 1577; Leonard Cape, 1581; Anthony Wharton, 1594; Percival Head, 1636; Richard Fletcher, 1661; George Stark, 1669; Peter Farish, 1703; William Pool, 1711; Thomas Leather, 1719; John Kendal, 1729; John Waite, 1782; Peter How, 1815; Christopher Hilton Wybergh, 1826.

There is a good parsonage-house, built by the vicar, John Waite, about the year 1785, and enlarged and improved by the Rev. Peter How, on his appointment to the vicarage.

The parish school occupies a central situation near Isell Hall. It is a plain but neat building, somewhat in the Elizabethan style, erected in 1836, on the site of an ancient one, for the purpose of educating the children of the parish. It has a small income of £6 per annum, arising from the bequest of a Mr. Cannell, of London, who, about the year 1823, left the interest of £500, three-per-cents, to the poor and school of this parish, viz., the interest of £300 to the former, and that of £200 to the latter. The vicar and churchwardens are the trustees of this charity. The average number of children in attendance is about forty-five.

There is a good lending library, which has been in existence about twenty years, and has for its object the conveyance to the people of religious and useful knowledge. It is supported by donations and subscriptions, and is free to the people of the parish.

Isell Grange, a mansion near the hall, is the residence of Captain Peter Wybergh.

Blinderake is a village in this township, four miles north-east of Cockermouth, and has descended with Isell to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.

The manor of Redmain was given by Alan Lord of Allerdale to the priory of Gisborne, in Yorkshire, to which it continued annexed until the period of the dissolution, when it was granted to the Curwen family, who appear to have been its possessors in 1688. The Curwens enfranchised the tenants for eighty years' purchase, mortgaged the demesne called the Trinities to Sir John Lowther, and afterwards sold it to Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Redmain is a small but neat village three miles north-east of Cockermouth. There are some few remains of an ancient oratory in a field called Chapel Guards, or Chapel Yard, adjoining a large extent of good land, called the Trinities, upon which it is probable there might have been a chapel, or hospital, dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The site of the ancient hall of the Redmaines, a Yorkshire family, who became lords of Redmain after the dissolution of monasteries, is still distinguished near the village of Redmain.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, of Isell Hall and Brayton, member for Cockermouth in the reign of William and Mary (1690), was among the most prominent public men of the period. In playful reference to his crest, which was the sun supported by the arms of a warrior, he was long fondly and gratefully remembered under the name of the "Bright Star of the North."

At Redmain was born of a family long established, and once having considerable possessions there, in the year 1710, the Rev. Joseph Simpson, D.D. He was educated at Queen's College, in the University of Oxford. He was an eminent Greek scholar, and published an edition of several of the Greek philosophers. This work has passed through several impressions, and has not, for more than a century, been superseded by any superior edition.

At Redmain also was born, in 1719, the Rev. Bolton

Simpson, D.D., brother to the above, who was also educated at Queen's College, Oxford. He was a very eminent tutor in the university, and published an edition of Zenophon, which retains, even to the present day, its reputation as a work of much learning.

Dr. John Redmayne, master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and one of the compilers of the Litany of 1548, is understood to have been a member of the Yorkshire stem of the branch family of Redmain Hall.

ISELL OLD PARK.

The number of inhabitants in this township in 1801 was 88; in 1811, 84; in 1821, 90; in 1831, 108; in 1841, 107; and in 1851, 87. The land here is generally poor, and would be much improved by draining. This township comprises six scattered farm-houses, bearing the respective names of Iselgate, Longclose, Harrisongate, Old Park, Irtou House, and Coalbeck, which are situated about four and a half miles east-north-east of Cockermouth.

SUNDERLAND.

The population of Sunderland township in 1801 is not returned separately; in 1811 it was 61; in 1821, 48; in 1831, 77; in 1841, 81; and in 1851, 99. The land here is generally poor, and might be much improved by draining. Its area, exclusive of woodlands, is 698 acres, and its rateable value £495 15s. 6d.

The village of Sunderland, which consists of six good farm-houses and several cottages, is pleasantly situated six miles north-east-by-east of Cockermouth.

The parish of Isell is situated between the clay slate range of the mountains, and the red sandstone and coal deposits of Aspatria, Gilerux, &c. There is a limestone range extending from east to west, metamorphic, or amorphous on its highest point of the Clints, overlooking the hall, where the stones are reposing in large horizontal masses, with deep ravines between them. This range, in its westward course, seems to consist almost entirely of encrinites—and at the extremity of the range, a little to the west of Redmain, is a high and striking hill, thrown up by internal convulsion, and presenting everywhere, along with the most ancient rock, specimens of lava and pumice stone. On an offshot of this range, or the Moota range, there is on the highest point of elevation, and surrounded by limestone, a considerable deposit of white sandstone. There is a bridge near the church over the Derwent, and one over a small stream near the hall, on which stream there is, in the township of Isell, a corn-mill.

In former times it is said the people were much given to the game of archery, and there is near the hamlet of Redmain a knoll on the broad summit of the volcanic hill above-mentioned, which, by its name, indicates that they were there accustomed to erect their target for the indulgence of the said games. In later times, and until the enclosure of the common lands, the people seem to have been fond of the athletic game of foot-ball. At present, the sole indulgence with many is to be found in drinking at the ale-house. In former times the people were very superstitious. Their situation favoured this tendency. In a locality thinly peopled, looking down from their villages on an old hall, connected with which were many black stories of the olden time,—inhabiting an upland country, covered in part with deep woods, and living from childhood to old age within sight of the deep and rapid waters of the Derwent, rolling many hundred feet beneath them, and continually sending up to them the voice of its waves. Education, or rather the spirit of the times, has dissipated most of these airy fancies. The parish is considered to be very healthy.

Many of the yeomen, in former times, who had received the benefits of education, were fond of poetry. Spencer, and Shakespeare, and Milton, were not unknown in the families of the yeomen, or small proprietors. These are now nearly an extinct race, and the farmers and cottagers have become a more matter-of-fact people.

The name of this parish, Isell, seems to have been more properly, in former times, written, "Ishall," or the hall which is nearly surrounded as an isle, by the waters of the Derwent, and by a brook which flows into the river, on the west of the edifice. The word Blencrake, or Blindcrake, as it is sometimes written, is uncommon in its form. It might be compounded of Bla, an old Icelandic word, signifying a village, and the Teutonic word crake, a crow,—the neighbouring woods have always been remarkable for the immense number of rooks that frequent and build in them.

A fish-pond, communicating with the Derwent, and adjoining the vicarage, existed until the commencement of this century. It is understood to have been for the use of the vicar during Lent and at other times, previous to the reign of Edward VI. The woods of Isell, in consequence of the retreat afforded in the crevices of the rocks, have always been remarkable for foxes and otters. Game is also most abundant.

PLUMBLAND PARISH.

THE parish of Plumbland is bounded on the north by the river Ellen, which separates it from Aspatria; on the west by a streamlet, known by the name of Warthole Beck, which separates it from Gilcrux; on the south, partly by the Cockermouth and Wigton highway; and on the east by Popplebeck, which divides it the whole length from the township of Threapland, in the parish of Torpenhow. It possesses no dependant township. Plumbland has been surveyed for the purpose of tithe commutation, and a copy of the survey is kept in the parish, as well as in the proper office.

Plumbland comprises an area of 2,970 statute acres, and its rateable value is £4,015. The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 330; in 1811, 237; in 1821, 396; in 1831, 524; in 1841, 729; and in 1851, 800. The parish is divided into four villages or hamlets, viz., Plumbland, where the houses are closely connected; Parsonby, where they are a little more scattered; Arkleby, still more dispersed; and Warthole, where the farm-houses, all detached, surround the church on all sides, from which no house is more than a mile distant. There are about twenty-five farmers in the parish, occupying farms varying in size from forty to 200 acres, one containing 375 acres, four of which are held by the proprietors themselves; these give employment to many of the inhabitants. Coal and lime have long been worked in the parish; the former is at present (1858) dormant, but a considerable number of miners reside in the parish, who are engaged in the collieries in the neighbourhood. Two lime works are at present in active operation. About one half of the population is employed in the coal mines and lime works. The coal seams here consist of several bands, one of which, the "Metal Band," about five feet in thickness, is of excellent quality; this and the "Thirty Inch Band," are the two that have been worked to the most advantage. The working classes in the parish are very industrious, and, as they have good wages, live very comfortably; in fact, present comfort is with them everything, little or no provision being made for old age, or for any other purpose. The quality of the soil throughout Plumbland is good, generally loam or clay, producing excellent wheat.¹ The Maryport and Carlisle railway crosses a portion of the parish, but has no station in it. The inhabitants usually attend the Cockermouth and Maryport markets. The northern half of the parish belongs to the coal measures of the Whitehaven coal fields, and dips considerably to the north-west; the southern portion is included in the carboniferous or mountain limestone which surrounds the Lake District. Previous to the influx of the mining population the parish was remarkable for the longevity of its inhabitants; even now there are several individuals above eighty years of age.

A little to the south-west of Ewe Close, on Ward Hill, are the remains of what is called a Roman camp, and though it bears the impress of Roman costramentation, it is very probable that it afterwards served as the site of a beacon. It is now nearly obliterated. The enclosure of the common, including rather more than 139 acres, took place in 1823, in pursuance of an act of Parliament passed in 1818. The land was allotted to the owners of the soil, and a small portion, containing limestone, was left out for the use of the inhabitants of Plumbland village. There are no ancient crosses at present here, but there is no doubt there were some in former times, as there is a farm-house called Little Cross, and on the same road, about a mile to the west is Gilcrux, and the same distance east is Cross Gill, which names are the same, gill meaning ravine.

This parish includes four manors, those of Plumbland, Arkleby, Parsonby, and Warthole.

The manor of Plumbland was formerly possessed by the family of Orlew, who were its possessors as early as the reign of Edward II. It continued to be held by this family till the commencement of the eighteenth century, when it was sold by Charles Orlew, Esq., who died in 1725, to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., in whose family it has since remained. It has since been enfranchised; but the demesne land called High Close, where is the site of the ancient manor house, continued in the Lawson family, and having passed under the will of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the tenth baronet, to the nephew of his wife, Thomas Wybergh, Esq., who assumed the surname and arms of Lawson, is now vested in his brother Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the present baronet. About thirty years ago corncage rent was claimed by the lord of this manor, but the tenants resisted on the grounds of its having been for a long period uncollected, and so the matter dropped.

The manor of Arkleby was held in ancient times by a family bearing the local name, as appears from many old deeds in which several of the Arklebys occur as witnesses. From this family it passed to the Martin- dales, in whose possession it continued till the reign of Elizabeth, when it was forfeited to the crown, in consequence of the head of the house taking part in the insurrection of the Northern earls. It was afterwards granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir John Penruddock, whose grandson, Sir John, was beheaded at Salisbury, by Cromwell, in 1652. According to Dexton, it was subsequently held by the Orfeurs, of High Close, whose heiress brought it to Henry Peirson, Esq., from whom it was purchased by Gustavus Thompson, rector of Plumland, in 1702. His son, Gustavus Thompson, Esq., erected Arkleby Hall, now used as a farm-house. Arkleby came afterwards into the possession of the Satterthwaites, by whom it was sold to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and is now the property of his representative.

Parsonby manor is held of the rector for the time being. The manor of Warthole belonged formerly to the abbey of Calder. Since the suppression of the monastic establishments it has been for several generations in the family of Dykes, and is now held by Mrs. Dykes, of Dovenby. Warthole Hall is now in ruins. Near it is an old decayed mulberry tree, in which it is said one of the family of Dykes took refuge after the battle of Marston Moor, and whose ample foliage effectually concealed him from some of Cromwell's iron- sides who were sent to apprehend him. Tradition says that a lady of the Warthole family was addicted to gaming at high stakes, according to the custom of the times, and that having "set her all upon a cast," when lifting the last card she exclaimed—

"Up a dence, or else a tray,
Or Warthole's gone for ever and aye."

Fortune however smiled upon the lady, and Warthole was saved.

THE CHURCH.

The church, though called Plumland church, stands at Parsonby, hence the distich—

"The greatest wonder ever was seen Is Plumland church on Parsonby Green."

It is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. The living is a rectory, having a glebe farm of more than 130 acres, rented off for more than £200. The tithes were commuted about seven years ago for £128, but the High Close Estate, Arkleby Hall, and Warthole estates, only paid a small modus, which they continue to do under the above commutation. Henry Curwen, Esq., is patron.

RECTORS.—Valer de Aencourt, —; Peter de Aencourt, 1310; Adam de Bassenthwaite, 1358; William Potter, —; Lancelot Wallace, 1592; William Richardley, 1568; Lancelot Fletcher, 1638; Joseph Nicholson, —; Michael Robinson, 1638; Gustavus Thompson, 1702; Peter Farish, 1711; Thomas Leathes, 1724; Adam Asker, 1760; John Bird, 1788; Edward Stanley, 1802; John Curwen, 1834; John Wordsworth, 1842.

The rectory was erected at the expense of the Rev. John Bird, who laid the foundation stone May 1st, 1788. He took down the old rectory, which stood on a very wet part of the glebe called the "Guards," a short distance south of the church.

The Grammar School was founded in pursuance of the will of Captain John Sibson, dated the 29th June, 1759, but not to have effect till after the death of his wife. This latter event took place in 1797; the next year the foundation was effected, and in 1799 the school was built. It contains two rooms, in one of which the classics are taught, and in the other English, &c. Captain Sibson's legacy was invested in the funds, and now produces £87 13s. a year. All the children of the parish, with some exceptions specified in the will, and all children of the name of Sibson, wherever they come from, have the liberty of attending the school, and "be instructed in Latin and English, in writing and accounts, without any charge or expenses whatsoever." There are two masters. The average attendance is rather more than a hundred children of both sexes. The school was opened in 1800, and was, before the influx of the mining population, an academy of some note for gentlemen's sons, but from the increase of respectable schools, and the number of poor children that attend it, it has fallen off in that respect.

CHARITY.

Sibson's Charity.—Besides his legacy to the school, Captain Sibson bequeathed £1 per annum to the poor widows of the parish, and a guinea to be paid to the clergyman for preaching a sermon on Good Friday. The present trustees for Captain Sibson's charities are J. Curwen, Esq., Workington Hall; G. Moore, Esq., Bow Churchyard, London; and James Dobinson, Esq., Philpot Lane, London.

The village of Plumland is about seven miles east-by-north of Maryport. It contains a small Independent chapel, erected in 1847. Parsonby is contiguous to Plumland. Arkleby is a little distance to the north; and Warthole to the west. Low Leathes, that is, Low Barns, deriving its name from being the barn attached to Warthole Hall; and Little Cross, near the church, are two farms in this parish.

The small streamlet, Popple, which bounds the parish on the east, has a course of about five miles. For about a mile in the middle of its course it goes through a subterranean passage, winding its way in the intricacies of limestone rocks, from which it emerges into clay a much larger stream. This outburst, says tradition, ran blood on the day that Charles I. was beheaded. There is an eminence of considerable elevation, called at present Parsonby Hill, but there is little doubt that in former times it was called Ward Hill, and thus gave name to that division of the parish. On this hill beacons were formerly lighted to give notice of any disturbance on the Solway, of which it commands an extensive view. Few countries afford greater facilities for communication by beacons than this part of Cumberland. Tallantire Hill, Ward Hill, Wharles (Ward Hills) at Bothel, and Catlands in Bolton, are still peculiarly adapted for telegraphing according to the system practised in the rude times of border warfare.

There are two mills on the river Ellen in this parish, called respectively Plumbland and Arkleby Mills.

LOWESWATER PAROCHIAL CHAPELRY.

The parochial chapelry of Loweswater extends about seven miles from north to south, and about three miles from east to west. It is bounded by the mountains of Grassmoor, Whiteside, Mollibreak, Blake Fell and Low Fell, and by the parishes of Lamplugh, Dean, and Brigham. Loweswater was formerly included in the parish of St. Bees', to which it still pays an annual tribute of 3s. 4d. if taken to the mother church, from which it is distant upwards of seven miles; or 6s. 8d. if the curate of St. Bees' has to apply for it. It is divided from Lorton by the river Cocker, which, together with several smaller streams, waters the chapelry. The soil in the enclosed land here is generally light and gravelly, producing excellent oats and potatoes, with some wheat and barley. The inhabitants are engaged in agricultural pursuits, and attend the markets at Cockermouth.

Loweswater comprises an area of 6,473 acres, and its rateable value is £1,785. The population in 1801 was 294; in 1811, 336; in 1821, 440; in 1831, 454; in 1841, 436; and in 1851, 391.

The manor of Loweswater was the estate of Randalphus or Ranulphus de Lindsay, and in the reign of Richard I. William Lindsay sued out a writ of right against Henry Clarke, of Appleby, the Countess of Albermarle, and Nicholas Estoteville for Loweswater and other lands. It was anciently the demesne of Egremont, and by partition between the daughters and co-heirs of Richard Lucy it fell to the share of Alan Multan and Alice his wife, as the twentieth part of the barony of Egremont. Thomas Multon assuming his mother's name, Lucy, seated himself here. He purchased Brackenthwaite of the Moresbys in exchange for a moiety of Distington, and also Thackthwaite of Agnes Drumburgh, wife of Roger Lindsay, which he gave to his sister Agnes, wife of Thomas Stanley; but the same, after some time, reverted to the Lucy family, and the whole devolved upon Maud Lucy, who gave the same, together with the rest of her patrimony to her second husband, Henry Percy, the first earl of Northumberland of that name, in whose family it continued till Henry, the sixth earl, gave the same to Henry VIII., by whom it was sold to Richard Robinson, clerk; and John Robinson, goldsmith, of London, sold the same to Thomas Stanley, Esq., whose daughter and heir married Sir Edward Herbert, and in conjunction with her and her husband sold the property to Anthony Patrickson, Esq., from whom it was purchased by Gilfrid Lawson, Esq. It was subsequently bought by Joshua Luccock Bragg, Esq., whose trustees sold it to John Marshall, Esq., and it is now held by William Marshall, Esq., M.P., of Patterdale Hall.

Mockerkin and Sosgill, or Soskill, is another manor in this township, and is held by General Wyndham, as lord paramount of the manor of Derwent Fells, parcel of the honour of Cockermouth. From a survey taken in 1578, we extract the following particulars relating to this manor:—"The tenants of Mockerkin and Sosgill pay yearly for a miln moulture for every whole tenement 2s., which of ancient being only 8s. did amount to 16s., besides 8s. which the said tenements do pay yearly to the grave of Loweswater, viz., out of every tenement 1s." A memorandum accompanies this statement, which says, "The said town of Mockerkin hath been in ancient surveys of eight tenements, but now divided as appeareth. The said town is situate in the uttermost bounds of the liberties of Cockermouth, in that part which joins the township or hamlet of Lamplugh, being of the inheritance of John Lamplugh, Esq., who presently maketh claim and hath interest (in disturbance of the tenants of Mockerkin) upon parcels of their commons or waste grounds to the value of sixty acres, or thereabouts, which for the relief of the said tenants is to be regarded and considered upon, for that the tenants (as they affirm) have always used the said ground (so challenged by the said Jo. Lamplugh) as their common soil, and that the said Jo. Lamplugh nor his ancestors, whose estate he now hath, had ever anything to do with the said ground—save only escapes with the chattels as the said tenants of Mockerin hath in like manner in their commons. That the said tenants and inhabitants of Mockerin have common pasture with the graveship of Loweswater as well in the forrest as without, without any interruption." The principal landowners at present in the township are W. Marshall, Esq.; Captain Robertson Walker, W. Fletcher, Esq., Miss Hudson, and the Misses Skelton.

The hamlet of Loweswater is situated near the foot of the lake, seven miles south of Cockermouth. A sheep fair was formerly held here on the second Friday in September, but since 1854, it has been held alternately at Churchstyle in this township, and Scale Hill in Brackenthwaite. The distance between the two places being about a mile.

THE CHURCH.

Loweswater church or chapel was erected by the inhabitants in 1827, upon the site of an older chapel-of-ease. It is a neat edifice, with a bell turret, surmounted by four ancient crosses. It is very probable that Loweswater chapel was founded by the Randalphus de Lindsay mentioned at page 202, for we find that he, early in the twelfth century, gave to the prior and convent of St. Bees the church or chapel of Loweswater, and two bovates of land.¹ After the suppression of the religious houses, certain of the possessions of the priory of St. Bees, in Loweswater, were granted to Lord Graye, of Wilton, and John Banister, Esq.; and in 3rd Edward VI. (1549-50,) there is a license to them to alienate unto Richard Robinson, clerk, a cottage called Kirkstall, and two small closes called Kirkcroft and Milnehow, in Loweswater, and pasture for 300 sheep on Loweswater Moor, late parcel of the possessions of the priory of St. Bees, belonging to the abbey of St. Mary, at York. In like manner, in the 3rd and 4th Philip and Mary, John Robinson conveyed the same by fine to Thomas Stanley, Esq. The chapel was certified at £1 11s., part of it being interest of money given by will of several persons, and the rest made up by the inhabitants; which stock was lodged in the hands of twelve inhabitants, who paid the curate by turns. In 1723 it was augmented with £200, and again in 1745 with £400, of which £200 was obtained from Queen Anne's Bounty, £100 given by Dr. Stratford, and £100 by the inhabitants. The present value of the living is about £65. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale, but the inhabitants had formerly the advowson, and from time immemorial presented through the medium of twelve sidemen. Sir H. R. Vane is the impropiator of the tithes, which were commuted, in 1841, for a rent charge of £63 per annum. The registers commence in 1667.

The churchyard was enlarged in 1859 by public subscription, Miss Skelton of Foulisye having given the land.

In 1858 the inhabitants placed a tablet in the church to the memory of the late Mr. Atkinson, who was twenty-nine years their pastor.

INCUMBENT.—Jeremiah Atkinson, 1667; Henry Forest, 1689; Andrew Naingley, 1739; T. Cowper, 1743; Jeremiah Atkinson, Eldred Green, 1898.

The parsonage house was erected in 1832, at a cost of £670, inclusive of the purchase of the site. The parishioners subscribed £200 towards the expense, the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty a similar sum; the remainder being defrayed by the Royal Bounty Fund.

Loweswater School was erected in 1839 by the late John Marshall, Esq., on ground given by John Hudson, Esq. It is a neat structure, capable of accommodating about eighty children, but the average number in attendance is only forty. The master receives £4, and the mistress £9, from an endowment raised by subscription, the Marshall family being the chief contributors.

CHARITIES.

School.—There is another school situated on the common called Howe, near Mockerkin, which was founded and endowed with nearly £200, in 1781, by Mary Mirehouse. The money is invested in government securities, and produces £8 a year, which is paid to the master. There are five trustees. The average number of children in attendance is only twelve.

Woodville's Gift—Tiffin's Gift—Nutt's Gift.—William Woodville, in 1687, left £50 to the poor of Loweswater not receiving parish relief. John Tiffin, in 1722, left £20; and John Nutt, in 1784, gave £5 for the same purpose. The money is invested, and produces £2 12s. 6d. a year interest, which is distributed on St. Thomas's Day, by the twelve sidemen amongst the poor of the township not receiving relief.

Mockerkin is a small village in this township, situated on a lofty eminence five miles south-south-west of the same town, and forms, with two farms called Sosgill, a separate constablewick.

Thackthwaite is a hamlet five and a half miles south of Cockermouth.

The lake of Loweswater gives name to this picturesque district, which also includes part of Crummock Water. It is scarcely a mile long, and the scenery at its head is tame; but that around its foot, when the Crummock mountains are added to the views, is of a magnificent description. Crummock Water is three miles long, by about three quarters of a mile broad; its sounded depth is twenty-two fathoms. There are three small and prettily wooded islands at the head, but they are too near the shore to add much to the other beauties of the scenery. These lakes, with the scenery by which they are surrounded, will be found more fully noticed at page 49.

THE Ward of Allerdale-above-Derwent is bounded on the north by Derwent Ward, on the west by the Irish Sea, on the south by the estuary of the Duddon, and on the east by Lancashire and Derwent Ward. It is of an irregular oblong form, about thirty-five miles in length from north to south, and in breadth at its widest part about fifteen miles. The Whitehaven and Furness railway runs along the whole of its western side, and connects it with the south, while the Whitehaven Junction connects with Maryport and the north. The northern part of the ward, in the neighbourhood of the coast, is a fertile district, abounding in coal, iron-ore, and other minerals. Here are situated the flourishing ports of Whitehaven, Workington, and Harrington. The Derwent, Duddon, Calder, Bleng, Ehen, Irt, and Mite, are the principal rivers. At the quarter sessions held at Carlisle, October 20th, 1857, this ward was deprived of the parishes of Bootle, Corney, Muncaster, Wabertwaite, Whicham, and Whitbeck; and the townships of Birker and Austwaite, Millom, and Ulpha, in the parish of Millom, and the townships of Eskdale and Wasdale, in the parish of St. Bees. This new arrangement, which came into operation on the 1st of January, 1858, does not extend to police purposes. Allerdale-above-Derwent Ward at present includes the parishes of Arlecdon, Cleator, Distington, Drigg, Egremont, Gosforth, Hale, Harrington, Irton, Lamplugh, Millom (part of), Moresby, Pousonby, St. Bees (except as above stated), St. Bridget's Beckermat, St. John's Beckermat, and Workington, besides the extra-parochial places of Cloflocks, and Salter and Eskatt.

ARLECDON PARISH.

THIS parish is about four miles in length from north to south, and about two and a half miles from east to west. It is bounded by the parishes of Lamplugh, Dean, Distington, Moresby, and Cleator, and the townships of Weddicar and Kenniside in the parish of St. Bees. It comprises the townships of Arlecdon, Frisington High and Low, and Whillimoor, whose united area is 5,700 acres. The population in 1801 was 351; in 1811, 438; in 1821, 478; in 1831, 475; in 1841, 558; and in 1851, 643.

ARLECDON.

The principal part of the parish is held by customary tenure under the Earl of Lonsdale and Lady Le Fleming, of Rydal Hall, Westmoreland; and the whole is tithe free, land having been awarded in lieu thereof many years ago. The inhabitants attend the Whitehaven markets. Coal, iron, and limestone are found in the parish. The principal landowners are the Earl of Lonsdale, the Baroness de Sternberg, Thomas Dixon, Esq., John Lindow, Esq., Thomas Brokellbank, Esq., John Steel, Esq., Messrs. Douglas, John Dickinson, Isaac Fletcher, John Lamplugh Raper, Esq., Mrs. Hartley, and Messrs. John Watson, C. Mossop, James Key, A. Spittall, H. Wood, W. S. Wilson, H. Jackson, and J. Yeates. The Roman road leading from Egremont to Cocker mouth passed through this parish.

The township of Arlecdon contains 1,466 acres, and its rateable value is £1,121 17s. 6d. There are several scattered houses in the township, as well as the village of Arlecdon, and the hamlet of New Asby. The soil here is much varied, but yet fertile. The manor of Arlecdon is a fee of Beckermat, as that place is of Egremont, and was given, together with Frisington, Rotington, Weddicar, and other places, by William Meschines to Michael le Fleming, Knt., ancestor of Lady le Fleming, of Rydal Hall, the present proprietor. The Earl of Lonsdale is lord of the common, which is freehold, as is also a great part of the ancient lands, whose separate owners claim the manorial rights of their own property.

The village of Arlecdon is situated about six miles east-by-north of Whitehaven. Cattle fairs are held here on April 24th, the first Friday in June, and September 17th.

THE CHURCH.

Arlecdon church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small but very neat edifice, consisting of nave, chancel, and porch, with turret containing two bells. It was erected in 1829, upon the site of the old church, at a cost of £798 6s. 4d., raised, with the exception of £100 given by the Bishop of Chester, by a rate on the parishioners. The benefice of Arlecdon was a rectory till the thirteenth century. In 26 Henry III. (1241) it was given by John le Fleming, grandson of the first Michael, to the abbey of Calder; and in 1202, in consideration of the total appropriation of the church of Beckermet to the said abbey, whereby the Archdeacon of Richmond would lose the benefit of institution thereunto, and other casual profits, the church of Arlecdon was, by the Archbishop of York, Godfred Ludham, appropriated to the archdeaconry of Richmond. The living is now a perpetual curacy, of which the bishops of Chester were appropriators and patrons till 1856, when, on the demise of Bishop Percy, the authority of the Bishop of Chester ceased in Cumberland, and his rights and privileges in that county were transferred to the Bishop of Carlisle, who is now patron. The living does not occur in the King's Book. It was certified to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty as of the clear annual value of £10; and, in or about the year 1764, was augmented with £600 by the Countess Dowager Gower; and, in 1810, by a parliamentary grant of £200; it is now worth £110 per annum. At the time of the enclosure of the commons of Arlecdon and Whillmoor, in 1820, 190 acres of land of the former, and 200 acres of the latter were given in lieu of all tithes of these townships. The tithes of Frisington were commuted in 1846, for £84, the whole of which is payable to the Bishop of Carlisle. The parish register for marriages commences in 1730; for burials, 1735; for baptisms in 1752.

INCUMBENTS.—Thomas Baxter, 1795; John Baxter, 1787; Joseph Fullerton, 1793; George Wilkinson, 1829; Francis John Allnatt, 1847.

The parsonage house is a good substantial building in the Elizabethan style, situated about three-quarters of a mile from the church. It was erected in 1842, at a cost of £600, taken out of the fund arising out of Queen Anne's Bounty. A Sunday school is held at the parsonage, and is attended by about sixty scholars.

There is a small Wesleyan place of worship in this township, situated on the Lamplugh road, about a mile east of Arlecdon. It is a small stone building erected in 1829.

Arlecdon School is supported by the quarter pence of the children, and £5 each from Beaton's charity and the Baroness de Sternberg, and has an average attendance of thirty-five children.

New Asby is a hamlet in this township.

William Dickinson, Esq., of North Mosses, a few years ago, wrote two works on agriculture, for which he received premiums from the Agricultural Society.

FRISINGTON, HIGH AND LOW.

The area of this township is 1,636 acres, and its rateable value £1,770 10s. The soil here varies much, but is fertile, and abounds in freestone, iron, and coal. The population of the township is included in the parish returns, not having as yet been returned separately.

The manor of Frisington is a fee of Beckermet, and was anciently held by a family bearing the local name, whose last heir, male, dying in the reign of Henry IV., left three daughters, co-heiresses—Johanna, married to Richard Sackfield; Agnes, married to John Lawson; and Margaret, wife of John Atkinson; by whom the manor was sold to John Leigh, in whose family it remained till purchased of a descendant by Anthony Patrickson. It subsequently passed to the Williamsons, who sold it, excepting the parks, to Sir James Lowther, Bart., ancestor of the Earl of Lonsdale, the present lord. A grandson of the Anthony Patrickson above-named sold the parks, part of the demesne of this manor, to the Fletchers of Hutton, from whom it was purchased by the Lamplughs. The lands here were enclosed under an act of Parliament passed in 1805. The Whitehaven, Cleator, and Egremont railway have a branch line to the iron mines in this township.

The Parkside Mining Company possesses two shafts in the royalty of Moses Peter, Esq., of Egremont, one twenty fathoms, the other thirty fathoms—the depth of ore is about thirty-five feet. The same company also possesses a shaft in the royalty of the late Mr. James Fitzsimons, the depth of which is thirty fathoms, with 50 feet of ore; and another shaft in the royalty of the Earl of Lonsdale, fifty-four fathoms in depth, exclusive of the depth of ore, which is about fifty feet. The quantity raised from two pits during the past year was 80,000 tons. The other two pits are not long opened, and may be expected to produce about 60,000 tons per annum. This is the largest iron-ore deposit in the district, and the ore is of superior quality. The number of men at present engaged is about 250. These mines are connected by a horse-tramway with the Whitehaven, Cleator, and Egremont railway at Frisington. Proprietors: Joseph Fletcher, James Dees, Peter Fisher, and John Musgrave.

There are two iron-ore mines here, called the Yeathouse and Winder mines, worked by four shafts, two in each mine. The Yeathouse mine, which produces a rich hematite iron-ore, has been in the hands of the present proprietors, Messrs. Fletcher, Miller, and Co., since 1858, previous to which it was worked by Messrs. Tulk and Ley, who became its proprietors in 1839. The Winder mine is worked by the same proprietors, having been opened by Messrs. Tulk and Ley in 1850. The ore in this mine lies stratified, having a flat roof lying above it similar to what is usually found in coal mines. One of the pits was sunk through the magnesian red conglomerate, and grit series with beds of slate, before the ore was arrived at. The bed upon which the ore rests is most irregular, being in some places thirty feet distant from the roof lying above the ore, and at other places it approximates to the roof till it nearly touches it, and thereby diminishes the thickness of the ore. These mines afford employment to about 250 persons.

Messrs. Smith & Co. have an iron-ore mine here called the High House Mine. It was opened in 1853, under a lease from I. Fletcher, Esq., and employs about fifty hands, producing about 600 tons of ore per week.

The village of Frisington is about five miles east of Whitehaven. Here is a school, which is attended by about forty children, and is under government inspection.

At a place called Crosslacon, and near the residence of Thomas Dixon, Esq., is an ancient cross of rude workmanship, about three and a half feet high. It is connected with the ceremonies of the Catholic church by a tradition which says, that in olden times, when a corpse was being brought to St. Bees for interment, it was set down here for a short time while a portion of the burial service was read by one of the monks, the indentation on the top of the cross having been made for the purpose of supporting the book used on these occasions.

On the Cringlehall estate there is a chalybeate spring, said to possess medicinal properties.

Rheda, the seat and property of Thomas Dixon, Esq., is in this township, four miles from Whitehaven.

WHILLMOOR.

Whillmoor township contains 1,983 acres, and its rateable value is £830. The population has not as yet been given separately, but is included in the parish returns. The land here, being formerly an open common, is generally sterile, and still covered in many places with black heath. The Earl of Lonsdale, John Douglas, and J. L. L. Raper, Esqrs., are the chief landowners—the former possessing what manorial rights and privileges appertain to the township.

CLEATOR PARISH.

The parish of Cleator is about three miles in length, from north to south, and one and a half in breadth, from east to west. It is bounded on the north by Frisington; on the west by Kenniside; on the south by Egremont; and on the east by St. Bees. The soil in this parish is principally clay, and is naturally wet; but there are a few small parcels of light limestone land. It is however with its mineral productions that the property of Cleator and the neighbourhood is connected. The increase of population in this parish has been very rapid of late years. About two centuries ago there were only a few scattered dwellings; the two principal lines of houses being Cleator Maunes and Cleator Row. In 1688 the population was 330. In 1801 it was 362; in 1811, 571; in 1821, 818; in 1831 (in consequence of the stoppage of work at a flax manufactory) it decreased to 487; in 1841 it was 763; since which time it has greatly increased in population, owing to the extension of iron and coal works, and the establishment of manufactories, attaining in 1851, 1779 inhabitants, and at present (1858) the number is probably more than 3,000. This parish possesses no dependent townships. It is connected with the coast by the Whitehaven, Cleator, and Egremont railway.

The parish of Cleator was anciently called Kekellten, from the rivulet Keekle, which bounds it on the west. Probably the district derived its name from Ketel, third baron of Kendal, who may have had the manor granted to him, as Kelton, in the neighbouring parish of Lamplugh, was; and the derivation of the name Kelton, as given in an old MS., is "Ketel's Town." We may also infer that Ketel, or his successors, among their other grants to the priory of St. Bees, included Cleator. The manor is mentioned in an ancient chronicle as belonging, in 1315, to the monastery of St. Bees; at which time, during the invasion of Robert le Brus, the manor houses of Cleator and Stainburn were burnt, and the monastery itself pillaged by a party of Scots, under the command of James Douglas.¹ The manor is said to have been enfranchised before the reign of Henry VIII., for in the 35th year of the reign of that monarch (1543-4), an inquisition of knights' fees in Cumberland was taken, and from it we learn that at that period the free tenants of Cleator held jointly the manor of Cleator of the king in capite as of his castle of Egremont, by the ninth part of one knight's fee, rendering homage and suit of court and 12d. seawake. But at the same inquisition, it is said that Richard Irton, Esq., of Irton, possessed Cleator;² and also that Richard Kirkby held lands in Cleator by the same tenure as his manor of Bolton, and paying a fee farm rent of 2s. for the said lands.³ The parish was enclosed by act of Parliament, passed in 1816. The manorial rights of the common are vested in General Wyndham. The landowners in Cleator are Samuel and John Lindow, Thomas Ainsworth, George Dixon, Thomas F. Brocklebank, James Robertson, John Morison, Thomas Little, Charles Dean, S. R. G. Braddyll, William Jenkinson, and Capt. J. R. Walker, Esqrs.; the executors of the late Mr. Smith, Mrs. Waters, the Hematite Iron Company, and the Carron Iron Company.

The Whitehaven Iron Works, established here in 1842, comprises three blast furnaces capable of producing 160 tons of pig-iron each per week. At these works the pure red Hematite ore alone is used, no admixture of other iron-stone or ore being allowed, and it is the only place where the pig-iron is smelted from this ore alone. To produce blast for the furnaces here there is a steam-engine of 100 horse power, and another of larger dimensions. A machine is in use for washing all impurities out of the coal previous to its being put into the coke ovens. The proprietors of the iron works are also lessees of an extensive coal-field in the same district from which the coal for consumption at the blast furnaces is raised. The total number of men and boys employed at the iron works, coke ovens, collieries, &c., amounts to about 500. The pig-iron made here is of a superior quality, and although made with hot blast, is considered equal to the Welsh cold blast iron; and as a mixture with Scotch hot blast iron for casting, where strength is an object, is of great benefit, producing castings of great strength. The pig-iron made here is conveyed to Whitehaven by the Whitehaven, Cleator, and Egremont railway, and thence shipped to various parts of the kingdom. The iron company have a very valuable limestone quarry on their own property. Messrs. Samuel and John Lindow carry on the Cleator forge, as also several iron-ore mines in the parish and neighbourhood. Mr. John Stirling also works an iron-ore mine here, which was commenced in 1853. The vein varies in thickness from a few feet to fifty-five feet. Cleator flax-mill was commenced in the year 1800, by Messrs. Birley and Son; but in 1834 it became the property of Messrs. Ainsworth and Stirling. In the aggregate it employs about 300 hands, earning in wages about £120 a week, or £6,240 a year. In February, 1859, a new flax spinning-mill was opened by the same proprietors, and is capable of receiving 30,000 spindles.

THE CHURCH.

Cleator parish church, dedicated to St. Leonard, was, with the exception of the chancel, rebuilt in 1841, in consequence of the damp and dilapidated state of the old building. It now consists of nave, chancel, porch, and bell turret, with vestry beneath. Including the chancel, it is ninety-four feet in length and thirty-nine in width, and contains upwards of 400 sittings. The windows of the nave are lancet-shaped; the roof is open to the timber work; but the chancel roof is concealed. In the chancel, on the south side, is a small window, which has not been altered probably since the building of the first church; it is square-headed, and of two lights. The font, which formerly belonged to St. Bees' church, is hexagonal at the upper part containing the basin, but is supported on a round pedestal. Cleator church, during Catholic times, was wholly appropriated to the abbey of St. Mary, at Calder. In the Valor of Pope Nicholas its revenues are entered under that abbey, and the tithes and Easter offerings are valued in it at £4 4s. 5d. per annum. At the dissolution of the monastic institutions, the original endowment appears to have been seven marks per annum, or £4 13s. 4d., which has come down to the present time. There is also a pension of £2 from the crown arising from the property of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. By grants from Queen Anne's Bounty, parliamentary grants, and a donation from Lady Gower, and also a small allotment of land on the enclosure of the common, the stipend has been increased to £79. In 1702 John Robertson, Esq., of Cleator Maines, had the impropriation and patronage. It subsequently passed to Wilson Gale, Esq., of Cleator Hall, who succeeded to the estates of the Braddylls of Conishead Priory. That family recently sold the patronage of the living to the Earl of Lonsdale, and the tithes to Thomas Ainsworth, Esq., of the Floss; but an estate, called the Nook, is charged with the payment of the original endowment, and with the other liabilities of the impropriation. Some of the landowners have redeemed the tithe of their farms. The living is a perpetual curacy. The following is the most perfect list of the incumbents that can be at present obtained from the parish register:—

INCUMBENTS.—William Barne, 160—, died 1643; William Barne, 164—; John Stamper, 1728; Peter Richardson, 1730; Joseph Dixon, 1731; T. Brocklebank, 1755; — Jennings, 1761; John Lowther, 1762; William Stockdale, 1763; H. Nicholson, 1764; — Aarey, 1765; Joseph Harrison, 1769; Ralph Tunsdale, 1769; John Fisher, 1770; Henry Mossop, 1772; John Brunt, 1822; William Malone Jukes, 1845; William Hadfield, 1847; John Taylor, 1852; Frederic Addison, 1856.

The Catholic church of St. Bega is situated about a quarter of a mile from the village of Cleator, in a field, called Priest Croft, which is said to have been the site of a church or chapel previous to the Reformation. It is a handsome stone structure, in the Decorated style, with a square tower, and, when completed, will cost about £1,300, inclusive of the site, priest's house, and schools. The altarpiece is a fine painting, representing the Crucifixion; there is a very good organ. The church will accommodate about 600 persons. The cost of erection was defrayed by subscriptions, collected through the unwearied exertions of the late Rev. W. G. Holden, who was himself a large contributor. The church is served by priests of the order of St. Benedict. We have been favoured with the following remarks respecting the late incumbent of this church, by one who knew him well:—"Few men have done more or worked longer for the good of souls than the Rev. Mr. Holden, of Cleator. His services in the cause of religion were so well known to the late Earl of Lonsdale that that nobleman, purely from respect for Mr. Holden, gave a large plot of ground, near the coach-road at Whitehaven, for the building of a new Catholic church and presbytery, both of which Mr. Holden completed. After thirty-six years spent in the active performance of every pastoral duty at Whitehaven, Mr. Holden established the now flourishing mission of Cleator, where he continued to labour till his decease, in 1858." His successor at Cleator is the Rev. Francis B. Williams.

At Crossfield, in this parish, the Society of Friends had a meeting-house, prior to the erection of their present place of worship at Whitehaven. Nothing, however, now remains except the burial-ground.

The parochial school, situated in the village, was erected by subscription in 1854, at a cost of £300, and is a neat stone building, capable of accommodating about 150 children; the average number in attendance is eighty. The Baroness de Sternberg gives £5 a year towards the support of the school.

There is a parochial library of 160 volumes, the books of which circulate at present in all parts of the parish, and are lent by the incumbent on the payment of a small monthly subscription, to defray expenses.

On account of the increase of population in Cleator Moor, a private school-room was licensed in 1858, by the Bishop of Carlisle, for the celebration of divine service and for baptisms. There is also a Church Sunday school in connexion with it.

In 1857 the Hematite Iron Company erected a commodious school for children of both sexes, close to their works at Cleator Moor, for the education of the children of their workmen. The average attendance is 120.

The Roman road from Cockermouth passes through the parish. It enters at the boundary stone on the road to Frisington, and pursues a south-westerly direction past the Catholic church, and then is probably merged into the high road through Cleator village. The larger stones composing it have nearly all disappeared, but traces of it are very distinct.

Dent Hill, which is the last of the mountains of the slate formation, bounds the parish on the east. Veins of copper ore have been found in it, but not of sufficient richness to be wrought.

Wath and Crossfield are hamlets in this parish, the former is about four miles south-east of Whitehaven.

¹ His name first occurs in the registers in 1609, as "Clericus curatus de Cleator." To him the parish is indebted for the preservation of the earlier registers of the church. He had caused the former paper documents from 1572 to 1599 to be copied on parchment in a beautiful hand, and at every second or fourth page is the following attestation, which may be, even in these days, an example of care and accuracy in preserving parochial documents:—"Concordat cum veteri libro chartaceo, testes sunt hi quorum nomina subscribuntur videlicet Willielmus Barne, curatus ecclesie parochialis de Cleator, Willielmus Belsie, Nicolaus Sharp, Antholius Lister, et Willm Rychemond, Gardiani ibidem."

² Son of the preceding. He is last mentioned as "curatus" in 1076. There are four generations of this name in lineal descent in the church registers.

DISTINGTON PARISH.

THIS is a small parish, containing about three square miles, and is without dependant townships. It is bounded by Moresby, Harrington, Alcedon, Lamplugh, and Dean. The inhabitants are principally collected in the village of Distington, but there are several scattered houses, and the small hamlet of Gilgarran. Coal and limestone are abundant here, but are not worked at present. Freestone is obtained in considerable quantities from the Barnhill and Robin Hood quarries. Whitehaven and Workington are the markets usually attended. The parish is remarkable for its salubrity, and is known throughout the district for the longevity of its inhabitants.

Distington contains 2,910 statute acres, and its rateable value is £3,558 10s. 9d. Its population in 1801 was 724; in 1811, 910; in 1821, 988; in 1831, 960; in 1841, 1,108; and in 1851, 1,106. The Whitehaven and Maryport railway runs near the westerly side of the parish.

The first recorded possessor of the manor of Distington is Gilbert de Dundraw, who held it in the reigns of Richard I. and John. This Gilbert was the son of Sir Gilbert de Dundraw, son of Odard de Logis, lord paramount of Wigton. He was lord of Distington, Crofton, and Dundraw, and gave lands in the two first-named places to the abbey of Holme Cultram, and the priory of St. Mary Carlisle. He appears to have had no male issue, but we meet with the names of two daughters, one of whom, Isolda, became the wife of Adam de Tynemouth, and with her husband, in the 42nd Henry III. (1257-8) gave the fourth part of Distington and the advowson of the rectory to Thomas, son of Lambert de Multon. The other daughter was espoused by Stephen de Crofton, who, with his wife, gave, in the 6th Edward I. (1277-8) their part of Distington to Thomas de Moresby and Margaret, his wife. This Margaret exchanged it with her brother, Thomas Lucy, for Thackthwaite, and he, in his turn, gave it to the Moresby family, receiving, in return, Brackenthwaite in Loweswater. Distington came afterwards into the possession of the family of Dykes, as we learn from the escheats in the reign of Richard III.; and in the 2nd year of that monarch (1484-5), William Dykes occurs as presenting to the rectory. In the 35th Henry VIII., Thomas Dykes held the manor of the king, as of his castle of Egremont, by homage, fealty, and suit of court, paying for cornage 10s., seawake 11d., and pature of the serjeants; and in the 4th Philip and Mary (1557-8) Leonard Dykes presented to the living of Distington. From a survey taken in 1578 we learn that "Leonard Dykes and William Fletcher holdeth the hamlet of Distington, by homage, fealtie, and suit of court, and knight's service, and by the rent of 12s. 11d., unde accedit domini de proprietia Fitzwater 1s. 10d., de proprietia domini Lucy 11s. 1d., in toto 12s. 11d." At the same period, William Fletcher held the moiety of Gilgarran by like services. The whole manor seems to have been brought eventually by marriage to the Fletchers, and after the death of the last of that family it was sold, under a decree in Chancery, in 1720; the purchaser being John Brougham, Esq., of Scales, who, in 1737, conveyed it to Sir James Lowther, Bart., from whom it has descended to its present owner, the Earl of Lonsdale; but it is stated that he possesses the manorial rights of the common only, each proprietor of the ancient land claiming the manorial rights of his own property, the tenure being freehold. The Earl of Lonsdale, Capt. James R. Walker, R.N., Henry Curwen, Esq., and Dr. Thomas Peile, are the principal landowners. The commons were enclosed by act of Parliament in 1768, when a portion was allotted in lieu of tithes, so that the parish is now tithe-free.

Hay, or Hayes Castle, of which some remains are still in existence, is supposed to have been the manor-house of the ancient lords of Distington, and the seat of the Moresby family. It was formerly possessed by the Dickinsons, from whom it was purchased by Mr. John Hartley, ancestor of Thomas Hartley, Esq., of Gillfoot, near Egremont, and is still held by his descendants. The ruins of this ancient stronghold adjoin a flour-mill, called Castle Mill, which is situated to the south of the village, on the left of the road leading from Whitehaven. Near this mill, on elevated ground, can be traced the foundations of a square building, and a portion of the northern wall, of immense thickness, and still of considerable height. The moat, on two sides, is in a very perfect condition. From the appearance of what remains, the castle seems to have been a single tower of great strength.

The village of Distington is about four and a half miles north-north-east of Whitehaven, and four miles south of Workington. It is large, and consists chiefly of one long street of well-built houses. There is here a manufactory of edge tools.

THE CHURCH.

Distington church, situated on an eminence west of the village, is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, south porch, and bell turret, with two bells. The porch is seated, and has a pointed arch. The windows of the church are of various styles, some round-headed, and some modern. The font, which is of stone, and square in form, bears the date of 1662. The church contains a few mural monuments. The living is a rectory, valued in the King's Book at £7 1s. 0½d., and was certified to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty at £67 19s. 2d., but is now worth upwards of £300 a year. The glebe consists of 530 acres. The patronage of the living has descended with the manor, and is now vested in the Earl of Lonsdale. The parish register commences in 1653.

RECTORS.—William Curken occurs 1535; — Fletcher occurs about 1642; Richard Arntstead, 1669; Richard Tickell, 1685; Lancelot Teasdale, 1692; John Dalton, 1712; W. Briscoe, 1729; Thomas Sewell, 1745; Thomas Spelding, 1747; W. Lowther, 1753; Thomas W. Morley, 1785; Henry Lowther, 1813.

There are two small dissenting places of worship in the village; one belonging to the Wesleyans, erected in 1830; and the other to the Primitive Methodists, built in 1838—they will each accommodate about 120 persons.

There is a school in this parish, which was built on the waste in 1754, by the voluntary contributions of the inhabitants; and, about 1770, upon the enclosure of the commons, an allotment was made, with the consent of the parishioners, containing about three acres, for the use of the schoolmaster. He has the entire management of the land, which now lets for £4 5s. a year. The school is supported by the children's pence, and is attended by about thirty scholars.

The Sunday school, situated near the church, was erected by the parishioners in 1830, at a cost of about £200.

Gilgarran is a hamlet two miles east of Distington, where the stately mansion of Captain James Robertson Walker, R.N., is situated.

The Rev. JAMES ROBERTSON, minister of Loch Broom, co. Ross, born about 1701; he married 1751, Anne, second daughter of Murdoch Mackenzie, of Letterwe, and by her (who died in 1791) left at his decease, in March, 1776, six sons and two daughters, viz:—

- i. John, who died unmarried in 1776.
- ii. Alexander, who served as a captain in the army, and died in Nova Scotia.
- iii. JAMES, of whom we treat.
- iv. Charles, of London, deceased.
- v. Hector, died unmarried.
- vi. Murdoch, a distinguished officer in the British naval service, married Miss Mac Rae, and left issue.

- i. Janet, married to Alexander Mackenzie, of Balachrae.
- ii. Margaret, married to John Fisher, Esq., of Rothessay, Bute.

The third son,

JAMES ROBERTSON, Esq., J.P. and D.L., and many years collector of customs at the port of Storraway, married, 1781, his cousin-german Annabella, daughter of John Mackenzie, Esq., of Letterwe, and died 31st of August, 1840, having had issue,

- i. JAMES, of Gilgarran.
- ii. Murdoch, married Anne, eldest daughter of John Higgin, Esq., of Laurester, and left a son James.
- iii. John, married Barbara, eldest daughter of Francis Shand, Esq., of Liverpool, and had two sons and a daughter.
- i. Johanna.
- ii. Katherine, married to Lewis McIver, Esq., of Gress.
- iii. Anne.
- iv. Margaret.
- v. Annabella.
- vi. Hectorina, married to the Rev. William Scott Moncreiffe, minister of Pennicuik, N.B.

Mr. Robertson, on his decease, was succeeded by his son, JAMES ROBERTSON-WALKER, Esq., of Gilgarran, co. Cumberland, J.P., high sheriff in 1841, commander R.N., born 22nd June, 1783; married first 24th June, 1824, Ann, daughter of the late William Walker, Esq., of Gilgarran, and heiress of her brother William Walker, Esq.; and secondly, 21st October, 1856, the daughter of John Mackenzie, Esq. Captain Robertson-Walker was mate of the Victory (Lord Nelson's ship) at Trafalgar, died in 1856.

Prospect House, the seat of Captain Spencer, is near Distington, as is also Belle Vue, the residence of John Stanley, M.D.

There are two corn-mills in the village, Hayes Castle Mill and Distington Mill.

Distington possesses an excellent Museum, founded some years ago by Mr. Joseph R. Wallace, one of the editors of the "Maax Liberal." It contains many curiosities in the shape of antiquities, among which we may mention a fragment of a Runic Cross of the same character as those found in the Isle of Man.

DRIGG PARISH.

THE parish of Drigg is bounded on the north by that of Gosforth, on the west by the Irish Sea, on the south by the river Mite, which divides it from Muncaster, and on the east by the parish of Irton, and the chapelry of Wasdale. It extends along the coast for about four miles, its greatest breadth being about two miles and a half; and though divided by the Irton into two parts, Drigg and Carleton, yet it forms only one township. The Whitehaven and Furness railway runs through the parish.

The area of Drigg is 5,347 acres, and its rateable value £2,135 2s. 6d. The number of its inhabitants in 1801 was 367; in 1811, 373; in 1821, 433; in 1831, 432; in 1841, 429; and in 1851, 430, residing principally in the village of Drigg. Agriculture is the principal employment of the population; but some are engaged in the manufacture of bricks and tiles, which is carried on near the railway station, established in 1853. The Whitehaven and Furness Junction railway runs through the parish. Whitehaven is the market usually attended. The Irton, which flows south-west-by-west from Wastwater, to the west end of Drigg village, is frequented by salmon and abounds with trout, &c.; and Camden speaks of the shell-fish in this river producing pearls. The soil on the east side of the Irton is chiefly a deep clay and fertile loam, but on the west and north it is mostly of a sandy nature. It is remarkable for yielding large quantities of fine potatoes. Near the sea shore is a strong chalybeate spring, highly esteemed for its medicinal properties, and was once much resorted to by invalids and others. There is also, on the sea coast, in this parish, a large boulder stone, twelve feet in length, nine in breadth, and five and a half in height, which bears the name of Carl Crag. It consists of a very fine grained sienite, divided into transverse parallel sections of about two feet each by a vein of shale of half an inch in breadth between two narrow strips of quartz. Some years ago, three hollow tubes of a vitrified substance were observed projecting from the surface of a sandhill on the sea coast, one of which was traced downwards to a depth of about thirty feet. It is supposed they were produced by the action of lightning on the drifted sand.

The first recorded possessors of the manor of Drigg are the family of Stuteville, or Estoteville, who held it in the reign of Henry II., and whose heiress brought it in marriage to Baldwin, Lord Wake, baron of Liddel. In the 10th Edward I. (1281-2), William, the son of Thomas de Graystoke, and the Lady Adingham, in Furness, held a knight's fee between them, in Drigg, of the Baldwin just mentioned; and in the 29th year of the reign of the same monarch (1300), the Abbot of Calder, Patrick Culven, and the Lady Margaret Multon, held Drigg of John de Graystoke, and of John, the son of Robert Harrington; and they of Lord Wake.

Subsequent to this the portion of Drigg held by the Harrington family passed with an heiress to the Curwens of Workington Hall, who continued its possessors till the reign of James I., when Sir Nicholas Curwen sold it to Sir William Pennington, of Muncaster, whose successors have continued to enjoy the manorial rights and privileges. General Wyndham is, however, lord paramount of the whole parish, and the tenants owe suit and service at the courts of the barony of Egremont. The lord of the manor claims flotsam—wreck floating on the water, and jetsam—goods cast from any vessel, or thrown on the shore, and lagan—goods that are sunk.¹ From a survey of the barony of Egremont taken in 1587, we learn that, in that year, "Jos. Pennington holdeth certain lands and tenements in Dregg, late Richard Eaglesfield's, and before that Thomas Wake's, by homage, fealtie, and suit of court, from three weeks to three weeks, and by the rent for cornage 6s. 8d.; for seawake, 1s.; for serjeant's food, 4s.; wholly belonging to the lord de propartia, Dni. de Lucy." The landowners at present are Edward A. Burrow, John Taylor, John Thompson, William Hodgkin, John Hodgkin, William Sherwen, John Singleton, Isaac Clements, John Pearson, and William Leavens. The manor is nearly all freehold and tithe free, Lord Muncaster, the lord of the manor and lay rector, having in the last century taken 1,100 acres of common land in lieu of all tithes, and enfranchised his customary tenants.

The village of Drigg is a street of well-built detached houses, bearing various names, and extending from the vicinity of the sea to Holm Rook, on the Whitehaven road, two and a half miles north of Ravenglass. With respect to Drigg there is a well-known Cumberland saying, "Let us gang together like lads of Drigg and lasses of Beckermert," which has reference to the manner in which Barncsar, or Bardscar, a ruined Danish city, or town, near the foot of Devoke Water, is said to have been peopled. This was accomplished by taking the men of Drigg and marrying them to the women of Beckermert, whose original helpmates had been slain in battle—what had become of the women of Drigg is a point upon which the legend is silent. Drigg, formerly Dregg, may possibly take its name from the circumstance just alluded to—old Norso dreg, from the verb draga, to draw or lead away.¹ We must, however, state that some writers have derived the name from derigh, or dergh, a Celtic term for the oak.

THE CHURCH.

Drigg church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a small structure in the Perpendicular style, erected on the site of the old church, in 1850, and will accommodate about 250 persons—forty sittings are free and unappropriated. This church appears to have been appropriated to Conishead Priory, in Lancashire, but the abbots of Calder seem to have had part of the manor. Bishop Gastrell informs us that Anselm, son of Michael de Furness, gave the chapel of Drog to the priory of Conishead, and supposes that Drog has been a clerical error for Dreg or Drigg. In the King's Book, the church of Drigg is mentioned among the possessions of Conishead Priory, and is valued at £7 7s. 4d. It subsequently became so closely appropriated that it became a perpetual curacy, and is returned to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, as of the annual value of £5 6s. 8d. It is now worth about £90 a year. On the dissolution of the monasteries in England, Drigg church was granted to the Curwen family, and was sold with the manor, by Sir Nicholas Curwen, to the Penningtons, of Muncaster. The late Lord Muncaster sold the advowson to Samuel Irton, Esq., the present patron. The parish registers commence in 1631.²

The parish possesses two endowed schools, one in Carleton, and the other in the village of Drigg. The former school was founded in 1723, and in 1797 was endowed with £200, by Joseph Walker, for the education of the children of those who had previously contributed to the erection of a school-house, subject, however, to a small annual gratuity to the master at Shrovetide, locally denominated "cock penny." Through bad management and other causes the endowment of this school has dwindled into insignificance, the income now being barely sufficient to keep the building in repair. The school at Drigg was erected in 1828 by the Rev. William Thompson, M.A., a native of the parish, curate of Farnworth, near Prescott, Lancashire, and its government was invested in seven trustees. The master is to teach eight poor children, natives of the parish, for the payment of 1s. entrance, and 1s. per quarter each, but is allowed to take other pupils, who pay a regular quarterage. The school-house is in the neighbourhood of the church, on a site granted by the late Lord Muncaster. The endowment is £42 per annum, arising from money invested in the Three-per-cent Consols. £40 of the proceeds go directly to the master in half-yearly payments, and the remaining 40s. are at the disposal of the trustees for the repair of the school and school-house. The teachers' house adjoins the school.

Carleton, a constablowick in this parish, lying between the rivers Irt and Mite, contains a few dispersed houses, and the hamlet of Hall Carleton with Carleton Hall, the seat of Edward A. Burrow, Esq., about one mile north of Ravenglass. It contains about twelve farms, formerly held of the Penningtons of Muncaster, as of their manor of Drigg, but the tenants have been enfranchised. Carleton Hall commands fine views of Scawfell, the Pikes, Great Gable, and other mountains.

EGREMONT PARISH.

The parish of Egremont is bounded by those of St. Bees, Cleator, Hale, St. John Beekermest, and the chapelry of Ennerdale. It extends about three miles from north to south, and two and a half from east to west, possessing no dependent townships. The soil here is principally a thin light mould, incumbent in gravel. The inhabitants are principally engaged in the flax, &c., manufacture, and in the iron mines of the neighbourhood.

Egremont comprises an area of 2,708 acres, and its rateable value is £5,599 17s. 1d. The population in 1801 was 1,515; in 1811, 1,556; in 1821, 1,741; in 1831, 1,741; in 1841, 1,750; and in 1851, 2,049. The Whitehaven, Cleator, and Egremont railway, opened for passengers in 1857, runs through the parish, and has one of its termini in the town.

In the year 1072 William the Conqueror gave to Raufe, or Ranaulph de Briquesard, surnamed Le Meschiu, or the younger, Viscount de Bessin, (one of that numerous band of Norman warriors, who, on the invasion, had flocked to share in the spoil of the rich and fruitful soil of England,) the whole of Cumberland, together with that part of Westmoreland which, in the Confessor's time, was known as Appelbischyre, the grantor enjoining his old companion-in-arms to hold that large district of him and his successors in capite, as supreme lord of the fee, by homage, fealty, and the service of a certain number of knight's fees, or, in other words, to perform military service to the crown whenever called on by his sovereign. Having obtained investiture of that vast feudal chieftainrie, together with his elevation to the earldom of Cumberland, and lordship of Carlisle, the powerful noble, after appropriating the central portion to his especial use, in order to establish his authority more firmly over his new acquisitions, parcelled Cumberland into eleven great territorial divisions, or baronies, on which he placed an equal number of his kinsmen, or chief military adherents, whom he bound to hold their respective gifts of him and his heirs by knight service, and the rendering of various feudal obligations, proportioned to the extent and circumstances of their several grants. Among the superior fees thus created, was the barony of Coupland or Copeland, which, with its wild rugged wastes, Camden affirms was so designated "because it runs in pointed mountains, which by the Britons, were called Kopa." In length it was about thirty-five miles, by twenty in mean breadth, and was bounded by the sea and the rivers Duddon and Derwent. That extensive tract, which comprised within itself numerous manors and seigniories, the lord of Cumberland bestowed upon his youngest son, William, to hold by the like services as required from the grantees of the other baronies. Several years after that distribution among his chief vassals, Earl Ranulph died, and Ranulph, or Randal, his eldest son, on the occasion of the loss at sea, in A.D. 1119, of his cousin Richard, earl of Chester, in that calamitous wreck of the White Ship, in which the king's son, William Duke of Normandy, and many other persons of high rank perished, became heir to the possessions of the earldom of Chester. Having, in consequence of the power and influence derived from his augmented estates, excited the fears or cupidity of Henry I., he, on being enfeoffed with his relative's inheritance, in order to remove all cause of uneasiness, surrendered to his sovereign the great domains he held in the north, and, retiring to Chester, contented himself with the enjoyment of that princely palatinate. Previous, however, to the cession of his northern estates, he stipulated that all those who there held lands of himself, should be continued in possession under the king in capite; in pursuance of which agreement Henry II., upon coming to the throne, re-granted to their feudatories the baronies bestowed upon them by the first Earl Ranulph, with the difference in tenure merely of requiring them to hold the same immediately of the crown, and subject to the fulfilment of the several conditions they were primarily enjoined to observe. Among the rest, the barony of Copeland was confirmed to William de Meschines and his heirs. Quieted in the enjoyment of his large and picturesque fief, that martial noble changed its ancient name to Egremont, or Allerdale-above-Derwent; and, for the purpose of more effectually securing his title, he raised his baronial castle on the banks of the Egre or Ehen, near the centre of his possessions, which he made as strong as the skill and appliances of the times would admit. Still further to strengthen his authority, by that chain of many links which extended the principle and the rule of feudal policy from the throne to the cottage, William de Meschines divided his barony into numerous smaller tracts, or dependent manors, which he meted out, as rewards to his immediate retainers, for their services and attachment, and all his fees which he and his heirs granted to any subordinate vassal within the barony were bound to be holden as of the castle of Egremont, upon condition of rendering for the same certain stipulated imposts incident to the feudal system in the north of England. So much of the barony as lay between the Cocker and the Derwent William de Meschines re-granted to Waltheof, or Waldieff, lord of Allerdale, son of Gospatric Earl of Dunbar, with the honour of Cockermouth, and the lordship of "the five towns above Cocker," Brigham, Dean, Eaglesfield, Braithwaite, and Greysouthen. William de Meschines made Egremont the seat of his barony, erecting his castle there; and all lands which he or his successors, lords of Copeland, granted within the barony, were to be held of the castle of Egremont. This William de Meschines gave Workington, Salter, Kelton, and Stockbow, to Ketel, son of Eldred, son of Ivo de Tailbois, baron of Kendal: the manors of Beckermert, Frisington, Rotington, Weddicar, and Arleedon, to — Fleming; Kirkby Begog (St. Bees), to the abbey of St. Mary, at York; Mulcaster, to an ancestor of the Pennington family; Drigg and Carleton, to one of the Stutevilles, or Estotevilles; Millom, to Godard Boyvill; and Santon, Bolton, Gosforth, and Hale, to Thomas Multon, of Gilsland. William de Meschines had an only daughter and heiress, who married Robert de Romeley, lord of Skipton, whose daughter and heiress, Alice, married William Fitz Duncan, earl of Murray, son of Duncan, brother of David, King of Scotland, by Othreda, sister and heiress of Waltheof, son of Alan, son of Waltheof, first lord of Allerdale, son of Gospatric before mentioned. By this marriage, William Fitz Duncan became lord both of Skipton and Egremont. Cicely, one of the three co-heiresses of Fitz Duncan and Alice de Romeley, married William de Gros, earl of Albermarle, and inherited the barony of Skipton; Alice was twice married, but had no issue; Amabel married Reginald de Lucy, and had two daughters, co-heiresses, married to two brothers of the Multon family. In the year 1300 the barony of Egremont was in moieties between Thomas de Multon and Thomas de Lucy, the latter having taken the name of Lucy from his maternal grandfather. The Multons subsequently became possessors of the whole barony, which they held till it became divided among the sisters and co-heiresses of John de Multon, the last heir male of that family, who died in 1335; one of these married Thomas, Lord Lucy, grandson of Thomas Multon, who took the name of Lucy, as above mentioned. Henry Percy, the first earl of Northumberland, having married Maud, the only sister and heir of Anthony, the last lord Lucy, who died in 1369, the earls of Northumberland, by gift or purchase, eventually became possessed of the whole barony. During the time that the Percys held Egremont, in 1578, a survey was made of the barony, from which we extract the following particulars:—

“The seignory or lordship of Egremont aforesaid, by descent of inheritance, came from John de Multon to his three sisters, who were then his heirs, viz., Johan, married to Robert Fitzwater; Elizabeth, married to Walter Birringham; and Margaret, married to Thomas Lucy; amongst whom the said seignory and lordship was divided by ordinary partition indre tripartite, by virtue of writs to the exiles directed for that purpose, in which partition the royalties and liberties remain in common, and certain lands and other things, as appeareth in the said partition, and the castle, parkes, demesne lands and customary lands and tenants at will, and also the services and tenures of freeholders, together with the forests, chases, wastes, and advowsons of benefices, were equally divided into three parts, two parts whereof are now of the inheritance of the said Earl (Northumberland) viz., the part of Thomas Lucy and Margaret, his wife, by ancient descent of inheritance; the other part of Robert Fitzwaters and Johan, his wife, being the eldest sister, by exchange for other lands, from Edmund Viscount Fitzwaters, made with Henry, late earl of Northumberland, uncle to the said earl that now is, in the — year of King Henry the Eighth, which two parts particularly appear in the survey following.

“The towns and hamlets within the precincts of the boundary of the barony are as followeth. Egremond Bigrigg, Corkecle and Couderton, Sealcrofte, Beotle, Birkby, Mulcaster, Dregg and Ravenglass, Irton and Sancton, Bolton, Gosforth, Newton and Ponsoby, Calder and Beckermert, Kirkby, alias St. Bege, Wilton and Braistones, Haile, Workington and Winscales, Harrington, Disington, Gilaron and Castlerigg, Moreton, Moresby, Mosergh, Rotington, Wedacre and Harase, Lamplugh, Frisington and Arghladown, Kelton, Cleator. And within the same circuite and limits are contained the forests and chases of Wasdalehead, Eskdaleward, Netherwasdale, Middleward, Kennyside, and Ehenderdale, within which there be divers dales and hamlets, as in the survey hereafter appeareth.

“Within the precincts and limits aforesaid, the lords of the said seignory and lordship have and always have used, as have been allowed by judgement in quo warranto, &c., courts baron, three weeks courts, courts leet with view of frank pledge, with the assize of bread and ale, and to hold plees, and to have the return of all writs of our sovereign lady the queen, and to hold pleas of the crown of our said sovereign lady, and also of attachments and appeals of felons, and to prosecute the prosecutions of these appellors to such as be appealed with in the court of Egremond, unto the outlarie or exigent, viz.: by twenty-four weeks at every court which there are holden from three weeks to three weeks, and aforesaid to witness the said accusations in the county, and afterwards in the county the said party (so appealed) shall be outlawed if they do not appear, &c., and to have the custody of the prisoners taken within Coupland, and of ancient custom to do and exercise all these things which do appertain to the office of coroner and sheriff, by their bayliff, through all the land of Coupland (except the lordship of the five towns), and also to have all the chattels of felons, convicted persons, and persons beheaded, except the moiety of felons' goods between Esk and Dudhen, through all the land of Coupland aforesaid; and also free chase through all the land of Coupland (except Whitehaven and Kirbey, alias Kirkbee), seawake, waif, stray, infanktheif, outfanktheif, toule, through tolle, oxen of the diseisor by diseen made, the first being of any goods saleable coming as well by waters as land, and also to have keil toll, viz., toll of ships and all merchandize sold in the havens of Coupland; and the amendment of the assize of nets broken in the waters of Esk between Eben and Caldre, the masts whereof are of lesser breth than four inches; and also to have a market at Egremond every week, upon Saturday, and a fair at Ravenglass every year, in the even, the feast-day, and the morrow after, of St. James the Apostle;

gibbit and pillorie at Egremont aforesaid, of ancient custom; and one market at his manor of Egremont, by the charter of Henry III., king of England, in the fifty-first year of his reign (1267), every week, upon Wednesday; with one fair every year, by three days, enduring the even, the day, and the morrow after, of the nativity of St. Mary the Virgin, and to be quite from suit of the county courts and hundred courts, and from all fines and amerciements there; and the toll aforesaid, within the said seignory of Coupland, of ancient custom, is used as followeth, viz.: for one horse shodd, of the seller 2d., and of the buyer 2d.; for one horse unshod, of the seller 1d., and of the buyer 1d.; for one ox, of the seller 1d., and of the buyer 1d.; for ten sheep, of the seller 1d., and of the buyer 1d.; for ten swine, of the seller 1d., and of the buyer 1d.; for one pack of cloth, 4d.; for one piece of cloth, of the seller ½d., and of the buyer ½d.; for one barrel of salt-herring, of the seller 4d., and of the buyer 4d.; and one daker of leather, of the seller 3d., and of the buyer 3d.; one bond of iron, of the seller ½d., and of the buyer ½d.; for every stall in the market, upon the market-day in Egremont, ½d. Keil toll in all havens: for one ship having a flote boat, 8d.; for every vessel without a flote boat, 4d. Toll by the king's charter, viz.: for every stall of the market, upon the market-day, ½d.; for every stall upon the fair-day, the even and the morrow of St. Mary the Virgin, 4d.; for every horse that is shod 2d., for every horse unshod 1d., and for every ox 1d., within the liberties aforesaid. Concerning the execution of offices there, there are between Darwent and Ehen one serjeant of armes, called the bayliff, between Ehen and Darwent by the lord deputed and assigned; and another serjeant, called the bayliff, between Ehen and Dudhen, by the lord deputed and assigned; which, being sworn, make attachments, summons, and all other things to the said offices belonging.

"The boulder particularly taken between the lord lands belonging to the lordship of Egremont and the town of Kirkby, alias St. Beges,¹ beginning at the sea, and so over the scars or rocks to a ditch called the Mereditch, between Kirkby and Couderton toward the east, unto Ellergill Beck, and so ascending the said beck to a close called Brackenthwaite, being of the lordship of Egremont, to a stone, being a mere stone, and from thence to another stone near to the turn of a close called the Boardland of pallaslat, then turning east by way and the said close edge, unto a close called Jordan Close, and so continuing towards the east to a place of an old hedge where it cometh to the ground of Walton, and thence north by a hedge and a valley to another hedge between Bigrigg and the lands belonging to the tenants of J. Nicholson, in Egremont; and thence as the meers go between Bigrigg and Walton, and between Hensingham and Korkkele on the one side and the lordship of St. Bees on the other side till it come to the ground called the Flatt, and so compassing that ground, parcel of St. Bees, as the meers goeth unto the sea." Egremont barony continued to be possessed by the earls of Northumberland till Elizabeth, daughter and sole heir of Josceline, the last earl, brought it, in the year 1682, to Charles Duke of Somerset, whose son Algernon, the succeeding duke, was in 1749 created Baron Cockermouth and Earl of Egremont, with remainder to Sir Charles Wyndham, son of his sister Catherine, by Sir William Wyndham, Bart. Algernon Earl of Egremont, died 7th February, 1750, when his nephew, Sir Charles Wyndham, succeeded as Earl of Egremont, and from him the barony of Egremont and honour of Cockermouth have descended to the General Wyndham the present lord. The principal landowners are the trustees of the late Thomas Hartley, Esq.; Anthony Dixon, Esq.; Thomas Nelson, Esq.; the trustees of the late William Bragg, Esq.; Henry Jefferson, Esq.; John Birley, Esq.; — Gaitskell, Esq.; and B. Caddy, Esq. We subjoin the following account of the lords of Egremont from Jefferson's Allerdale Ward-above-Derwent, page 36, et seq.—

De Meschines.

"William de Meschines received this barony by grant from his brother Ranulph. He left at his death an only daughter, Alice, married to Robert de Romeley, lord of the honour of Skipton in Craven.

De Romeley.

"Robert de Romeley just mentioned acquired the barony of Egremont on his marriage as above, in right of his wife. He had issue a daughter, Alice, married to Fitz Duncan.

"William Fitz-Duncan, earl of Murray, nephew of David King of Scots, being the son of his brother Duncan by Ochthreda, his wife, sister and heiress of Waltheof, or Waldieve, first lord of Allerdale, who was the son of Gospatric Earl of Dunbar. William Fitz-Duncan had issue by Alice, his wife, just named, William, who died an infant, and three daughters co-heiresses—First, Cicely, who was married to William le Gros, earl of Albermarle, and had issue a daughter named Hawise, who was married to three husbands successively; first to William de Mandeville, earl of Essex, to whom she bore no issue; secondly, to William de Fortibus; and thirdly, to Baldwin Beton, earl of the Isle of Wight. To her second husband, William de Fortibus, who in her right assumed the title of Earl of Albermarle, she had a son, William de Fortibus, who had issue the third William de Fortibus; whose daughter and heir, Aveline (wife to Edmund Crouchback, brother of Edward I.), dying without issue, the third part of William Fitz-Duncan's lands (which was Skipton in Craven) came to the king's hands, and by Edward II. was granted to Robert de Clifford, in exchange for the Clifford lands in the county of Monmouth, in whose posterity it still remains. 2nd, Amabil, the second daughter of William Fitz-Duncan, had for her part of the inheritance this barony of Egremont; and was married to Reginald Lucy, of whom hereafter as lord of Egremont. 3rd, Alice, third daughter, and co-heiress of William Fitz-Duncan, was married to Gilbert Pippard, who was justice itinerant in Wiltshire in the 23rd Henry II. (1176-7), and afterwards was married to Robert Courtney, but had no issue; and, in consequence, her share of her father's inheritance (which was the liberty of Cockermouth, Aspatia, and the barony of Allerdale-below-Derwent) was divided between the Earl of Albermarle, her eldest sister's husband, and Richard de Lucy, her other sister's son. And so it continued divided until the eldest sister's issue was extinguished by the death of Aveline above-mentioned, daughter of the last William de Fortibus; after whose demise, all the land of the Romeleys, both above and below Derwent, came entirely to the heirs of Reginald Lucy and Amabil Romeley, his wife, second daughter of William Fitz-Duncan.

Lucy.

"Reginald Lucy, whose parentage Dugdale declares his inability to discover, married, as we have seen, Amabil Fitz-Duncan. He occurs as governor of Nottingham during the rebellion of the Earl of Leicester in the reign of Henry II., and was present at the coronation of Richard I. By his wife Amabil he had issue his successor.

"Richard Lucy, who granted a charter to the burgesses of Egremont. In the 1st of King John (1199-1200) he paid a fine to the crown of three hundred marks for livery of his lands and license to marry with whom he should think proper. Four years afterwards he gave five marks and one palFREY to the king, that he might have jurors to inquire what customs and services his tenants had used to perform, and to do, him and
